We have forgotten them. Their names are dust.
There is a sure intention in the world,
A steady aim that goes on thru the lands.
We must remember that; for we are those
That ages hand to others, with their hands.
We can not stay the great inevitable.
There will be peace—tho come a thousand wars.
The march is steady, sure, and can not pause;
As earth goes grinding on among the stars.
—Edward Curran in the Forum.
Russian women are said to be born politicians. They must have lost their grip.

ITALY AND AUSTRIA.

The Austrian crisis, after causing a momentary flutter in the various European chancelleries, has simmered down and again assumed something like normal proportions, says the Washington Post. Rumors of Yugoslav mobilizations and massing of troops, current in certain quarters, are categorically and officially denied in Belgrade. Italy's supposed schemes of annexation have been reduced to a simple plan for an economic and customs union, and even this, according to the Rome journal, Messaggero, has proved abortive and unworkable and has been abandoned.

It is further declared that Italy has no intention of taking isolated action regarding Austria, but will continue to base her whole policy vis-à-vis with that state on the existing treaties. Last but not least, it is announced that M. Nintchitch, the Yugoslav minister of foreign affairs, will shortly proceed to Rome to confer with Signor Schanzer, the Italian foreign minister.

As M. Nintchitch has just returned from Marienbad, where, with King Alexander and M. Pashitch, premier of Yugoslavia, he has had long conferences with Dr. Benes, the Czechoslovak premier, he will be in a position to inform the Italian foreign minister of the exact situation in Austria. The resolutions at Marienbad represent the views of the "little entente"—that is to say, the alliance of Czechoslovakia, Roumania, and Yugoslavia.

As the result of these conferences at Marienbad, declared Dr. Benes, the coöperation of the states composing the "little entente" is closer than ever. "Our exchange of views has satisfied us," said the Czechoslovak premier, "that the peace of central Europe depends upon us and on our continued and active collaboration, and we are confident in our ability to maintain it."

There was little verisimilitude in the reports that Italy planned the annexation of Austria. That country, in her present plight, would be a mere deadweight, and Italy has certainly no ambition to hang such a millstone round her neck. She is struggling with enough economic problems of her own without adopting any additional burdens. The greatest advantage that could be accorded to Austria would be the throwing down of the economic barriers which today exist between her and the states composing the "little entente." When this is done the former Austrian Empire will be reconstructed in its main economic lines and fresh prospects of industrial and commercial prosperity opened up to the states entering the combination.

Inscriptions on animals' bones are the earliest form of Chinese writing. The British Museum possesses a few specimens.

FURNISHED HOUSES FOR RENT

VERNON HEIGHTS, Oakland

Attractively furnished, desirable modern house, in charming garden; 6 master bedrooms, 3 baths, sleeping porch, garage, laundry, furnace, Ruud heater, 2 maids' rooms and bath; fine view. Mrs. George F. Bowman, 2460 Union Street, San Francisco, West 895.

MILLS COLLEGE SCHOOL OF MUSIC

EXTENSION OPPORTUNITIES

New equipment in instruments and studio space makes possible a limited number of extension students in the study of Piano, Organ, Voice, Stringed Instruments and Theory.

For information call
Elmhurst 10, or write to

LUTHER MARCHANT
School of Music, Mills College

THE SANTA BARBARA GIRLS' SCHOOL

Resident and Day Pupils. Eleven acres. Country Life and Sports. Sleeping-porches. Open-air school rooms. Riding. Swimming all the year round. Basis of work, clear thinking.

MARIAN L. CHAMBERLAIN, A. M., Principal
P.O. Box 548, SANTA BARBARA, CAL.

William Warren School for Boys

MENLO PARK, CAL.
Write for Catalogue

The Katharine Branson School, Inc. ROSS, MARIN COUNTY, CALIFORNIA

A COUNTRY SCHOOL FOR GIRLS

DAY AND RESIDENT COLLEGE PREPARATORY

Heads: Katharine Fleming Branson, A. B., Bryn Mawr
Laura Elizabeth Branson, A. B., Bryn Mawr

THE ALLEGED HUMORISTS.

Jack—Aunt Amelia's out. Caller—I'm so sorry. I've never met her. Jack—Then jolly well touch wood quick.—Punch.

"What's your husband growling about?" "He's cross because I'm taking him out to enjoy himself."—London Mail.

The Calf (referring to pump)—What's that, mother? The Cow—That, my dear, is a pump. It has been collaborating with me for years.—Life.

"Congenial set in your apartment house?" "Best I ever met with. Everybody is determined not to know anybody else."—Louisville Courier-Journal.

Miss Flirty—Jack, that man at the fifth table hasn't taken his eyes off me since we came in. Her Escort—How do you know?—Boston Evening Transcript.

Flannigan—What hit ye, Mike? Ye're all shredded. Mike—Me own dog did it. I went home sober last night, and he didn't know me.—Dartmouth Jack o' Lantern.

"I don't see why you call Jamieson stupid. He says a clever thing quite often." "Exactly. He doesn't seem to realize it should be said only once."—Columbia Jester.

Customer—You don't seem very quick at figures, my boy? Newboy—I'm out o' practice, sir. You see, most of the gents say, "Keep the change."—London Titi-Bits.

Elderly Hostess—Really, I am horrified! No child has ever spoken to me like that in all my life! Five-Year-Old Betty—Exactly; that's the way you've been spoiled.—Judge.

Crawford—The damp weather is blamed for the plague of mosquitoes. Crabshaw—It's more likely the way the little dames are dressing. Look at all the bait in sight.—Judge.

A correspondent says there are two kinds of non-prohibitionists in this country—those who have a little still and those who have still a little.—Boston Evening Transcript.

"What d'you think of the Smithson girl?" "Oh, well—er—she's a rather nice little thing, isn't she?" "Ye-es, but—cat to cat—what d'you think of her?"—London Daily Express.

"Why are those two fighting?" "About Mrs. Anderson." "What, jealousy?" "No. The one above married her recently on the advice of the other fellow."—Stockholm Kasper.

Film Star—How much will you charge to get me my divorce? Lawyer—If you'll agree to let me handle all your divorce suits for the next ten years, I'll make you a special price.—Life.

"I really dislike to talk to her; she has such a habit of finishing one's sentences for one. You know the kind?" "Yes, they listen faster than you can talk to them."—Boston Transcript.

He—Indeed, I am fond of children, particularly in the country. She—Why particularly when you're in the country? He—Not when I am in the country. When they are.—Paris Sans-Gêne.

Provincial (after fall of curtain on Act II)—What's the next act about? His Wife (consulting programme)—Says 'ere, "Act III same as Act I." Provincial—What, all over again? Not me. Let's 'op it.—Punch.

"I understand your husband isn't going to contest your suit for divorce." "No. That's the way he's always been. There never was any fun quarreling with him because he wouldn't talk back."—Detroit Free Press.

Struggling Author—There was a lot of paper on my desk. What has become of it? Cleaner—I threw it out. I thought it was waste-paper. Struggling Author—It wasn't waste-paper. I haven't written anything on it yet.—Punch.

Smith—How's the liquor question in the West? Jones (who has just returned)—No question at all. Why in one town I was in the water had been turned off for a week and the inhabitants didn't know it until they had a fire.—California Pelican.

College President—So you want a job as a professor. Did you ever earn any money in your business? Applicant—No, not to any marked degree. College President—Very well, you will be given a position in our economics department.—Stanford Chaparral.

Youth (by the sea)—You little thought a week ago that you'd be sitting on a lonely seashore with a man then unknown to you. Maiden—Oh, yes, I did. Youth—But, dear, you didn't know me then! Maiden—Of course not, but I knew myself.—London Opinion.

Small Boy—Mother, can God see everything? Mother—Yes, dear. Small Boy—Can he look through cloth and iron? Mother—Yes, dear. He can even do that. Small Boy—My gosh! Think of all the circuses he must have seen for nothing.—Los Angeles Times.

The essence of tyranny, it is said, is power without responsibility. Under our present organization, or lack of it, when a group procures legislation it exercises this power, says John Corbin in the North American Review. But there is another menace to the freedom of a nation, equally great—that its elected representatives have responsibility without power. Thanks to the uncontrolled activity of groups, that is the case with even a numerically strong majority. Congress is fast becoming a mere rubber stamp for selfish, warring group interests. "Will the Republicans control the next Congress?" one politician asked another in the fateful months of 1922. "What difference does that make?" was the answer. "They can't control this one." Harassed by multifarious machinations, even the "strongest" majority finds itself impotent to serve, not merely the nation, but—grim portent—its own political fortunes.

Only queen bees and workers have the power to sting. The drones can not sting. The stinger is curved, and is carried sheathed. After the point enters there is a flow of poison. It is believed that a bee can not sting a second time because, owing to backward pointing barbs the stinger is left in the wound. Thus, the bee dies as a result of its vengeance.

The municipal council of Amsterdam includes five women.

A Drawer in an Office Desk is admittedly no place for valuable documents, such as deeds, wills, contracts, bonds, etc.

A Safe Deposit Box in the Crocker Safe Deposit Vaults (Crocker Bldg.) for $4.00 a year will give you peace of mind.

TREASON HARD TO PUNISH.

Convictions for treason against the United States have been very few, and it is a striking fact that at no time in our national history has any one actually been punished as a result of judicial conviction for the crime, says James G. Randall in the North American Review. Some of the leaders of the Whisky Rebellion of 1794 were convicted and sentenced to death as traitors, but were pardoned by President Washington.

In 1798 an insurrection in eastern Pennsylvania to resist a land tax passed by Congress gave rise to the famous Fries case. Fries was tried for treason, and it was in his elaborate charge to the jury, since often cited, that Judge Iredell declared that opposing the execution of any law by force of arms amounted to levying war. Fries was convicted and sentenced to death, but was pardoned by President Adams.

The Burr case was the most notable treason trial in our history, and it illustrated well the many legal obstacles that stand in the way of a conviction for this crime. In spite of the intense popular resentment against Burr, and the efforts of the administration at Washington under President Jefferson to have him convicted, the jury found it impossible under the instructions of the judge, John Marshall, to bring in an adverse verdict, even though it seems clear that they desired to do so. Burr was known to be connected with an assemblage of men on Blennerhassett's Island in the Ohio River, but it was not proved that any act of war took place in connection with this assemblage, the evidence tending to show Burr's connection with it was ruled out, and the prosecution had no other evidence to offer.

During the civil war the general law of treason was used but slightly, special acts being passed which related to the existing "rebellion." The Treason Law of July 17, 1862 (called also the second Confiscation Act), is chiefly notable, perhaps, for its softening of the penalty for treason. According to the law of 1790, death was the only penalty, but few favored enforcing the extreme penalty against the thousands who were (according to the Union view) guilty of treason. The new act therefore gave the court the discretion to decree either death or fine and imprisonment for treason, while for insurrection or rebellion (which seemed to be recognized as a distinct offense in the law) death was not provided at all, the prescribed penalties being imprisonment, fine, and confiscation.

Of the hundreds of thousands who were technically "traitors" during the civil war, only a few hundred were even indicted. Of these only a very limited number were brought to trial, and none were actually punished for the offense.

In the case of Jefferson Davis, preparations were made for his prosecution, the charge being treason, before the Federal Circuit Court at Richmond under the act of 1790, the penalty of which was death; but the general amnesty proclamation of December, 1868, caused the dismissal of his and all similar cases.

During the great war, the Treason Law was found unavailable as a means of punishing disloyal and hostile acts, and the Espionage Act was passed to deal with the emergency. Four prosecutions for treason were instituted merely as test cases to develop the possibilities of the statutes, but none of them resulted in conviction. In one of these cases (United States vs. Werner, in the Eastern District of Pennsylvania, 247 Federal Reporter, 708) the government's attorneys attempted to fasten the crime of treason upon the editors of a German language newspaper on the ground of discouraging enlistments, obstructing war measures, falsifying war news, and the like, but the court held that, while words published in a newspaper may be adduced to show treasonable intent if taken in connection with an overt act, and while the conveying of messages valuable to the enemy is treasonable, yet something more than the mere publication of sentiments must be shown.

This recapitulation will make it clear that the severity and extreme features of the Federal treason statutes make them really unavailable as actual instruments of judicial prosecution, and that in the rare cases when conviction has occurred, executive clemency has always interposed to prevent punishment.

There is no sounder critic of golf than Mr. Bernard Darwin, and the explanation which he gives for the triumph of the American amateurs over the British invaders is the same as that which he advanced for the victory of the American professionals in the British open championship, says the New York Times. The Americans play the better short game. Especially do they excel in that shortest of all short games, the dropping of the ball into the cup with a single stroke from any part of the green. That certainly is a fair inference from the analysis of the play on the National links the day before yesterday. The Americans won by putting. Mr. Darwin sorrowfully but firmly concludes that the British have much to learn from their conquerors in what he calls "this damnable and seductive art."

It has been recently found that photographs of stars down to the sixth magnitude of degree of brightness can be taken in broad daylight. If the photographs are taken through a deep red screen the stars appear distinctly.

FOR A
CLEAR COMPLEXION
and a HEALTHY COLOR
eat
FLEISCHMANN'S YEAST

Three Cakes a Day

ENGLISH
CASEMENTS
and Windows
for banks, offices, schools,
hospitals, etc.

for artistic residences and
other substantial buildings

Made in varied designs
to meet all conditions

CRITTALL
Steel Casements

Coast Representatives

J. E. DWAN, Los Angeles F. T. CROWE & CO., Tacoma and Seattle
WATERHOUSE-WILCOX CO., San Francisco J. McCRAKEN, Portland

Crittall Casement Window Co., Detroit, Manufacturers

KING
COAL

High in Heat Units
Low in Ash

FOR SALE BY ALL DEALERS
IN CALIFORNIA

KING COAL CO.

Main Office
EXCHANGE BLOCK
San Francisco

Wholesale Only

The Argonaut.

VOL. LXXXI. No. 2374.

SAN FRANCISCO, SEPTEMBER 23, 1922.

Price Ten Cents

PUBLISHER'S NOTICE: The Argonaut (title trade-marked) is published every week by the Argonaut Publishing Company. Subscriptions, $5.00 per year; six months, $2.55; three months, $1.50, payable in advance—postage prepaid. Subscriptions to all foreign countries within the Postal Union, $6.00 per year. Sample copies free. Single copies, 10 cents. News Dealers and Agents in the interior supplied by the San Francisco News Company, 747 Howard Street, San Francisco. Subscribers wishing their addresses changed should give their old as well as new addresses. The American News Company, New York, are agents for the Eastern trade. The Argonaut may be ordered from any News Dealer or Postmaster in the United States or Europe. Special advertising rates to publishers. Address all communications to The Argonaut, 207 Powell Street, San Francisco. Make all checks, drafts, postal orders, etc., payable to "The Argonaut Publishing Company."

Entered at the San Francisco Postoffice as second-class matter. The Argonaut can be obtained in London at the International News Co., Breams Building, Chancery Lane; American Newspaper and Advertising Agency, Trafalgar Square, Northumberland Avenue; and at Daws Steamship Agency, 47 Green Street, Leicester Square, and can be ordered from any of the news-stands of W. H. Smith & Son. In Paris, at 37 Avenue de l'Opéra. In New York, at Brentano's, Fifth Avenue and Twenty-Fourth Street. In Chicago, Western News Company. In Washington, at Adams' News Agency, Ninth and G Streets.

The Argonaut is on sale at the Ferry Station, San Francisco, by Foster & Orear; on the ferryboats of the Key Route system by the news agents, and by the Van Noy-Interstate Company on Southern Pacific boats and trains.

Telephone, Kearny 5895. Publication office, 207 Powell Street. WM. J. MILLIKEN, Business Manager.

FORTY-SIXTH YEAR

ALFRED HOLMAN - - - - - Editor

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

|   |         |
|---|---------|
| EDITORIAL: The Proposed School Bond Issue—The Bonus Veto—England and the Turk—America's Part in the War—Mrs. Harding's Illness—Again Mexico—That Wooden Fleet ..... | 193-195 |
| LETTERS TO THE EDITOR .....   | 195     |
| THE WARLIKE TURK: He Has Not Been Lacking in Martial Energy or the Use of Improved Weapons .....  | 195-196 |
| OLD FAVORITES .....   | 196     |
| INDIVIDUALITIES: Notes About Prominent People All Over the World .....  | 196     |
| "THE LADIES!" Feminism of the Days of Pepys and Horace Walpole Treads a Minuet in the Pages of E. Barrington .....  | 197     |
| BANKING AND INVESTMENT NEWS .....   | 198-199 |
| BOOKS ON THE TABLE: Notes of Books and Authors .....  | 200     |
| REVIEWS AND NOTICES: New Books Received .....   | 201     |
| DRAMA: "Nju"; The Orpheum; Dramatic Prospects. By Josephine Hart Phelps .....   | 202     |
| FOYER AND BOX-OFFICE .....  | 203     |
| VANITY FAIR: The Marcel Wave—Turkish Prudery—The Celery Obligate .....  | 204     |
| STORYETTES: Grave and Gay, Epigrammatic and Otherwise .....   | 205     |
| THE MERRY MUSE .....  | 205     |
| PERSONAL: Social Notes—Movements and Whereabouts .....  | 206-207 |
| CURRENT VERSE .....   | 207     |
| THE ALLEGED HUMORISTS .....   | 208     |

The Proposed School Bond Issue.

In addition to the annual budget of $4,799,144 for current expenses of the school department there is demanded from the taxpayers of San Francisco a lump sum of $12,000,000, to take the form of bonded indebtedness, for the purchase of sites and the erection of some thirty-odd new schoolhouses in San Francisco. There is need for better school facilities and something ought to be done in the way of providing them. And doubtless the demanded twelve millions will be granted, since the verdict is to be by popular vote, in which the "have-nots" will decide what shall be done at the cost of the "haves." The normal way to augment our school facilities would be by the moderate process of building one schoolhouse after another. This would be the course of prudence and economy. Upon the basis of a bulk grant of twelve million dollars there will certainly be a riot of extravagance. It will be difficult or impossible to sell the bonds at par, as the law requires, but the restriction will be evaded by paying for contracted work in bonds. To the bids as prepared by contractors there will be added a percentage sufficient to cover the estimated loss—or something more—involved in selling the bonds at a low price. Favored parties will be given the contracts and the looting of the taxpayers will proceed blithely. This is the way we have been doing things in recent years and there is little hope of a change. And so it will continue just so long as we shall put into office professional exploiters of the public, men of no business capability, of no individual responsibility, and of relatively low character.

Advanced engineering opinion has discerned what is probably an error, and a costly one, in the common practice of schoolhouse construction. According to this view it is a mistake to pay for permanence. In twenty-five years or less the type of building becomes obsolete, through changes in teaching requirements, and then the community has on its hands a heavy investment, too good to scrap, and upon which it is still paying interest. One-storied buildings where possible, of cheap materials, with numerous wide exits for safety in case of fire, will do all that brick and steel can do, and at much smaller cost. Unfortunately the community has become wedded to the idea that in order to have good school buildings it is necessary to pay as much as possible. The tenacity with which this view is held is assisted by many improvement clubs and "booster" organizations whose idea seems to be to have something expensive about which to brag. Some sober second thought on the subject might save us money and give us more school buildings at the same time.

The Bonus Veto.

President Harding has done well to veto the bonus bill. He has done even better to embody in his message of rejection the underlying moral considerations upon which the veto rests. He makes clear the reasons why special payment for service in the war to those who returned in health and competence ought not to be granted. We quote:

Citizens of every degree of competence loaned and sacrificed, precisely in the same spirit that our armed forces went out for service. The war spirit impelled. To a war necessity there was but one answer, but a peace bestowal on the ex-service men, as though the supreme offering could be paid for with cash, is a perversion of public funds, a reversal of the policy which exalted public service in the past and suggests that future defense is to be inspired by compensation rather than consciousness of duty to flag and country.

In giving approval to "the avowed purpose of the bill" the President is careful to define that purpose as an "expression of the nation's gratitude." Appreciation and gratitude for service do not imply approval of demands upon the national treasury. The President makes this point clear. Likewise in avowing the "binding obligation of the country to its defenders" he limits its financial phase to those "who left the armies injured, disabled, and diseased," and "unable to resume their places in the normal activities of life." These reservations are pertinent and wise. In precisely defining the obligations of the government they serve also to place limits upon its obligations. In thus drawing a clear line relative to the government's duty the President does much to clarify a confusion of mind that has failed to discriminate between sentimental and material commitments. He "avows" the former; he denies the latter, defining it as that "which the soldiers themselves while serving in the world war did not expect."

There will undoubtedly be an attempt to pass the rejected bill over the President's veto, but it is not likely to succeed. The House of Representatives may give the requisite two-thirds vote, but a tentative poll of the Senate indicates defeat of the measure in that body. The bill is dead, as it deserves to be; and there is little prospect of its being revived—at least not in the form that has characterized it up to date.

Partly in ignorance, but mostly in the spirit of mendacity, it has been asserted that the bonus was a pledge of the Republican national platform of 1920. The Hearst press has ceaselessly asserted this falsehood. The record speaks for itself—here it is in the full text of the 1920 platform as it relates to those who served in the war:

We hold in imperishable remembrance the valor and the patriotism of the soldiers and sailors of America who fought in the great war for human liberty, and we pledge ourselves to discharge to the fullest the obligations which a grateful nation justly should fulfill, in appreciation of the services rendered by its defenders on sea and on land.

Republicans are not ungrateful. Throughout their history they have shown their gratitude toward the nation's defenders. Liberal legislation for the care of the disabled and infirm and their dependents has ever marked Republican policy toward the soldier and sailor of all the wars in which our country has participated. The present Congress has appropriated generously for the disabled of the world war.

The amounts already applied and authorized for the fiscal year 1920-21 for this purpose reached the stupendous sum of $1,180,571,893. This legislation is significant of the party's purpose in generously caring for the maimed and disabled men of the recent war.

If in this declaration there is the promise of a bonus there must be something amiss with the Argonaut's mind, since after many careful readings we can not find it.

England and the Turk.

Owing to the collapse of the Greek military efforts in Anatolia and the alarming development of Turkish strength, the Lloyd George government has ordered the British fleet into the Dardanelles and dispatched Lord Curzon, its foreign minister, to Paris to confer with Premier Poincaré, Count Sforza of Italy, and representatives of the Little Entente, with a view to some concert of action that will prevent a restoration of the Turk in Europe.

Since the sack of Smyrna by the Turkish forces last week, the gravity of the situation has become apparent, and a call has gone out to the overseas dominions of the British Empire to support the defense of Constantinople. It is said that the call has not been received everywhere with enthusiasm. Hope is expressed that a way will be found out of the present trouble without another general war. Meanwhile the victorious Turkish commander has gone to Nicomedia, close to Constantinople, where he will be able to consult the remains of the old Turkish government. He declares the Christians must get out of Asia Minor, the Allies out of Gallipoli, the Greeks out of Thrace. England is said to be determined that the Turks shall not return into Europe, and ready to go to war in order to prevent it. The language of the cabinet is that of high resolve: "The empire will not consent to sacrifice the result of the gallant struggle and decisive victories of her sons in the western theatre." As the Argonaut goes to press things seem to be tending toward a sharp conflict between England and the Turk, with the further possibility of a clash between Western civilization and Mohammedanism, out of whose fundamental antagonism the whole trouble really grows.

America's Part in the War.

Remarks attributed to Mr. Rudyard Kipling in belittlement of America's part in the war are marked more by assumption and presumption than acquaintance with the facts; and we shall be glad if it turns out that Mr. Kipling has been misinterpreted. Yet undoubtedly there are many in England, perhaps in our own country as well, who have an erroneous impression as to the part we played in the war. There is reason for it. The fact that our President was an avowed pacifist—"too proud to fight" and hopeful of "peace without victory"—and that he had in the executive departments of the government, including those directly administering our military and navy establishments, creatures similarly minded, has tended to mislead many even of our own people as to the extent and value of our participation in the great conflict. That we were late in getting in is a fact of which there can be no denial and of which most Americans are frankly ashamed. The motives that kept us out of the war long after we should have been in it are apart from the purpose of this writing, which is to consider what we did after we got in. Yet it may be said in passing that long before the spirit and will of the American people succeeded in pushing a reluctant administration to action we were promoting the war in its most serious requirements by holding open our market and extending credits.

Since America is so frequently stigmatized as thinking in terms of dollars we take license to speak first of the financial phase of our part in the war and of our contribution to the relief of Europe since its end. We sent in round numbers two millions of men to the battlefield. Of this vast total something over 70 per cent., or in numbers 1,400,000, went in British ships and for their transportation we paid to the tune of $250 per man—a total of $350,000,000. We paid other vast sums, of which we have not exact figures, for transportation of munitions, food, horses and other materials and accessories of war. Probably one billion dollars is a low estimate of the sums paid to England upon transportation account. During the war period and since we have waived interest on amounts due us from the countries with whom we were associated in the war. Concurrently we extended credits which still stand against our allies. Since the war we have bought foreign securities to the extent of approximately three-quarters of a billion dollars each year. Summarized, our financial contribution to Europe during the war and in the more recent period stand as follows:

|  |                  |
|--|------------------|
| American securities repurchased from abroad..... | $ 3,000,000,000 |
| American government loans.....                   | 10,000,000,000   |
| Interest on government loans.....                | 2,000,000,000    |
| Commercial credits extended abroad.....          | 3,000,000,000    |
| Dollar securities bought from foreign countries: |                  |
| 1919 .....                                       | 713,000,000      |
| 1920 .....                                       | 571,000,000      |
| 1921 .....                                       | 596,000,000      |
| 1922 (8 months).....                             | 751,000,000      |
| Foreign-money securities sold here:              |                  |
| 1919, 1920, 1921 and 1922.....                   | 620,000,000      |
| Foreign currencies bought by America.....        | 500,000,000      |
| Total.....                                       | $21,751,000,000 |

It is in no spirit of self-righteousness or boastfulness that we refer to this record. But it is right that the people of Europe, and of our own country as well, should be informed that statements to the effect that we have shirked our obligations in the war and that we continue to shirk them are based on false premises. In effect they represent ignorance and presumption rather than acquaintance with actual facts. We say actual facts because the statement as above tabulated comes from official sources, verified by Mr. D. R. Cris-senger, Comptroller of the Treasury, and presented by him in an address before the Indiana Bankers' Association at Indianapolis on the 13th instant.

When the war ended it came before the council table at Paris to allocate the gains and salvages of victory. All were clamorous—America excepted. Mr. Lloyd George, speaking for England, insisted and promised that all Britain's vast financial charges should be paid by the defeated countries—and it was due to his insistence that the sum total of the bill presented to Germany, and which she was forced to accept under duress, ran to the prodigious total of $36,000,000,000. Here, incidentally, it is pertinent to remark that American experts, after careful study of the conditions, wished to place the demand upon Germany, not at the colossal total of $36,000,000,000, but for a sum less by two-thirds—to be precise, $12,000,000,000—which representatives of the Central Powers conceded to be within their capability. France, with more moderation but with notable persistence, demanded indemnities sufficient to repair the damage done by the German armies with partial reimbursement of her charges on war account. Similarly Italy, Belgium, and the lesser participants were eager for whatever might be obtained from the defeated countries. America alone, we repeat, stood aside, asking for nothing. There came to the Allied countries, as contraband of war, great and rich territories in Africa, in the Mediterranean, and in the Pacific Ocean; and these were apportioned to England, to France, to Italy, to Japan. Again America asked for nothing and was awarded nothing. Will Mr. Kipling, or any Englishman with full knowledge of how the account stands, dare deny that in many ways a prodigious net gain accrued, especially to England, in the award of the salvages of the war? Would Mr. Kipling's country today accept the full amount of European debts due to us in exchange for her territorial gains growing out of the war? Verily, she would not.

But not alone in money, or in money plus our participation at the fighting front and on the sea, did America participate in the war. Psychology played its part; and it may not be denied that America's entrance into the war turned the tide toward ultimate victory at a time when nothing else could have done it. Mr. Arthur W. Page, then Ambassador of the United States in London, is a credible witness, and it will tend to the enlightenment of Mr. Kipling, or whoever else may carp at American participation in the war, to study the record as given in confidential memoranda and in letters written while the events were in process. Mr. Page records (see World's Work for September, current year) that at the date of our entrance into the war—April, 1917—"Great Britain had overdrawn her account in America to the extent of $400,000,000 and that she had no cash available to meet this overdraft." This debt had been incurred in purchase of supplies and securities. The money was due, and if it had not been paid British credit would have broken down. What happened in this emergency? The American government paid the debt out of the proceeds of Liberty Bond sales and so saved the credit, not only of England, but of the allied countries which were represented in her purchases. In the meantime England was not able to feed herself. She had barely six weeks' food supply for herself and her allies. Says the editor of the Page letters, summarizing their significance:

If Germany cut the lines of communication and so prevented these supplies from reaching British ports, the population would be starved into surrender, France would be isolated, and the triumph of the Prussian cause would be complete. That the success of the German submarine campaign would accomplish this result was a fact that the popular mind readily grasped. What it did not so clearly see, however, was that the financial collapse of Britain would cut these lines of communication quite as effectively as the submarine itself. The British were practically dependent for their existence on the food brought from the United States just as the Allied armies were largely dependent upon the steel which came from the great industrial plants of this country. If Great Britain could not find the money with which to purchase these supplies, it is quite apparent that they could not be shipped. The collapse of British credit, therefore, would have produced the isolation of the British Isles and led to a British surrender just as decisively as would the success of the German submarine campaign. And it was the American government, through money provided by the American people, that sustained British credit at a time when otherwise it must have collapsed.

It is not in the spirit of self-applause that we recite these facts. It is because they are essential to sound understanding of America's participation in the war and a refutation of charges—even of sneers—that we hear now and again from across the water and even from our own people. It is only just that the truth should be before the world in its full significance. Nobody claims for America that she did more than she ought in the war. But when America is criticized as a shirk and as a moral delinquent it is time the plain truth were forced home, namely that America saved the cause at a time when England was approaching collapse, and that her dealings with Europe since the war have been generous and helpful—helpful probably even to the extent of saving the world from a vast disaster.

A word needs to be said as to America's part in bringing about "premature peace." It is true that the war ended prematurely. It is true that peace should have been signed, not at Versailles, but at the gates of Berlin—or above her ashes. It is true that the correspondence relative to the armistice was conducted on the side of the Allies in the name of the then President of the United States. But Mr. Wilson did not speak upon his individual initiative and for the United States alone. The facts are that the German government applied to the President of the United States and that the latter in conference by cable with at least one European power—Britain—and probably others made reply for the Allies. There can be no doubt on this point. The Argonaut can speak positively. By curious chance its editor was at the moment in England and in relationships that gave him the facts at first hand. He was present at a conference in which participation was declared and approval recorded of Mr. Wilson's first and second letters in response to the German request for armistice, by the most authoritative personalities in Britain. That it was a mistake—that the armistice, being a military matter, should have been referred to General Foch—is now conceded. The point was raised at the time, but it was not heeded. The British government wanted immediate peace and cooperated with President Wilson in the correspondence that brought it about prematurely. It was not America alone, acting through her President, but

America in consultation with Britain, acting through her authorities, that ended the war before it reached its logical climax at the gates of Berlin—or above her ashes.

Mrs. Harding's Illness.

The illness of Mrs. Harding, now happily passing, has touched the heart of the country. When the gravity of her condition became known the sympathetic response was immediate, spontaneous, universal. Explanation does not lie wholly in the fact that the sufferer is the wife of the President. In large measure it lies in the humanness of the Hardings, in the fact that over and above maintaining the official character of the White House they have given it an atmosphere of friendliness—almost of neighborliness. What the Hardings were in their home town of Marion, and later in the senatorial life of Washington, they have been in the White House. There has been the same freedom from pose, the same simplicity and cordiality. There has been no stately mystery about their lives, no appearance of isolation. And all this without sacrifice of dignity or of conventional form.

Sincerity and simplicity have marked the conduct of Mrs. Harding from the hour she entered the White House as its mistress. Of her sufficiency upon formal occasions the whole world has knowledge, but it has remained for kindly gossip to reveal a more intimate expression of her character. A recent visitor at the White House tells of finding Mrs. Harding busy transferring a piece of silk from a sofa pillow to repair a break in the covering of a chair. It was a small economy characteristic of careful and thrifty housewifery, and under the circumstances especially pleasing. A recent dinner guest at the White House upon being tendered a cup of coffee brewed upon the table by the hostess begged off upon the plea that he suffered a state of nerves under which indulgence in coffee at night implied later denial of sleep. "This will not harm you," replied Mrs. Harding; "it comes right from home—from Marion. It is warranted not to affect the most sensitive nerves." "My wife," replied the guest, "is a coffee lover and she has tested all the substitutes and dopes, but none of them work with us." There was no further insistence, but later, upon his leaving the White House, there was handed him with his hat and coat a tin of coffee for his wife with the compliments of Mrs. Harding. Trivial things, to be sure. None the less significantly revealing kindness—a neighborly homeliness—on the part of the mistress of the White House.

President Harding has had his share in maintaining a gracious atmosphere in the great official establishment for the time being his home and in his keeping. The courtesy that marks his official hours is transmuted into cordiality the moment he enters the domestic atmosphere. It is universal testimony that no host could be more free from any form of affectation, more solicitous for the comfort of whoever may be his guest.

Again Mexico.

From private sources of unquestionable reliability the Argonaut learns that conditions in Mexico, while presenting a fairly smooth surface, are hardly better than they were prior to Obregon's taking on of the presidency. There is no open rebellion, but there would be if the Obregon government would take a positive stand against abuses. He holds on under a policy of toleration. Under this policy there is given to sinister forces a species of license to pursue their courses by whatever methods may please them. The German element, which came into a position of large influence in the chaos of recent years, continues in a species of dominance. But wherever Americans are concerned, property is seized at will and there is no means by which it may be recovered. The courts are largely controlled by bribery. In the more remote districts brigandage in a relatively mild form abounds, the owners of mines and the great ranches being compelled as heretofore to pay tribute to marauding bands. By these bands there is persistent discrimination against the property of Americans. Protection may not be had from Obregon, not because he would not be glad to give it, but for the reason that he is powerless. In the cities bolshevism, under the inspiration of German socialists, has taken a profound hold upon the people, and very recently, upon an occasion similar to our Labor Day, a procession of twelve thousand men marched through the streets of the capital, each man in line bearing a red flag with a mourning border. Nobody doubts that the Obregon government would have been glad to suppress this demonstration if it had dared.

These facts are of course known to the State Department at Washington and, beyond a doubt, they explain why we have not given formal recognition to the Obregon régime. While nominally in an orderly state, Mexico is in the hands of its mobs in a degree hardly less than it was three years back, when there was no pretense of government. The military group is held in restraint by liberal and regular payments from the national treasury, and it will remain quiescent just so long as there is compliance with its demands. On the whole, while murder and outrage are less rampant than formerly, the condition is not very much improved, and those with close knowledge of the situation are doubtful if it ever can be until force is applied from the outside.

Since the day of Huerta, the Argonaut has held the opinion that peace and order in Mexico will not be attained until this country shall assume toward that country something comparable to its attitude toward Cuba. In spite of the prevailing semblance to order we see no reason to modify this judgment. There does not, we are convinced, abide in Mexico the power to regulate the affairs of the country and to establish conditions of general security. A day must surely come when we shall be compelled for the protection of our interests and our people, and of social order in general, to establish a species of guardianship comparable to the relationship we sustain toward the affairs of Cuba

That Wooden Fleet.

A fleet of wooden ships built by the government during the war, and which in detachments of anywhere from five to fifty have been lying in quiet harbors during the past five years, was knocked down last week to the highest bidder for $750,000. This figure is in sharp and painful contrast with the original cost of these ships—approximately $300,000,000—not to mention the many millions expended more recently for care-taking and insurance. None the less the government is well rid of an incubus since, regarded as ships, these vessels are valueless. They are of small tonnage, of hasty and faulty construction, and of a type for which there is no use in normal commerce. The syndicate that has taken them over, so it is said, will seek its profit in salvage of materials contained in these vessels.

There is instinctive temptation to gibe at this deal as illustrating the scandals and the wastes of the war period. From a business standpoint the whole transaction is marked by folly. The loss to the government is obvious. But it is to be remembered that it was for no business purpose that these vessels were created and that under the circumstances of their construction ordinary business considerations had no part. This fleet was created at a time when there was immediate demand for ships to carry supplies of food and munitions to Europe. In the judgment of those in authority there was no time to build steel ships. What was wanted, and wanted grievously, was anything that would float and do the work. The need was imperative and time was the essence of the situation. Very possibly—indeed we think in fact—there was bad judgment in the whole business, but there is no evidence that there was lack of good intent and a good faith. Ships were wanted, and a wooden fleet was planned to meet the requirement. That it did not meet it or even attempt to do so is due to the fact that the war came to its end before the boats were ready.

For the motive under which construction of the wooden fleet began we have only to turn back the pages of history to April, 1917, when the United States entered the war. At that time the German submarines were doing prodigious damage. The monthly toll of losses ran into heavy tonnage and fear was universal that under the ratio of destruction the Allied armies fighting the Germans and the people of the Allied countries might soon be in the grip of famine. The need of the Allied cause was for ships. Writing from London in April, 1917, the late Arthur W. Page, American Ambassador to Britain, said:

We find the need of more ships—ships, ships, ships—troop ships, food ships, munitions ships, auxiliary ships of the navy, wooden ships, steel ships, little ships, big ships, ships, ships, ships, without end of number.

Here was truly a hurry call. In the judgment of those in authority the quickest way to answer this call was to build wooden ships. This was done, perhaps not with judgment, certainly with extravagance. But it is to be pleaded in extenuation that the need was great and immediate. Anything was better than nothing. And since the wooden ships might be built in less time than steel ships, orders were given and the fleet was created.

It is true that no one of these ships ever did any service in the sense of carrying men, food, or munitions to the war zone. None the less they served a purpose in that the enterprise of their hurried building had a profound psychological effect. It was concrete evidence to the German government that America was in the war and that she was to make contribution of her tremendous resources without stint. There may have been those in the German war organization who knew better than our own authorities that this method of creating a fleet was not founded in sound judgment. But at least they knew that in a frantic effort to cover the ocean with transports there was determination backed by a resource that could not in the end fail to be decisive. Beyond a doubt this great fleet of little boats, built at such tremendous cost and now sold for a trifle, played an important part in forcing upon the Germans the state of mind that ultimately brought about surrender. Waste there was in the wooden ship programme—grievous waste. But it was not all waste.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR.

A Kind Word for Storyettes.

YEON BUILDING,
PORTLAND, OREGON, August 24, 1922.
TO THE ARGONAUT: I read with interest the various letters addressed to your editor commenting on the masterful presentation of timely topics, and I have most often silently acquiesced with the writers. Amid our appreciation for the "sublime" I hope we do not lose sight of the genuine humor contained in every issue. I modestly confess that I have become so attached to your "storyettes" that I turn to them first.
Very truly yours,
L. EDWARD TONKON.

A Word of Approval.

SANTA BARBARA, September 19, 1922.
DEAR ARGONAUT: Your September 16th number is one of your best. I wish that the sound and common-sense statement touching the claim of the labor unions for a wage that should provide "reasonable comfort" could be read by millions instead of thousands. We are embarked on a programme to try these socialist notions and with few politicians who have either the knowledge or the courage to tell the truth. Please send me half a dozen copies of the Argonaut of the 16th.
S. H.

Boldness Versus Courage.

SAN LUIS OBISPO, September 17, 1922.
TO THE EDITOR:—Sir: It is a common remark that Senator Johnson is a man of courage. The remark fails to take into account the real meaning of the word "courage." Senator Johnson has boldness, which is a very different thing from courage, and particularly on the stump, before an audience, under the stimulus of public speaking, he has great audacity. It is related of Abelard that when he came to the University of Paris to teach philosophy, while yet a very young man, he felt himself at a disadvantage in comparison with the theologians in the disputation. He accordingly retired for two years and gave himself to the study of theology. On his return, his biographer quaintly remarks that his "power of vituperation was unexcelled."

It is not recorded that Senator Johnson ever studied Theology, but he had a long experience as a criminal lawyer, and his power of vituperation is his chief political asset. But this also has nothing to do with courage. Courage is a moral quality, that sort of moral bravery which enables a man to take his part in the uncomfortable tasks because it is his duty to face the disagreeable public service, because he owes it to his position to deal frankly with great public issues to the best of his ability, whether they make for or against his own political fortunes. Senator Johnson's greatest weakness lies in the lack of this quality.

The most thorny question which has come before Congress in recent years, the industrial situation, was dealt with in the Esch-Cummings bill. Naturally the politicians disliked it, but men of courage dealt with it to the best of their ability. Senator Johnson sidestepped. When the Newberry case was voted on in the Senate, Senator Johnson found it agreeable to be absent. It was not a pleasant question for him to face, but a man of courage would have faced it whether the approval of Senator Newberry's case or not. The most vicious legislation before the American Congress today is the so-called "Bonus Bill," but men of courage in the Republican party have stood nobly against it. Senator Johnson is for it. Its advocacy is supposed to carry votes.

In no matter has Mr. Johnson shown his lack of courage more clearly than in his attitude toward organized labor. Here again votes are involved. The true friend of labor approves its course when it is right and as a true friend frankly tells it when it is wrong. The present grave situation in industrial matters is largely due to the cowardice of men like Senator Johnson, who fail to do their duty both toward labor and toward the country, and the interests of labor and the interests of the country are one. It doesn't take any courage for a politician to wax eloquent over the sins of a corporation. The most timid politician on earth has nothing to fear from any such attack. When Governor Johnson went out after the corporations his roar could be heard from Shasta to San Diego, but when he was called upon to deal with violations of the law by the labor unions in San Francisco his voice was as meek and mild as that of a sucking dove.

In such emergencies boldness and audacity take to the woods. Courage meets the issue. Senator Johnson has the first, he has hitherto failed to show that sort of moral courage that faces the hard questions the country wants answered. He has contributed nothing to the solution of our most serious domestic problem—the industrial one. If Senator Johnson is a true friend of labor and has at heart the interest of the whole people, let us hope he may take counsel of courage and face the question fairly, thoughtfully, and with an eye single to the good of all.
H. S. H.

Detroit is said to be the greatest open-shop city in the United States.

THE WARLIKE TURK.

He Has Not Been Lacking in Martial Energy or the Use of Improved Weapons.

The Turk is again plaguing Europe and raising the old question as to just how terrible he is. The treaty of Sevres does not suit him at all, nor does the modern conquest of Palestine, the recent smash-up of the Greek adventure in Anatolia has added embarrassments to those expected by the international commission for bringing security to the more or less peacefully disposed people of Northern Asia Minor, murders of non-Turkish persons by Turks are reported in Constantinople, and altogether the outlook is several degrees darker than it was two months ago. The Turk in triumph is not a reassuring spectacle, especially when he feels that he has been despoiled of territory to which his ancestors took title by the sword. Egyptian independence, the Hedjaz business, the French mandate over Syria, and the hand of the western European on Constantinople and the Dardanelles have not had a soothing effect on Turkish nationalism and religious fever. Like Cousin Egbert, the Turk can be pushed just so far, and it looks as though that point had been reached. It hardly repairs things now for the beaten Greeks to blame their once popular king, and to fling themselves into Athens yelling for the return of Venizelos.

In the general admiration of the Germans as methodical war-makers we have been diverted from the talents of the Turks in the same direction. But those that have fallen into the habit of regarding them as slothful voluptuaries, devoted to the entertainment of the harem varied by a debilitating over-indulgence in Hammam baths might do well to consider some past performances. It would take too long to catalogue the battles and victorious wars that marked their invasion of Europe and came within an inch of reducing it to one large mediæval Armenia. What underlay those advances is of more significance. We do not commonly ascribe progressiveness to the Turk; and yet, at his chosen occupation of war-making he has shown some features of management a little ahead of his competitors. It would not be illogical to credit his military leaders with strategy at least equal to that of the enemies they conquered, or they would not have been the conquerors. But in addition the Turks displayed a skill and an invention in arms indicative of mental abilities which, had they been directed to a proper object, might have contributed something to human happiness.

The Turks were the greatest bowmen in Europe, realizing what General Pershing realizes as a result of the recent conflicts: that, other things being equal, individual small arms are determinative in battle. So clearly did they understand this that centuries ago it became the custom for the heir of the throne of the Ottoman Sultans to be apprenticed to a bowyer. The bowyer's trade was thus brought directly under imperial patronage and dignified with its own peculiar prestige. And the weapon was worthy. The English long bow was a good arm, but in snap, speed, and driving power it did not compare with the Turkish short bow, while in construction is showed a relatively infantile simplicity. The English long bow was what is known as a "self bow": that is, it was made from a single stave. Strangely, no steel that men could produce in the days when the bow was important ever had the right qualities. But in the Turkish bow, wood contributed neither elasticity nor force, its function being merely that of a light core or form.

This core had the shape of an open bracelet, the ends nearly meeting. On the outer curve were attached by means of very fine glue two riven pieces of buffalo horn, butted together at the handhold. Along the inner curve were glued a large number of pieces of sinew from the neck muscles of the ox. It took a really terrible Turk to string his bow; no mere sedentary sensualist, but a powerful man. At a meeting of English toxophilites in London about a century ago one of these bows was produced and not an Englishman among them could string it. It took the secretary of the Turkish legation, and he had to get a leg lock on it like Stecher's scissors hold around an opposing wrestler's neck.

When this bow was strung its curves were reversed, and it was so sectioned that it took the form of the Cupid implement in a Valentine; but, as the fellow said, it was far from such. Reversing the curve brought the buffalo horn inside, to resist compression, and the ox-neck sinews outside, to supply the tension. This supplied a lightning snap lacking to any steel then known. The bow was usually covered with beautifully tooled leather to keep dampness out of the glue.

The form of flight arrow had been experimentally determined, within such definite limits that in a hundred specimens examined the lengths did not vary over a quarter of an inch. They were slightly barrel-shaped—a refinement of design that the English fletcher never reached, and that has made its first appearance in the American "boat-tailed" rifle bullet within the past year. Tipped with ivory and winged with two delicate vanes of parchment, it is said that this arrow could be driven the incredible distance of 600 yards; more than twice the range of the English long bow. There are records carved on marble shafts on the archery course at Constantinople of arrows having been driven 800 yards, but the writer refuses to believe them—600 is his limit.

It was practically useless to give an English archer a mount; his long bow could not be handled on a horse. But the Turkish short bow was a good cavalry weapon, like a carbine. It could be used effectively without snapping off the horse's ear or becoming entangled in his mane, and so it gave great mobility to the Turkish archers. With its range and adaptability it was for a long time the most effective small missile weapon used in Europe.

The Greeks of the Eastern Empire resisted Turkish encroachments with Greek fire for centuries, and while the descriptions would indicate something crudely resembling gunpowder, they do not appear to have used it for the discharge of missiles. But when Mahomet II decided that Constantinople was ripe for its fall and might as well fall into his lap, he used real artillery. The Germans were not the first to use "fort wreckers"—the Turks were. Mahomet employed in the final attack on the city the largest cannon that had been cast at that time. It was done in bronze by a Hungarian or a Danish engineer, was supposed to have a calibre of "twelve palms," and could throw to a distance of a mile a stone ball weighing 600 pounds. It took sixty oxen and thirty wagons to haul it, with 200 men to steady it and 250 preceding to clear the way and stiffen the bridges on its journey of 150 miles from the foundry at Adrianople. It could be loaded and fired but six or seven times a day. In Gibbon's text it blew up, and then an "artist" devised the trick of pouring oil into it to prevent its blowing up—a rather confusing statement that leaves us uncertain whether it was greased after it exploded or exploded after it was greased; but it appears to have done the work, or its companion pieces did.

While this great gun and two others scarcely inferior, and fourteen batteries of smaller ordnance, were hammering the landward walls, the Turks gave another exhibition of ingenuity and martial energy far beyond the powers of any race of ineffective sybarites or mere dull-witted savages. Behind the wall it was about ten miles from the Bosphorus to the Golden Horn, which the Turkish vessels had been prevented from entering by a chain stretched across the harbor mouth and defended by a number of Greek and Genoese craft. Over this ten miles of hillocky land a runway was made of planks, daubed with tallow. Eighty Turkish galleys and brigantines were beached close to the other terminal, mounted on skids, started on this plank runway, and with the aid of tackle and their own sails were navigated overland and launched into the upper waters of the harbor. The transit was accomplished in a single night, according to Greek historians. In the last assault Constantine Palæologus died in the breach—and we find coupled with his name that of Cantacuzene, borne today by the granddaughter of General U. S. Grant. Mahomet took the real estate, but assigned to his soldiers the captives and the loot. The sack of Constantinople by the Turks was very thorough, but less profitable than it would have been had the city not been sacked and burned two and a half centuries before by the alleged Christians of the Fourth Crusade.

It was some time in the eighteen-nineties, perhaps the late 'nineties, before American troops were armed with repeating rifles. Such weapons had long been used by our hunters, but our soldiers were provided with clumsy single-shots until a short time before the Spanish war. But at the battle of Plevna, fought between the Russians and the Turks in 1877, the latter were armed with Henry rifles, made in the United States, and they were the first troops in Europe to be so armed. With this repeating rifle, they melted down the Russian charges and won the field. In a strictly military sense the Turks were ahead again.

The recent discomfiture of the Greeks tends to elevate the Turks to their old importance as an ever distracting element in a distracted world. As Senator Lodge said in a recent article in the Forum, "wherever the Turks have power there are massacres, and the destruction of populations seems certain to follow in their footsteps. There never has been a worse example than that now shown in Anatolia, Armenia, and the northern part of Asia Minor." The Turkish weakness, and the safety of Western Europe from them, has not been in any want of ingenuity on the part of the Turks or their lack of ardor for battle and the spoils of war. It has lain rather in their scientific backwardness, in their failure to master the methods and the discipline of modern knowledge. Their operations at the front are not supported by a scientifically resourceful and productive nation behind the lines. Director W. W. Campbell of the Lick Observatory once said on this subject:

The remarkable advance in the civilizations of the leading nations during the past four centuries has been due chiefly to the daily and hourly influences of accurate knowledge and scientific method. . . . The scientific spirit is almost unknown among the Turks, the Moroccans, the Mohammedans in general, the Hindus, the Egyptians, the Chinese. The unscientific nations are threatened with absorption by their more scientific neighbors, not so much because they do not invent or perfect the most powerful cannon, the sturdiest dreadnaught, the speediest aeroplane, or the subtlest submarine, but because the scientific people forge ahead of them in the arts of peace, in the moves of thought, in the affairs of daily life. The unscientific people are without influence in the world, not because they are unwarlike, but because they are lacking in the everyday efficiency which accompanies the scientific spirit.

Still, considering past performances, it will not do to underrate the Turk, or attempt to absorb him too rapidly. He is likely to be even less digestible than he looks.

In July, 1920, the Allies dispatched to the Turkish government, through M. Millerand, this rather pointed opinion:

The Allies are clear that the time has come when it is necessary to put an end once and for all to the empire of the Turks over other nations. . . . During the war the record of the Turkish government in massacre, in deportation, and in maltreatment of prisoners of war, immeasurably exceeded even its previous record. . . . For these reasons the Allied powers are resolved to emancipate all areas inhabited by a non-Turkish majority from Turkish rule. It would be neither just nor would it conduce to lasting peace in the Near and Middle East if large masses of non-Turkish nationality should be forced to remain under Turkish rule.

If the Turk remembers that, and then thinks how little the Allies have done to make it good, or help the Greeks make it good, he must smile as he wipes his scimitar on his voluminous trousers.

Abraham Lincoln.

(Assassinated April 14, 1865.)

You lay a wreath on murdered Lincoln's bier,
You, who with mocking pencil went to trace,
Broad for the self-complacent British sneer,
His length of shambling limb, of furrowed face,

His gaunt, gnarled hands, his unkempt, bristling hair,
His garb uncouth, his bearing ill at ease,
His lack of all we prize as debonair,
Of power or will to shine, of art to please;

You, whose smart pen backed up the pencil's laugh,
Judging each step as though the way were plain,
Reckless, so it could point its paragraph
Of chief's perplexity, or people's pain:

Beside this corpse, that bears for winding-sheet
The Stars and Stripes he lived to rear anew,
Between the mourners at his head and feet,
Say, scurrie jester, is there room for you?

Yes: he had lived to shame me from my sneer,
To lame my pencil, and confute my pen;
To make me own this hind of princes peer,
This rail-splitter a true-born king of men.

My shallow judgment I had learned to rue,
Noting how to occasion's height he rose;
How his quaint wit made home-truth seem more true;
How, iron-like, his temper grew by blows.

How humble, yet how hopeful, he could be;
How, in good fortune and in ill, the same;
Nor bitter in success, nor boastful he,
Thirsty for gold, nor feverish for fame.

He went about his work;—such work as few
Ever had laid on head and heart and hand,—
As one who knows, where there's a task to do,
Man's honest will must Heaven's good grace command:

Who trusts the strength will with the burden grow,
That God makes instruments to work His will,
If but that will he can arrive to know,
Nor tamper with the weights of good and ill.

So he went forth to battle, on the side
That he felt clear was Liberty's and Right's,
As in his peasant boyhood he had plied
His warfare with rude Nature's thwarting might;

The uncleared forest, the unbroken soil,
The iron-bark, that turns the lumberer's axe,
The rapid, that o'erbears the boatman's toil,
The prairie, hiding the mazed wanderer's tracks,

The ambushed Indian, and the prowling bear,—
Such were the deeds that helped his youth to train:
Rough culture, but such trees large fruit may bear,
If but their stocks be of right girth and grain.

So he grew up, a destined work to do,
And lived to do it: four long-suffering years'
Ill-fate, ill-feeling, ill-report, lived through,
And then he heard the hisses change to cheers,

The taunts to tribute, the abuse to praise,
And took both with the same unwavering mood;
Till, as he came on light, from darkling days,
And seemed to touch the goal from where he stood,

A felon hand, between the goal and him,
Reached from behind his back, a trigger prest,
And those perplexed and patient eyes were dim,
Those gaunt, long-labored limbs were laid to rest!

The words of mercy were upon his lips,
Forgiveness in his heart and on his pen,
When this vile murderer brought swift eclipse
To thoughts of peace on earth, good-will to men.

The Old World and the New, from sea to sea,
Utter one voice of sympathy and shame:
Sore heart, so stopped when it at last beat high;
Sad life, cut short just as its triumph came!

A deed accurst! Strokes have been struck before
By the assassin's hand, whereof men doubt
If more of horror or disgrace they bore;
But thy foul crime, like Cain's, stands darkly out.

Vile hand, that brandest murder on a strife,
Whate'er its grounds, stoutly and nobly striven;
And with the martyr's crown crownest a life
With much to praise, little to be forgiven.

—Tom Taylor.

According to an old reader of the Argonaut, the doggerel verse recently published in these columns about "The days of old, the days of gold, the days of forty-nine" is by a certain Dr. Putt, a pioneer, who published his poems in pamphlet form.

INDIVIDUALITIES.

Lady Astor has an opponent for the candidacy of her district, the Sutton Division of Plymouth, in Dr. H. W. Bayley. He is a Conservative, and against Lady Astor's national policy.

The city of Liverpool claims the distinction of having the first woman cotton broker in England. She is Miss Margaret Robertson, who has become a partner and active manager in her brother's business.

Alois Brandl, a distinguished Anglo-philologist of Germany, is the recognized authority of that country on Shakespeare. For many years he has been president of the German Shakespeare Society. He has published a great deal of valuable Shakespeare philology.

Another marriage between royalty and commonalty is to be that of the sister of King Christian of Denmark, the Princess Dagmar, to Lieutenant Castenskold, an officer on the reserve list of the royal body guard. Castenskold has recently returned from two years spent in Alaska, where he is said to have augmented his fortunes considerably. The young lieutenant's aunt is grand mistress of the robes, and at the head of the household of the Queen of Denmark, so the mésalliance is not of a striking nature.

Colonel the Hon. William Orde-Powlett, who has just succeeded his septuagenarian father as Lord Bolton, is the descendant, on the Powlett side, of Martha Jones, one-time cook to Lord Scrope. It is, in fact, through this lady's illegitimate daughter, who married Charles Powlett, afterwards first Duke of Bolton, that the present Lord Bolton inherits no small portion of the county of Yorkshire which once belonged to the historic house of Scrope. Incidentally another of Colonel Orde-Powlett's ancestresses was Lavinia Fenton, the original Polly Peachum in Gay's "Beggars' Opera."

Horatio G. Eddy, eighty-one, of Chittenden, Vermont, who many years ago startled the country by his spiritualistic manifestations, and who was the head of a family of spiritualists, died early this month. Eddy was especially famous for his Honto's Cave episode, when he held alleged communication with the spirit of a dead Indian. After Horatio and his brother, William H., had traveled over the world holding séances they finally confessed that they had duped the credulous and today the Chittenden ghosts have almost been forgotten.

Miss Florence E. Smith, who operated one of the first two typewriters to be used in the United States Post-office Department, has retired after nearly a half-century of government service. Miss Smith entered the postal service through an appointment as stenographer August 7, 1875. Since the installation of the parcel post, some years ago, her work has been confined to translating French, Italian, Spanish, and German letters, claiming indemnity for lost articles. She had known French and German from youth, but was obliged to teach herself Spanish and Italian. Miss Smith is a D. A. R. through five revolutionary ancestors.

A testimonial fund is being raised on both sides of the Atlantic to be presented to Professor George Saintsbury on his seventy-seventh birthday, which will occur in October. For twenty years Professor Saintsbury occupied the chair of rhetoric and English literature in the University of Edinburgh. In 1915 his health forced him to resign, but owing to war conditions no suitable recognition of his services could then be made. Professor Saintsbury, despite his immense learning, could never be called a pedant. It is interesting that his "Cellar Book," which shows a long-standing acquaintance with life, letters, and liquors, is the classic on its subject.

W. Morgan Shuster, president of the Century Publishing Company of New York, publisher of the Century Magazine, probably knows more about the "inside baseball" of Persian politics than any other American. After his successful service as collector of customs at Manila and as secretary of public instruction in Cuba, Mr. Shuster opened law offices in Washington. Subsequently, on the recommendation of President Taft, he was asked by the Persian government to become treasurer-general of that country. His administration of the office was so successful that the Russian government, which was then seeking to dominate Persia, demanded his dismissal. To avoid bloodshed, Mr. Shuster resigned and returned to this country.

Rafael Sabatini, author of the popular tale of the French revolution, "Scaramouche," is, as his name implies, Italian. Born in Central Italy in 1875, English is an adopted tongue with him, and like Joseph Conrad's, his literary feats in the acquired medium are therefore the more remarkable. His youth was spent in Italy and he was educated in Portugal and Switzerland, but as a young man he became an English citizen. In addition to his writing, he conducted an English publishing house for five years, and during the war served in the intelligence department of the war office, where his knowledge of languages made him particularly useful. Incidentally, his historical novels are done as relaxation—not without its commercial advantages—from his real historical labors. His "Life of Cesare Borgia" and "Torquemada and the Spanish Inquisition" being among the latter.

"THE LADIES!"

Feminism of the Days of Peppys and Horace Walpole Treads a Minuet in the Pages of E. Barrington.

It is likely that the eternal feminine is no more eternal than the eternal masculine, nor ever will be, in spite of certain recent female efforts to dispense with male assistance in carrying on. It still seems necessary to have fathers as well as mothers, and so the efforts of the sexes to bamboozle each other will long continue the main amusement of humanity. In the words of the Sunday-school song, speaking of something quite different, this is a blessed assurance. It is a poor heart that never rejoices, and a dull nature that never participates, be it ever so prospectively or even tentatively, in the excitements of the everlasting chase.

Gallantry, fans and perfumes, miniatures and morsels of lace, smalls and dress swords, the swish of silken skirts (said, in our time when skirts were long, to have been simulated by sandpaper attachments), the enticements of the hunt that never ends, the recurrent drama of capture and conquest, the hypocrisies of chivalry countered by the swindles of modesty—in short the whole gauzy sublimation of sex-attraction dressed to the decorum of the Atlantic Monthly's pages, appear in a little blue-covered sort of boudoir volume entitled "The Ladies!"—with its unavoidable suggestion of the balance of the toast, "God bless 'em!" And who would wish to avoid that suggestion? Certainly not the male of the species, to whom the perpetuation of the race has been made the most painless of obligations, involved in one of the most poetic and delightful of pursuits. The subject is defined as "A Shining Constellation of Wit and Beauty." It is all that. The literary treatment is by E. Barrington, who seems gifted that way, and its several chapters have already delighted the dear old Atlantic's readers, and should delight still others.

The author has cast back to the eighteenth century for idle days and scented nights, and the longings and sweet languishments of the English court when it was a real one, to give us the gentle adventures of some celebrated beauties when beauty was historically influential—as who shall say it is no longer? He has gone farther back than that, for in his presentation of feminine allurements he introduces us first to "The Diurnal of Mrs. Elizth Pepys." It is not known that Mistress Pepys ever kept a diurnal, but he has set himself the problem, "What would Elizabeth have felt if she had read the secrets of the diary?" And he answers it thus in the confidence of a fictitious diarist:

3d.—This day awakes Saml in a musty humour as much over-served with meat and Drink, and in great discontent calling me, do bid me rise and fetch his Pills that olde Mother Wigsworth did give him at Brampton. I merry and named him the Passionate Pilgrim from his love to these, whereupon he flings the Pills in my face and all scattered, Deb grudging to gather them it being Lord's Day. So I go to church, leaving him singing and plaining "Beauty, Retire" to his Viall, a song not worthy to be sung on a holy Day however he do conceit his skill therein. His brown beauty Mrs. Lethulier in the pew against us and I do perceive her turn her Eye to see if Saml do come after. She very brave in hanging sleeves, yet an ill-lookt jade if one do but consider, but with the seeking Eye that men look to, and Saml in especial. Fried Loyne of mutton to dinner, and Saml his head akeing I did sit beside him discoursing of the new hangings for the small closet, wherein great pleasure for it will be most neat and fine. And great content have we in such discourse and in our house and the good we are come to.

4th.—This day do Saml speak handsomely enough of his humour yesterday, charging it upon the Rabbits, and so I left it. And strange it is how when he do so repent my heart do take part with him though I would better renounce him awhile to learn him manners. So he to the Exchange and buys me a piece of Paragon to a petticoat, and though it be not what I would have of my own choosing yet I do receive it with many good words as hoping all will yet be as I desire. So to sup on a good dish of beef à la mode, and he well content, it appearing he have this day bestowed upon himself at the Exchange a good Leorbo, four Bookes, and a payre of Globes, talking very high how these be for my instruction rather than his own liking. The which I receive smyling, but do think—Lord! what fools men be that will have a woman so lightly deceived, fine wordes buttering no parsnips. Sure they be but Children when all said and done, and their Innocency in this a pleasant thing to see.

This day, he being with his Lordship, I to gain a sight of his Journal, he carelessly leaving it about, but took nothing by my pains, it being writ in secret writing, which do plainly show it to be what he would be shamed if known. Whereas mine owne is void of all offence, and I do lay it under the smocks in the great armoire only because it is not seemly that Saml should know my thoughts, I having to deal with him as best I may.

Mem. To ask of Mrs. Jemimah Crosby if her father, being a scrivener, knoweth and can instruct in secret writings.

24th July.—For many days I have not writ, for at the last I did come to read what I would, and thought not all, for some is in Greeke or I know not what, yet what I did read hath broke my heart. His Mrs Lane that he did prayse for a God-fearing woman, his Deb—but what do I say?—sure he hath not a heart but a stone. So I telling him certayne things of my knowledge (and yet not how I did know them), he in great fear and terror and as I thought unlike a man of Courage. Which did shame me for him that I could scarce bring myself to look in his face and see him thus, remembering his high carriage that I did use to see in him. And times there were when I would rather he did Brazen it out, it seeming so poor a thing to see him so low, and times again when in Madness I would have taken a knife to him, but he did pull it away with weeping Teares and promise of amendment. But how to trust him or any I can not tell. And I have bid Will Hewer (Saml humbly agreeing thereto) that he continue with his master and oversee him in all his walks abroad, doing me to wit where he goeth. Yet, how to trust Will—for sure all men are alike and will give the other countenance in Deceit. So what way to surety, for if a man regard not his wife where shall she look for good? And truly I do believe that in such Trafficking men do chip and whittle away their heart till none be left and they can not love if they would, and no anchorage in so rotten a Holding ground. And thus have I learned that a woman may be young and yet aweary of her life, which I did not think to be true.

Never suppose the hunt is always one-sided, or lacks those climactic surprises in which the pursued turns on the pursuer or the trapper steps into another's trap. Were the beautiful Gummings merely gunning, or did some compassion for the quarry enter into their gentle breasts? "Was there," says Mr. Barrington, "no finer, more ethereal touch in Elizabeth Gunning's stolen marriage with her duke than is recorded in Horace Walpole's malicious gossip?" The Gummings were poorer than church rats (why a rat should hang around a church we could never understand, but so goes the proverb), and Ma Gunning had about as much compunction; but an author whose heart is held in the little pink palms of beauty will perforce ascribe in such a case some sweeter lure than the dry and brittle pages of history supply. They left Dublin for London, where Elizabeth Gunning, on account of the great Duke of Hamilton, jilted the honest heart that had loved her in Ireland, and here is how our author tells what followed, supplying from a colorful imagination one of the prettiest love passages since Richard Feverel. The duke was a cagey old fox who did not purpose to be caged—the hot-hearted but icy-headed hero of many a sultry chamber. This time the trap caught him, though not after the intent of the trapper. There was a family council:

"What signifies grumbling?" finishes Mrs Gunning. "T is as plain as the nose on your face. Elizabeth's is the best chance, and if she makes her match, my Lord Coventry will kiss your slipper, Maria. The Duchess' sister can marry where she will."

"T was vain to interrupt. Mrs Gunning sailed on, maternal, imperative, and took no heed. It would be impertinence to intrude on the talk that followed, and the plan laid for the entrapping of his Grace, of whom it may be said that he could protect himself against even the assaults of beauty better than Mrs Gunning supposed. But Elizabeth, borne down by two to her one, fought a losing game.

"I hate the man," she cried with spirit, and knew 't was false as she said it. 'T'd sooner sweep a crossing—"

Mrs Gunning smiled contemptuously. "Not you! You came pretty near it in Britain Street, and 't is known how you relished it. Beggars, my dear, can't be choosers. The Duchess of Hamilton may have as much delicacy as she pleases. Miss Elizabeth Gunning can't afford it. There's no more to be said."

Ma baited the trap. The duke arrived. In the dim light of perfumed tapers, such as D'Annunzio loves, Elizabeth appeared, hair streaming to her timid knees, lips a-tremble, breath a-flutter, a negligée with blue ribbons clinging to every bifurcated contour—and we have people nowadays that shy at short skirts. Ma and the sister left them alone on some trumpety invention to suit the proprieties of those austere times, for any mother of ability can beat any mere propriety that gets in her way; and the duke chased Elizabeth around the table, as the Uncle Tom bloodhounds chased a later Eliza over the ice on the Ohio River. He caught her, too, for she couldn't run very fast—was supposed to have a headache, which made her look tender and easy to take.

But here the author's predilection for internal as well as external tenderness leads him into sheer romance. Elizabeth can not carry it through, and says so; and confesses the plot, and that springs the trap more effectively than even Ma had planned it, for Hamilton sees reality in the confession, and, being Scotch, has no fear of a mother-in-law, and begins to plead for love itself, and demands to know were he merely poor James Hamilton if she would not have come to his breast; and she says:

"T is not impossible. But oh, how should I prove it—prove it? There's not a word I say but rings false now. Leave me—leave me. I have said too much."

"You can't prove it? But you can, and if you prove it, I will distrust God's mercy before I will distrust my girl. All you have told me was known to me—known to all the town. It rings through the streets that the fair Gummings and their mother are schemers; that they love none and seek only the best price for their charms. Marry me now, this hour, Elizabeth, and face the world that will call your plotter and adventress. For they will so! There's no club in town but will ring with the story of how the beauty was cunningly left to a half-drunk man's advances. That's how Horry Walpole and all the old women of both sexes will have it! All this will be known through your mother's folly and your Abigail's chatter, and they will tell how you trapped me, how I would have escaped and could not for the snares about my feet. Marry me and face this, if you will, and I will believe you love me, for you will stand a disgraced woman for all time. Marry me not, and I will make your way easy with gold, and your mother shall tell her own tale, and not a smirch on your name, and fear not but another rich man will give you all I could, and not a spot on it. Choose now once and for all. I have seen and I know how my coronet will sting you with shame—with shame set in it."

He did not embrace her. "T was the strangest wooing. The clock pointed to eleven. The house was dead silent. Her eyes widened with pain and fear. She looked piteously at him.

"They will say you caught me drunk, whom you could not catch sober. They will say you forced the marriage, lest I escape. There is nothing they will not say but the truth—that my sweetheart is the sweetest, the purest, the proudest woman alive. Your delicacy will be trod in the mud, Madam. Will you take your man at that? Will you crawl through the dirt to his heart?"

His fire kindled hers. Her eyes glittered. "And if they believed me worthless—that is not what I ask. What would your Grace think?"

He smiled with peculiar sweetness. "Child, you know me. Look at me."

And still she trembled. "Beloved, adored!" he cried. "Thank you I knew not 't was death to you to tell the truth? Shall a man find a pearl in the dirt and not set it over his heart? I have loved you since first I saw your fair face, and now I honour you. Come to me and bless me; and when these fools cackle and gibber, I shall know how to protect my wife."

Well, Hamilton shook the peach tree and they were wed in a rush, with full benefit of clergy, and then they shook Ma. Sister married a mere count; but Elizabeth, having got off to a good start, survived her duke and married another, the Duke of Argyll. Some people have all the luck. Ma became housekeeper in a royal palace, which was pretty good for her. She was probably a trapper to the end. And that was the episode of the Golden Vanity.

Let us proceed to a consideration of "The Walpole Beauty," another of those Watteau figures setting out for the Cytherea of a royal court. The text is now epistolary, and sufficiently explicit, especially of the heart and manners of the times:

But, Kitty child, who do you guess is the new beauty? I give you one, I give you two, I give you three! And if 't was three hundred, you'd be never the wiser. Why, Maria Walpole, you little blockhead! Maria, the daughter of Sir Edward Walpole, Horry's brother. What think you of that? But Sir Edward never was married, says you. True for you, Kitty, but don't you know the story? No, to be sure. There's no scandal in Ireland, for St. Patrick banished it along with the snakes and their poison, because the island that has so many misfortunes would have died of another.

Well, take your sampler like a good little girl and hearken to the history of the lovely Maria that 's to blow out the Gunning candles. Let me present to your la'ship Sir Edward Walpole, brother to the Baron of Strawberry Hill. A flourish and a sliding bow, and you know one another! Sir Edward who resembles not Horry in his love for the twittle-twattle of the town, is a passable performer on the bass viol, and a hermit—the Hermit of Pall Mall. But the rules of the Hermitage are not too severe, child. 'T is known there were relaxations. And notably one.

The Hermit some years since was lodged in Pall Mall; and in the lower floors was lodged a dealer in clothes, with pretences to fetch and carry.

Lord! says Kitty, what 's this to the purpose? Attend, Madam. The curtain rises!

'T is an old story: the virtuous pretence—and the un-virtuous. There was one of them—Dorothy Clement, a rustic beauty, straw hat tied under the roguish chin, little tucked-up gown of flowered stuff, handkerchief crossed over the bosom, ruffled elbows. 'T is so pretty a dress, that I protest I marvel women of quality don't use it! However, this demure damsel looked up at Sir Edward under the hat, and he peeped under the brim, and when he left the house and returned to his own, what should happen but the trembling beauty runs to him, one fine day for protection, swearing her family and master have all cast her off because 't was noted the gentleman had an eye for a charming face.

Well, child 't is known hermits do not marry. 'T is too much to ask of their Holinesses. But he set a chair at the foot of his table for the damsel, and bid her share his pulse and crusts; and so 't was done, and whether in town or country, the Hermitess kept him company till she died. Sure the Walpoles are not too fastidious in their women, excepting only Horry of Strawberry Hill, who has all the finicals of the others rolled up into his lean body.

Well, Kitty, there were four children: a boy,—nothing to the purpose,—and Laura, Maria, and Charlotte. And the poor lasses, not having a rag of legitimacy to cover 'em, must needs fall back on good behaviour and good looks. I saw Laura, a pretty girl, in the garden at Englefield some years since, when I was airing in Lady Pomfret's coach; and as we looked, the little hoyden Maria comes running up in muslin and blue ribbons, all health and youth and blooming cheeks and brown curls and eyes—a perfect Hebe. And 't is she—the milliner's brat—that 's to borrow the Car of Love and set the world afire. But she can't be presented, Kitty; for our high and mighty Royals frown on vice, and not a single creature with the bar sinister can creep into Court, however many may creep out. And that's that!

And now I end with compliments and curtsies to your la'ship, and the glad tidings that one of the virgin choir of Twickenham, those Muses to which Mr. Horace Walpole is Apollo, has writ an Ode so full of purling streams and warbling birds, that Apollo says he will provide a sidesaddle for Pegasus, and no male shall ever bestride him again.

Nevertheless she appears to have been presented, for in later letters we find:

Well, into the midst of this prodigious assemblage, with Uncle Horry quaking inwardly and making as though Walpole nieces were presented every day, comes the fair Waldegrave, gliding like a swan, perfectly easy and genteel, in a silver gauze with knots of silver ribbon and diamonds not so bright as her eyes. I dare swear not a man there but envied Lord Waldegrave, and many might envy the beauty her husband—a good plain man, grave and handsome. But the bride! She swam up to His Majesty, like Venus floating on clouds, and her curtsy and hand-kissing perfect. Who shall talk of blood in future, when a milliner's daughter can thus distinguish herself in the finest company in Europe? 'T is true 't is mixed with the Walpole vintage; but when all's said and done, who were the Walpoles? If you get behind the coarse, drinking Squire Western of a father, you stumble up against Lord Mayors and what not! So 't is a world's wonder, and there I leave it.

Who, indeed, were the Walpoles? They should all know soon. There must be losers, that there may be winners. In that brocaded world, to be somebody you made some one else nobody. A sovereign's favor was both pattern and golden thread; and the Countess Maria Coventry, one of the two Gunning beauties, was soon pushed aside for the milliner's bastard daughter. And the milliner's b. daughter survived her noble husband and married a royal duke, the king's brother, His Grace of Gloucester. Receiving en princesse at Gloucester House, "she wore a robe in the French taste, of gold tissue, her hair lightly powdered, with a bandeau of diamonds and the duke's miniature in diamonds on her breast." And the Countess of Coventry, deposed court beauty, died of spreading on too much white lead in lieu of her natural complexion.

So wagged that waggish world; and such blue-and-silver images of it are today a good antidote to the carking frets of the bank clearings, the building permits, the Rotary Club and the other obsessions of twentieth-century success.

"THE LADIES!" By E. Barrington. Boston: The Atlantic Monthly Press; $3.50.

BANKING AND INVESTMENT NEWS.

San Francisco's bank clearings for the week ending September 16, 1922, were $176,800,000; for the week ending September 17, 1921, they were $147,700,000; a gain of $29,100,000.

Blyth, Witter & Co. are members of a syndicate offering $21,000,000 Kansas City Power and Light Company first mortgage thirty-year 5 per cent. gold bonds. Series A, price 93 and interest, yielding 5.47 per cent., due September 1, 1952. Interest payable without deduction of Federal income tax, deductible at source, not in excess of 2 per cent.

The Kansas City Power and Light Company controls the electric light and power business in Kansas City, Missouri, and also sells either at wholesale or retail electric current used in portions of fourteen near-by counties in Missouri and Kansas. The total population of the territory served is approximately 575,000. Upon completion of the present financing these bonds will be secured by a direct first freight over its southern route as against the central route via Ogden unless the shipper so stipulates. The percentage of transcontinental traffic delivered unrouted to the carrier and which the carrier might divert from the central to the southern line is so insignificant that it cuts little or no figure in the case. If the Central Pacific line to Ogden were operated by a new management, or if the Union Pacific took it over, as has been suggested, the present situation would remain unchanged and competitive conditions would not be intensified. There would be a mere substitution of another railroad-operating organization for the present one.

"In connection with competition, it is worth while considering the situation that would confront the Pacific Coast were the Union Pacific permitted to acquire the Central Pacific lines, as Union Pacific officials have suggested. The Union Pacific, with its headquarters and its important interests east of the Rocky Mountains, now reaches out from Salt Lake and Ogden northwest to Portland, and has trackage rights into Seattle. The Union Pacific now reaches out from Salt Lake southwest into Los Angeles. The Union Pacific now owns a steamship line from Portland to San Francisco. If the Union Pacific further succeeds in gaining control of the Central Pacific lines from Ogden out to San Francisco Bay and reaching up and down the Sacramento and San Joaquin valleys, the Union Pacific will hold the Pacific Coast transportation situation in the hollow of its hand.

"Creation of such a situation is contrary to the government's policy, set forth in the transportation act of 1920, which contemplates the grouping of the country's railroads into a limited number of strong systems, competing on terms of substantial equality.

"Central and Southern Pacific lines were developed during the last half-century as a single transportation unit, in Central and Northern California and elsewhere, along routes that meet the requirements of shippers and travelers in the most efficient and economical way. Terminal and other facilities are now established on this transportation system at points where they naturally speed the movement of traffic and best serve the interests of the public.

"If the interwoven lines of the Central Pacific and Southern Pacific are torn apart, according to corporate ownership, as is proposed, many additional terminals and other facilities of no benefit to the shipper would have to be established at the new and arbitrary points of junction of the separated companies' lines. Train runs would have to be based on the new artificial arrangement, with greater expense and less efficiency as the result. Changes of crews and switching of cars at all junction terminals would mean delay to shippers. Efforts to avoid such delays and confusion from two-line hauls by confining shipments to the lines of a single company would in many cases bring roundabout routing and attendant slower transportation. Duplication of certain lines and facilities, giving no additional service to the public, would be necessary, and the public would ultimately have to pay for such injudicious duplications.

"The net result of separation of Central Pacific from Southern Pacific lines upon the major part of the Pacific Coast traffic would be slower and less efficient service, the annoying necessity for shippers to deal with two managements instead of one, change in the flow of commerce from natural to artificial channels, thus depriving many communities of service they now enjoy, and an increase in operating expenses that would be reflected in higher rates or poorer service or both."

At such a time as the present, public utility common stocks present an unusual opportunity to the investor who is willing to accept a small element of speculation when placing his funds for income, in return for the chance of a substantial appreciation of principal. This is because the earnings applicable to sound public utility common stocks can be counted upon to increase during the coming few years with more assurance than in the case of any other class of industry with a possible exception of the railroads, says R. W. Sykes in Forbes Magazine.

The favorable outlook does not necessarily presuppose any great industrial revival, although this seems probable, but the increase in net will be due, and it is already apparent, to lower operating costs. Public service is a necessity, and the volume of business shows a consistent expansion during depressions as well as boom periods with few exceptions; so that gross income can be counted upon. But what is left after operating expenses, taxes, and other prior claims are deducted, is subject very largely to outside influences. It is only necessary to recall the plight of the utilities during the war to emphasize this. Then man power was scarce and wages correspondingly high, materials, especially copper, were at inflated levels and rates were fixed by franchises at a level based on pre-war expenses.

Now the very opposite holds true. Not only are the materials used substantially lower and numerous wage reductions in effect, but rates which were finally advanced as a general rule, have not been much changed, nor does there seem to much agitation that they should be. The majority of public service corporations are far behind in their expansion programmes, and it is felt that a period of high earning power should be allowed in order to permit them to catch up with the demand for service, this giving more actual cash for reinvestment by the companies themselves and also improving the investment merits of public utility securities and thus making new financing easier.

Another factor of no small importance which is changing the entire appearance of electric light and power companies particularly, from the viewpoint of earning power, is the increasing adaptation of water power which almost eliminates fuel costs. In the case of steam plants the many improvements which are constantly taking place in generating equipment is increasing the production per employee and this reduces labor costs.

A selected list of public utility common stocks is given here. Many of the issues named have already enjoyed a considerable advance, but the outlook is so encouraging that much higher levels are likely to be reached. These stocks should be bought with the idea of holding over a period of time. A gain in earning power in a public service corporation comes more slowly than in the case of an industrial corporation where selling prices may be advanced upon an increase in demand, but it is more stable.

Columbia Gas & Electric for the first seven months of this year reported a gain in net earnings of almost 28 per cent. over the corresponding period of 1921 and for the full year should show earnings equivalent to from $9 to $10 a share. The surplus stands at the largest amount ever reported and the prospects of an extra disbursement or an increase in the dividend rate are good.

In 1916 Detroit Edison sold as high as 149 on a 7 per cent. dividend and earnings at the rate of 14.61 per cent. Later followed a period of decreased earnings which grew out of war conditions, but with 1921 a turn for the better came and earnings of 10.21 per cent. were reported. Now earnings are running at the rate of better than 13 per cent. a share, and the stock is paying 8 per cent.—and selling around 111.

Laclede Gas Light has had a pretty hard time of it since 1918 while fuel and labor costs have been so high, but relief has come in double measure. Operating costs are headed downward and increases in rates for both gas and electricity have been procured. From not earning full fixed charges in 1921, to say nothing of anything on the preferred and common, net earnings for the first half of 1922 increased to an amount equal to $4.32 a share for the common after preferred dividends. Dividends have been resumed at the rate of 7 per cent. and are, of course, being fully covered at this time.

The yield on Montana Power at this time is only slightly over 4 per cent., and the dividend, such as it is, is not being earned. The secret of the present selling price of the stock

BRADFORD KIMBALL & Co.

FORMERLY
BRADFORD, WEEDEN & CO

DEALERS IN GOVERNMENT, MUNICIPAL
AND CORPORATION BONDS

SECOND FLOOR
Insurance Exchange Building
San Francisco

and the favorable conclusions as to the future is found in the close affiliation of the company with the Anaconda Copper interests and the low cost at which an enormous amount

INVESTMENT SECURITIES

Government, Municipal and Corporation Bonds in denominations of $100, $500, and $1000 for the investment of Banks, Trust Funds, and Individual Investors. Inquiries Invited.

HUNTER, DULIN & Co.

THE SECOND FLOOR—
256 MONTGOMERY ST.

Los Angeles
Pasadena

San Francisco

Oakland
San Diego

STRASSBURGER
private wires to principal financial and commercial centers.

STOCKS · BONDS
COTTON · GRAIN
COMMODITIES

133 Montgomery Street

San Francisco
Members San Francisco Stock & Bond
Exchange & Chicago Board of Trade
— Douglas 2220 —

of power can be produced when demand warrants. The Anaconda mines and the Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul are already large users under normal conditions and are likely to be much larger users later on. Practically the entire power production is hydro-electric

McDONNELL & Co.

And Other Leading Exchanges

633 Market St., at New Montgomery

SAN FRANCISCO

TELEPHONE SUTTER 7676

N. Y. Office, 120 Broadway

Los Angeles, 634 So. Spring St.

PRIVATE WIRES

CARSTENS & EARLES, INCORPORATED

GOVERNMENT, MUNICIPAL
AND CORPORATION BONDS

ESTABLISHED 1891

Insurance Exchange Building

San Francisco

Phone Sutter 4142

SEATTLE

LOS ANGELES

SPOKANE

Private Wires
Coast to Coast

E. F. Hutton & Co.

MEMBERS
NEW YORK STOCK EXCHANGE

HUTTON BUILDING

Montgomery and Bush Sts.

HOTEL ST. FRANCIS

DEL MONTE HOTEL

and undeveloped reserves will increase the present capacity by 50 per cent. when expended.

The North American Company is following an aggressive expansion policy and increasing its earning power rapidly. For the first three months of 1922 the common stock earned at the annual rate of over $10 a share, while dividends at the rate of only $5 a share are being paid.

Pacific Gas & Electric common is conspicuously out of line with other public utility stocks of an equal grade. The common is earning more than $10 a share annually at this time and the payment of extra dividends or an increase in the declared rate can be looked for. The community in which this company operates is showing a remarkable gain in population and facilities are inadequate to meet the growing demand.

The common stock of the Philadelphia Company yields a high return and affords a conservative speculation. The Pittsburgh District was subject to particularly severe effects in the 1921 depression and the income account of this company reflected this. However, depression is a thing of the past and earning power is recovering sharply. The new electric power units are proving very profitable and the outlook is as good as at any time in the company's history. The railway properties are being rehabilitated and promise to carry themselves, at least in the future.

There is much speculation over the probability of a $2 increase in the dividend rate year 1922 is likely to stand out as a very prosperous one for this company.

In spite of the apparently very unfavorable news developments here and abroad during the past two weeks, the stock market has been consistently strong, with many issues scoring extended advances. There has been no important liquidation and reactions have resulted from technical considerations. The unavoidable conclusion is that there has not been as yet any considerable distribution and that stocks are still largely in strong hands.

The question of modifying the terms of the German indemnity and granting that country a respite in her payments appears to have reached a state of impasse, with France violently opposed to the other Allies and insistent on her demands. The matter has been referred to the Reparations Commission. Meanwhile German marks have sunk to new low levels and French francs and bonds have been very weak. However, the outlook can not be quite as gloomy as it seems, for sterling exchange and the British security markets as well as our own have been very strong, which is a pretty plain indication that the economic collapse of Germany will be averted.

The gradual ending of the soft-coal strike, even though this has meant largely yielding to the miners' demands, is a most bullish development, as it has done much damage economically. The steel trade in particular is likely to feel its effect for several months. The anthracite strike is of little consequence, except as it may affect the comfort of the Eastern cities by forcing the use of smoky soft coal. The railroad strike has not been in existence long enough, nor has it been sufficiently successful from the standpoint of labor to have had any great economic effect.

The general advance of wages in the steel industry and coal mining appears to mark a return toward some inflation. This is not surprising. Periods of prosperity usually are accompanied by rising prices for commodities and labor, just as periods of depression are noted for the reverse. Provided this inflation does not extend too far, it need not be viewed with alarm, but rather welcomed as a harbinger of good times.

A most encouraging feature of our home news is the splendid crop prospects, which are likely to mean prosperity for the farmers, rural communities, railroads and industrial corporations supplying their needs. The McCumber tariff bill, when, or if, readjusted may be in some respects deplorable, but will prove a very bullish factor on many industries.

The bull market has been showing signs of renewed activity, and it is gratifying to see the return to speculative favor of such old standard dividend-paying rails as Union Pacific and Southern Pacific, New York Central, Norfolk & Western, Delaware & Hudson and the Hill roads. The rails and equipment stocks seem to be among the most attractive speculations. The public utilities also will do very much better, although many of these stocks have already had considerable advances. The so-called farm stocks comprising the manufacturers of farm implements and fertilizers and the mail-order houses are discounting a return of prosperity.—The Trader.

By all the signs that one may find in the day-to-day dealings on the Stock Exchange, the market has definitely started upward again. Its present movement is the resumption of the major upward movement which was interrupted in June. It should be a typical fall boom; that is, it should go much further and culminate in much more violent movements than did the rise of the spring and early summer, says J. G. Donley, Jr., in Forbes Magazine.

And—if you have not already read the indications in the market and acted accordingly—it is not too late to buy stocks. Advances of from ten to twenty or thirty points in rails as well as industrials of exceptional speculative attractiveness are likely to be scored before the fall upswing terminates; and it is better to get the last twenty points of a move than the first ten.

Those who had been waiting some sign of the resumption of the main movement, or some indication that the market was actually in shape to advance from the level it held during the dull period without a clarifying reaction, found what they had been looking for in the action of prices following the publication of what seemed to be good strike news. Following the apparent settlement of the soft coal strike at the Cleveland conference there was a wave of distinct optimism regarding the outlook for ending both the hard coal and the railroad strikes. Had there been many holders of stocks anxious to take profits or had the inside position of the market been weak, it seemed likely that the coming of the good news would have been used for unloading. But the market went to new high levels on the good news. Such action coming after months of rising prices could only be interpreted as bullish. And it was immediately following this demonstration that many big operators began to add heavily to their lines of stocks. Their purchasing operations encouraged others, and it was not long before trading again expanded to the million-share level.

In spite of its probable discomfiting effect in the camps of those who have been attempting to induce workers to accept lower wages, the announcement by the Steel Corporation of a 20 per cent. advance in the pay of common labor in the steel mills was accepted by Wall Street as a constructive development. It is reason that such action by the far-seeing heads of the Steel Corporation indicates that they are looking forward to a long period of prosperous business conditions and, if not high prices, at least firm prices. Fear of the consequences upon earnings of industrial corporations of a resumption of the downward movement toward pre-war price levels has all along been one of the restraining factors in the market for industrial shares. If wages are to hold up 80 per cent. above the 1915 level—as in the case of Steel Corporation workers—then prices of finished goods will stay up. And if both these things are going to happen, stocks are too low.

Another development that has helped stocks has been the slowing down of activity in the bond market, where high-grade securities have pretty well adjusted themselves to the ruling rates for money. Funds long employed in the bond market are now coming enthusiastically into the stock market, for their possessors have in most instances reaped handsome profits by buying bonds low and selling them high.

With the exception of rubber and perhaps one or two other things, commodity prices have been rising slowly but steadily. While leather, which was once in almost as bad a statistical position as rubber, has not advanced much the market is holding firm and it seems likely that an increasing demand will cause further advances. Steel prices have been steadily advancing, due to high coke prices, high labor costs, and a rapidly expanding demand. Interference in transportation caused by the rail strike and shortage of fuel caused by the bituminous coal strike have tended to accentuate these movements of raw material prices. And the price situation is very important because nothing begets confidence in the buyer as much as a rising market.

In fact, everything points to a very healthy fundamental situation, and if the shortage of coal and the rail strike do not have a much more depressing effect upon general business than has yet been apparent there should soon be such marked improvement as will clear away all doubt.

The railroad stocks are proving their right to be regarded as one of the most attractive groups in the market. And traders, long accustomed to look for their quick profits and big moves in the industrial list, are rapidly being attracted to the rails. In a recent week the average price of a group of active railroad shares scored a larger advance than a representative group of industrials. Moves of three, four, or five points in a day in different rail issues have, in fact, become quite the usual thing.

The standard dividend-paying rails, into which group a large volume of investment buying has overflowed from the bond market, have through constant absorption gotten into such a strong position that perpendicular advances are quite likely to result. Union Pacific, for instance, has been steadily going into the boxes of investors and out of the loan envelopes of Wall Street brokerage houses; and even after its steady advance the stock is still very cheap on the basis of its high yield and well-known earning power. Others in this group that are in much the same position are Atchison, Atlantic Coast Line, Illinois Central, Louisville & Nashville, New York Central, Norfolk & Western, and Southern Pacific.

Among the low-priced rails, St. Paul common is an outstanding bargain. Earnings have not yet recovered sufficiently to cover interest charges; but those who are accumulating this stock are looking forward—not backward. In one month the earnings picture can be radically changed, and it may be predicted rather confidently that this will happen when the bumper crops begin to move. Another very attractive low-priced rail, and one that is earning a substantial margin, is St. Louis & Southwestern. Earning about $10 a share, this stock is entitled to sell fifteen to twenty points higher than its current level.

Other medium and low-priced rails that promise to make profits for buyers are Baltimore & Ohio, Wabash "A," Kansas City Southern, Pere Marquette, Rock Island, St. Louis-San Francisco, Erie first preferred, and Southern Railway common.

E. H. Rollins & Sons are offering $550,000 Santa Marina Building first mortgage 6 per cent. serial gold bonds, dated July 1, 1922, and due serially July 1, 1924 to 1937 inclusive, exempt from personal tax in California, and the company agrees to pay interest without deduction for any Federal income tax up to 2 per cent.

The bonds of this issue will be a first closed mortgage upon a lot at the intersection of Market, Drumm, and California

LOGAN & BRYAN

STOCK, BOND, COTTON, COFFEE,
SUGAR AND GRAIN BROKERS

DIRECT PRIVATE WIRES

Pacific to Atlantic—U. S. and Canada

MEMBERS:

NEW YORK STOCK EXCHANGE
BOSTON STOCK EXCHANGE
CHICAGO STOCK EXCHANGE
NEW YORK COTTON EXCHANGE
NEW YORK COFFEE EXCHANGE
NEW YORK PRODUCE EXCHANGE
NEW ORLEANS COTTON EXCHANGE
PITTSBURGH STOCK EXCHANGE
CHICAGO BOARD OF TRADE
MINNEAPOLIS CHAMBER OF COMMERCE
WINNIPEG GRAIN EXCHANGE
ST. LOUIS MERCHANTS EXCHANGE
SALT LAKE CITY STOCK EXCHANGE
LOS ANGELES STOCK EXCHANGE
PHILADELPHIA BOURSE
MONTREAL BOARD OF TRADE

SAN FRANCISCO BRANCH OFFICES AT
401 Montgomery Street

and
Merchants Exchange Bldg.

Telephone Garfield 3000

R. C. JENKINS, C. S. LAWRENCE,
San Francisco Managers

Streets, San Francisco, having a frontage of 91.8 feet on Market Street and 137.6 feet on Drumm Street, and upon an eight-story fire-proof, reinforced concrete office building situated thereon at 112 Market Street. Comprehensive improvements to this building will be commenced within thirty days in order to still further increase its rental value and the desirability of its office space, and $50,000 has

Exchange Your Liberty Bonds

Present conditions make it advisable, in many instances, to exchange Liberty Bonds for securities offering higher yield or with longer maturity.

Confer with a representative of our Bond Department. He will analyze your needs and will recommend exchanges to your profit.

Call, write or
telephone Sutter 6900

ANGLO-CALIFORNIA TRUST COMPANY

Commercial • Savings • Trust • Bond Departments

"The City Wide Bank"
Market & Sansome Streets
San Francisco

MARKET-MCALLISTER
AND JONES STREETS
101 MARKET

MISSION AND 16TH
FILLMORE AND GEARY
THIRD AND 20TH

been deposited with the trustee for the purpose of carrying out these improvements.

The permanent type of construction of the improvements and the strategic location of the property provide values which amply secure the company's bond issue.

A title insurance policy in the amount of $650,000 has been secured and is payable to

INVESTMENT SECURITIES

COMMERCIAL PAPER

AND

ACCEPTANCES

GOVERNMENT

MUNICIPAL

AND

CORPORATION

BONDS

BOND & GOODWIN & TUCKER

AMERICAN NATIONAL BANK BUILDING
SAN FRANCISCO
LOS ANGELES SEATTLE PORTLAND

EXPERIENCE of over 35 years in California guides us in selecting for investors those issues which offer the maximum interest consistent with excellent security.

WM. R. STAATS CO.

Established 1887

Alexander Bldg., Montgomery St., cor. of Bush
SAN FRANCISCO
Telephone Kearny 301

LOS ANGELES SAN DIEGO PASADENA

the trustees for the bondholders, insuring the title to the property in the company. Fire and earthquake insurance, each in the amount of $550,000, is also being carried and insurance in the amount of $50,000 against rental losses due to fire.

Demand for all grades of bonds holds firm and as there is very little selling coming into the market, prices are steady. The feverish activity of two or three months ago is absent, fortunately, and the majority of bonds have returned to an investment status. Yields are pretty well adjusted to current money rates and the ensuing stability lends confidence and also gives the investor a firmer basis upon which future transactions may be calculated, says Forbes Magazine.

The ratio of reserves to liabilities and deposits, the truest indicator of credit conditions, the Federal Reserve System reports at the highest point in years.

If general business experiences a boom in the autumn it may reach sufficiently large proportions to cause an advance in interest rates. It is not believed, however, that any strain is likely to be felt, nor, in fact, is much of an advance in rates very probable in view of the almost unlimited resources of the Reserve banking system. Certainly the present requirements could be greatly augmented before being reflected in the cost of time money. Bond prices under the circumstances should remain steady.

A form of investment which is sometimes neglected is that found in equipment trust certificates. These certificates or bonds are generally issued under what is known as the Philadelphia plan, the provisions of which make them among the safest investments afforded. The title to the new equipment, passenger or freight cars, locomotives, etc., against which the bonds are issued, is lodged with a trust company which leases it to an operating company, as the New York Central, for example, at an annual rental sufficient to pay interest on the bonds and to retire a certain amount each year. The railroad company must make a cash payment in the beginning, usually about 20 per cent. of the cost price, as a margin of safety, and the annual rental must be sufficient to retire the balance due before the equipment wears out. The life of a freight car is estimated at about twenty years on the average, while equipment trusts rarely run for longer than fifteen years.

The rental thus paid is accepted as an operating expense and is deducted from earnings before the interest on even a first mortgage bond is deducted.

Default on equipment trust certificates is almost unknown. If these rentals can not be paid, the operating company has to do without a large part of its equipment, and earning power, of course, is practically cut off.

At a meeting on September 19th the Paraffine Companies, Inc., declared the usual 1 3/4 per cent. on preferred stock, payable September 27th, transfer books closing September 21st. The directors also passed a resolution authorizing an application for listing preferred and common shares and bonds on the local stock and bond exchange. Mr. W. D. K. Gibson was elected a director to succeed Mr. A. F. Morrison.

BOOKS ON THE TABLE.

The name of Rostand has been twice in the limelight lately. "The Crystal Coffin," Maurice Rostand's first book, was published in English this summer (Robert M. McBride & Co.), and now it is announced that Arnaga, Edmond Rostand's famous estate in the Pyrenees, is offered for sale. In fact it is to be publicly auctioned, minimum bid allowed being a million and a half francs. That sum represented in the neighborhood of $300,000 before the war, and of course represents sadly less today. In a happier era Arnaga would have been bought by the French government. It is said that in France it is hoped some altruistic American millionaire will be the purchaser—one who will throw it open on certain days to the public. Arnaga consists of a palatial residence and forty acres of beautiful grounds. In the halcyon days before the war it was the Mecca of the artistic, literary, and theatrical cliques of Paris. A perfectly equipped marionette theatre for which Rostand and his son Maurice wrote pieces was one of the great attractions of the place, rivaling in interest the Comédie Française, the Théâtre Sarah Bernhardt, and the Théâtre Porte-Saint-Martin. After the relative failure of "Chantecler" in 1910 Rostand withdrew more and more to his Basque retreat, in which country, it is said, he was the more at home because of a prominent strain of Spanish blood.

It should be remembered that the later condition of Rostand's life was that of an invalid. Shortly after the production of "L'Aiglon" in 1900 at the Théâtre Sarah Bernhardt he was taken with a dangerous attack of pneumonia, from which he never fully recovered—a fact that amply accounts for his not quite living up to the brilliant promise of his youth. He was not yet thirty at the time of the phenomenal success of "Cyrano de Bergerac" in 1897. That was said to be the most sensational theatrical event since the memorable first night of Victor Hugo's "Hernani" in 1830. The first three acts were a perpetual ovation, every line of certain passages being applauded. The book of "Cyrano" outsold the current best sellers among French novels. Its sale has been estimated at half a million copies and it is no doubt still going strong. But Rostand never did it like again. He was taken ill three years later after the strain of producing "L'Aiglon," and though his admirers everywhere "Les Romanesques" and "La Princesse Lointaine" still they do not pretend to compare them with his acknowledged masterpiece.

It is typical of the fate of a great man's son that the publication of his first book should send one into rhapsodies about his father. Maurice Rostand is still a very young man—we do not know exactly how young, but his father was fifty at the time of his death four years ago—and he may have a brilliant future. Certain it is he can write. But we suspect he will follow the usual curve of great men's sons. Judging alone from the content of "The Crystal Coffin" he is bound to do so. It is replete with all the decadent morbidity of Verlaine, La Forge, Gautier, and nothing could be farther from the sweet reasonableness and wholesome romanticism of Rostand père. As the foregoing would imply, Maurice is entirely lacking in his father's humor, or, at least, "The Crystal Coffin" is entirely lacking in it. As a neurotic study of the modern French soul this introspective rhapsody is enlightening, but bad publicity.

Compton Mackenzie's "Carnival" was a sordid thing with its morbidity only relieved by passion—not much alternative. Because of it we began "The Altar Steps" (George H. Doran; $2) with distaste. In fact we almost did not begin it at all, and so narrowly missed missing a book of unusual spiritual beauty and considerable claim to literature. For the person at all minded to things immaterial, to the something beyond the husk and pomp of life, "The Altar Steps" will be a great delight. Even those of more casual bent will revel in its beauty of style. "Carnival," too, we recall, was beautiful, at least in spots, but it was the beauty of iridescence on a stagnant pool. It was not agreeable to the spiritual olfactory nerve. "The Altar Steps" is so very different that it would be easy to call it ascetic. But it isn't ascetic or ecclesiastic, as undoubtedly some reviewers will label it. Nor are we sure that it has anything to do with "Robert Elsmere," even though it does hinge—or its plot does—on the Oxford controversy. It is rather comparable to such a book of spiritual renaissance as "Jean-Christophe," and like every other genuine book, it is in one sense incomparable. Much consideration is given nowadays to the revival of historical fiction. It is really more a sign of the times that serious fiction is being revived, if by serious we understand fiction of distinction and merit, and of some interest other than artificial problems of social caste. Mrs. Wharton's "Glimpses of the Moon" has a spiritual theme. So has Gerald Donovan's "Vocations," though the latter, like "The Altar Steps," belongs to the more exclusively religious type. What we are contending, though, is that a book need not be religious to be mentally refreshing. Nor need it be sexual to be interesting—as "The Altar Steps" admirably proves. It is to be hoped that Mr. Mackenzie will not mar his achievement here by a sequel with a love theme. R. G.

Notes of Books and Authors.

Jay William Hudson, author of the popular Appleton book, "Abbé Pierre," is a professor of philosophy at the University of Missouri. It is said he has written a substantial volume of poems which, however, he can not be persuaded to publish.

Evidently the "collecting" of Samuel Butler has begun, for an autograph copy of his "Erewhon" was sold at Sotheby's recently for $23.

Funk & Wagnalls have secured the American book rights to Lloyd George's memoirs, and the Chicago Tribune and the New York Times the serial rights.

Emerson Hough is reported as seriously ill in a hospital in Denver. Perhaps he is cheered a bit by the tidings that his new novel, "The Covered Wagon," continues strongly among the best sellers of the season.

The dog-lover will be interested in "Terriers," which Darley Matheson has written and the Duttons have just published. For there he can learn all about that desirable breed of dog, whatever the variety—Fox and Bull and West Highland and Skye and Airedale and Boston and Yorkshire and Welsh and the dozen more of which he writes. The author knows his subject and he confines himself to the business of describing each variety, its origin, points, objects, faults, virtues, characteristics. Several chapters are devoted to the care of terriers and the management of stud dogs. Thirty or more full-page plates afford excellent illustrations of various kinds of terrier.

All Books that are reviewed in the Argonaut can be obtained at
Robertson's
222 STOCKTON ST.
Union Square San Francisco

THE HOLMES BOOK CO.

707 Market St. 152 Kearny St. 22 Third St.
Largest variety of new and second-hand books in the city. A visit to our stores will convince you of the truth of this assertion. We buy libraries or single books for cash. See us before selling. Phone—Douglas 3283.
SAN FRANCISCO, CAL.

IF YOU ARE A REAL BOOK-LOVER

Spend a pleasant hour in the real "Old Book Shop" at 2 TILLMAN PLACE, OFF GRANT AVENUE—below Sutter.
Rare Old Books Bought, Sold and Hunted For by GEORGE HARGENS (formerly of the White House)

The Sutherland Circulating Library

Room 222, Foxcroft Building
68 Post Street San Francisco
All the recent or current popular titles available during library hours in the forenoon and afternoon, also open Monday, Wednesday and Friday evenings, 6 to 8 o'clock. Telephone Douglas 6078.

HAVE YOU READ—

SIMON CALLED PETER

By Robert Keable
Author of "The Mother of All Living," etc.

IT IS probably the most widely talked of novel published during 1922.

$2.00 (postage extra)

E. P. DUTTON & CO., 681 5th Ave., N.Y.

The White House

The Valley of Content

By BLANCHE UPRIGHT

A San Francisco author's first novel—the dramatic version to be produced in New York this season, by Marjorie Rambeau. $1.90

Book Dept., Main Floor.

Raphael Neill & Co. Inc.

The FRENCH AMERICAN BANK

OF SAN FRANCISCO
108 SUTTER STREET
Commercial Checking Savings
RESOURCES OVER — $16,000,000

A General Banking Business Transacted.
COMMERCIAL AND PERSONAL CHECKING ACCOUNTS SOLICITED.
Savings Accounts receive interest at the rate of 4 per cent. per annum.
SAFE DEPOSIT BOXES $3.50
OFFICERS
Leon Bocquier, President
J. M. Dupas, Vice-President
J. A. Bergerot, Secretary
W. F. Duff, Vice-President
J. C. Pres. and Cashier
A. Bonquet, Secretary
J. T. Trillary, Asst. Cashier
Chas. L. Ebner, Jr., Asst. Cashier

The San Francisco Savings and Loan Society

(THE SAN FRANCISCO BANK)
SAVINGS COMMERCIAL
526 California St., San Francisco, Cal.
MISSION BRANCH ..... Mission and 21st Streets
PARK-PRESIDIO DISTRICT BRANCH, ..... Clement and 7th Ave.
HAIGHT STREET BRANCH ..... Haight and Belvedere Streets
June 30th, 1922
Assets ..... $76,170,177.18
Deposits ..... 22,470,177.18
Capital Actually Paid Up ..... 1,000,000.00
Reserve and Contingent Funds ..... 2,700,000.00
Employees' Pension Fund ..... 385,984.61
A dividend to depositors of FOUR AND ONE-QUARTER (4 1/4) per cent. per annum was declared for the six months ending June 30th, 1922.

Bonds for Investment

MUNICIPALS IRRIGATION DISTRICTS CORPORATIONS

Specialists in Safety

Anglo London Paris Company
One Sansome Street San Francisco
Phone Kearny 5600

The CROCKER NATIONAL BANK

OF SAN FRANCISCO

Condition at the Close of Business, September 15, 1922

| RESOURCES   |                 |
|---|-----------------|
| Loans and Discounts.....                                    | $25,935,538.51 |
| U. S. Bonds and Certificates.....                           | 8,302,415.75    |
| Other Bonds and Securities.....                             | 607,295.13      |
| Capital Stock in Federal Reserve Bank of San Francisco..... | 150,000.00      |
| Customers' Liability under Letters of Credit.....           | 1,735,217.63    |
| Cash and Sight Exchange.....                                | 14,011,726.63   |
|   | $50,742,193.65 |
| LIABILITIES   |                 |
| Capital.....  | $ 2,000,000.00 |
| Surplus and Undivided Profits.....                          | 6,574,113.33    |
| Circulation.....  | 1,984,200.00    |
| Federal Reserve Bank.....                                   | 2,580,000.00    |
| Letters of Credit.....                                      | 1,875,952.05    |
| Deposits.....   | 35,727,928.27   |
|   | $50,742,193.65 |

OFFICERS

| WM. H. CROCKER..... President                          |                                 |
|--|---------------------------------|
| JAS. J. FAGAN..... Vice-President                      | B. D. DEAN..... Asst. Cashier   |
| W. GREGG..... Vice-President                           | J. M. MASTEN..... Asst. Cashier |
| I. B. McCARGAR..... Vice-President                     | D. J. MURPHY..... Asst. Cashier |
| WM. W. CROCKER..... Vice-President                     | A. C. READ..... Asst. Cashier   |
| F. G. WILLIS..... Cashier                              | W. D. LUX..... Asst. Cashier    |
| G. W. EBNER..... Asst. Cashier                         | J. A. ROUNDS..... Asst. Cashier |
| H. H. HAIGHT..... Asst. Manager Foreign Department     |                                 |
| G. FERIS BALDWIN..... Asst. Manager Foreign Department |                                 |
|  | Auditor                         |

BOARD OF DIRECTORS

|                   |                |                    |
|-------------------|----------------|--------------------|
| WM. H. CROCKER    | R. S. MOORE    | J. B. McCARGAR     |
| TEMPLETON CROCKER | CHAS. E. GREEN | A. G. GRIFFIN      |
| JAS. J. FAGAN     | W. GREGG       | WILLIAM W. CROCKER |
| GEORGE W. SCOTT   | S. F. B. MORSE |                    |

REVIEWS AND NOTICES.

French Cooking with American Food.

Every one who has envied the good fortune of a friend possessed of that highest product of civilization, a French chef, will—quite literally—rejoice at the publication of a book of recipes by Xavier Raskin, whose long experience as a French chef in this country has, as he says, fitted him to arrange recipes of French dishes conforming to American conditions. Everything about French cooking, from the mysteries of roasts and entrées to those of French pastry and confitures, is lucidly set forth in this really invaluable book. Nor does M. Raskin write for his fellow-artists. His book is intended for private families and he claims there are few recipes in it that the average housekeeper will find beyond her means or experience. M. Raskin has selected for publication here only the recipes that have been most in demand from him in his twenty years of connection with Americans.

THE FRENCH CHEF IN PRIVATE AMERICAN FAMILIES. By Xavier Raskin. Chicago: Rand, McNally & Co.

Pirates in the Offing.

Rafael Sabatini's new novel, "Captain Blood," has revived lively speculation concerning the return of the historical novel. The fervor with which Mr. Sabatini's "Scaramouche" was welcomed in 1921 would indicate that the problem of the inevitable domestic tangle which will not be unknotted, however skillful the writer, has wearied readers to the point of returning to the Stevenson-Johnston type of novel, whose popularity was beginning two decades ago. Perhaps we are not doing justice to Mr. Sabatini in attributing the popularity of his books to the assumption that the problem novel has palled. Undoubtedly his novels are of sufficient merit to stand alone in spite of their belonging to that almost extinct school of historical fiction which Mary Johnston's later novels certainly did not serve to keep alive.

In "Captain Blood" we have a gripping piratical tale of the seventeenth century and the creation of the redoubtable Peter Blood with his sardonic humor, hot temper, and Irish sentiment is a masterpiece. At times the author is unkind to this experienced soldier and well-educated gentleman in making him appear rather a fool. For instance, to serve the purpose of a necessary turn in the tale, Captain Blood is made ignorant of the position of the North Star, a circumstance explained on the ground that he had never studied astronomy. Another vividly interesting character is Arabella Bishop. She is not the plump, languishing, and quite helpless feminine type so characteristic of that period. Though a product of the seventeenth century, she has the spirit of the twentieth. That is one of the charms of the book. While lacking in even the suggestion of anachronism, it has an ultra modern spirit.

This tale of buccaneers, Spanish gold, and pieces of eight will make a strong appeal to the adventurer in us which formerly delighted in "Treasure Island."

CAPTAIN BLOOD. By Rafael Sabatini. Boston: Houghton Mifflin Company; $2.

The biggest seller in the world is neither A. S. M. Hutchinson nor Ethel M. Dell, says John o' London's Weekly. His name is Harold Bell Wright, and he is an American expert in what is called "uplift" fiction. The first sales of his novels average 250,000, and the total sales at least 500,000. He runs a publishing firm that issues nothing but his own books, and a cinema company that films them. Harold Bell Wright was originally a minister and nowadays he lives in Arizona.

New Books Received.

QUEEN ELIZABETH'S MAIDS OF HONOR. By Violet A. Wilson. New York: E. P. Dutton & Co.; $8.

A picture of the Elizabethan court.

THE RUSSIAN TURMOIL. By General A. I. Denikin. New York: E. P. Dutton & Co.; $8.

Memoirs: Military, social, and political.

OUT OF THE WORLD NORTH OF NIGERIA. By Angus Buchanan. New York: E. P. Dutton & Co.; $6.

An expedition through the Western Sudan in the interests of the zoological geography of Africa.

THE LAST HARVEST. By John Burroughs. Boston: Houghton Mifflin & Co.; $2.

A final collection of Burroughs essays, including studies on Emerson and Thoreau.

WITCH DOCTORS. By Charles Beadle. Boston: Houghton Mifflin Company; $2.

A tale of Central Africa.

THE CAPTIVE HERD. By G. Murray Atkin. New York: Thomas Y. Crowell Company; $1.75.

A novel.

THE COMPLETE POETICAL WORKS OF EDGAR ALLEN POE. Edited by James A. Harrison and R. A. Stewart. With an introduction by Charles W. Kent. New York: Thomas Y. Crowell Company; $1.75.

FLOWING GOLD. By Rex Beach. New York: Harper & Brothers; $2.

A novel.

CARNAC'S FOLLY. By Gilbert Parker. Philadelphia: J. B. Lippincott Company; $2.

A Canadian romance.

THE MOUNTAIN SCHOOL TEACHER. By Melville Davison Post. New York: D. Appleton & Co.; $1.50.

A novel.

THE VAN ROON. By J. C. Snaith. New York: D. Appleton & Co.; $2.

A novel.

CAPTAIN POTT'S MINISTER. By Francis L. Cooper. Boston: Lothrop, Lee & Shepard Company; $1.75.

A novel for young people.

DAN QUIN OF THE NAVY. By Captain Beach. New York: The Macmillan Company.

A sea story.

WANTED—A WIFE. By Alfred Panzini. New York: Nicholas L. Brown; $1.90.

Translated from the Italian by Frederic Taber Cooper.

THE TRAIL OF THE WHITE MULE. By B. M. Bower. Boston: Little, Brown & Co.; $1.75.

A sequel to Casey Ryan.

THE HAWK OF EGYPT. By Joan Conquest. New York: The Macaulay Company; $1.75.

A novel.

LONESOME TOWN. By Ethel and James Dorrance. New York: The Macaulay Company; $1.75.

A story of Montana and New York.

THE TREMENDOUS EVENT. By Maurice Le Blanc. New York: The Macaulay Company; $1.75.

An adventure story by the author of "Arsène Lupin."

THE GOLDEN FACE. By William Le Queux. New York: The Macaulay Company; $1.75.

A "crook" romance.

THE SECOND FLOWERING. By Samuel Gordon. New York: The Macaulay Company; $1.75.

The love story of a modern Enoch Arden.

SIDE LIGHTS ON AMERICAN LITERATURE. By Fred Lewis Pattee. New York: The Century Company; $2.

Literary criticism.

THE SOCIAL TREND. By Edward Allsworth Ross. New York: The Century Company; $1.75.

SOCIETY NOTES. By Duffy R. West. Cincinnati: Stewart Kidd Company; 50 cents.

Modern plays, edited by Frank Shay.

HOW TO WATCH AND UNDERSTAND FOOTBALL. By Percy D. Haughton. Boston: Marshall Jones & Co.; 50 cents.

A guide to football by a Harvard coach.

THE WONDER BOOK OF CHEMISTRY. By Jean Henri Fabre. New York: The Century Company; $2.50.

Translated by Florence Constable Bicknell.

THREE BLACK BAGS. By Marion Polk Angellotti. New York: The Century Company; $1.75.

A mystery story.

THE REST HOLLOW MYSTERY. By Rebecca N. Porter. New York: The Century Company; $1.75.

A mystery story.

LITERATURE AND LIFE. By E. B. Osborn. New York: E. P. Dutton & Co.; $2.50.

A selection of essays and occasional papers by the literary editor of the London Morning Post.

Statistics about books for some reason seem to have a more general attraction than similar compilations along other lines. The annual figures on best sellers are always eagerly greeted. In this connection the statistical "fans" may like to glance at the list of the publishers of one hundred and three "best biographies," compiled by the North Carolina College for Women. The Houghton Mifflin Company appears as sponsor for twenty-two; Scribners for seventeen; Macmillan, eleven; Appleton and Doubleday Page, six each; Century, Dutton, and Holt, five each; Longmans, four; Lane and Harper, three each; the Atlantic, Lippincott, Little Brown, Putnam, and Crowell, two each; and Stokes, Doran, Moffat Yard, Jacobs and Harcourt, Brace, one each.

An unfinished O. Henry story has been discovered on the back of an old ledger belonging to the Morley Drug Company, by whom the author was once employed in Austin, Texas.

IT'S THE WATER.
Prepared with Glacier Water from
Shasta Springs
AT ALL DEALERS
SHASTA WATER COMPANY

"Only a Novel."

Current discussions of the novel, with indications by some critics how easy it is to write a good one, and groanings by others over the terrible amount of trash which comes from the press in the form of fiction, says the New York Times, prompted an English writer to go back to Jane Austen. She not merely wrote novels, but had ideas about them. One of her characters takes up the theme in "Northanger Abbey" and refers to those who speak contemptuously of a book as being "only a novel." She adds: "In short, only some work in which the greatest powers of mind are displayed, in which the most thorough knowledge of human nature, the happiest delineation of its varieties, the liveliest effusions of wit and humor, are conveyed to the world in the best chosen language." What a terrible prescription for these days of easy writing and hard reading!

A young Japanese novelist named Segiro Shimada, who is traveling in England, is translating several of Mr. Wells' and Mr. Galsworthy's novels into Japanese.

THE MOTHER OF ALL LIVING

By Robert Keable, Author of
"Simon Called Peter"

The Boston Transcript says:

"Mr. Keable has power we knew before, but it has grown with use. He is a bigger man than when he wrote 'Simon Called Peter' and he has staged a vaster scene . . . this is a book with a meaning and it possesses potent appeal."

—Dorothea L. Mann.

Any bookstore, $2; postage extra.

E. P. Dutton & Co., 681 5th Ave., N. Y.

The Wright Magazine

("Not for self, but for others")

Only $1.00 a Year.

Besides a serial and short stories it contains departments for literary and music, women and children, farm and garden, a people's forum, manuscript markets, radio notes and other interesting features.

THE WRIGHT MAGAZINE
P. O. Box 894 Little Rock, Ark.

BOOKS
AT
PAUL ELDER'S
239 POST ST. SAN FRANCISCO

BIG POWER for BIG AUTOMOBILES

You selected your car carefully for quality. Select your motor fuel the same way. It's unfair to feed a good car an inferior gasoline.

"Red Crown" answers completely the automotive engineer's demand for a motor fuel that will vaporize rapidly and uniformly in the carburetor and explode cleanly in the cylinders. All the heat units it contains are converted into power at the drive wheels.

"Red Crown" is uniform in quality—every gallon is the same, wherever and whenever you buy it.

Fill at the Red Crown sign—at Service Stations, at garages, or other dealers.

STANDARD OIL COMPANY
(California)

The Gasoline
of Quality

"NJU"

These two weeks the Rainey-Travers combination is giving us at the Players Theatre a highly creditable representation of Ossip Dymow's Russian play, which has gained a pronounced success in several of the European capitals. It is always rather a difficult feat for American players even of the best quality to give foreign drama with its native atmosphere. We are obliged to rely on suggestions and the psychology of the play.

"Nju"—which they pronounce "Noo-a," a soft-sounding and caressing name truly—is the interior view of the triangle which has been made so familiar to us in European drama. That is to say, the author has shown us the emotions with which each of the three, the married pair and the lover, is possessed; has given us a near view of their separate and individual psychologies. Each of the nine scenes shows the gradual presentation of the drama which culminates in tragedy.

For Ossip Dymow is essentially tragic in his view of life; and in fact gives nowhere in the play any indication of possessing a sense of humor. There are, in places, a Maeterlinckian simplicity in the dialogue; an intention on the author's part, probably, to show how inseparable are the trivialities of life from the culminating peaks of drama.

Here is a case in point: Husband—How beautiful you look, lying there in your white dress in the moonlight. The Wife (languidly)—It isn't white. Husband—What is it, then? Wife (limply: she is dreaming of love with the other fellow, a poet)—It's cream. Husband—Well, cream then. It reminds me of the dialogue about the view of the city from the tower between the princess and the nurse in Maeterlinck's "Princess Maleine." But although there are intentional commonplaces in the dialogue, the play is far from commonplace. It presents Nju as a rare and beautiful woman who has never really loved; which means, of course, that she was ready for trouble when it came. And come it did, embodied in the shape of a young poet whom she met at a ball. They met, they gazed silently—like the Flying Dutchman and his mortal sweetheart—they loved.

Nju is depicted as a woman with an immense and hitherto unexpended capacity for loving. Her love flows around its object in a serene, beautiful flood, for she loves with her soul rather than with her senses, which makes the crux of the drama.

The character of the poet is that of a man who, like Tolstoy's Fedya, cares nothing for the conventions of life. He loves beauty, and finds it in Nju. It is difficult to pierce the mystic yearnings of the soul of the poet, who is a modern complex. Therefore he can not yield to the primitive simplicity of love, as in his case it is complicated with intellectually analytic inhibitions.

The woman who from the commonplaces of her existence has slipped into this dream of a beautiful and perfect love, the potency of which is so great that home, husband, and child fade into insignificance, suddenly awakes from her dream.

Her introspective lover is incapable of complete surrender to love. He fails to top the heights, and the statuesque woman silently withdraws her love and finds the world a void. The husband is simple, male love personified; possessive love reduced to first principles. Nju does not conceal her evasion of his claims, and Dymow has depicted him as bewildered at his sudden bereavement. Deprived of the exquisite being who has been the joy of his life, he veers between passionate jealousy, the primal desire to kill, and avid clutchings to regain this beautiful possession that was his but yesterday. "Why can't we all three live here? I will just be your friend." And then comes the gust of rage which culminates in the bloodless struggle between the two men. For, true Russian that he is, Dymow wishes to show the pitiful futility of earthly things. A point of view which we perceive repeated in the tragicomic ending, and which explains the episode of the husband and wife's old love letters. "They have served their turn," she says impatiently, when the husband wishes to soften her averse heart by rereading them, "and now they are dead."

Obscure Russian psychology in the upper classes is rather baffling to the average American audience. All audiences are interested in the triangle, and this one showed the usual absorption. But I think that it was the husband, and not Nju walking on her lonely, impossible heights, who had their sympathy. Him they comprehended, Dymow having made his character as simple and readable as large print. They were slightly aghast when, in his drowning clutch at his vanishing love he proposed a ménage à trois. But they sympathetically comprehended his varying states of mind, and no doubt some of them, male and female, knew that cry of the heart for solitude with which the woman wounded a faithful but disregarded love.

Ben Erway had the simplest character to interpret, and, being an intelligent young actor, satisfied his audience in spite of being in a dramatically exotic atmosphere to which his stage experience hitherto has not led him.

Evelyn Vaughan had the rôle of the romantic, impractical idealist; the woman whose soaring wings fell broken from their flight into the empyrean of a lofty, disinterested love when her chosen mate could not soar equally high.

Miss Vaughan is an intelligent woman, and dealt successfully with an expression of the soul of the dreaming Nju. Without being a great beauty she managed, with sumptuous costumes, silver embroideries, a skillful consideration of lights, and backgrounds, and poses, to make herself an interesting and graceful figure, with an exotic suggestion of something strange and foreign about her.

Rainey has the hardest problem of the three, for the baffling psychology of the lover is much more difficult to convey. The young actor sought earnestly adequately to convey the enigmatic character of the poet, which is complicated by a tendency on the author's part to revert to an old-school blend with a modern complex. Mr. Rainey had his good moments, and his average ones, the principal fault in his impersonation being the appearance of effort. And, indeed, the love-making was a tax on the young actor, the poet's special brand of love being of a kind in the expression of which does not dwell Mr. Rainey's specialty.

The general performance, however, is such as to merit commendation for adhering to simplicity of expression; which is what Dymow would have approved, even while missing certain Russian subtleties in the players.

How essentially Russian is the ending; death, oblivion, and the play of life goes on above the grave of the forgotten one.

Several minor rôles were appropriately presented, notably that of Marie by Mrs. Parent. In respect to the externals of the production it was admirably dressed. The curtained backgrounds somehow seemed particularly appropriate to the psychology of the piece, and the stage pictures were so harmoniously grouped and composed as to be very pleasing to the eye.

THE ORPHEUM.

We San Franciscans are so far away from the theatrical centre that we are perpetually experiencing the sensation of having hitherto unknown players swim into our consciousness, take possession of our imagination, and then swim out again, generally back to the East, from whence they sometimes come no more. But on one occasion one of them, we thought, had floated into eternity and the eye of man would not see him again.

How many years ago was it that Florence Roberts played here in a translation of Angel Guimera's Spanish play, "Marta of the Lowlands"? Eight, ten? I give it up. Perhaps more. Probably more, as it was long enough ago for Hobart Bosworth to give six years to the building up of his health, then re-emerge into the life of men, become a movie star and a movie producer, and make his name perfectly familiar to all the movie fans.

Yes, it was Hobart Bosworth, a handsome young six-footer supporting Florence Roberts in "Marta of the Lowlands," whom a lot of us had deeded and buried all those 'steen years ago.

Mr. Bosworth was a young shepherd in the play who brought his athletic proportions, his good looks, and a very dizzy toilet, I remember, down from the Spanish Pyrenees to Marta's wedding in the lowlands. For they titivated him up to the nines. I can remember how irresistible the matinee girls found him in his white trappings—white goatskin, was it? Anyway, he was dressed like a stage bridegroom, for I do not doubt that the management recognized that it was worth while to make the best of Mr. Bosworth's youthful beauties.

And then, one day, it was stated in the papers that the favorite young actor Hobart Bosworth was obliged to leave the stage because he had tuberculosis. So we incontinently buried him and forgot his name, and never knew that the Hobart Bosworth who was the beautiful young shepherd from the Pyrenees was the same man redivivus in the movie world. For the energy and staying power that built up the Bosworthian career in the picture-play industry had been invoked during a six years' fight to down what is known quite aptly as the grim messenger.

Hobart Bosworth and Rae Samuels are the leading attractions of this week's Orpheum bill, which is well provided besides with other entertaining and amusing features. Mr. Bosworth wrote his own playlet, "Jes' Buck," which is a melodramatic "hands up!" trifle with a blend of honest cowboy sentiment. The point of the piece is the quickness on the trigger of the cowboy fraternity, and the rapidity with which the point of vantage can be shifted according to a man's pistol strategy. The sentiment is merely a side show.

Mr. Bosworth's personable figure and stage magnetism assist him greatly in carrying off his rather creaky vehicle, and the audience gave him due honors as a headliner.

Rae Samuels, however, is the hit of the week, her ebullient vitality and gay animal spirits and the chummy relations which she establishes with her audience, together with her songs and impersonations combining to attract the oft-repeated applause that proved her the favorite. Besides, she dresses up to the nines.

W. C. Fields in "Fields' Family Ford" gained a laughing success, the audience shedding streams of risible tears as Mr. Fliverton tackled the numerous clanging attachments of his tin equipage and gave numerous false alarms to the expectant Fliverton outfit as he cranked his recalcitrant car in rain.

Anderson and Burt made good in "Dizzy Heights," a sketch depicting a wrangling couple who carry their marital bickerings to Alpine heights. The piece is quite scenic, with its perspective of clouds and mountain tops, and the two scrappers costumed in the garb of mountain climbers. Also the audience laughed immoderately at Eddie Swartz' lively nonsense. Julia Clifford is rather a whooping vocalist, but she was ornamental, for she is a good dresser.

D'Amore and Douglas gave a cleverly violent representation of an Apache dance, showing such amazing strength and agility as to win prolonged salvos of applause.

The Girtin girls give a very good act in trick bicycling, in which they show the strength, balance, and muscular elasticity of born as well as trained acrobats.

And the Melette Sisters, dressed in duplicate and making the audience feel as if it saw double, so much did they look alike, both in their opening cottons and later in their pretty green and silver, made a good wind-up act, in which they did both graceful and acrobatic dances.

DRAMATIC PROSPECTS.

San Francisco, in spite of some southern affirmations to the contrary, is the metropolis of the Pacific Coast, at least in feeling and aspect. Recently it has been growing rapidly, and the increased population will have great need of the numerous flats and apartment houses that are springing up so thickly during the present unprecedented building activity.

Going by financial records, we are a very prosperous community. Our sunny, bracing climate predisposes us to the enjoyment of holiday festivities. We are continually seeing huge bleachers go up for the popular enjoyment of parades, in which the participants gayly costumed and flower decorated, appear to the delighted public view in ornate floats of various designs and symbolisms. We have a flourishing art school, are contiguous to two flourishing universities. There is a commendable effort being made by an art association to keep up popular interest in both local and imported art. We have an uncommonly beautiful park and two fine and generously stocked museums.

There are minor features into which I need not go. What I am leading up to is the absence of a prevalent interest and delight in real art in this prosperous, beautifully situated city that is crammed with a pleasure-loving population. Musically San Francisco has developed considerably in the last seven years. Since the many musical festivals at the Exposition of 1915, which discovered to San Franciscans their delight in music as music—which is different from a taste for opera, in which drama and spectacle play a part—the San Francisco Symphony Association has successfully fostered the local taste for high-class music.

And yet as a community we remain childish and undeveloped in our taste for drama. We have a large number of theatres; so many that nowadays we have lost count. Not one of them, however, strictly identifies itself with

Bringing in More Water

Direct communication between Calaveras Reservoir in Alameda County and Crystal Springs Reservoir in San Mateo County will solve San Francisco's water problem for years to come.

That direct communication is now being established, the work proceeding on a cooperative footing, with the city of San Francisco and the Spring Valley Water Company as the two members of a virtual partnership.

When this work is completed, San Francisco's water supply will be augmented by an addition of 24 million gallons daily, making the total 66 million gallons daily.

Spring Valley is now adding to the height of the Calaveras Dam. The company will also build a new conduit to carry Calaveras water as far as Irvington.

San Francisco is at present driving Pulgas tunnel through the hills between Redwood and Crystal Springs Reservoir. This tunnel is part of the Bay Division of the Hetch Hetchy conduit which, when completed, will extend from Irvington to Crystal Springs.

When Calaveras water reaches Irvington, it will enter this Hetch Hetchy aqueduct and flow through it to Crystal Springs.

Spring Valley will pay the City for the use of this section of the Hetch Hetchy line, and will also pay the interest on the bonds sold by the City to build it.

San Francisco taxpayers therefore will not have to carry the burden of this bond interest. They have to pay the interest on all other Hetch Hetchy bonds, but not on those sold to build the Bay Division. Spring Valley relieves them of that responsibility.

SPRING VALLEY
WATER COMPANY

ESMOND'S

"THE CAKE SHOP"

253 Grant Ave.

We offer a large variety of pies, cakes and pastries—all of the highest quality and flavor.

"ECCLES CAKES" Our Specialty

The Place with an "atmosphere"

WHERE the artistic environment insures the epicure that perfect enjoyment of a meal which, to such, is always something more than a mere satisfaction of the inner man.

33 POWELL ST. NEAR MARKET
130 POST ST. NEAR GRANT
511 FOURTEENTH STREET, OAKLAND

the finest and highest forms of dramatic art. True, the Players Theatre—and our only firmly established little theatre—aims at quality; but little theatres naturally do not have the pick of the profession as players. That was the trouble at the Maitland, in which masterpieces were sometimes played by obscure actors who were quite incompetent adequately to interpret a work of art.

This fall season the launching of a number of new theatrical enterprises, the new Curran, and the Alcazar under its new management specializing in stock. They will incline to the giving of light popular pieces, and perhaps occasionally the grab bag may toss up a play that is worth while.

There will be a season of opera bouffe in San Francisco, Ferris Hartman and Paul Steindorff having arranged to transfer their Oakland enterprise to this side of the Bay. And this promises to be interesting and enjoyable, although probably only of a temporary nature. That, of course, rests with San Francisco. The Century, renamed the Morosco, will specialize in the lightest brand of musical comedy.

Hence, generally speaking, the seeker after the best and finest theatre can offer us can only occasionally be found in what we call the commercial theatres, since, like the daily press, they seek to appeal to a diversity of taste. And it is foolish to expect them to be altruistically unbusinesslike.

It seems as if the proper development of the best in drama is today in the hands of youth, since practical-minded maturity does not dare to juggle with profits. Youth, however, is courageous, venturesome, and generous in its enthusiasms. Keeping abreast of progressive ideas, it has the courage of faith. It aims at quality first and profit second, hoping, however, that all-round merit will attract sufficient patronage to keep the ball a-rolling. For youth, though more open-handed than maturity, is no fool.

And so the little theatres sprang up all over the country, engineered by youth. And though lots of them fell down again, there are vigorous survivors, and they have put their stamp on their times; a stamp that will not be obliterated.

Out of the Washington Square Players in New York was evolved the Theatre Guild, which made, during the season that ended in the summer of this year, many notable, liberally patronized and widely discussed contributions to the list of masterpieces produced in New York.

For some years the Greek Players in Berkeley have been putting on pieces that, no matter how much a cultivated minority of theatre-goers might desire to see them acted, could only be known from the printed page. But now we, too, shall have a line of work similar to that done by the Theatre Guild in New York.

The San Francisco Stage Guild will make known to us such pieces as Zona Gale's "Miss Lulu Bett," "Lilliom," and "The Hairy Ape"; "The Truth About Blayds" and "Heartbreak House"; pieces that make the commercial managers fairly tremble. The Guild will branch into such activities as a lecture bureau, a series of concerts rendered by musical lights, marionette plays, and fairy dramas for the children, the child players to be trained by Mrs. John Cuddy, an expert in that line.

In the meantime the Players Theatre, which has a modestly brilliant season with "The First Fifty Years" and "The Rivals," is going to follow up Dymow's "Nju" with Powers' "The First-Born," and later we may see there Philip Moeller's witty presentation of that "femme galante" Mme. Sand, intrepid seeker, as she persuaded herself, after an ideal love.

So here is the opportunity for those who have little taste for the sentimental fairy tales that are popular with the majority of American theatre-goers to witness dramas that present a philosophy of life, genuine human nature, and the real conflict from which drama is born. But if they want that kind of attraction in the theatre they must dig themselves out of their scornful isolation and support the kind of drama that is aimed at their special kind of taste.

Nor need the heads of the commercial theatres have cause for apprehension. If the class who have given up theatre-going come back into the fold the big theatres will enjoy their patronage when they offer attractions of real magnitude, such as Walter Hampden in the legitimate, Margaret Anglin in "The Trial of Jeanne d'Arc," Gilbert and Sullivan revivals, and so on.

And every once in awhile there is a charming refreshment even for those who are sticklers for the drama of truth in such pieces as "The Three Wise Men," soon to be revived at the Columbia, which also promises us Rachel Crothers' "Nice People," "Six-Cylinder Love," and other New York successes.

For my part I thank heaven for a catholic taste. If the dispenser of sentimental fairy tales can present his pleasing improbability with grace, wit, pretty sentiment and charm I'll enjoy it with the children in heart. But it has been hard sledding to see the masterpieces enacted by tyros, while the trained, experienced, polished players are obliged to dedicate their talent to the lighter forms of drama.

The San Francisco Stage Guild, however, has secured several experienced and talented professionals whose tastes and abilities have caused them to associate themselves with the higher forms of drama. Among these, and heading the company, when the new enterprise opens on September 27th, are Maurice Brown and Ellen von Volkenburg, both of whom will, it is believed, prove to be inspiring leaders in the School of the Theatre which is to be one of the numerous activities in connection with the new Plaza.

The Travers-Rainey season at the Players also has more than a professional cast, as demonstrated in the really excellent acting of "The First Fifty Years" and "The Rivals."

JOSEPHINE HART PHELPS.

The oldest known banknotes were issued in China 2837 years before the Christian era.

FOYER AND BOX-OFFICE.

The Columbia Theatre.

As a stage offering the Rachel Crothers comedy-drama, "Nice People," achieved a most decided success on Broadway, running there for one year and later for six months at Chicago. This play will be seen on the stage of the Columbia Theatre beginning Monday night, September 25th, with Mary Newcomb in the rôle of "Teddy" Gloucester, the society "flapper."

Miss Newcomb, in recent seasons, has won distinction for herself and will be remembered as leading player with the late Clifton Crawford in his New York production of "My Lady Friends." In the play in which she comes here next Monday night Miss Newcomb has added laurels to her wreath.

Sam H. Harris has surrounded his star with a competent cast to tell the story of the modern fast pace of the younger set who will not tolerate parental assertion on the question of drinking, smoking, and plunging. The regeneration of "Teddy," the leader of a coterie of these "nice people," comes only after a series of escapades with attending humorous scenes. Matinées will be given Wednesday and Saturday.

The Orpheum Next Week.

Karyl Norman, known as "The Creole Fashion Plate," is one of the most finished artists on the stage. This engagement of this entertainer comes after a success in London and New York.

Wesley Barry's work in the screen version of "Penrod" was a hit and his freckles have won more hearts than many a dimple. He has a big company for his Orpheum appearance and is going to surprise many of his screen admirers when they find him just as clever on the stage.

Rae Samuels has new numbers and some dazzling gowns.

Beth Beri is a California girl who went East and returns to her native state one of the country's most finished and entertaining dancers.

Senator Ford, formerly a newspaper cartoonist, is a newcomer to the West, but he is said to be a great comedian with brand new material.

William Sully and Genevieve Houghton, a pretty girl and a snappy young fellow, present amusement of rare distinction.

The Great Léon is a magician and mystifier. He brings a startling act.

Mr. Mantell has originated a comical, ingenious, manikin turn entitled "La Petite Cabaret."

Farrar's Supporting Artists.

Geraldine Farrar, the Metropolitan soprano, who will be heard in concert Sunday afternoon, October 8th, at the Curran Theatre, is too great an artist to ignore the value of competent support; therefore she is bringing with her Henry Weldon, the basso; Joseph Malkin, the 'cellist, and Claude Gotthelf, accompanist.

Regarding her opera performances or her concerts as a whole, and not as a vehicle for self-exploitation, Miss Farrar encourages her associates to do their best; the result being that her audiences leave the opera house or concert hall feeling that every minute spent there has been one of delightful entertainment.

Tickets for Miss Farrar's concert are on sale at Sherman, Clay & Co.'s music store.

Paris workmen engaged in carrying out street improvements in the Boulevard St. Marcel, near the Jardin des Plantes, have apparently unearthed vestiges of a cemetery dating from the Merovingian period, on the site of a portion of what was much later known as the collegiate burial ground of St. Marcel. So far five stone coffins have been discovered, together with a large number of bones. The discoveries tend to prove that during the Merovingian period only the more important dead received the honor of burial in coffins of any kind. In one of the coffins brought to light a small quantity of coal is said to have been found, which indicates that the deceased person was one of the great ones of his time. The purpose of purifying the soul of the departed is supposed to have been reserved exclusively to leaders of the community.

The Catacombs of Cypress Lawn

Comparable with the luxurious tombs of ancient Egyptian kings, yet within the means of people of moderate circumstances.

A stone edifice, highly artistic in appearance, containing a magnificent chapel. Eleven Tomb Rooms, 425 Crypts.

Cypress Lawn Cemetery Association

Phone Doug 1-1000 995 Market St.

WALTERS SURGICAL CO.

SURGEONS' INSTRUMENTS
Hospital and Sick Room Supplies
Trusses and Abdominal Supporters
441 Sutter St.—Entire Building. Telephone
San Francisco, Cal. Douglas 4017

MOST BEAUTIFUL

Rota-Gravure Section

in the world

Published Each Sunday

by the

San Francisco Chronicle

ONLY

$5.20

a

Year

Including Every Sunday Feature of the CHRONICLE

COLUMBIA THEATRE

Leading Playhouse the West

Geary at Mason

Phone Franklin 150

Two Weeks—Beginning Monday, Sept. 25
Matinees Wednesday and Saturday
Sam H. Harris presents

MARY NEWCOMB

In Rachel Crothers' Comedy-Drama

"NICE PEOPLE"

1 Year in N. Y.—6 Months in Chicago

TICKETS NOW!

At Sherman, Clay & Co.'s Music Stores,
Fresno, Sacramento, Oakland,
San Francisco

For CONCERTS

GERALDINE

FARRAR

Oct. 5th—Fresno Municipal Auditorium.
Oct. 6th—Oakland Auditorium Theatre.
Oct. 8th—San Francisco New Curran Theatre.
Oct. 9th—Sacramento State Armory.
Management FRANK W. HEALY

Through Car Service
TO
SALT LAKE CITY
DENVER
CHICAGO ST. LOUIS

50 POST STREET 436-13th STREET
FERRY BUILDING OAKLAND
PHONE SUTTER 1651 PHONE OAK 791

WESTERN PACIFIC

Orpheum
THE BEST IN VAUDEVILLE
Orpheum Circuit

MATINEES 25 and 50c
DAILY
EVENINGS 25c TO $1.25
Except Sats., Suns. and Holidays
ALWAYS A GREAT SHOW
SMOKING PERMITTED IN DRESS
CIRCLE AND LOGES

VANITY FAIR.

When the United States Steel Corporation introduced a commodity known as "flat wire" it caused a mild sensation in industry, for flat wire served many purposes formerly requiring much preliminary labor on the iron or steel strip. Paris has been preparing to celebrate a great Parisian who introduced to the multitudes flat hair, and who inaugurated the process of flattening the hair on the head of any one whose hair was merely tubular with what the engineers call a circular section. To millions it would be a serious question which of the two benefactors deserved the better of humanity: he that introduced flat wire into industry, or he that introduced flat hair on heads that had formerly borne only the round section variety. For round hair is uninterestingly straight, while flat hair is beautifully curly. And it is a question whether it is better to add to the beauty of the world or to its mere mechanical conveniences. Paris celebrates the man that added to the snares of human beauty, male and female. His name is Marcel, and he is the inventor, not of aeroplanes or hydroplanes, or some new-fangled method of wireless transmission of bad songs and dull market statistics, or even a new style of abdominal surgery, but of the Marcel wave, a process of increasing the flatness of hair and thereby decreasing the flatness of life. Fifty years ago this great benefactor was a mere barber; and yet not a mere barber, for he was, under his own scented locks, a blazing genius, a forward-looking leader of his trade, his tribe, his race. He flattened the tresses of a young lady of his acquaintance, and she couldn't keep it to herself, and well he knew she couldn't, and he soon had all the work he could do. The results lasted five months, by which time, of course, the straight hair grew up from the uncorrupted scalp, and the kinks waved around on top. This made it necessary to repeat the operation, and brought the new industry into conformity with the basic principle the late P. D. Armour once laid down for a young man who had asked him how to get rich: "Make something the people will eat up." If Marcel waves were really permanent they would be far less profitable, just as permanent hams would be. But that in five months at most they grew out on straight stems meant wealth to the inventor. Marcel's services were sought, with profitable repetition, by beauties from France and England, and all parts of Europe. He was overwhelmed with business. He has flattened the hair of practically all the famous French actresses. Can this man be called a barber? Perish such vulgarity and such ingratitude! Paris acclaims him as she would any other patriot, any savant who had added to the national fame and honor. She elevates him, still living, to the pedestal on which stand her mighty dead, she places him with Daudet, with Zola, with Victor Hugo, with Pasteur, with Lavoisier, killed at his chemicals by the Terrorists, who declared the Revolution had no need of scholars. Marcel the hair waver shall have his due. The great beauties of Paris will take hair in kinks. The most brilliant luminaries of the stage will act as subjects while hundreds of instructed barbers will engage in a hair-dressing competition for 30,000 francs, paper money. The man that invented flat wire will not be in it with the man that invented a way to flatten hair. But more wealth awaits another inventor—the man who can reverse the process and straighten the kinks on the Afro-Americans of the United States. That man need never worry about his debts again.

Turkey has determined to guard its ethical standards from the corrupting influence and dubious morality of the Christian nations as exemplified in female costume. The government has appointed a style commission which finds danger in the shortened skirt just as Western nations are about to lengthen it. No doubt an irade will soon issue requiring all Turkish women to use plenty of material in their pantaloons, especially at the bottoms, or, rather, the lower edge. Such regulation seems timely and advisable, for all restraints commonly understood as Turkish in the matter of women appear to have been relaxed since the Young Turk revolution of 1908. It is strange how political changes affect costume and customs, even among the Turks. The traditional costume of the harem is gone. The Turkish woman no longer dresses as she did. The impenetrable black veil (yashmak) which used to conceal her features as effectively as any Venetian masque has changed into a piece of thin transparent gauze serving to enhance rather than conceal the flash of Oriental eye beneath it, according to correspondence of the Philadelphia Public Ledger. The ungainly tcharchaf, or head scarf, which used to cover the whole of the upper part of the body and left one in doubt whether Turkish women possessed waists, has grown shorter and shorter. The more advanced section, in their desire to prove that they possess, not only waists, but necks, have bisected the tcharchaf, restricting the part which covers the head to a sort of Russian toque. Skirts have become shorter and shorter, and in some cases are covered with variegated colored embroidery, thus showing the influence of Parisian or Viennese models. The Turkish commission has worked on this problem for months and has elaborated a code of dress which will protect Mohammedan virtue from the general looseness of Western ways. Whatever else the Turk may do, he is determined to live on a high moral plane—at least he is determined to keep his womenfolk on that plane.

Autumn is on the way, and a few September rains will bring the fact home to all, including the prune farmer who must arise in the night and stack his trays to salvage part of his crop. That is one of the unfailing signs of the approach of autumn in the country. But in the city it is most distinctly heralded by the appearance of celery on the grab counters of the cafeterias. This omen has appeared. The violinists have begun rosinning their bows more heavily, the pianists are using dumb-bells again. Jazz orchestras have little to fear, for the penetrating saxophone and the ear-splitting Chinese trumpet and shark-skin drum are beyond effective competition, but with old-fashioned orchestras, that dispense music rather than hullabaloo, the case is different. Those that like music with their meals have had it in some restaurants all summer. They must now give their kindly consideration to those that prefer celery. After all, there are few happier sounds in nature than a cafeteria full of people crunching celery. And there is a way by which both music lovers and celery enthusiasts can be pleased. Given a good orchestra leader, one that really leads rather than one that tries to lead and play at the same time, one able to set the tempo for a whole restaurant full of celery chompers, and a sublime effect should be possible. There is no truth in the rumor that they are about to exclude celery from restaurants because it interferes with the music. It should be part of it, and one of the best parts. But only when well led. Syncopated crunching will not serve. It must be rhythmic, truly concerted. And in order to be so it should be orderly. We have a number of popular compositions with which it will, at a pinch, accord. There are "Stumbling," "Hot Lips," and many more. It can even be articulated with the old reliable "Poet and Peasant" overture, only that is long, and it takes several bunches to last out. For the celery obligato the leader should see all set, each diner with his branch poised. At three raps on the music rack every mouth should open, every branch should find itself between suddenly converging teeth, natural or store. Thence it is mainly a matter of keeping time, with trimmings, indicated in Italian, the language De Quincy found so necessary to music. The first crash tears the morsel from the brittle stalk. The rest is the champing movement, only to be interrupted for fresh supplies. Now, all together! Addagio, allegro, andante, con molte espressione, fortissimo, crescendo! We do not know if we have these in their most effective sequence, but if not the composition can be rearranged. The musical possibilities of celery are not exceeded by those of any jazz orchestra in any tin tray palace in the land.

Only one man was ever known to us who could eat celery in silence. All his processes were silent, to secretiveness. He was an expert at it. He embezzled $5000 and silently slipped away. This points to the conclusion that when an honest man chaws celery he makes a noise.

The Topeka State Journal has for some months been printing the Bible in serial form, and states that the experiment has proved a great success. Readers are following the installments with interest, and those of

BALFOUR, GUTHRIE &amp; CO.

SAN FRANCISCO AND LOS ANGELES,
PORTLAND, SEATTLE, TACOMA,
AND VANCOUVER.

MERCHANTS

EXPORTERS AND IMPORTERS

MARINE AND FIRE INSURANCE
AVERAGE ADJUSTERS

Agents of

HARRISON DIRECT LINE OF STEAMERS
TO AND FROM EUROPEAN PORTS
and
COMMONWEALTH GOVERNMENT LINE

Redwood Export Company

California Redwood
Lumber and TiesCargoes and Parcels
"To off shore markets only"260 CALIFORNIA STREET
SAN FRANCISCO, CALIF.

Phone Sutter 2163

UNION LUMBER CO.

CROCKER BUILDING

SAN FRANCISCO, CALIFORNIA

MANUFACTURERS AND WHOLESALERS

— OF —

REDWOOD LUMBER
RAILROAD TIES
TELEGRAPH POLES
SHINGLES

— AND —

SPLIT REDWOOD PRODUCTS

E. C. EVANS &amp; SONS, Inc.

(Established 1881)

STEAMSHIP AGENTS

SHIP AND INSURANCE BROKERS

260 California Street, San Francisco
Phone Douglas 8040 Cable Address "DEWGRIP"

GENERAL PETROLEUM CORPORATION

Offices at

SAN FRANCISCO LOS ANGELES
Alaska Commercial Bldg. Higgins Bldg.HAMMOND
LUMBER COMPANY
260 CALIFORNIA ST.
REDWOOD, DOUGLAS FIR
AND PILING

THE CHARLES NELSON CO.

MANUFACTURER AND WHOLESALER

of

REDWOOD, DOUGLAS FIR,
SPRUCE, HEMLOCK,
SUGAR & WHITE PINE,
CEDAR SHINGLES & POLES.

230 California St. San Francisco

Geo. E. Billings Roy C. Ward Geo. B. Dinsmore
J. C. Muessdorffer Jas. W. Dean

GEO. E. BILLINGS CO.

ALL FORMS OF INSURANCE
EFFECTED312 California St., San Francisco, Cal.
Phone—Douglas 6400BONESTELL & CO.
PAPERThe paper used in printing the Argonaut is
furnished by us
CALIFORNIA'S LEADING PAPER HOUSE
118 to 124 First Street, corner Minna,
San FranciscoArgonaut subscribers may have the paper sent regularly to their out-of-town address during the vacation season promptly on request.

"Travel Without Trouble"

COOK'S TRAVEL SERVICE

World wide—Complete—Efficient

Inclusive Tours for Individual Travel

arranged, to start any day by
any route.

Explanatory circular on request

THOS. COOK &amp; SON

(Est. 1841)

Agents for the best lines for travel by
Land, Water or Air

128 SUTTER STREET

(COOK'S BUILDING) Phone Kearny 3512

LAKE TAHOE
THE SCENIC DAYLIGHT WAYRound
Trip Only $16.50

Leave San Francisco 7:20 a.m.

Lunch Placerville

Arrive Lake Tahoe 6:00 p.m.

SAN FRANCISCO-
SACRAMENTO R. R.
AND PIERCE-ARROW STAGE

Press Clippings

Are money-makers for Contractors, Supply
Houses, Business Men and
CorporationsALLEN'S PRESS CLIPPING BUREAU
Phone Douglas 5119 121 Second StreetCOOK QUICKLY WITH ELECTRICITY

Electric ranges cook quickly. Heat begins in the cooking units the instant the switch is turned to Low, Medium, or High. It rapidly mounts to an intensity which is ample for proper cooking. The heat units are just large enough for quick, perfect cooking, and not so large that electric current is consumed needlessly.

If the stores you patronize do not carry electric ranges, ask at the local P. G. and E. office for further information on their speed and economy of operation.

Pacific Gas and Electric Company

P. G. and E.
"PACIFIC SERVICE"

STORYETTES.

Grave and Gay, Epigrammatic and Otherwise.

Senator Borah said at a dinner in Boise: "I am sorry that Lord Grey opposes the system of international conferences, for I believe they will avert future wars; I believe they would have averted the world war. Yes, gentlemen, I say with the great Lloyd George, 'Better pow-pows than bow-wows.'"

The provision dealer was astonished. He gazed at the newly-married young woman as if he thought she were a victim of temporary insanity. "Did you say you wanted a—lean chicken, ma'am?" he queried. "Certainly, I did," and the young woman's expression took on an added dignity. "Neither Mr. Torker nor I ever eat chicken fat. It is extremely distasteful to both of us, and I see no occasion for paying for what we do not like."

The following conversation took place as Dinah Johnson entered the office of Probate Judge Emory in Southern Georgia: "Am yo' de reprobate judge?" "Yes, I'm the probate judge." "Wall, dat's wat I says, you'se de reprobate judge an' my ole man, wat's been studyin' down at his heah logical cemetery, done died detested an' lef' me two little infidels an' I done come to be 'pointed der executioner.'"

The defendant, held in an Ohio court on the charge of keeping a dog without a license, repeatedly tried to interrupt the evidence, but was hushed each time by the court. Finally the clerk turned to him and said: "Do you wish the court to understand that you refuse to renew your dog license?" "Yes, but—" "We want no 'buts.' You must renew your license or be fined. You know it expired on January 1st." "Yes," said the defendant, "and so did the dog."

A. J. Balfour said on the Aquitania: "I go back home impressed with your American quickness. You are certainly the quickest people on earth. An English farmer was showing an American over his sheep farm one day. 'How many sheep do you think there are in that field?' the farmer asked. 'Er—600,' said the American. 'Right! Exactly right!' said the farmer. 'How the deuce did you know?' 'Why,' drawled the American, 'I just counted the legs and divided by four.'"

In the streets of a Southern city there recently met a couple of darkies, and, during the course of their conversation, one remarked to the other: "Yessuh, I's done proved dat honesty is de best policy, after all." "How?" demanded his friend. "You remembers dat dawg dat I took?" "Shore, I remembers." "Well, sub, I tries fo' two whole days to sell dat dawg and nobody offers more'n a dollah. So, like an honest man, I goes to de lady dat ownied him, an' she gives me three dollahs and fifty cents."

The late John Kendrick Bangs, the humorist, said at a dinner in Atlantic City last summer: "Germany isn't hated quite so bitterly as in the war-time, but she had better pay what she owes us, all the same. 'There's my husband in the backyard,' said the woman. 'But, madam,' said the gas collector, 'I see nobody but a Chinaman out there in the back yard.' 'Well, that's my husband,' said she. 'Your husband's a Chinaman!' groaned the gas collector. 'No!' 'Yes, sur,' smiled the woman. 'Why, the woman next door is married to a German.'"

The conjurer was performing in a theatre near a powder mill. A sailor and his parrot were enjoying the show. The conjurer changed half a crown into a penny. "Now that's a fine trick," said the sailor, lighting his pipe. "I wonder what the hell he'll do next?" The sailor threw away his match. A minute later there was no sailor, no factory, no theatre, no village. On a steeply a mile away the parrot, with one feather remaining, said: "Now that's a fine trick. I wonder what the hell he'll do next?"

The late Sir James T. Naesmyth of Posso, Peeblesshire, is succeeded in the title by his nephew, Mr. Douglas Naesmyth. An interesting story is told of how this very old family got its name. In the reign of James III of Scotland an ancestor, pursued by the Douglas partisans, sought refuge in a smithy, disguised as a hammerman. The Douglas followers suspected the man, who in his agitation struck a false blow, when one of the Douglas men rushed at him calling out, "Ye're nae smith." The story leaves much to be desired; for example, where Posso got its name, and also Peeblesshire.

According to Mr. G. B. Burgin in his "Memoirs of a Clubman," Robert Barr was once traveling in France with his wife in a non-smoking carriage, when two brawny Huns, each smoking a huge pipe, got in. Explaining that it was not a smoking carriage and that Mrs. Barr objected to smoking, Barr promptly bundled them out again. At the first stopping place, when the Huns were strolling up and down the platform, they saw Barr smoking a huge cigar in the same carriage. "You to us tell," one of them spluttered, "this a smoking carriage not is, and you yourself smokes when the lady the smoke not wishes." "Ah, but you see," replied Barr, "she's my wife and can't help herself."

When Susan Johnsing brought back the clean clothes, the mistress of the house said, "Why don't you let that big, hulking husband of yours carry the clothes for you?" "Mah husban'?" was the scornful response. "Dat aint no husban' o' mine. Dat's jes' de nigger I lives wid."

An Abraham Lincoln story in William A. Roger's treasure house of reminiscences in "A World Worth While" concerns the well-known cartoonist when he was a young treasury clerk. He was a member of the Home Guard and was liable to be called out for guard duty after office hours at any time. "One night," he relates, "I had arranged to go to a ball and had arrayed myself in my best clawhammer, my most immaculate vest, and a silk hat. I was about to leave the house when a call for guard duty came. No time for a change of raiment—but one thing to do, shoulder my musket and march all night in front of the Treasury Building! In the early gray dawn I saw the long, shambling figure of the President coming down the White House walk. He had his hands folded behind his back and his head was bowed. Evidently he was out to do a little quiet thinking by himself. He approached, and when he was still a few feet away I stiffened up in true military form and presented arms to the commander-in-chief of the army and navy of the United States. Mr. Lincoln stopped, looked at me carefully, and then inquired what regiment I belonged to. I felt a good deal flustered, but managed to reply that I was Treasury Clerk So-and-So called for guard duty in such-and-such a company and regiment of the Home Guard. The President looked at my top hat, at my patent-leather pumps, my clawhammer coat, and my old army musket, and he said, 'Well, young man, I did not wish to be too inquisitive, but I can't get used to all these new uniforms.'"

THE MERRY MUSE.

The Comrade Speaks.

I'm a wild, or Russian, Bolshevik,
With manners rough and rude,
I swear 'most ev'ry time I speak,
My table-talk is crude;
I curse out-kings and queens and such,
And drop bombs in their soup;
I think it funny as a crutch
To see them loop the loop.
And as for rich aristocrats,
I lead them quite a dance.
(Frankly, I bat 'em in the slats,
What time I get the chance.)
For do you think that I would change
My kopeks for their dollars,
That I would give my kerchief strange
For all their linen collars,
That I'd eschew my simple fare
To chew their costly food,
And lap up all their liquors rare?
YOU BET YOUR LIFE I WOULD!
—A. C. M. A. in Life.

Is the Salon Coming Back?

Verily, these are the days of petticoat politics, or of petticoated politicians, says Maud McDougall in the Philadelphia Public Ledger. All over the country women are being nominated, generally by the party whose nomination is regarded as more or less an idle compliment, carrying scarcely the ghost of a chance of election. Men all over the country—especially the men who are candidates or party managers—are waiting that "You can't count on the woman vote!" In the old days they could make a fair guess which way Mr. Thomas Catt was going to jump in an election, but now no mere man can predict in which direction Mistress Tabby Catt's feline imagination will carry her. Women are breaking lances with men in the political lists. Politicians are trying to propitiate the woman vote with sacrifice and burnt offering. Senator Pomerene, for instance, who is credited with presidential aspirations, but who was opposed to the bitter end to the Federal suffrage amendment, is offering, apparently as a propitiation, a mothers' pension bill; other are inquiring anxiously how the women "react to the tariff."

Playing politics is at all times Washington's favorite in-and-outdoor sport; and in these feminist days the game is acquiring a new and piquant interest. Also it is developing a little group of political hostesses, women of means and position whose homes are in a fair way to becoming centres of party activity, political salons, such as have flourished in London and Paris and other European capitals, where campaigns have been planned and men and measures have been made and unmade.

DESTRUCTIVE "Sulpho" compounds are the cause of motor oils breaking down rapidly under engine heat. An enormous amount of money is annually lost through the presence of these unnecessary properties in oils.

Cycol will save engine owners this tremendous amount of money lost through wasted oil, wasted fuel, preventable repairs, because it is free from destructive "sulpho" compounds. These have been removed by the new Hexeon Process used exclusively by us.

When your oil contains destructive "sulpho" compounds it breaks down rapidly under engine heat. Its lubricating value becomes quickly impaired. The oil film is broken and serious damage may result.

Have your crank case thoroughly flushed—not with kerosene. Use the correct grade of Cycol as shown on the Cycol Recommendation Chart. Use Associated Gasoline. Then notice the improved performance of your motor.

ASSOCIATED OIL COMPANY
SAN FRANCISCO

CYCOL
MOTOR OIL
FREE FROM DESTRUCTIVE "SULPHO" COMPOUNDS

PERSONAL.

Social Notes.

Miss Elizabeth Schmiedell, who will be married to Mr. James Moinitt September 30th, was the honor guest at a dinner party given Tuesday evening by Mr. and Mrs. Walter S. Martin at their home in Burlingame. The guests were of the younger married set and the debutantes of the past two seasons. Miss Schmiedell was also the honor guest at two luncheons last week, one given on Thursday by Mrs. Wakefield Baker in San Rafael and another on Friday by Mrs. Lawrence Fox at the Town and Country Club. Mrs. Alfred de Ropp will entertain for her today at the de Ropp home in town.

Dr. and Mrs. George Ely are in New York on their wedding trip. The wedding of Dr. Ely and Miss Jessica Wilbur, daughter of President Ray Lyman Wilbur of Stanford University and Mrs. Wilbur, took place last Thursday evening at the Stanford Memorial Chapel in the presence of forty relatives and friends. Dr. and Mrs. Ely will remain East for a month and upon their return will make their home in Palo Alto.

The engagement of Miss Frances Lent to Mr. Hugh Porter was made known last week by means of betrothal cards sent through the mail by Mr. and Mrs. Eugene Lent, parents of Miss Lent. Miss Lent is a debutante of last year. The wedding will take place during December upon the return of Mr. and Mrs. Lent, who are now in the East.

Mrs. Charles J. Foster entertained at tea on Tuesday at her home in Ross as a farewell to a number of friends. Mr. and Mrs. Foster will make their home in the future in Piedmont.

Miss Elizabeth Oyster entertained at luncheon last Friday at the home of her mother, Mrs. Joseph Oyster, in Palo Alto. Her guests included Mrs. Charles W. Hunt, Jr., Mrs. Lorraine B. Mackey, Mr. Alfred Oyster, Mr. Lorin Howard Tryon, and Mr. Elmer Jennings.

The engagement of Miss Cornelia Sutton to

Mr. Joseph Mason Reeves, Jr., of New York is announced by Miss Sutton's parents, Mr. and Mrs. Walter Sutton. Miss Sutton is a University of California student. Mr. Reeves is an illustrator of national note. The wedding will take place upon Miss Sutton's graduation from the university.

Mrs. William Bowers Bourn entertained at luncheon recently in honor of Mrs. Frederick Sharon, who is passing the summer in California. Mrs. Bourn's guests at the affair, which was held at Filoli, her home in San Mateo, were Mrs. William Mayo Newhall, Mrs. George Barr Baker, Mrs. Osgood Hooker, Mrs. William H. Crocker, Mrs. William N. Tubbs, Mrs. Richard Sprague, Mrs. Louis Parrott, Mrs. George H. Mendell, Jr., Mrs. James P. Langhorne, Mrs. George T. Marye and Mrs. James L. Flood.

The wedding of Miss Katherine Mackay and Mr. Kenneth O'Brien will take place today at St. Mary's Church, Roslyn, Long Island, with many Californians in attendance. Among the bridal attendants will be Miss Geraldine Graham of Santa Barbara, who is visiting at the home of the bride's father, Mr. Clarence Mackay, in Long Island.

Mrs. John R. K. Nuttall entertained at luncheon recently in honor of Mrs. Louis Parrott, who has returned to California for the summer. A dozen guests were asked to meet Mrs. Parrott.

Miss Evelyn McGaw, whose engagement to Lieutenant-Commander Elsworth Harper Van Patten, U. S. N., was announced last month, was given a bridge-ten on Saturday afternoon by Miss Mollie McBride at the Francesca Club. Over twenty guests were present.

The recital which Miss Doria Fernanda gave Tuesday evening at the St. Francis Hotel was attended by many San Franciscans. Those who took boxes and entertained friends included Mrs. Templeton Crocker, Mrs. Edwin R. Dimond, Mrs. Joseph D. Grant, Mrs. Thomas Graham Crothers, Mrs. Charles Slack, Miss Laura McKinstry and Miss Ada Clement.

Mr. and Mrs. Wellington Gregg will entertain at a dinner-dance on Saturday evening at their new apartment in Hyde Street.

Miss Hélène de Latour will be a luncheon hostess tomorrow at the St. Francis Hotel, when her guests will include the debutantes of the past two seasons.

Miss Mary Chickering gave a luncheon during the past week for Miss Betty Dibblee and Miss Harriet Walker. Miss Chickering entertained at the Town and Country Club and was assisted by her mother, Mrs. Allen Chickering.

Mrs. Laura Bride Powers entertained at a reception Sunday afternoon at her studio in the Court Yard Studio Building. Several hundred guests called during the afternoon. Mrs. Ray Simonds, Mrs. Adrian Applegarth, and Mrs. Carlo Morbio were among those who assisted Mrs. Powers in greeting her guests.

Mrs. Robert Stewart entertained at tea on Saturday in honor of Mrs. Nicholas Kittle Boyd, Miss Margaret Geary, Miss Kathleen Kinney and Miss Lucille Crow, the latter of New York. The engagement of Miss Crow to Captain J. W. Roy Stewart, U. S. A., son of the hostess, was made during the afternoon. Several hundred guests were entertained, many from San Francisco being among those present.

Mrs. George Howard entertained at luncheon on Friday at Howard House in El Cerrito. The guests were Mrs. Joseph Grant, Mrs. Charles Dudgeon, Mrs. George T. Marye, Mrs. Rudolph Spreckels, Mrs. George Landenberger, Mrs. Rennie Pierre Schwerin, Mrs. James Robinson, Mrs. Russell Wilson, Mrs. Alfred Tubbs and Miss Flora Doyle.

Miss Helen Marye entertained at dinner last Friday evening at the St. Francis Hotel, having ten guests. Mrs. Eugene Murphy chaperoned the group. A theatre party followed the dinner.

Mrs. Horace Hill gave a luncheon on Friday at the St. Francis Hotel, having as her guests Mrs. Charles Templeton Crocker, Mrs. John Gallois, and Miss Marion Zeile.

The engagement of Miss Camilla Loyal Ashe Sewell, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Harold Sewell of Bath, Maine, to Senator Evans Edge of New Jersey is announced. Miss Ashe has visited in San Francisco a number of times as the guest of her aunt, Mrs. Norman McLaren, and her uncles, Mr. Porter Ashe and Mr. Gaston Ashe.

Mrs. Henry Foster Dutton entertained at luncheon last week at the St. Francis Hotel, prior to her departure for the East. Her guests included a number of matrons from the peninsula.

Mr. and Mrs. Edmunds Lyman entertained at dinner on Sunday evening at the Burlingame Country Club in honor of Mr. and Mrs. Arthur Hill Vincent. The guests were Mr. and Mrs. Bernard W. Ford, Mr. and Mrs. George Nickel, Mr. and Mrs. Arthur Hill Vincent, Count and Countess André de Limur, and Miss Katherine Ramsey.

Mrs. Walter G. Filer was luncheon hostess to Mrs. Ross Ambler Curran, Mrs. Robert Hays Smith, Mrs. D. C. Jackling, and Mrs. Rudolph Spreckels at the St. Francis last Monday. Mr. and Mrs. George S. Romanovsky and Mr. and Mrs. Paul Verrier were another of the groups at luncheon in the Fable Room. Miss Edith Grant entertained a party of five. Mrs. George T. Marye was hostess to a group at luncheon, including Mrs. George de Latour, Miss Lillie O'Connor, Miss Cecelia O'Connor, and Miss Flora Doyle. Among others entertaining were Mr. and Mrs. Alexander Rutherford, Mrs. Frederick Burnham, Mrs. Ritchie Dunn, Miss Jennie Blair, and Mrs. J. A. Folger.

May Look at an Ex-Emperor.

Now that he is rid of his officious aide-de-camp, who it was said was the instigator of the secrecy maintained at Doorn, the ex-Kaiser no longer hides from the stares of tourists who go to his Dutch castle home, according to the New York Herald. Visitors to the town this summer—and these include hundreds of Americans—are not in any way prevented from getting a long look at the former emperor as he strolls or busies himself about the grounds.

While admittance to the residence and grounds is still prohibited, the guard about the grounds has been reduced, and the big palisade built by the order of the former aide-de-camp has been removed, so that Wilhelm as he continues to saw down trees is plainly visible and can often be heard talking.

His favorite subjects for conversation are agriculture and shooting. Visitors report that he has been seen to shoot a hare and a rabbit and to plant a tree.

His interest in the minutiae of his life is still intense for him. The only trace left of his former power is exercised at the dinner-table, where no one is allowed to speak unless he does, with the result that if the ex-Kaiser is moody and won't speak the meal is taken in silence.

He objects to all criticism of President Ebert and rebukes all jokes on his successor as head of the German nation. He still believes, however, that Germany will again become a monarchy, although he does not entertain the hope that he will be recalled. He expects one of his grandsons to be the next emperor.

For visitors he invariably has one question: "What does the outside world say about me?"

Wilhelm was the first to take steps for a reconciliation with the ex-Crown Prince, who is now one of the most frequent visitors at Doorn. It is even reported that he will be authorized by the Dutch government to leave Wieringen and live with his father.

The United Fruit and other lines have instituted a rigorous system to prevent bootlegging in live birds and animals which have been smuggled in by the hundreds to supply the New York market for pets, says the New York Times. Importation of birds and animals is not forbidden, but quarantine regulations are so strict, and the difficulty in handling a shipment of monkeys, parrots, and miscellaneous birds and animals is so great that the ship companies often refuse to transport them at any price. Sometimes they name so great a figure that the pet dealer can not meet it. This condition, together with the disorganization of the world's pet market, which formerly was in the hands of Germans, is responsible for the enormous prices of pets at retail.

The largest sum ever paid for a film in France was 750,000 francs for the French rights of Griffith's "Orphans of the Storm."

War Workers' Work.

San Francisco Chapter, National American War Mothers, will give a bridge and whist party and informal dance at the St. Francis Hotel, Friday evening, September 22d, at 8:30, to raise funds for carrying on the chapter's work for disabled veterans in hospitals. There will be a series of prize awards. The chapter, of which Mrs. Rose C. Sargent is Chapter War Mother, keeps up extensive activities looking to the care, comfort, and entertainment of buddies confined to hospitals. Tickets may be procured from members and from Sherman, Clay & Co.

Kentucky blue grass grows successfully in well-fertilized lawns in Alaska.

The ST. FRANCIS
One of the world's great hotels
Facing Union Square
SAN FRANCISCO CALIFORNIA

WHERE SERVICE AND COMFORTS ARE PLANNED FOR GUESTS WHO APPRECIATE THE BEST

Thos. J. Coleman
Manager

El Encanto Hotel and Bungalows

SANTA BARBARA, CALIFORNIA.

LOCATED on the Riviera 500 feet above sea level, overlooking the city, ocean and distant islands. Street-cars within a block. Fifteen minutes to the beautiful beach, or to La Cumbre's unsurpassed Golf links. Horseback Riding over glorious mountain trails. Tennis Courts and Putting Course in hotel grounds. Purest milk, cream and butter from El Encanto Dairy. Fresh vegetables from our own gardens. Highest standard cuisine.

RATES MODERATE
Liberal discount for long stay

DEL MONTE

The Largest Resort Hotel Plant in the World
Where "Thinking People" can find Recreation in Hotel del Monte's Comfort, Service and Outdoor Life. "Here every sportsman can find his chosen recreation."

TWO CHAMPIONSHIP GOLF COURSES
CARL S. STANLEY, Manager
DEL MONTE : : CALIFORNIA

San Ysidro Ranch

Furnished bungalows of various sizes; situated on the foothills among the orange groves, overlooking the sea. Central dining-room, electric lights, hot and cold water. Good tennis court. Six miles from Santa Barbara, two miles from ocean. Booklet. Address MANAGER

San Ysidro Ranch, Santa Barbara

Ideal for Rest

Marin's great outdoors—and all the comforts of home; no wonder folks prefer to spend week-ends at HOTEL RAFAEL. Rates, $1.50 up.

Dinner Dance Saturday—8 to 12
Management, W. C. Jurgens

BOND DEPARTMENT large bank has splendid opportunity for ambitious, well-educated young man. Experience not necessary. College graduate preferred. A real business education is available for young man who is willing to place opportunity before immediate remuneration. Give full particulars when answering.
Address Bond Department, care The Argonaut.

$19.00

Lowest Round Trip to Los Angeles

Good on any of our

7 Regular Trains AND ON

"Daylight Limited"

which leaves Third Street Station 7:45 A. M. Fridays and Saturdays

Tickets good for return within 15 days

AT $22.50

ALSO TICKETS ON SALE DAILY. RETURN LIMIT NOT LATER THAN OCTOBER 31

Our Agents will gladly give you additional information

Southern Pacific Lines

Ferry Station

50 Post Street

Phone Sutter 4000

Third St. Station

THE ALLEGED HUMORISTS.

"Don't you think she should have her voice cultivated?" "Yes, plowed under."—Life.

The Artist—Do you like marines? The Girl—Yes, but I just adore aviators.—Judge.

Mother's Voice—Are you entertaining Harold? Daughter's—No, we're just talking.—Colgate Banter.

"My wife is quite mad. I can't have her put away, however, until she has killed some one—preferably a stranger."—Paris Journal Amusant.

Ezra—How long you say that son o' your'n has been in college? Ezekiel—Waal, 'bout sixteen head o' cattle 'n' twenty acres o' corn.—Annapolis Log.

She (as the band strikes up)—Surely this is Tschaikowski's "1812"? He—Very likely; I asked for the oldest wine in the cellar.—London Passing Show.

"If Juliet imagines that Frank is marrying her for her money, why doesn't she pretend she's lost it all?" "She's afraid he might believe it."—London Mail.

"How did Blithers get a job with the government?" "His congressman had to get him a government job or pay his railroad fare back home."—Birmingham Age-Herald.

"You 'usband 'as got to look shabby lately." "Well, it's really a blessing" in disguise, Mrs. Miggs; y'er see, it saves me all the expense of 'avin' to dress up to 'im."—Punch.

"Where is your mother?" "She has to stay in bed." "Why, is she ill?" "No, she must keep to her bed because, if she leaves it, father will occupy it."—Berlin Der Brummer.

A contemporary reminds us that there are two mentally deranged men in Russia who think they are Trotzkys. It is quite possible that one of them is right.—London Humorist.

Summer Visitor—And does the splendor of a sunset mean nothing—nothing to you? Farmer—You—betcher—sweet—life it does, missus! It means I kin onhitch an' go home.—Life.

Hubby—Did you get Norah to clean the spot out of my golf suit? Wifey—No, I did it myself. Poor girl, she can't bear the smell of gasoline since the chauffeur jilted her.—Judge.

Seaside Landlady (to maid)—I thought I told you to present the bill to Number 13? Maid—Yes, mum, I 'ave. Landlady—Impossible. I can still hear him singing.—London Opinion.

The Doctor—Sure, I'm willing enough to prescribe beer for you, but I can't think of any disease to name in the prescription. Mr. Wetmore—Make it hydrophobia, Doc.—Way-side Tales.

"What's the matter, dear? You look unhappy." "Oh, dear. I married Dick for alimony and then I fell in love with him, and now it breaks my heart to divorce him."—London Mail.

"I have seen some strange characters since I came to the States," said Klaus Klone. "Well, I do see one fellow, however, on a regular basis, down the road, but he is a little suspicious. He was daid."—Toronto.

"Do you know that good stuff?" "It's poison, sir." "Then why are you drinking it?" "Strictly as a sporting proposition. The law may interfere with my personal habits to some extent, but my life is my own."—Birmingham Age-Herald.

"Do you find that taking summer boarders lightens your burden as an agricultural toiler?" "I'll say it does," declared Farmer Cornstossel. "It's a heap easier to get your tomatoes with a can-opener than it is with a hoe."—Washington Star.

Complete Stranger—Could you tell me who that old fellow is? I've noticed him on the pier a goodish bit. Old Lady—Well, he has the air of an actor or a poet. Complete Stranger—Air! Oh, you can't go by that. They often cut it nowadays.—Punch.

QUICK AND CROOKED.

"The most remarkable fact about Richard Douglas, professional swindler," says Mr. Charles Kingston in 'Remarkable Rogues' (John Lane Company), "was that he kept a record of every one of his crimes, as well as a profit and loss balance-sheet, which he drew up at the end of the year. His diary was an astonishing document, and had it not been for the craft and obvious guilt of the impostor it might have been used as evidence to prove that he was not quite right in his head. Douglas, however, was too resourceful a thief to be a lunatic, and for some years he victimized all classes in London, where he posed as a baronet and committed depredations upon the trusting and unsuspecting.

"The impostor was a man of venerable aspect, with kindly blue eyes and a soft, ingratiating manner. He was born with the name of Douglas, but as his father was a small tradesman in a Surrey village Richard thought he had better disown him, and when he had failed many times to earn an honest living he blazoned forth as 'Sir Richard Douglas of Orpington House, Kent,' and made his two elder sons partners in his criminal enterprises. A few months' swindling provided Douglas with sufficient capital to rent an expensive house at Ascot, which became his headquarters, and it was to that he would retire every week-end from the stress and strain of London.

"He had, of course, many narrow escapes. Once he absent-mindedly entered the shop of a jeweler whom he had defrauded only a fortnight earlier. The moment the proprietor saw him he recognized him, but pretended not to do so, and entered into negotiations with the self-styled 'baronet.' But the jeweler was so unusually alert that 'Sir Richard' soon realized the situation, and knew he was in a tight corner, for in addition to the presence of the jeweler a brawny assistant was keeping guard at the door. But the 'baronet' was in no way perturbed—he just casually glanced out of the window, lightly brushing his cheek with his handkerchief. It was a signal to his son, who was outside, that he was in difficulties.

"Philip Douglas was a real chip of the old block, and in a moment he devised a plan to save his venerable parent. Walking briskly into the shop where 'Sir Richard' was the only customer, he peremptorily laid his hand on his father's arm, and in curt tones expressed his delight at having at last captured him.

"It's a bit of luck for you that I was passing and recognized this fellow," he said to the astonished jeweler. 'Do you know that he is one of the greatest swindlers in London? I have been looking for him for over a year. Take my advice, and see if he has robbed you of anything.'

"The jeweler, who had been waiting for a sign to determine whether or not the man before him was the 'baronet,' and thinking that the man was a moment before his hands were bound, and that which was his own and his son's.

"At the suggestion of the 'detective,' the jeweler further charged Sir Richard with having tried to obtain the tiara by false pretenses. This was what the two rogues wanted.

"Then you will be good enough to make a parcel of that tiara," said the 'detective' with an air of authority which was irresistible. 'You will carefully seal it, too. I shall have to hand it over to my superior officer to be used as evidence at the trial. Of course, I will give you a receipt for it.'

"The jeweler hastened to obey, and ten minutes later Philip Douglas left the shop and stepped into a four-wheeler with his father and the diamond tiara. The 'detective' shouted out the address of a police station, nodded curtly to the jeweler, and drove off. That night at Ascot the family gloated over the acquisition of a prize which would bring them in six hundred pounds at least, and leave a big profit for the receiver of stolen goods."

A War-Born College.

Down on a little quiet street in Paris, the rue de l'Elysée, is the headquarters of an international experiment that is interesting, because it combines idealism with action in its quiet but effective educational work, says the Philadelphia Public Ledger. It is called the College des Etats-Unis l'Amerique.

Established in France in 1916 and incorporated in the United States in 1919, it was designed primarily to encourage intellectual unity between the United States and France, as well as a better understanding of the people so closely brought together during the war. It is an organization with the soul left in, and its object is to give individual attention to any student coming to France—a centre from which he can not only obtain information regarding the merits of universities, schools, and all intellectual activity, or in any special branch, but where he is advised as to his own special needs. Intellectual honesty is needed in these days. Universities are sometimes only magnificent structures, housing a cafeteria, where the student helps himself according to his appetite for instruction. A little diagnosis or a few suggestions from some one interested would not come amiss, and that is the object of this unique clearing house for humans; it hopes to solve the problems that so often confront the individual student in coming to France.

A Drawer in an Office Desk is admittedly no place for valuable documents, such as deeds, wills, contracts, bonds, etc.

A Safe Deposit Box in the Crocker Safe Deposit Vaults (Crocker Bldg.) for $4.00 a year will give you peace of mind.

If the student desires it, every effort is made to place him with sympathetic French families, where he may live comfortably and economically and at the same time acquire a knowledge of the language and customs of the country available in no other way. A better understanding among the young people of the allied nations is a good foundation for future peace, and is there a better way than through the mutual friendship gained by English-speaking students living in French homes?

Several hundred students have been placed in French families through the assistance and interest of the College des Etats-Unis and their letters are full of friendly understanding and sympathy.

The College des Etats-Unis is in America one of the best known, best loved, and, in fact, the largest reality in French education and culture. The inspiration of the French people and the French Republic is the heart of the world over.

The College des Etats-Unis has on its board of administration men who are famous on both sides of the Atlantic. The American Ambassador is honorary president, and the patrons include M. Millerand, president of the republic; the president of the council, the president of the senate, the ministry of public instruction and rectors of the universities. The catalogues have been printed in English for the first time for the express use of American students and are prefaced by the foremost savants of France.

Back to Barter.

In Boston many years ago a canny landlord leased a piece of real estate for a long term of years at an annual rental of so many bushels of wheat, says the New York Evening Post. As dollars cheapened, the value of the wheat rose compensatingly, and so the rent remained nearly stable in purchasing power from year to year. Not exactly, of course, but the variation between the purchasing power of that rent fifty years ago and today is far less than if the rent were paid in money.

Lately Germans have been adopting this method. A peasant woman the other day leased so many acres for so many pounds of butter per annum. As the mark descends, her rental butter rises in value. This practice is bound to become common wherever and whenever money becomes insecure and unstable. In a pinch of that sort every one realizes that money is not wealth and acts accordingly. In that conviction a trader exchanges one reality for another, and the age of barter is reborn.

A humorist recently suggested to the American publishers of the ex-Kaiser's memoirs that the American title should be "From Baden-Baden to Worse and Worse."

Visit to San Francisco Cemeteries

(Reprint from Park and Cemetery.)

I am interested in Mr. Banta's "Cemeteries of San Francisco" in the July Park and Cemetery. A few weeks ago I was in San Francisco and visited the cemeteries and found them just as he tells us they are. I was at the Hotel Plaza when, Wednesday morning, June 14th, my good old friend John McLaren, Superintendent of Golden Gate Park, came for me and I was his guest for the day. The forenoon was given to the glories of that queen of parks, Golden Gate Park, and the companionship of the great landscape architect who designed it and constructed it and who has been chosen by the people of San Francisco to continue to reign over it so long as he lives, was certainly a delight and a fund of instruction no other teacher could impart. Then, with the kindly hospitality of Mrs. McLaren, rested and refreshed away again we sped, this time to a feast of cemeteries and the greatest among these was Cypress Lawn Cemetery.

Now, I know many of our great cemeteries, east and west, north and south, at home and several abroad, but a more beautiful cemetery than that of Cypress Lawn near San Francisco I never have seen, and when it comes to their new public mausoleum, it defies competition. Its beauty, elegance, substantial and artistic finish inside and out, and the tasteful disposition of growing plants, rock and water, surpass any effort in a similar situation that ever before came under my observation.

And the outside cemetery was lavishly beautiful with splendid grass and a wealth of furnishing trees, shrubs, palms and other plants to us here unknown out of doors, because of their tenderness, still their manner of use at Cypress Lawn suggested many a lesson in planting, using the material available at our hands. Mr. Banta, do please give us some detail of what they plant and how they use it.

During part of that happy day another dear and congenial old friend of both of us, Tom Lee, Superintendent of Del Monte, Monterey, joined us. I spent the previous Sunday with him on that magnificent estate of a thousand acres reveling in its vast collection of rare trees and other plants. Twenty years ago I spent a day with him in the same enjoyable task.

You know it does a fellow good to get out and away among other folks, it helps to eliminate the conceit from his noddle, a mighty good job, too, sometimes.

WM. FALCONER,
Supt. Allegheny Cemetery,
Pittsburg, Pa.

KING
COAL

High in Heat Units
Low in Ash

FOR SALE BY ALL DEALERS
IN CALIFORNIA

KING COAL CO.

Main Office
EXCHANGE BLOCK
San Francisco

Wholesale Only

The Argonaut.

VOL. LXXXI. No. 2375.

SAN FRANCISCO, SEPTEMBER 30, 1922.

Price Ten Cents

PUBLISHER'S NOTICE: The Argonaut (title trade-marked) is published every week by the Argonaut Publishing Company. Subscriptions, $5.00 per year; six months, $2.55; three months, $1.50, payable in advance—postage prepaid. Subscriptions to all foreign countries within the Postal Union, $6.00 per year. Sample copies free. Single copies, 10 cents. News Dealers and Agents in the interior supplied by the San Francisco News Company, 747 Howard Street, San Francisco. Subscribers wishing their addresses changed should give their old as well as new addresses. The American News Company, New York, are agents for the Eastern trade. The Argonaut may be ordered from any News Dealer or Postmaster in the United States or Europe. Special advertising rates to publishers. Address all communications to The Argonaut, 207 Powell Street, San Francisco. Make all checks, drafts, postal orders, etc., payable to "The Argonaut Publishing Company."

Entered at the San Francisco Postoffice as second-class matter. The Argonaut can be obtained in London at the International News Co., Breems Building, Chancery Lane; American Newspaper and Advertising Agency, Trafalgar Square, Northumberland Avenue; and at Daws Steamship Agency, 17 Green Street, Leicester Square, and can be ordered from any of the news-stands of W. H. Smith & Son. In Paris, at 37 Avenue de l'Opéra. In New York, at Brentano's, Fifth Avenue and Twenty-Fourth Street. In Chicago, Western News Company. In Washington, at Adams' News Agency, Ninth and G Streets.

The Argonaut is on sale at the Ferry Station, San Francisco, by Foster & Orear; on the ferryboats of the Key Route system by the news agents, and by the Van Noy-Interstate Company on Southern Pacific boats and trains.

Telephone, Kearny 5895. Publication office, 207 Powell Street. WM. J. MILLIKEN, Business Manager.

FORTY-SIXTH YEAR

ALFRED HOLMAN - - - - - EDITOR

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

|  |         |
|--|---------|
| EDITORIAL: Announcement—Canada and Our Tariff—The New Tariff Law—Some Calm Reflections—Courage in the Presidency—The Stadium Blunder—A Case of Political Demoralization—Editorial Notes..... | 209-211 |
| LETTERS TO THE EDITOR.....   | 211     |
| SHALL THE TURK RETURN? Mohammedan Power Again Looms Ominously on the Eastern Horizon.....  | 211-212 |
| OLD FAVORITES.....   | 212     |
| INDIVIDUALITIES: Notes About Prominent People All Over the World.....  | 212     |
| ATOLLS AND BLUE LAGOONS: Two More Wanderers Yield Themselves to the Spell of the South Pacific Islands.....  | 213     |
| BANKING AND INVESTMENT NEWS.....   | 214-215 |
| BOOKS ON THE TABLE: Notes of Books and Authors....   | 216     |
| REVIEWS AND NOTICES: New Books Received.....   | 217     |
| DRAMA: "Nice People"; A Lost Opportunity; Orphans in Paris; The Farrar Concert. By Josephine Hart Phelps   | 218     |
| FOYER AND BOX-OFFICE.....  | 219     |
| VANITY FAIR: John Bull's Middle—Boots and Ankles—Dancing, Here and There.....  | 220     |
| STORYETTES: Grave and Gay, Epigrammatic and Otherwise.....   | 221     |
| THE MERRY MUSE.....  | 221     |
| PERSONAL: Social Notes—Movements and Whereabouts.....  | 222-223 |
| CURRENT VERSE.....   | 223     |
| THE ALLEGED HUMORISTS: Paragraphs Ground Out by the Dismal Wits of the Day.....  | 224     |

Announcement.

Under the heading "Shall the Turk Return?" there appears in this number of the Argonaut an article by Mr. Morton Todd setting forth the background, with something of the foreground, of conditions that have produced the threatening situation in the Near East. It is pertinent to say that Mr. Todd joined the staff of the Argonaut some months ago in succession to the late Sidney Coryn, taking up the work that gentleman so long carried with diligence and brilliancy. Mr. Todd is a native Californian and was graduated from the State University at Berkeley so long ago as happily to have forgotten it. Since that day he has had wide experience in journalism and in book writing, both here and at the East, and has supplemented these experiences by foreign travel. He comes to the Argonaut highly equipped and with the purpose of making it his life work. The editor of the Argonaut takes pleasure in introducing Mr. Todd to its readers and bespeaks for him the confidence that was for so long and so freely given to his predecessor.

Canada and Our Tariff.

We are told that Canada is in a mild sort of panic in sudden consciousness that our new tariff law will measurably shut her from our markets. While not in sympathy with the fact, and while not regarding it as sound policy, we find it impossible to refrain from reminding our Canadian neighbors that they have small ground for complaint. For many years they clamored for reciprocity. Under the Taft régime reciprocity was offered them and they turned it down—and in spiteful terms. It is not so far back as to have been forgotten that there was in Canada a tremendous campaign accompanied with loud beating of the imperial drum in opposition to a fair proposal—this after the proposal had been invited. A little foresight, a common-sense acceptance of facts and conditions inherent in geographical contiguity and identity of interest, should have instructed our northern neighbors that their best policy was to accept what was offered. They should have got what was good for them when the getting was good. But, blinded by prejudice and vanity, obsessed with the pride of imperial connection, they missed their chance. The natural affinities of the six provinces that go to make up Canada lie each with the American states immediately to the south. All would be more prosperous if the line that separates them from the United States were wiped out. If they have not realized this in the past they are now likely to discover it. It is a case where a chastening experience may yield a better state of mind with ultimate consequences all to the good—for both countries.

The New Tariff Law.

A vast patchwork is the Fordney tariff bill, which became a law on Thursday of last week. Originally drawn on broad lines and in terms conforming with the promises of the Republican party in its 1920 platform, it was in its course through Congress amended at more than two thousand points, each emendation representing some particular local or other specific interest. It may be that our all-wise Father in Heaven knows what, in its final form, it contains, but it is certain that nobody else does. What we do know is that it was made up in respect of no principle and upon no consistent theory. The political party whose policies it is presumed to represent and which must accept responsibility for it had no more to do with the making of it than the opposing party. It is a product of mutual bargaining—of log-rolling, in the argot of politics—on the part of members of Congress who for this purpose abandoned their political affiliations and ignored or repudiated the pledges implied in them. In broad sense it is reflective of the chaos brought about by the direct primary system—a system that has eliminated the spirit of nationality from our politics and given emphasis and enlarged authority to personal, local, and class considerations.

The so-called agricultural bloc was the largest influence in the writing of this bill. The bloc is composed of men of all parties frankly more solicitous for sectional and class interests than for the broad welfare of the country or of the parties whose principles they nominally represent. The trick by which this incongruous group was organized and held together is analogous to the traditional confraternity among thieves. Practically each man, in consideration of his support of the bill as a whole, was allowed to put into it that which might please his special constituency and so serve his personal interest. For example, a congressman for Massachusetts wishing to favor some special interest in his district could get his particular job through by yielding to every other man's job. Our immediate representatives had full share in this riot of bargaining. They boast that they have done "big things" for California; and so they have in the sense that they have put high—even excessive—rates on many of our products. But these results ought to be cause of shame rather than of congratulation; and, in truth, the indirect cost will far outrun the direct gain. We "got ours," but at costs, moral and material, vastly outbalancing any advantage that the achievement may yield.

First or last the country must come to understand that it has been buncoed by this tariff. Knowledge may not come in time to affect the November elections, but it can not be very long delayed. When it shall be found that half the items of domestic expenditure have been pushed up in price, when it shall be seen that the old bugbear "H C L" has gone up rather than down, when it shall be realized that promises made at Chicago in 1920 have been dishonored, there will come, first resentment, and in the end rebuke. A political party, no more than an individual, may ignore its pledges with impunity.

Some Calm Reflections.

An interesting development in connection with the situation in the Near East is found in militant, even bloodthirsty, demands made to our government to participate actively in military operations against the Turks. A women's board of missionaries in Boston insists that the President send battleships to join the British fleet in beating back the Turks from the Dardanelles and Constantinople. Preachers in various parts of the country are shrieking demands that we join in punishing the Turk for outrages perpetrated on the Armenians and on residents of Smyrna and other parts of Asia Minor. In this connection it is interesting to recall that these same worthy folk have been giving the aid of their voices to propaganda put forth by the organized pacifists of the country to destroy the military effectiveness of the army and navy of the United States. All of which reminds us of the familiar adage that there are those who are never able to see further than their noses. The plight of the Armenians has long been a favorite topic with the Federal Council of Churches in America, the Church Peace Union, and other religious organizations associated with the National Council for the Reduction of Armaments and the Federation of Pacifist Organizations that have directed recent raids on our army and navy and maintained a lobby at Washington for that purpose.

Sympathy for Near Eastern Christians has come easily to those who have not given themselves the labor of looking into what Christianity means in that part of our moral vineyard. If they had looked closely—or even at all—into the history and character of those so-called Christian populations they would have found them scarcely less bloodthirsty than even the terrible Turk. Admiral Chester of the American navy, whose views are supplemented by the testimony of other informed and responsible Americans, has made formal report to our government that the Greeks signaled their entrance into Smyrna—under the auspices of the Allies—in 1919 by a series of wholesale massacres. When the Greeks landed at Smyrna in the year named they killed more than three hundred Turkish troops in the courtyard of their barracks by turning machine guns on them. A correspondent of the London Mail in Asia Minor reported last week, submitting testimony in proof of the statement, that during the past two years the Greeks have murdered more than 100,000 non-combatants in Asia Minor. But this is not all. It has in many instances been a case of Greek against Greek, since it has been the practice of one band of so-called Christians to launch campaigns of wholesale murder against other Christians of different creed. Still the sentimentalists of this country would hurl the United States into war against the Turk for the advantage of Christian Greeks and Christian Armenians who in reality are little better than savages.

Sentimentalism just now takes another turn regardless of exact facts. Senator Sheppard (Democrat) of Texas, speaking for this group the other day, declared that if the United States had entered the League of Nations "there would have been no war in the Near East." Likewise and concurrently, the International Reform Bureau proclaims that if the United States had accepted an Armenian mandate "all would have been well." The statement of this organization is that "there is no reason to believe it would have cost us blood or money to safeguard Greek and Armenian Christians and carry out the Allies' determination as to Turkish outrages." The cold logic of the situation is that if we had accepted the Armenian mandate, as Mr. Wilson proposed under his League of Nations plan, we would now be pulling Europe's chestnuts out of the fire and incurring the bitter enmity of Europe in so doing.

Very obviously Europe has mishandled the whole Near East situation. The present crisis has been brought about through the mutual suspicions and jealousies of England and France with regard to the Dardanelles. France has been backing Mustafa Kemal with loans and other forms of assistance while England has been backing the Greeks, and now our sentimentalists, who would have us believe that they are consistently opposed to war on principle, want us to get into the mess on behalf of England and the savage Greek. The Allies installed the Greeks in Thrace and in Asia Minor as a means of holding the Turk in check—this with the hearty approval of our professional sentimentalists. For be it remembered that, in 1919, churches, preachers, and religious federations too numerous to mention, throughout the whole United States, howled that the ancient lands be restored to Greece. It was done. But the course of Greece since 1919 has been characterized by massacre and destruction. Eager to possess these lands, she has lacked the strength to hold them either peaceably or by the sword. Turkish rule over these countries was long characterized as intolerable. But has Greek authority been better?

Another interesting development, far from the Near East, but directly related to the troubles there, is the new handicap under which the government of the British Empire now operates in establishing and maintaining imperial foreign policy and in making war. Somebody, we hope, will recall that the editor of the Argonaut, writing from Europe in the fall of 1918, declared that the so-called British Colonies had "grown up"; that in consideration of the developments of the war they had ceased to be "children" of Great Britain, and that henceforth they would be full co-partners in the empire. Proof of this prophecy is afforded by the immediate situation. The ministry at London finds that it can not move far without the advice and consent of the Dominions. What actually has been going on in the last few days—since the trouble in the Far East became serious—is that the British ministry has been submitting a referendum to the dominions to the end of determining how far it may go in checking the Turk and in preserving the Dardanelles from Turkish control. Britons have professed amazement that the President of the United States can not put into effect a foreign policy without the advice and consent of the Senate. It is now pertinent to suggest that our British critics should take stock of the parallel condition under their own system as revised by progress of events.

Courage in the Presidency.

If President Harding had done nothing else since taking office and if in the remaining two years and a half of his term he shall do nothing else, he has already done enough in two special acts to establish his permanent fame as an executive of courage and of essential integrity of mind. We refer to (1) his assertion of the principle that every citizen is entitled to protection in his right to work; (2) to his veto of the bonus raid. We hear on many sides that by these acts Mr. Harding has made it impossible that he shall succeed himself in the presidency. Parallel historical incidents do not justify this prophecy. Abraham Lincoln was reelected President in 1864 under circumstances infinitely more threatening than anything that can be brought to bear in the case of Mr. Harding. Grover Cleveland was elected President for a second time, in 1892, after having been beaten in 1888—this in recognition of the strength of character illustrated in courses that were the cause of his defeat in 1888. It is a mistake to assume that a man in political life incurs enmity by courses of conduct that tend to offend elements in the country, when there stands in support of his acts the basic qualities of character and courage. The American people instinctively respect a man who does his duty as he sees it, even though in so doing he may antagonize certain elements. In the immediate instance nobody—not even those who feel themselves aggrieved—questions the integrity of President Harding; and time will surely confirm and approve his judgment in both instances above referred to. That a citizen is entitled to work upon his own contract free from intimidation or disturbance from anybody is a principle so founded in the social equities as not to be subject to permanent disapproval. Again, passing over the consideration that time will surely justify the bonus veto, it will as surely confirm respect for the courage involved in the President's act. On top of all is the fact that Mr. Harding is doing nothing and intends to do nothing looking to reelection. Obviously he is content to perform to the full of his abilities the great duty that is upon him without reference to future effects as regards himself. It is the universal testimony, not only of those close to President Harding, but of all immediate observers at Washington that his eye is upon his immediate duties and not at all upon future projects relating to continuance in office. This will surely command the respect of the country; and unless we are wholly at odds respecting the psychology of the American people, Mr. Harding will gain consideration—even popularity—rather than lose under the course that he has thus far pursued in the presidency.

The Stadium Blunder.

Although the decision is not yet final, the Regents of the University of California seem determined to locate the football Stadium in Strawberry Cañon. The Argonaut believes that if they do they will make a mistake, and that the mistake will be indicative of a misunderstanding of university needs.

Considering the matter merely from the viewpoint of utility, the selected site will, if used, prove both inconvenient and dangerous, besides being offensive to the neighboring residents and detrimental to their property values. The town of Berkeley did not develop with any such institution in prospect. The approaches to the proposed site are insufficient to accommodate the traffic which popular sporting events are certain to attract. There will be no parking spaces for automobiles except the streets, which will therefore be choked with them. If not, then automobiles can not be effectively used, and there are no other transportation facilities to the Strawberry Cañon site that are adequate in any degree. And if automobiles are to be parked in the streets, it will not only be inconvenient to the owners, but a serious danger in case of fire, as the chief of the Berkeley fire department pointed out after the destruction of Hearst Hall. Fire starting anywhere in the congested area on a football day would probably become a conflagration, because the department could not get at it. The vicinity is thickly built over; and the persons that thickly built it over do not want the Stadium and the mobs and the disturbances and the dust, and should not be forced to suffer them. It is not fair to deface a settled neighborhood that way when it does not have to be done.

If the Stadium is to be built in Strawberry Cañon it will be necessary to cut away, at heavy cost for landscaping, a large part of the Big C hill; which disposes of the argument that the topography of the site is in its favor. Such a structure as the Yale Bowl, and that seems the best form, is a scraper job, in which the earth is moved from the centre oval, to deepen it, and banked up around the rim to support the seats. A natural amphitheatre, if there were one available, is little to the point; it would probably be a cheaper operation on level land.

It is doubtful if the university can acquire, without a legislative act, a good title to the proposed site. Three and a half acres about in the centre of it were once condemned for a reservoir to serve both the university and the deaf and dumb institution. This set up a trust, which it will take some management to dissolve. Until it is dissolved the Regents could probably be enjoined from proceeding, and the undertaking held up.

Whether such a structure is to be a monster of ugliness or an object of interest and beauty may depend altogether, and in this case will depend altogether, on where it is placed. The Flavian Amphitheatre is a rather good-looking thing where it is, but crowded into the Roman Forum it would have been an enormity. The Stadium jammed into Strawberry Cañon, close against the fine old residences of the neighborhood, will be an oppressive, overwhelming thing, no matter how it is planned. Down on the level prairie toward West Berkeley, there is ample room, as yet unoccupied or but sparsely occupied, where it would have a spacious setting and would be an imposing and dignified and perhaps beautiful work, rather than a nightmare. And there are good transportation facilities, capable of expansion for peak loads, and there is plenty of room for parking all the automobiles people will ever wish to drive there; and if the owners of the surrounding vacant lots are canny they will probably rent parking space and supply security for the property entrusted to them. That will accommodate every one concerned, and it will not interfere with the fire department. As yet there is nothing down there to burn, and the whole neighborhood could develop with reference to the Stadium and the risk. The neighboring owners would like to have it. Those in the vicinity of Strawberry Cañon would not. Distance from the university is no objection. It is no farther than the Yale Bowl is from the Yale buildings, or Soldiers' Field from Harvard.

But there is another and deeper reason than these, which we fear the Regents have not considered; that is, the opportunity to make a physical and symbolical separation between the scholarly purposes of the university and its mere sporting propensities, a separation that ought to become more pronounced as the university undergoes proper development. Those sporting propensities are a degenerate imitation of the athletic fad among the classic Greeks. And the athletic fad was never necessary to the civilization of Greece. We are not unmindful of the claims made for the agency of the Olympic games in bringing the Greeks together and making them one people; claims which would have more validity if the Greeks had ever got together or had ever become one people. Their athletics had little to do with their passion for knowing things. They were not supreme at it. Their best runners would probably look like paralytics beside the crooked professional sprinters of a generation ago, and their most eminent gymnasts are beaten all hollow all summer long by those of the cheapest little American circus. If you don't believe the latter statement, read Brander Matthews' book on the drama.

Our young people in college have elected to imitate one of the poorer parts of Greek life. If, instead, they had chosen to master Greek philosophy and learning and literature and art, and make the whole scholarly spirit of ancient Greece their own, universities would be worth a hundred per cent. more than they are. The Regents should encourage the student world to reverse itself in this matter. The Stadium, which in spite of anything you want to say or sing about it is to be the Colosseum of university life, should be as far removed as possible from the academic halls. It does not belong on the campus, which has already too much the character of a country club, too little the character of the academic grove.

President Barrows has recently expressed serious concern about the lack of space for the construction of buildings to serve the legitimate uses of the university as a place of learning and culture. In the face of his statements on the subject, how can the Regents devote land on the campus to athletic spectacles, without encouraging the belief that football is as valuable as philosophy?

A Case of Political Demoralization.

It was the wish of Senator Johnson, candidate for reelection, to have a close personal and political friend at the head of the State Republican Committee, and his choice fell upon State Senator Boynton. It was the wish of Mr. Richardson, candidate for governor, to have in that position a man devoted to his interests, and his selection was Mr. Radcliffe of Watsonville. When the State Central Committee met in San Francisco last Saturday there was a counting of noses and Johnson had the best of it. Boynton was chosen by a substantial majority. Now comes Richardson with a declaration that he will take his doll rags and go home. He will have naught to do with a committee presided over by Johnson's man Boynton. There you have it. Already, before the campaign has begun, a pretty row between candidates, with one of them arbitrarily ignoring the official party organization. It is pertinent to ask—Where are we at? Is there a Republican organization in California, or has our politics become a mere fight between rivals for official place?

What is the obligation of Republicans in a situation in which a candidate for United States senator denies by his acts any obligation to sustain party policies, and when a candidate for governor repudiates the head of the official party organization? Again—Where are we at? There was a time when the Republican organization in California belonged to the members of the party and when it had authority to outline principles and policies and to pledge candidates. It would appear now that we had attained a condition in which each candidate makes his own platform, grabs the organization if he can or ignores it if that suits him better, and schemes for election after any manner that fits his whim or pleasure. A situation in which this sort of thing is possible comes pretty close to political chaos. And this is what the direct primary has put over on us. It has made of our state politics a mere scramble for office—a catch-as-catch-can game void of responsibility, character, or dignity. Under pretense of putting political power directly into the hands of the people it has denied to the individual voter—to the people—opportunity to have any part in defining public policies or in the selection of agents of public administration.

Editorial Notes.

It will take something more than angry assertion on the part of a partisan press and the perfunctory certifications of a partisan ex-officialism to discredit the judgment of the editors of the Encyclopædia Britannica, who have written into that work that Newton D. Baker, formerly Secretary of War, was a pacifist who had no stomach for preparedness, or for the war even after we got into it. It is a case where declamatory denial stands at odds with recorded fact. If Mr. Baker had been for preparedness he would have prepared—or quit. If he had been earnestly for prosecution of the war he would have prosecuted it with vigor—or quit. A Secretary of War whose heart was in his work would not have waited for four months after we were nominally in the war to determine what kind of a gun we should begin to manufacture. Can anybody imagine Stanton, Lincoln's Secretary of War, dilly-dallying and shilly-shallying through the period when we were obviously in the way of getting in? Can anybody imagine a man whose heart was in his work waiting until put under pressure of public opinion to take measures essential to organization and dispatch of our forces? "The record," says a maxim of the law, "is the best evidence." By the record Mr. Baker stands convicted. Furthermore, he was brought into the War Department for the self-same qualities that marked his conduct prior to our entrance into the war and after we got in. Mr. Wilson, himself a confessed pacifist—a man "neutral in thought" and "too proud to fight," an advocate of "peace without victory," a President who "kept us out of war"—wanted a weak and spineless war minister. He had found in his first Secretary (Garrison) a man of independence and spirit, and independence and spirit being not to his taste, he sought and found in Baker a creature whose mind would "go along" with his own. It is waste of energy for Baker or his apologists to froth at the mouth—or in print—over the verdict of history. It is a verdict illustrated and confirmed by a thousand facts. It stands among the ineradicable shames of our national history. For our national honor the least said about it the better.

The necessity for American oversight in Cuba continues, despite the fact that the island has been nominally independent now for a quarter of a century. For the third time Cuban affairs are in a mess. Recently General Crowder was sent by the Washington administration to "straighten things out," and his report embodies a series of recommendations essential to public order. The president of the Cuban government has accepted these recommendations, but the legislative branch of the government is obstreperous and threatens to disregard the agreement conceded by the executive. It looks as if we should again have to send an armed force into Cuba to enforce another season of house-cleaning. The more intelligent and responsible Cubans recognize this necessity, and so far from protesting are entirely willing that we should get at the job at the earliest possible date.

The San Francisco Bureau of Governmental Research has been looking into the proposal for a $12,000,000 bond issue for the construction of some thirty or more public school buildings. It presents an alternative proposition: (1) that the amount of the bond issue be reduced from $12,000,000 to $5,000,000; (2) that the contemplated life of the bonds be reduced from forty-five to twenty-five years; and (3) that $14,500,000 be provided on the pay-as-you-go plan by the budget appropriations during the next six years. The argument of the bureau is to the effect that by the proposed means the same sum could be provided as under the supervisors' plan and in the same length of time—$19,500,000 in six years. The cost to taxpayers would be reduced from $31,380,000 to $22,300,000, or a saving of $9,000,000. The tax rate for the six-year period would be increased 17.1 cents on the average over the tax rate mentioned for the supervisors' plan, and the tax rate for the succeeding thirty-nine years would be from 13 cents to 5 cents less, or an average of 9 cents, than under the $12,000,000 bond plan of the supervisors. Only two supervisors, Messrs. Hynes and McSheehy, voted "No" when the ordinance specifying that $12,000,000 forty-five-year bonds be issued was passed.

On top of the demand for twelve million dollars for additional school buildings in San Francisco now rises on the edge of the horizon a colossal demand for extension of the municipal street-car system. It is not that the extensions are seriously needed, but because there remain to be carried out certain electioneering promises in which certain committees and certain contractors have acquired what may be styled "vested interests." Private companies owning and operating street-car lines extend them when there is a demand promising profit. In the case of the municipal system extensions are made on political account. If it be desired to get the vote of an outlying district there is arrangement under which the powers that be promise new street-car facilities without reference to the earning power of the constructions proposed. The carrying out of such bargains is easy, since those who vote the money do not have to pay the bill. There was time when it seemed that this species of political shenanigan would work itself out, but there is no longer reason for hope. The trick of spending other people's money has been learned and the politicians and the non-taxpaying element have also learned how to keep it in continuous operation.

Government experts, figuring upon the larger and more obvious items of loss by the coal strike, place the figure at $1,190,000,000. Of this sum it is estimated that the 600,000 striking miners lost approximately $750 each, or a total of $450,000,000. All of which, first or last, will have to be paid by the consuming public. Losses by the railroad strike run into so many and such obscure channels that appraisal is difficult or impossible. The sum, assuredly, is a vast one. But the loss has not alone been in terms of money. The factor of social demoralization, involving the death by violence of some thirty-one persons and incidental losses due to accidents that normally would be avoided, are beyond estimate.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR.

Deer Hunters and Forest Fires.

DUTCH FLAT, September 14, 1922.

TO THE EDITOR—Sir: This is the "open season" for deer; also it is the season of forest fires. This year is as every year: when the deer hunters come forest fires begin. The two events are contemporaneous. There were no forest fires hereabout until the hunters began to arrive, September 1st; now one can see a beacon in every direction every night, and the horizon is obscured by smoke day and night.

Lighted cigarettes carelessly tossed aside as on the city streets, camp-fires heedlessly left burning or inefficiently quenched, or else permitted to spread in the mulch of the forest floor, are the cause of the conflagrations.

The "open" deer-hunting season, coming in September, when the woods are as tinder, annually is causing enormous destruction of timber, frequently of farming property, too. And slowly but surely, also, it is bringing about the destruction of the remnant of the cervidae of our mountains. Already the elk have disappeared from our Sierra and Coast range—from the Cascades, as well; and they would be as the buffalo everywhere, but that "Wood's Hole" in northern Wyoming is now under protection.

Why should such awful wastefulness be longer tolerated? California is paying an intolerable price to provide a month's fun (sic) annually to its town tenderfoot (during the most dangerous month of the year) to blaze his vain and destructive trail through the forests!

Hereabout every one is of opinion that there should be a closed season for at least ten years—the country hunters agree to it, and they are not the conflagration-makers—and when again there shall be "open season" that then it ought not to begin before October 15th—when the rains usually begin—and that it should end November 1st.

EDWARD A. BELCHER.

Appreciation.

BROOK FARM,

DEVON, PA., August 25, 1922.

TO THE ARGONAUT: It is a privilege to subscribe.
Yours truly, (Mrs.) OSCAR SEELEY.

Not Yet.

BERKELEY, September 25, 1922.

EDITOR ARGONAUT—Sir: I have read to several friends your description of the wife of the President of the United States patching a chair cover with part of a sofa pillow, and we are unanimously agreed that when such a thing can happen in the White House the country has not completely gone to hell yet.

MILLO ANDERS.

SHALL THE TURK RETURN

Mohammedan Power Again Looms Ominously on the Eastern European Horizon.

Religious conflict is the real character of the crisis in the Near East, a conflict presently complicated by international jealousy, aggravated by fears for concessions and investments, darkened by some treacheries and lightened by few considerations of real humanity. How far it will go can not be foreseen, but the old nature and an old trouble are clear. The Allies were willing that the Germans should stay in Europe; they were not willing that the Turks should. They, therefore, recognized some difference between the Germans and the Turks, and that difference must have been religion. The Germans were supposed to have our kind.

Concretely, the crisis arises from the efforts of the Greeks to enforce the provisions of the Treaty of Sèvres, signed, in fulfillment of the conditions of the armistice with Turkey, at the government porcelain works near Paris on August 10, 1920. The treaty that was made in the pottery was broken in the Porte—or to be precise it was refused ratification at Constantinople. At the same time, the fact that the Turkish delegates signed it, and the Oriental resignation with which the Sultan appeared to receive its confiscatory and expulsive provisions, split the Turkish Empire.

Recent Turkish troubles and Turkey's part in the great war brought upon the stage three striking characters: Talaat, Enver, and Mustafa Kemal. Each played his energetic part, but two of them have ceased from troubling. After the war Talaat went to Berlin and opened a saloon. He might have been a success as a saloon-keeper, but an Armenian who disliked his record among the Armenians assassinated him a year ago last March. Enver had a more dignified career. He took the back track of the Turkish people, and in Turkistan, with bolshevist assistance, organized a really formidable power, one that was beginning to menace India. But an Armenian killed him at Bokhara. Mustafa Kemal appears to have been more than the mere fighter. In the sketch of him presented in the Argonaut's department of portraiture, "Individualities," the reader may discern some qualifications of the constructive statesman and patriot; cruel, to be sure, but we hardly expect a Turk on the warpath to be real gentle. His progress from Angora, where he had set up a secondary Turkish state, to Smyrna and thence to the Dardanelles, appears to have been assisted by French jealousy of England, and Italian jealousy of Greece, more than by that general bugaboo, the Moscow soviet government. There is little natural affinity between bolshevism and the Turks, who are worshippers of authority and autocracy.

The presence of the Turk in Europe has a most interesting historic background. He is recognized as an anomaly, something which in a spiritual sense does not belong and never can; a transplanted part of Asia, with Asian guile and policy and Asian ways of regarding human relations. Perhaps he feels himself out of place, and he is certainly aware of the endless pressure exerted against him by the claims and desire of Russia to reach the Mediterranean through Constantinople. At any rate, his European possessions have been whittled away until at the outbreak of the great war comparatively little was left. This tends to make him irritable. It would anybody.

When we first meet the Turk in the pages of Gibbon, and that is the best place to meet him, he is rising somewhere vaguely in the plains of the East, beyond the Oxus and the Jaxartes, and erupting toward the West—the last of the great westward "migrations of peoples," if we omit the European influx into what was once songfully known as our own United States. He is a horseman and a horseback archer, just as the American pioneer when he reached the plains became a horseback rifleman; and he seems endowed with a genius for the destructive operations of war. The American plainsman liked to feel that his followers at least would found cities and build institutions for the service of men. If he slaughtered the Indians it was more on the principle of clearing the land. The Turk had no interest in constructive achievement; apparently no ability that way. He was satisfied to appropriate the work of others, after he had removed the workers. Denver, Cheyenne, Laramie and Salt Lake City may not be the most beautiful of human creations, but they are a paradise compared to the creative accomplishments of the Turk. Among the most fanatical of men, even his religion was borrowed. Fervent as he was in faith and prayer, he could not even give the world a respectable ecclesiastical architecture, and his main mosque today is the great church Justinian built. Like death, the Turk took all and gave nothing. His symbol on a banner is the crescent, denoting growth and development; but the real expression of his genius consists of full graveyards, and of 75,000 people on the quays at Smyrna, made homeless by a conflagration comparable to that of San Francisco in 1906, and as useless to any military, political, or social purpose. With his destructiveness he com-lines the abhorrent attribute of cruelty. He has some good qualities, but he is careful not to let them ride him.

In the tenth and eleventh centuries the Turks, tempted by riches they could consume but not replace, began to move westward from Turkistan, and the delicate civilization of Persia withered before them. The shepherds and horse herders had become robbers, the bands of robbers became conquering armies, the armies aimed at the Eastern Roman Empire and ultimately brought it down. Besides the Persians, they had overwhelmed the Syrians, the Armenians, the Kurds, and the Arabians both of Arabia and Egypt. They took the Holy Land and provoked the Crusades, for they persecuted the Christian pilgrims whom the Arabians had treated with an amiable tolerance; compelling them, with the most refined Turkish humor, to defile the shrines they had tramped a thousand miles to honor. Western Europeans have never liked them real well since. The Turks took back Jerusalem after the First Crusade, and rather easily repelled several more of these fantastic expeditions. Long before 1453 they had completely enveloped Constantinople, tearing away piecemeal the territories of the Eastern Empire, conquering Bulgaria and Serbia; and in that year Mohammed II broke his treaties with the last of the Roman emperors and took the city. The Turk's title to the best piece of real estate in the world is not even that of honest conquest. Nor did he halt there. He got into Italy. Jan Sobieski, the Pole, had to stop him at the gates of Vienna, or he might have overrun Europe. A Polish spy who penetrated the Turkish camp during that siege was rewarded with a monopoly of baking rolls. He chose for them the form of the crescent; and that is why we eat Vienna crescents for breakfast—when we have them. It is easier to devour the symbol of Turkey than its reality. What might have happened had Vienna fallen it is hard to say. Imams might have preached the Koran in Notre Dame and York Minster, and with the requisite surgical trimming the Pilgrim Fathers might have been Mohammedans.

After this failure the Turk seemed weary, and when they had Poled him out of Vienna, so to speak, he sat down on his conquests. Following the battle of Lepanto, in which our old friend Cervantes lost a hand, happily not his pen hand, Turkey began to wane. She lost in rather quick succession Hungary, the Ionian Islands, and much territory in what has been Russia. She had been weakened by her victories, and illustrated the biological law laid down by David Starr Jordan that a warlike people drains away its best blood, win or lose. Greece was lost to Turkey in the battle of Navarino, Mohammed Ali, pasha of Egypt, rebelled and captured Syria, France conquered Algeria, and in spite of slight recoveries a series of nineteenth-century events wore Turkey down to the limits she occupied in August, 1914. Her craftiest statesman did not wish to enter the great war, understanding that she had little to gain, and much to lose.

The Turk in Europe was never the Arabian in Europe. The Arabian in Europe created a civilization of beauty and value, laid the foundations of many of the modern sciences, and left remains and memories that are among the inspirations of literature, poetry, and art. If the Turk has contributed anything of similar worth we do not recall it. He has been a blight. For that reason, and for his religion, and his system of matrimonial repetition, and his cruelty, the peoples of Western Europe and the people of the United States hailed the end of the war as an opportunity to say to him, as the small London girl told her sister the Angel of the Lord had said to Adam and Eve after the fall: "Nah then, ahtside!" They purposed to bundle him over the Bosphorus and make him stay there. After the Peace Conference they evolved the Treaty of Sèvres, one of the four treaties supposed to bring peace on earth, one of the four heralds of the dove. It was a sort of Wilsonian achievement, looking to ideals and desirabilities rather than facts. The Sultan was permitted to remain at Constantinople with the remnants of a government, under the surveillance and practical control of a mixed commission representing England, Italy, and France, which has been so administering the business that you had to learn what quarter of the town you were in to know what sort of postage stamp to buy. The Turkish Empire was dismembered. The English had relied upon the Treaty of Sèvres, and had looked to Venizelos, the Greek premier, to enforce it. The Italians encouraged King Constantine to proceed from Venice back to Greece, where he promoted a turnover of government that sent Venizelos into exile. And both French and Italians had contrived secret treaties with the Turks.

Here is one of the apparent puzzles of the situation. People concerned for Western civilization are asking, "Why has France let us down?" They are tempted to the bitter observation of Lowell, slightly paraphrased:

"Your mark was the guns, Jean."

But the French financial interest in Turkey is heavy. Loan after loan of a decrepit government has been placed through French bankers, French financiers have established banks in Turkey, French capitalists have acquired valuable concessions and involved French money in Turkish territory. That inclines France to recognize Turkish territorial rights, and there is something to be said on that side. Financial interest is an intimate relationship. The Turk does not look so bad to the French, while on the other hand the English gains in Mesopotamia have disturbed the balance of interest in the Near East. Italy feared the rise of a Greek power. England was between two dark prospects: her bitter experience and a dangerous condition of her political and commercial establishment.

The British Empire is the largest Mohammedan power and the Mohammedan world is now in a ferment of religious revival. One-quarter of all British subjects are Mohammedan, and the most cohesive bloc of them is in India, where, under the agitations of Ghandi, they have at last formed a union of sentiment and ambition with large elements of the Hindu population, which joins them in the demand that the Caliphate shall not be expelled from Constantinople. This demand is based on certain assurances given by England to her Mohammedan subjects, assurances that were followed by heavy recruiting in India in the war against Germany. On the other hand the Turk, under obligations to both England and France, joined the Germans and closed the Dardanelles to the Allied warships, thus causing the defeat of Roumania, the collapse of Russia, and the prolongation of the war for two years; with grave chances of evil outcome.

Lloyd George declares that the treacherous porter shall not hold the gate again. But the Turks threaten to visit on Constantinople the pains of hell they sent on Smyrna, and from the Paris conference goes an humble invitation, with Lord Curzon's approval, to make themselves at home again in Constantinople, to accept most of Thrace, with Adrianople, and to come and talk it over at Venice. That great waterway, the Dardanelles and the Bosphorus, with the Sea of Marmora between, is to be neutralized, if the Turks will kindly consent. They are offered practically their old place in Europe as the fruit of their slaughters in Asia Minor, and the offer may have to be confirmed to them in the interests of a weary and tax-ridden civilization. It is disappointing. It looks like the recrudescence of Turkey, with all that involves of religious hatred and commercial jealousy; an event whose end no one can foresee, but one to which the United States can hardly be indifferent.

MORTON TODD.

OLD FAVORITES.

Abraham Lincoln.

(From the "Commemoration Ode."
Life may be given in many ways,
And loyalty to Truth be sealed
As bravely in the closet as in the field,
So bountiful is Fate;
But then to stand beside her,
When craven churls deride her,
To front a lie in arms and not to yield,
This shows, methinks, God's plan
And measure of a stalwart man,
Limbed like the old heroic breeds,
Who stand self-poised on manhood's solid earth,
Not forced to frame excuses for his birth,
Fed from within with all the strength he needs.

Such was he, our Martyr-Chief,
Whom late the Nation he had led,
With ashes on her head,
Wept with the passion of an angry grief:
Forgive me, if from present things I turn
To speak what in my heart will beat and burn,
And hang my wreath on his world-honored urn.
Nature, they say, doth dote,
And can not make a man
Save on some worn-out plan,
Repeating us by rote:

For him her Old-World moulds aside she threw,
And, choosing sweet clay from the breast
Of the unexhausted West,
With stuff untainted shaped a hero new,
Wise, steadfast in the strength of God, and true.
How beautiful to see.

Once more a shepherd of mankind indeed,
Who loved his charge, but never loved to lead;
One whose meek flock the people joyed to be,
Not lured by any cheat of birth,

But by his clear-minded human worth,
And brave old wisdom of sincerity!
They knew that outward grace is dust;
They could not choose but trust

In that sure-footed mind's unfaltering skill,
And supple-tempered will

That bent like perfect steel to spring again and thrust.
His was no lonely mountain-peak of mind,
Thrusting to thin air o'er our cloudy bars,
A sea-mark now, now lost in vapors blind;
Broad prairie rather, genial, level-lined,
Fruitful and friendly for all human kind,
Yet also high to heaven and loved of loftiest stars.

Nothing of Europe here,
Or, then, of Europe fronting northward still,
Ere any names of Serf and Peer
Could Nature's equal scheme deface;
Here was a type of the true elder race,
And one of Plutarch's men talked with us face to face.
I praise him not; it were too late;
And some innate weakness there must be
In him who condescends to victory

Such as the Present gives, and can not wait,
Safe in himself as in a fate.

So always firmly he:
He knew to bide his time,
And can his fame abide,
Still patient in his simple faith sublime,
Till the wise years decide.

Great captains, with their guns and drums,
Disturb our judgment not the hour,
But at last silence comes;
These all are gone, and standing like a tower,
Our children shall behold his fame.

The kindly-earnest, brave, foreseeing man,
Sagacious, patient, dreading praise, not blame,
New birth of our new soil, the first American.

—James Russell Lowell.

INDIVIDUALITIES.

John Barton Payne, successor to the late Henry P. Davidson as head of the Red Cross, is a lawyer, and was at one time a judge of the superior court of Cook County, Illinois.

Jesse W. Sweetser of Siwanoy and Ardsley, Yale and Wall Street, is America's new amateur golf champion. Sweetser, who is only twenty, has brought the amateur crown back to New York after a nine years' absence.

Jacob S. Coxey, who led his famous "army" to Washington many years ago, recently filed his petition in Toledo for the non-partisan nomination for United States senator from Ohio.

Edward Bell, chief of the current information bureau of the State Department, has been assigned to duty as counselor of the legation at Peking, China. Mr. Bell has been stationed at many capitols in various diplomatic posts.

George Horton, American consul-general at Smyrna, is an eminent man of letters, some of his titles being: "Songs of the Lowly," "In Unknown Seas," "Aphroessa," "Constantine," "A Fair Brigand," "Like Another Helen," "Modern Athens," "The Tempting of Father Anthony," "The Long Straight Road," "In Argolis," "The Monk's Treasure," "The Edge of Hazard," and "Miss Schuyler's Alias." Horton was born in Fairville, New York, in 1859. He has long been deeply interested in the life and affairs of the Near East. His wife was Catherine Sacapoulo of Athens. From 1899 to 1901 he was literary editor of the Chicago Times-Herald, leaving that paper to become editor of the literary supplement of the Chicago American. He has been consul-general at Athens, consul at Saloniki, and as consul-general at Smyrna was in charge of the interests of Great Britain, France, Italy, Russia and Serbia in Asia Minor, from the outbreak of the great war until April, 1917, when, on the rupture of our relations with Turkey, he was transferred to Saloniki, returning to Smyrna in May, 1919. For protection of the Christian populations in Turkey he was decorated with the papal Order of Gregory the Great, and he is also a Commander of the (Greek) Order of the Savior. He has received the thanks of the British and French governments for his services to their nationals during the war.

William Phillips of Beverly, Massachusetts, who was recently appointed Under Secretary of State to succeed Henry G. Fletcher when the latter was named Ambassador to Belgium, is notable among the "career men" in Washington. The State Department nowadays is being staffed with young men who enter the diplomatic service fresh from college, and who by reason of their special gifts—education, social background, and personality—have proved peculiarly fitted to establish and maintain friendly foreign relations. They are learning the game from the inside out, serving apprenticeships in secretarial positions and working up to the highest posts. The new Under Secretary was but recently Minister to The Hague. Seventeen years ago Mr. Phillips was succeeding Mr. Fletcher as first secretary of the American legation at Peking. Since that time the two have been playing on the international chess-board, occasionally passing on the high seas, each to slip into the position the other had vacated. Mr. Phillips was one of the Federal government commissioners to the Panama-Pacific International Exposition in this city in 1915. His present post of Under Secretary of State, which has given him the title of the "diplomat behind the diplomat," was created three years ago by law to relieve the Secretary of his increased duties and to give higher prestige to his assistant, who in the absence of his chief automatically becomes the acting head of the State Department.

Mustafa Kemal Pasha was brought up at Saloniki, and became well known at Constantinople during the Young Turk revolution of 1908. During the war in the Balkan peninsula he distinguished himself as a military leader at Chatalja, was promoted to a colonelcy, and sent on a mission to Sofia after the war, and on another to Paris, returning to Constantinople in 1914, a short time before the outbreak of the great conflict. During the attack of the Anglo-French fleet on the Dardanelles Kemal Pasha took command of a sector when the Turks seemed to be in a critical situation, and by disobedience of some erroneous orders saved the Turkish army by the victory of Anafarta and probably prevented the capture of Constantinople by the Allies. For quarreling with the German generals over points of strategy he was sent to Mesopotamia in disgrace, but returned to the capital a few weeks before the armistice. After the occupation of Smyrna by the Greeks he was appointed inspector-general of Anatolia, but being gifted with great organizing ability and at outs with the policy of his government, which he accused of betraying Turkey to the Allies, he raised an army of his own. In 1919 the government tried to recall him to Constantinople, but he refused to obey, and although he had formerly been very friendly with the Sultan he was degraded and deprived of the right to wear his decorations. He loathes politics, but has a remarkable ascendancy over the Turkish people and his troops. He is the real organizer and commander of the nationalist movement in Anatolian Turkey.

ATOLLS AND BLUE LAGOONS.

Two More Wanderers Yield Themselves to the Spell of the South Pacific Islands.

Another effort to penetrate the mystery of the south sea islands strengthens the conviction that they are in one particular like Chinamen: they have no mysteries, and only look mysterious because the troubled complexity of the Western mind can not credit their tranquil simplicity. When a Polynesian sits and looks at the surf breaking on a lava ledge, sits there and gazes for hours, and you wonder what he is thinking about, it is ten chances to one, not that he is thinking about nothing, but that he is not thinking about anything; which is a different business. James Norman Hall and Charles Bernard Nordhoff, reacting to the farther swing of the pendulum from the hell of war, sought peace as far from the French flying fields as they could get, and in "Faery Lands of the South Seas" they give us their interpretation of things seen and heard; and tell how that region of mystical beauty and calm laid soft hands on them and soothed them into companionship with the gentle ex-cannibals of the Paumotus, the Marquesas, and other spots of fragrant earth such as Melville first described and our own O'Brien later turned into slathers of money without causing any of them to disappear. We may say at the outset that their book, although a product of that impossibility, literary collaboration, is written in a style as charming as its subject, and as vivid as the blue lagoons and niu groves which it depicts. It is rare description of enchanting scenes and charming people, with just enough narrative to enable one to see the characters living their real lives; and it is illustrated with beautiful sketches.

The Polynesian is a rather good sort, and his soul has possibilities. Its character persists, despite efforts to alter it. Floating on an ocean of darkened silver one heavenly night, one of our authors gets a glimpse of a phase of it, thus objectivized:

Some one came aft, walking along the rail in his bare feet. It was Oro, the cabin boy, who is taken with an enviable kind of madness at the full of the moon. He looked carefully around to make sure that every one was asleep, and then stood clasping and unclasping his hands in ecstasy, carrying on a one-sided conversation in a confidential undertone. Now and then he would smile and straightway become serious again, gazing with rapt, listening attention at the world of pure light; nodding his head at intervals in vigorous confirmation of some occult confidence. At length his figure receded, blurred, took on the quality of the moonlight, and I saw him no more.

So we sail with them in trading schooners, propelled by the white man's hope of private profit, the real disseminator of civilization, and find ourselves outbound for strange ports, and in the peculiar company of beach combers, pearl speculators, seekers of solitude for its own sake and sometimes "for their country's good"; and happily of several characters of real nobility, like Varaner, whose English name was Warner, and his half-caste son who flew in France and returned to the islands a captain. The ladies, too, are there, making the most casual contributions to the population, and between times catching fish.

It may have been the muck of war that did it, but these men seem seized with a passion for the beauty of the world, and eager to share:

We made landfalls at dawn, in midafternoon, late at night—saw the islands in aspects of beauty exceeding one's strangest imaginings. We penetrated farther and farther into a thousand-mile area of atoll-dotted ocean, discharging our cargo of lumber and corrugated iron, rice and flour and canned goods; taking on copra; carrying native passengers from one place to another. Sometimes we were out of sight of land for several days, beating into head winds under a slowly moving pageantry of clouds which alone gave assurance of the rotundity of the earth. When at last land appeared it seemed inaccessible remote, at the summit of a long slope of water which we would never be able to climb. Sometimes for as long a period we skirted the shore line of a single atoll, the water deepening and shoaling under our keel in splotches of vague or vivid coloring. From a vantage point in the rigging one could see a segment of a vast circle of islands strung at haphazard on a thread of reef which showed a thin, clear line of changing red and white under the incessant battering of the surf. Several times upon going ashore we found the villages deserted, the inhabitants having gone to distant parts of the atoll for the copra-making season. In one village we came upon an old man too feeble to go with the others, apparently, sitting in the shade playing a phonograph. He had but three records: "Away to the Forest," "The Dance of the Nymphs Schottische," and "Just a Song at Twilight." The disks were as old as the instrument itself, no doubt, and the needles so badly worn that one could barely hear the music above the rasping of the mechanism. There was a groove on the vocal record where the needle caught, and the singer, a woman with a high, quavery voice, repeated the same phrase, "when the lights are low," over and over again. I can still hear it, even at this distance of time and place, and recall vividly to mind the silent houses, the wide, vacant street bright with fugitive sunshine, the lagoon at the end of it mottled with the shadows of clouds.

Things out there grow delightfully mixed, and people take little harm by the mixture. Humanity is not merely slowed down and comfortable, but seems to have acquired a really comforting interchangeability:

Before separating at Papeete we had arranged for a rendezvous, but at that time we still possessed American ideas of punctuality and well-ordered travel. Now we know something of the casual movements of trading schooners and have learned to regard the timely arrival of a letter as an event touching on the miraculous—the keeping of a rendezvous, a possibility too remote for consideration. One hears curious tales, in this part of the world, of the outcome of such temporary leave-takings as ours was meant to be—husbands seeking their wives and wives their husbands; families scattered among these fragments of land and striving for many months to reunite.

I witnessed, not long ago, the sequel of one of these unsuccessful quests. A native from a distant group of islands set out for one of the atolls of the Low Archipelago, the home of his sweetheart. Arrangements for the marriage had been made long before, but letters had gone astray, and upon his arrival the young man found that the family of his prospective father-in-law had gone to another atoll for the diving season. With no means of following, he submitted to the inevitable, and married another girl. Months later, the woman of his first choice returned with her second choice of a husband; and the former lovers met, for the young man had not yet been able to return to his own island. Neither made any question of the other's decision—life is too short; and from the native point of view, it is foolish to spend it in wanderings which, at the last, may never fulfill their purpose.

R. L. S. grooved his trail on these oceans, broad and deep, and neither the waves of time nor of the sea have obliterated it. Other wanderers cross it here and there, and send the tidings home to San Francisco and Scotland and the world, as though he still lived and one should come on him some day. Our wanderers met an old American castaway on Ahu Ahu, and he brought back that other wanderer:

Once, as we sat drinking, Tari mentioned Stevenson, and the old man's face brightened.

"E," he said, slowly, in native fashion, "I remember him well; he came to Hiva Oa with the Casco. A funny fellow he was . . . thin! There was nothing to him but skin and bones. And questions—he'd ask you a hundred in a minute! I didn't take to him at first, but he was all right. He didn't care how he dressed; one day I saw him walking on the beach with nothing on but a pair of drawers."

And there was another, less widely known, but with the scholar's love of the unexplored. On far Ahu Ahu they found one of those lovable delvers into the kitchen middens of the world, and took up with him the everlasting question of the origin or origins of the Polynesians. Here are his conclusions, based on nebulous appearances, and therefore vague and fascinating:

"On the whole," he said, with agreeable readiness to speak of his work, "I am convinced that they came from the west. The Frenchman's theory that the race originated in New Zealand, like the belief that they migrated westward from the shores of America, is more picturesque, more stirring to the imagination; but the evidence is too vague. If one investigates the possibilities of an eastward migration, on the other hand, one finds everywhere in the western islands the traces of their passage. For out in the Orient, in isolated groups, off the coast of Sumatra, about Java and Celebes, and in the Arafura Sea, I can show you people of the true Polynesian type. Even in such places, where the last migration must have passed nearly two thousand years ago, scraps of evidence remain—a word, a curious custom, the manner of carrying a basket. These things might seem coincidences if the trail did not grow warmer as one travels east.

"Though no trace of their blood is left, New Guinea must at one time have been a halting place in the migration. Papua it is called, and one finds the word current in Polynesia, meaning a garden, a rich land. The natives of New Guinea are as unlike the people of the eastern Pacific, I should say, as the average American or Englishman, and yet throughout New Guinea there is a most curious cropping out of Polynesian words, pointing to a very ancient intercourse between the races. Consider the word for woman among the Polynesians. In Rarotonga, it is vaine; in Tahiti, vahine; in the Marquesas, vehine; in Hawaii, wahine; in Samoa, fahine. The same root runs through the dialects of Papua. In Motu, woman is habine; in Kerepunu, vavine; in Aroma, babine; and in Motumotu it is ua, which in this part of the Pacific means, variously, female, seed, and rain. I could cite you dozens of similar examples. Now and then one comes across something that sets one's imagination to work . . . as you must know, the word for sun in the islands is ra, but in Tahiti they have another word, mahana. In New Guinea, thirty-five hundred miles away, and with all Melanesia between, the tribes of the South Cape call the sun mahana. What a puzzle it is!

"Though it may be the merest coincidence, that ra has a flavor of Egypt. I wonder if there could be a connection? I used to know a girl in Tahiti whose strange and rather beautiful name—hereditary as far back as the records of her family went—was that of a queen of Egypt who ruled many hundreds of years before Christ. But I mustn't ride my hobby too fast."

No name is given: the lonely delver is incog. But could this have been Judge Fornander? He seems too long ago, and yet this is much his method, and much the direction of his theories. However we may puzzle over these matters of Polynesian origin, the Polynesian apparently does not. He is the despair of the peddlers of ready-made civilization. It seems dangerous to sell him marbles, for instance, for instead of resisting idleness he takes the marbles and plays for keeps with them and makes no copra for days, when it is well known that his real function on the earth is to make copra so that the El Dorado Oil Works, or some other oil works, may turn out palmolive soap, or some other brand of soap, for the rest of us. He doesn't seem to care a red cent whether we have any soap or not. He is shameless about it. Approaching an island, the supercargo was talking:

"Well, we won't have to stop long," he added, grouchyly. "I'll take what copra they have and get out. It's a God-forsaken hole. They only make about twenty-five tons a year. The island could produce three times that amount under decent management. They're a lazy, independent lot, at Rutiaro. You can't get 'em to stir themselves."

I asked him what they had to gain by stirring themselves. "Gain?" he said. "They have everything to gain. There are only two frame houses on the place. The rest of them are miserable little shelters of coconut thatch. I haven't sold them enough corrugated iron in ten years to cover this cockpit. You remember Takaroa and Niau and Fakahina? Well, there's my idea of islands. Nice European furniture—iron beds, centre tables, phonographs, bicycles—"

A further catalogue of the comforts and conveniences of civilization which the inhabitants of Rutiaro might have and didn't convinced me that this was the atoll I had been looking for, and I regretted that our stay there was to be so brief.

After that it is plain what a perverse, refractory lot the Polynesians are, and how fast wedded to ways that are vain. And yet, somehow, they get along with themselves, with nature, with what we call life and think about a great deal; get along about as well with it as we do, and without thinking about it at all. Here is a motion picture of them not easily equaled:

The pass was at the farther end of the lagoon, and in order to save time in getting the work ashore under way, the supercargo and I, with three of the sailors, put off in a whaleboat, to land on the ocean side of the village. Half a dozen men rushed into the surf, seized and held the boat as the backwash poured down the steep incline at the edge of the reef. Among them was the chief, a man of huge frame, six feet two or three in height. Like the others who assisted at the landing, he was clad only in a pareu, but he lost none of his dignity through his nakedness. He was fifty-five years old, as I afterward learned, and as he stood bidding us welcome I thought of the strange appearance certain of the chief men in America or France or England would make under similar circumstances, deprived of the kindly concealment of clothing. What a revelation it would be of skinniness or pudginess! What an exhibition of scrawny necks, fat stomachs, flat chests, flabby arms! To be strictly accurate, I had seen some fat stomachs among elderly Paumotuans, but they were exceptions, and always remarkable for that reason. And those who carried them had sturdy legs. They did not give one the uneasy feeling, common at home, at the sight of the great paunches of sedentary men tottling unsteadily along a strip of crimson carpet, from curb to club doorway.

Wherever one goes in Polynesia one is reminded, by contrast, of the cost physically to men of our own race of our sheltered way of living. There on every hand are men well past middle life, with compact, symmetrical bodies and the natural grace of healthy children. One sees them carrying immense burdens without exertion, swimming in the open sea for an hour or two at a time while spearing fish, loafing ashore with no greater apparent effort for yet longer periods. Sometimes, when they have it, they eat enormous quantities of food at one sitting, and at others, under necessity, as sparingly as so many dyspeptics. It would be impossible to formulate from their example any rules for rational living in more civilized communities. The daily quest for food under primitive conditions keeps them alert and sound of body, so that, whether they work or loaf, feast or fast, they seem always to acquire health by it.

How much do they really need from us, their top-lofty superiors and guides and mentors to better ways of living—more satisfying and more wholesome ways? One of our authors supplies this rather illuminating discussion:

It seems to me that the chief benefit resulting from the Christianizing process is that it has offset some of the evils resulting from the rest of the civilizing process. This was not the opinion of Tino, supercargo of the Caleb S. Winship, however. I remember a conversation which I had with him on the subject, when Rutiaro itself lay within view, but still far distant. For the sake of argument I had made some willfully disparaging remark about traders, and Tino had taken exception to it.

"You're wrong," he said. "You know as well as I do—or maybe you don't—what these people used to be: cannibals, and not so many years ago at that. I don't suppose you would call it a genteel practice? Well, what stopped it? I'll tell you what stopped it—tinny beef."

That was a new angle of vision to me. I said nothing, but I thought I could detect a hint of a smile in his eyes as he waited for the statement to sink in.

"I have had some fun in my time," he went on, "arguing this out with the missionaries. I say tinny beef and they say the four gospels. Can't be proved either way, of course. But suppose, right now, every trading schooner in the archipelago was to lay a course for Papeete. Suppose not one of them was to go back to the atolls for the next twenty-five years. Leave the people to themselves, as you say, and let them have their missionaries, with the Golden Rule in one hand and the Ten Commandments in the other. What chance would they have of dying a natural death? The missionaries, I mean. About as much chance as I have of getting old Maroaki at Tako Raro to pay me the eight hundred francs he owes me."

That is candor, such as one hears on the ground, in the field, where theories are confronted by realities, and fine principles have to give way to probabilities.

Out there on the broad crystal of the Pacific, among the coral islands, white men have yielded to the immemorial spell, have "sat them down upon the yellow sand, between the sun and moon upon the shore," and lived instead of hurrying, and loafed instead of laboring, and sunk into the lotos-eating state. And even there the war reached its bony hand and dragged some of them back "home" as the English never lose the habit of calling it. So there was the case of Warner, as related by himself:

I never thought I'd see the old country again, but the war changed all that. I got a nasty wound in Gallipoli, you see, and they sent me home to convalesce. The family wasn't meant to know I was hurt, but they saw a bit of a thing in the paper [an account of the exploit which won Tari his D. C. M.], and there they were at the dock when the transport off-loaded. I hadn't laid eyes on them for fifteen years. . . . The old governor—by Jove! he was decent. It was all arranged that I should stop in England when the war was over; I thought myself it was a go. When the job was finished, and I'd got a special dispensation to be demobbed at home, I stood it for a fortnight and then gave up. . . .

Home is all very well for a week or two, but for a steady thing I seem to fit in better down here. What is it that makes a chap stop in the islands? You must have felt it yourself, and yet it is hard to put into words. This sort of thing, perhaps [he swept his hand through the soft darkness] the beauty, the sense of remoteness, the vague and agreeable melancholy of these places. Then I like the way the years slip past—the pleasant monotony of life. My friends at home put up with a kind of dullness which would drive me mad; but here, where there is even less to distinguish one day from another, one seems never to grow fretful or impatient of time. One's horizon narrows, of course; I scarcely look at the newspaper any more. If you stop here you will find yourself unconsciously drifting into the native state of mind, readjusting your sense of values until the great events of the world seem far off and unreal, and your interests are limited to your own business, the vital statistics of your island, and the odd kinks of human nature about you. Perhaps this is the way we are meant to live; at any rate, it brings serenity.

And that is one of the best things about a book like this: that even into a noisy, crowded, mainland city "it brings serenity."

FAERY LANDS OF THE SOUTH SEAS. By Hall and Nordhoff. New York and London: Harper & Brothers; $4.

BANKING AND INVESTMENT NEWS.

San Francisco bank clearings for the week ending September 23, 1922, were $152,000,000; for the corresponding week of last year, $136,300,000; an increase of $15,700,000.

The recent advance in wages announced by the United States Steel Corporation has been accepted as a recognition on the part of some of our most important industrial and banking interest of the beginning of a new inflation period. This wage increase affected for the most part workers not connected with labor unions. Later, the New England textile interests announced increased wages and invited strike. Mr. Gompers is now unfortunately permitting himself to become enlisted in the ranks of those unpatriotic labor unionists who think of patriotism only in the terms of their personal interests. He is quoted as saying before the International Typographical Union: "The men who are non-union will join our ranks as their only protection in the world of struggle. We must stand against the atrocious conduct of our government officials toward the rational and constructive movement of organized labor to raise the working people. It must not be stated that the spirit of 1776 is dead in 1922."

How about standing against the atrocious conduct of union labor at Herrin, Illinois, Needles, Arizona, and numerous other places? Why rail against injunctions calculated to check murder and arson and innumerable crimes? Mr. Gompers may as well be informed now as later that the spirit of 1776 is the very spirit that is actuating the government to issue such an injunction in behalf of men who desire to work and who temporarily do not feel constrained to abide by the rules and regulations of his various unions.

There is ample evidence that the railroads have been terribly handicapped by the former shopmen's rules that have compelled the activities of a dozen men, in many instances, to do some trivial repair work that one could have accomplished in far less time. It would almost seem that some of these union men who are riotously condemning and who recently have been actually murdering non-union shopmen may be regarded themselves, not as "labor-unionists," but as "non-labor-unionists," and it really begins to look as if some of the high-salaried labor union leaders were somewhat afraid of their jobs.—The Trader.

The absurdity of the so-called Water and Power Act is the tremendous risk that its supporters are asking the people of California to take—and all for nothing.

Herbert Hoover is authority for the statement that "nowhere is power so cheap nor so plentiful as in California." "Nowhere"—not excepting even Ontario, which advocates of the proposed Water and Power Amendment point to as the Utopia of hydro-electric development.

Then why all this fuss? Why this vast expenditure of money in an effort to foist upon the people of the state an experiment in state socialism for which there has been no popular demand, and which, from all accounts, was hatched behind closed doors by a handful of self-appointed representatives of "the people's interests"?

Why are the people of California being asked to mortgage all their property to the tune of $500,000,000? Why are they being asked to risk this vast sum and to take the chance of running up an additional huge tax bill? Why are they being asked to entrust half a billion dollars to a board of five men, whom they can not choose for themselves nor control after they have been appointed?

Why are the people being asked to create ideal conditions for the formation of an all-powerful, autocratic political machine that will control their business, their farms, their credit, their commerce, their power bills, their irrigation systems?

What is the object of it all?

If the people are going to take the tremendous risks involved in the so-called Water and Power Act they must be shown good reasons for it. They are not going to indorse this $500,000,000 note sight unseen.

Advocates of the proposed amendment have not yet advanced any adequate reason for its adoption. They will not do so. The fact is there is no good reason for this dangerous experiment, and the thinking people of California are going to reject it overwhelmingly at the polls next November.

The situation in the Near East may be taken too seriously, but can not be altogether ignored by us. For we have work of importance—and profit—to do in Asia Minor, which we might have been doing long since had we not allowed ourselves to be misled by an ignorant, quasi-religious propaganda, say Strassburger & Co.

Great Britain's policy is to blame for all that is happening. Abdul the Damner, Enver the Epileptic, Ferid the Fatuous, have been her fancies. Turkey, the real Turkey, she has not known.

Many years before Abdul entered the walls of his prison he would have been deposed had Britain not interfered. When a period was put to his misrule by the Young Turks it was not to be supposed that every member of that party was sincere. It was soon obvious that Enver was unreliable. Yet Britain tacitly supported him. Further, she antagonized all by her association with Russia, Turkey's enemy. Notwithstanding this, the entrance of Turkey into the great war on Germany's side could have been prevented had Kemal been in power. For he foresaw the inevitable end. The signing of the Mudros Armistice in 1918 gave the Allies a chance of redeeming the blunders of the past. Kemal was there, prepared to carry out a strictly defensive policy in external matters, content to devote his energies to internal reorganization. Instead, Ferid was put in power, Kemal fled, and quietly set to work to re-create a new Turkey at Angora. He succeeded without money in gathering round him a body of capable executives, and but for the ill-judged piece of impertinence represented by Greece's injection into Smyrna, the terrible atrocities of which she has been guilty and her persistent onslaughts on her neighbors, we should never have been faced with the present tangle.

Even a worm will turn. Kemal is no worm, is on the contrary probably the ablest statesman in the old world, next to Dr. Benes of Czechoslovakia. He has to be reckoned with now, as will have to be also the evil influences that are gathering round him. Handled wisely, he may, even now, be willing to listen to the voices that guided his earlier days. If not, he will be crushed, and a world that has rarely had any use for her greatest men will have suffered another loss.

The National City Company is offering $75,000,000 ten-twenty-year Federal Land Bank 4½ per cent. bonds, exempt from Federal, state, municipal, and local taxation, due May 1, 1942. These bonds, in addition to being obligations of the Federal Land Banks, all twelve of which are primarily liable for interest and ultimately liable for the principal on each bond, are secured by collateral consisting of an equal amount of United States government bonds, or mortgages on farm lands which must be: (a) first mortgages, to an amount not exceeding 50 per cent. of the value of the land and 20 per cent. of the

BRADFORD, KIMBALL &amp; CO.

FORMERLY
BRADFORD, WEEDEN & CO

DEALERS IN GOVERNMENT, MUNICIPAL
AND
CORPORATION BONDS

SECOND FLOOR

Insurance Exchange Building
San Francisco

value of the permanent improvements as appraised by United States appraisers; (b) limited to $10,000 on any one mortgage; (c)

INVESTMENT SECURITIES

Government, Municipal and Corporation Bonds in denominations of $100, $500, and $1000 for the investment of Banks, Trust Funds, and Individual Investors. Inquiries Invited.

HUNTER, DULIN &amp; CO.

THE SECOND FLOOR—
256 MONTGOMERY ST.

Los Angeles San Francisco Oakland
Pasadena San Diego

guaranteed by the local National Farm Loan Association of which the borrower is a member and stockholder. The stock of these as-private wires to principal financial and commercial centers.

STRASSBURGER

STOCKS · BONDS
COTTON · GRAIN
COMMODITIES

133 Montgomery Street
San Francisco

Members San Francisco Stock & Bond
Exchange & Chicago Board of Trade
—(Douglas 2220)—

sociations carries a double liability; (d) reduced each year by payment of part of the mortgage debt.

The conservatism of appraisals made for

Private Wires
Coast to Coast

E. F. Hutton &amp; Co.

MEMBERS
NEW YORK STOCK EXCHANGE
HUTTON BUILDING
Montgomery and Bush Sts.
HOTEL ST. FRANCIS
DEL MONTE HOTEL

Long Term—Tax Exempt
Imperial Irrigation District
Gold 6% Bonds
at 101
Ask for Circular

FREEMAN SMITH & CAMP Co.

SECOND FLOOR
FIRST NATIONAL BANK BLDG.
Douglas 2121

their striking employees to return. This action must be construed, not as a back-down on the part of the employing interests, but as another instance of recognition of the changed conditions governing labor's compensation.

There is scarcely any doubt that the United States Railway Labor Board will in its turn recognize these changes and increase certain railway wages where the situation seems to demand it. As a matter of fact, the vast ma-

GEARY, MEIGS & CO.
ESTABLISHED 1914

Sinclair
Pipe Line Company
20-Year Sinking Fund
5% Gold Bonds
Due 1942

Standard Oil of Indiana to presently own half interest in the company.
Price 95
To Yield over
5.40%
Phone for Circular

INVESTMENT BONDS
CAL COMMERCIAL-UNION BLDG.
GARFIELD 3450 SAN FRANCISCO

jority of striking shopmen are already back at work—most of them in the shops of other roads than those they left.

Meanwhile, labor unions are making much to-do over the so-called Daugherty injunction. Whatever criticism may be leveled at certain details of this injunction, it is well enough settled that it has had a definite effect already in vastly decreasing the number of criminal outrages which were interfering with railway traffic and which could only be laid at the door of labor unionists.

At times in the past Mr. Gompers, speaking for the American Federation of Labor, has reflected much greater sanity and intelligence than could be said of some of his confrères, but in the face of a losing shopmen's

McDONNELL & Co.

STOCK EXCHANGE MEMBERS

And Other Leading Exchanges
633 Market St., at New Montgomery
SAN FRANCISCO
TELEPHONE SUTTER 7676
N. Y. Office, 120 Broadway
Los Angeles, 634 So. Spring St.

PRIVATE WIRES

CARSTENS &amp; EARLES, INCORPORATED

GOVERNMENT, MUNICIPAL AND CORPORATION BONDS

ESTABLISHED 1891

Insurance Exchange Building
San Francisco

Telephone Sutter 4142

SEATTLE LOS ANGELES SPOKANE SAN FRANCISCO

"It is easy to buy
bonds"

Ask for our booklet explaining investment principles.

Name _____
Address _____

CYRUS PEIRCE & COMPANY
433 California Street
San Francisco

The Oldest Bond House in California

Member of San Francisco Stock and Bond Exchange

E · H · ROLLINS · & · SONS
300 Montgomery Street, San Francisco
Telephone Kearny 3807

the Federal Land Banks is indicated by the fact that, during the year ended November 30, 1921, 4725 farms against which the banks had made loans totaling less than $15,000,000 were actually sold for over $45,000,000.

Taxes are taxes, however they may be disguised.

It is idle for propagandists for the so-called Water and Power Act to try to argue that the $500,000,000 burden that they are every bit of property in California would be covered by a blanket mortgage, and the taxpayers would become responsible for the payments of this huge debt, principal and interest.

Theoretically the unspecified projects on which this $500,000,000 is to be spent would pay for themselves. But the drawers of the so-called Water and Power Act could not have had very great confidence in the ability of their Utopian scheme to pay for itself, for they provided that defaults in both principal and interest might be met by taxes, by draft on the state treasury, and by the issuance of more bonds.

The interest alone on $500,000,000 of bonds would be at least $25,000,000 a year, and the moment the Water and Power Act became part of the Constitution of California the taxpayers of the state would be irrevocably liable to pay additional annual taxes in that amount.

George H. Burr & Co. are offering $15,000,000 Cudahy Packing Company fifteen-year sinking fund 5½ per cent. gold debentures, due October 1, 1937.

The Cudahy Packing Company, one of the largest packing-house concerns in the United States, has plants in six packing centres and 110 distributing branch houses in the principal cities of the United States. After the present financing the company will have the following stock and surplus outstanding: $8,500,000 preferred, $17,000,000 common, $3,500,000 surplus. Funded debt includes this issue and about $10,500,000 first closed mortgage bonds, due December 1, 1946, which are being retired by a sinking fund of $325,000 per year.

The proceeds of this issue will retire by January 15, 1923, now outstanding $4,000,000 7 per cent. notes due July 15, 1923, and also provides additional working capital by reducing current liabilities. The company's financial statement, dated October 29, 1921, made at the close of their fiscal year, including these debentures, and applying proceeds of this issue and the proceeds from sale of the balance of first mortgage bonds issued earlier this year, shows total assets in excess of $65,450,000, net current assets and net tangible assets applicable to funded indebtedness $27,195,000 and $52,880,000 respectively.

An offering of a new issue of $2,000,000 San Diego County Water Company first mortgage gold bonds, 6 per cent., Series "A," due December 1, 1962, is being made by Blyth, Witter & Co. These bonds are exempt from personal property taxes in California and interest is paid without deduction for normal Federal income tax, not exceeding 2 per cent. The price is 95 and interest, yielding over 6.30 per cent.

The San Diego County Water Company, a California corporation, was organized to take over properties owned or controlled by Mr. William G. Henshaw of San Francisco, consisting of approximately 46,000 acres of agricultural land in San Diego County, which in large part is naturally sub-irrigated or is supplied with rainfall in excess of eighteen inches per annum sufficient for profitable orchard and general farming without recourse to irrigation; also dam sites, reservoir sites, and water rights capable ultimately of delivering water in dependable and sufficient supply to irrigate approximately 35,000 acres of citrus land in outside ownership available for and needing irrigation. In addition to this service the company's water properties can furnish a net safe domestic yield of 10,000,000 gallons daily whenever that amount or any portion thereof shall be required by the city of San Diego and neighboring communities.

Acquisition of these properties and complete engineering studies covering all phases of water supply, storage, and distribution have been in progress for the past twelve years under Mr. Henshaw's direction.

The growing disposition of the non-manufacturing world to exchange its raw material for American manufactures is apparent, says the National City Bank of New York, by a close study of the import and export figures of the fiscal year just ended. While the value figures often fall below those of recent years, the quantities of individual articles show in

Investors of Small Amounts

Our Bond Department serves anyone desiring to secure maximum income, with safety, from his funds. Bonds may be purchased in denominations of $100, $500 and $1,000.

Let this bank act as your financial advisor. It will be a pleasure to serve you.

Call, write or telephone for investment service!

ANGLO-CALIFORNIA TRUST COMPANY

COMMERCIAL SAVINGS TRUST BOND DEPARTMENTS
"The City Wide Bank"
Market & Sansome Streets
San Francisco
MARKET-MCALLISTER AND JONES STREETS 101 MARKET
MISSION AND 16TH FILLMORE AND GEAR THIRD AND 20TH

BONDS

$15,000,000

Cudahy Packing Company

15-Year Sinking Fund 5½% Gold Debentures
Due October 1, 1937

George H. Burr & Co.

KOHL BUILDING
SAN FRANCISCO

|              |             |           |
|--------------|-------------|-----------|
| NEW YORK     | LOS ANGELES | CLEVELAND |
| BOSTON       | ATLANTA     | DETROIT   |
| PHILADELPHIA | CHICAGO     | PITTSBURG |
| SCRANTON     | ST. LOUIS   | SEATTLE   |

"A National Yet Personal Service"

trying to saddle on the people of California does not mean more taxes for all of us.

It is true that the proposed constitutional amendment provides that this huge sum of money, the uncontrolled expenditure of which would be entrusted to a board of five men whom the taxpayers would have no voice in selecting, shall be raised by the issuance of state bonds.

But the full faith and credit of the State of California would be pledged to support those bonds; the moment they were issued

Our First Concern

We are interested, first of all, in the excellence of the security behind any issue of bonds offered by us to investors. Then we are interested in securing for our clients the highest yield consistent with such security.

WM. R. STAATS CO.

Established 1887

Alexander Bldg., Montgomery St., cor. of Bush
SAN FRANCISCO

Telephone Kearny 301

LOS ANGELES SAN DIEGO PASADENA

A High Grade Investment Opportunity

The new Bond Issue of the Sinclair Pipe Line Company offers an especially attractive opportunity to those who seek a conservative high grade investment.

Call Sutter 3434

SUTRO & CO.

ESTABLISHED 1858

410 MONTGOMERY STREET

Members of the San Francisco Stock and Bond Exchange
Direct Wires to All Eastern Centers and Canada

Send for copy of our Investor's Manual.

LOGAN & BRYAN

STOCK, BOND, COTTON, COFFEE,
SUGAR AND GRAIN BROKERS

DIRECT PRIVATE WIRES

Pacific to Atlantic—U. S. and Canada

MEMBERS:

NEW YORK STOCK EXCHANGE
BOSTON STOCK EXCHANGE
CHICAGO STOCK EXCHANGE
NEW YORK COTTON EXCHANGE
NEW YORK COFFEE EXCHANGE
NEW YORK PRODUCE EXCHANGE
NEW ORLEANS COTTON EXCHANGE
PITTSBURG STOCK EXCHANGE
CHICAGO BOARD OF TRADE
MINNEAPOLIS CHAMBER OF COMMERCE
WINNIPEG GRAIN EXCHANGE
ST. LOUIS MERCHANTS EXCHANGE
SALT LAKE CITY STOCK EXCHANGE
LOS ANGELES STOCK EXCHANGE
PHILADELPHIA BOURSE
MONTREAL BOARD OF TRADE

SAN FRANCISCO BRANCH OFFICES AT
401 Montgomery Street

and
Merchants Exchange Bldg.

Telephone Garfield 3000

R. C. JENKINS, C. S. LAWRENCE,
San Francisco Managers

many cases large percentages of gain, even in the "lean" international trade year 1922 when compared with the year immediately preceding. Though the strike troubles of the past

Sixty-five Sutter Street

BONDS

Ask to be placed on our mailing list for monthly circular and for data regarding various bond issues.

STEPHENS & COMPANY

SAN FRANCISCO OAKLAND
Los Angeles San Diego

few weeks may have checked the disposition to lay in stocks of manufacturing material, the figures of the full fiscal year ending June 30, 1922, make it quite apparent that the quantity of raw material being brought into the

INVESTMENT SECURITIES

COMMERCIAL PAPER
AND ACCEPTANCES

GOVERNMENT
MUNICIPAL
AND CORPORATION
BONDS

BOND & GOODWIN & TUCKER

AMERICAN NATIONAL BANK BUILDING
SAN FRANCISCO
LOS ANGELES SEATTLE PORTLAND

BOOKS ON THE TABLE.

...is increasing and that the countries sending them are willing to accept our manufactures in exchange.

Tin, which is sent us chiefly from the opposite side of the globe (for we produce none ourselves), is a striking evidence of the encouraging situation in our manufacturing industries and of the willingness of the foreign producer to accept our manufactures in exchange for his natural products. The quantity of pig tin imported in the fiscal year 1922 was, in round terms, 100,000,000 pounds as against 80,000,000 in the preceding year, but the stated value of this 100,000,000 pounds is only $29,000,000, while that of the 80,000,000 pounds of the preceding year was $42,000,000. In other words, imports increased 25 per cent. in quantity, but decreased 30 per cent. in stated value.

This striking characteristic, of an increase in quantities of imported manufacturing material but a reduction in stated values, extend to many of the articles for which we must rely on the other parts of the globe, and the fact that this increase in quantities is accompanied by a decrease of stated value suggests that our manufacturers will continue to compete successfully in world markets for the finished products.

That the non-manufacturing world is ready to accept our manufactures in exchange for its raw material is also strikingly evidenced by the figures of our exports of tin plate and other manufactures to the very countries from which we draw the tin. Most of the pig tin comes to us from the Straits Settlements, the Dutch East Indies, the Malayan Peninsula, Hongkong, and China, and all of these countries and colonies take in exchange our tin plate and many other manufactures, and this is also true as to Bolivia and Chile, from which we receive the tin ore of the Bolivian mines and pay for it in manufactures of tin and many other articles.

This commendable "habit" of paying for our raw material with the products of our factories extends to many articles and many countries. We sell cotton manufactures to the world's producers of raw cotton, Egypt, India, Australia, China, Peru, and Brazil; rubber manufactures to the Malayan Peninsula, the Dutch Indies, and Brazil; woolen goods to Argentina, Uruguay, and Australia, and leather goods to all the countries sending us the hides and skins which we must have from abroad.

L. M. MacDonald, representative of the executive council of the California Bankers' Association and vice-president of the Bank of Italy, left September 24th to attend the annual convention of the American Bankers' Association to be held in New York, October 2d to 6th. He was accompanied by Charles A. Smith, national executive councilman of the association and manager of the Bank of Italy Livermore Branch.

Yellow fever was finally eradicated from Cuba in 1901.

Foreign trade concern doing an excellent business needs additional capital for expansion and the right party to devote part or all his time to the business. Box G, The Argonaut.

Bonds

for Investment

MUNICIPALS
IRRIGATION DISTRICTS
CORPORATIONS

Specialists in Safety

Anglo London Paris Company

One Sansome Street San Francisco

Phone Kearny 5600

The English more than any other nation have a type of literature which is perhaps least represented in American letters. It is of a semi-private nature and is written by a certain group of people for the enjoyment of the same group. Much of it, frankly, is not interesting to the outside world. We refer to the English custom of printing private memoirs and travels. We do not, emphatically, mean such books as Mrs. Asquith's and Colonel Repington's diaries. Their piquancy stamps them with the earmarks of ultimate publicity. We refer instead to such quiet social, political, and travel annals of the English upper classes as E. P. Dutton & Co. have the pleasant habit of publishing. A steady diet of these books would be monotonous, though hardly more so than regular rations of American fiction. The kindest thing one can say about our home-made novel is that it is in the experimental stage and has therefore a sort of scientific interest that it certainly lacks intrinsically. There is nothing of the laboratory about the books we are here discussing: they are an English institution. And though they are, more often than not, written by non-professional writers, still, by virtue of their seasoned heritage in English letters, they are never or seldom amateurish. Though they lack the canons of literary form and composition, they are always mature. Every cultivated Englishman is a potential author.

Six books recently brought out by the Duttons seem to fall into this category of non-professional literature, whose principal characteristic is that it makes no claim to literature as such. They are the plain records of plain Englishmen, and the reason for their publication is public spirited. When America develops a school of public-spirited citizens and statesmen, we also will have this type of book, for it is the result of the Anglo-Saxon spirit plus generations of cultivation.

To return to the Dutton sextet. The first on our list, "Sir Edward Cook, K. B. E., A Biography," by J. Saxon Mills (Dutton; $6) is the chief exception to the definition, for every intelligent Englishman or American, whatever his class, will read it with interest. However, its general interest is due to its being an exceptionally intelligent treatment of a chapter of British journalism, not to any piquancy culled from the Asquith school of memoirs. Its virtues are intrinsic and it is the sort of book whose ideal background is a rainy, foggy evening in San Francisco, London, or Edinburgh, and a library fireplace. It is temperate, genial, and full of usable information. Sir Edward Cook was for many years editor of the Pall Mall Gazette and later of the Daily News. He is the author of four excellent biographies, chief among which are the standard life of Florence Nightingale and the "Life of Delane" of the Times. The author, Mr. Mills, is a London barrister.

The second of our selection also has its exception in that it is the work of a professional writer, Sir Henry Lucy. His "Diary of a Journalist: Later Entries" (Dutton; $6) is as full of meat as the former entries, which is perhaps the best advertisement we could give it. Here, indeed, is a book to vie with Margot and the trenchant colonel. If Sir Henry is not so acrid, he is at least spicy. His system, which should be commended to all diarists, is to record only interesting events. He was fortunate in happening on so many.

"The Private Diaries of Sir Algernon West,

G. C. B." (Dutton; $7), belongs preëminently to our classification. This is the sort of annal that is interesting to the cultivated Englishman or the American student of history, both of whom are interested for different reasons in private political history. Few if any racy anecdotes here. You must concentrate to follow all the moves on the board, Sir Algernon having had a perfect passion for detail, all which will be eagerly devoured by the historical student. "The Private Diaries," which are edited by Horace G. Hutchinson, belong to the familiar school category called a "source-book."

Number four on our list is the truly charming record of Sir Francis Younghusband's sojourns among the Himalayas. This is one of the most naive and refreshing of books. One wishes one were as lyrically inspired as Sir Francis himself in writing about "The Heart of Nature" (Dutton; $5). Why doesn't one hear more of Sir Francis' powers of description? He is not a professional writer, but he is better than any professional except possibly William Hudson, of whom he strongly reminds one. Even so, the professional Mr. Hudson, weighted ever so little as he is by technicalities, does not soar quite so rhapsodically as does Sir Francis. Perhaps it is the result of living so much among the mountains. His descriptions of the flora and fauna of the Himalayas is something not to be missed.

The last two of the group of six are typical—more so than Sir Francis'—of the class we have been defining. One is an anonymous book of travel entitled "People and Places" (Dutton; $6), and described as "a life in five continents." This is the typical Britisher's record of out-of-the-way travel. It is well worth browsing through and is written, as so many of these unprofessional books are, with a fresh sprightliness that might well be the envy of the jaded writer by trade.

"Out of the World North of Nigeria," by Angus Buchanan (Dutton; $6), is a chapter of African exploration that will be enjoyed by readers of Stanley's and Livingston's journals. The author was, according to native statement, the first white to penetrate to some of these northern African mountain fastnesses. Like Sir Francis Younghusband, Mr. Buchanan holds a brief for the beauties of nature, but he adds that it is hard for a white man to be sympathetic with nature or in a condition to appreciate its loveliness when he is as sick as the average white is in the tropical jungle. We assume that the Himalayas are healthier than Tamgak and Agalak. R. G.

Notes of Books and Authors

Three of Sir James Barrie's plays are to be produced in Italy with Emma Gramatica in the leading roles.

Dorothy Canfield has written a new novel, "Rough Hewn," to be published this fall. It is the only book she has written since "The Brimming Cup."

The extraordinary success of Emerson Hough's new novel of the pioneer West, "The Covered Wagon," has stimulated interest in his earlier work, "The Story of the Cowboy," to such an extent that the publishers, D. Appleton & Co., report that its twenty-first printing has been put to press.

Dr. Ossendoski, author of "Beasts, Men, and Gods" (Dutton), attended the recent Washington Conference, being attached to the Polish legation as adviser on Far Eastern

All Books that are reviewed in the

Argonaut can be obtained at

Robertson's

222 STOCKTON ST.

Union Square San Francisco

affairs. As his book indicates, he is an expert on the subject.

Clinton T. Brainard, president of Harper & Brothers and of the McClure Syndicate, returned to America in August on the President Taft. He brought with him, not only the contract for the ex-Kaiser's memoirs, but for books by both Asquith and Viviani which the Harpers will publish.

"The Garden of the West," a new volume of poems by Louise Driscoll; "On the Trail of the Peacemaker," sketches of travel in Europe and the East by Fred B. Smith, and "The Public Relief of Sickness," by Gerald Morgan, are among the early September books on the Macmillan list.

The selection of poetry and prose by Keats published by the Oxford University Press American Branch is introduced and annotated by Henry Ellershaw. The volume contains essays and criticisms on Keats by Shelley, Jeffrey, Landor, Leigh Hunt, Masson, Swinburne, and Robert Bridges. The volume which follows—"Johnson's Poetry and Prose," edited by R. W. Chapman—includes Boswell's "Character," Macaulay's "Life," and an essay by Sir Walter Raleigh.

THE HOLMES BOOK CO.

707 Market St. 152 Kearny St. 22 Third St.

Largest variety of new and second-hand books in the city. A visit to our stores will convince you of the truth of this assertion. We buy libraries or single books for cash. See us before selling. Phone—Douglas 3283.

SAN FRANCISCO, CAL.

IF YOU ARE A REAL BOOK-LOVER

Spend a pleasant hour in the real "Old Book Shop" at 2 TILLMAN PLACE, OFF GRANT AVENUE—below Sutter.

Rare Old Books Bought, Sold and Hunted For by GEORGE HARGENS (formerly of the White House)

The Valley of Content

By BLANCHE UPRIGHT

A San Francisco author's first novel—the dramatic version to be produced in New York this season, by Marjorie Rambeau. $1.90

Book Dept., Main Floor.

Raphael Wall & Co. Inc.

The FRENCH AMERICAN BANK

OF SAN FRANCISCO

103 SUTTER STREET

Commercial Checking Savings

RESOURCES OVER - - $16,000,000

A General Banking Business Transacted.

COMMERCIAL AND PERSONAL CHECKING ACCOUNTS SOLICITED.

Savings Accounts receive interest at the rate of 4 per cent. per annum.

SAFE DEPOSIT BOXES $3.50

OFFICERS

Leon Boqueron, President

J. M. Dupas, Vice-President

J. A. Bergeron, Vice-President

W. F. Duffy, Vice-President

Vice-Pres. and Cashier

A. Bousquet, Secretary

J. T. Irilary, Asst. Cashier

Chas. L. Ebner, Jr., Asst. Cashier

A CRITICAL FABLE

MORE MIRRORS: BUT OF PARNASSUS THIS TIME

SOMEONE is lampooning the poets—twenty-one of them—including such famous figures as Amy Lowell, Sandburg, Frost, Robinson, Lindsay, and Masters. An amazing little volume, full of wit, wisdom, and excellent fooling, written in a firecracker verse which is irresistible.

If you like the modern poets—read it, it will delight you.
If you don't like the modern poets—read it, it will amuse you.
If you don't know whether you like the modern poets or not—read it, it will convince you one way or the other.

WHO WROTE IT?

HOUGHTON MIFFLIN CO.

Boston New York San Francisco
612 Howard St.

Picture cover
Title-page in two colors
$1.00

REVIEWS AND NOTICES.

Carnac's Folly.

The many readers of Sir Gilbert Parker's dramatic romances of French Canada will welcome "Carnac's Folly," wherein he unfolds the thrilling story of John Grier, Canadian lumber king, and his son Carnac. Between the two exists a strange antipathy—the keynote of this lurid tale of hate and love whose background is French Quebec with its exotic population and the great St. Lawrence with its fighting, heroic denizens, the lumbermen.

CARNAC'S FOLLY. By Sir Gilbert Parker. Philadelphia: J. B. Lippincott Company; $2.

Warfare in the Human Body.

Mr. Morley Roberts is not a professional scientific man, but it is obvious from this book that he is a scientist—much more of a one, in fact, than are many professionals. This volume on "method, malignity, repair, and allied subjects" is a really brilliant contribution to modern scientific thinking. Like Florence Nightingale, who was another amateur in scientific fields, Mr. Roberts has a genius for scientific method.

Mr. Roberts' primary interest is sociological and his intention in writing these papers was to draw an analogy between the human and the social bodies. The student of social conditions will therefore find his book of unusual interest, but because in illuminating his social theory he had to delve deep in human pathology, he has also illumined modern biology on many obscure points.

Perhaps the most interesting paper, because it is one of the most general interest, is the anthropological study, "The Cannibal in Evolution," which like those of medical or psychological interest is also written with a view to clarify social and group behavior. Mention also must be made of an amusing paper, "The Pharmakos and Medicine," in which Mr. Roberts displays considerable ability as a comparative philologist. Again emphasis should be laid on the fact that this book is a brilliant exercise of the imagination in science—very much the reverse of an orthodox scientific treatise. That it is the more readable is of course obvious. What may not be so readily granted, but what we nevertheless believe true, is that it is therefore the more valuable even as a scientific document. An example of the informative value of applied imagination is his referring to psychoanalysis as "the drainage of what we may call figuratively a mental abscess." Another brilliant metaphor is that of the "cave remains, skulls, or bones, which are the island peaks of the submerged continent of anthropology."

WARFARE IN THE HUMAN BODY. By Morley Roberts. New York: E. P. Dutton & Co.; $7.

Our Debt to Seneca.

Admirers of Greek and Roman literature and believers in the value of the classical heritage for the modern world have of late been active in the defense of the now almost defeated study of the classics against the onslaughts of modern educational theorists. Realizing that the serious study of the languages is a thing of the past, they are now apparently determined at any cost to make a belated attempt to save at least the spirit of the classics. In England recently have appeared such excellent and inspiring studies as "Our Hellenic Heritage," by H. R. James; "A History of Greek Mathematics," by Sir Thomas Heath, and "The Legacy of Greece," by Gilbert Murray and others. The Loeb library of translations accompanied by the original texts has for some time been making Greek and Roman literature accessible to those who have been denied the privilege of learning the original tongues, and to those whose Latin and Greek have grown rusty through neglect.

Now a new series, Our Debt to Greece and Rome, makes its initial appearance with Mr. Gummere's "Seneca the Philosopher and His Modern Message." The series will include some fifty volumes, having as editors many of the leading classical scholars of England and America.

Mr. Gummere's "Seneca," as those who are familiar with his translation of the "Epistle Morales" in the Loeb library might anticipate, represents a careful and loving study of the author and his influence. In the space of one hundred and thirty-eight pages he has given us eight chapters dealing in a concise manner with the life of Seneca, his influence upon pagan Rome, his appeal to the church, his influence in the Middle Ages, in the Renaissance, and in modern times. Accompanying the text are brief notes and a select bibliography. Unfortunately there is no index. Barring this omission, the reader will find here in accessible form the information he needs to appreciate the tremendous influence that Seneca has had on modern literature and thought.

May we look forward to a rapid appearance of the remaining volumes in the series and hope that they will show a like excellence!

SENECA THE PHILOSOPHER AND HIS MODERN MESSAGE. By Richard Mott Gummere. Boston: Marshall Jones Company; $1.50.

The Vehement Flame.

Mrs. Deland has written a study in human nature, in matrimonial failure and success, and a study of mésalliance, in "The Vehement Flame," though judged from her title she merely intended to write a study in jealousy. "The Vehement Flame" presents the old problem of the possibility of happiness between people who are ill matched in age, mind, and disposition, though—again—the author ignores the larger possibilities of her theme, so great is her absorption in the difference of age and the resulting theorem of jealousy. Mrs. Deland has obviously set out to trace the history of a marriage of which the woman was twenty years the elder, and though in the native richness of her mind the original motif expands to far greater dimensions, she seems to us hardly to make the best of it. She is not an opportunist. But neither is her book the cut-and-dried result of a formula, as most thematic novels are. Thanks to her really great knowledge of humanity and to her saving grace of humor, "The Vehement Flame" is a very human novel—not a finished thesis at all. If we have any fault to find with it, it is that original motif which hardly needs proving—that an ill-matched marriage will be a failure. Also, we object, just a little, to Eleanor's being twenty years the senior of her husband. Her age of thirty-nine was feasible enough. It was his nineteen years that were so incredible, though again it is platitudinous to state that boys of nineteen are fascinated by women twice their age. Overlooking the theme, which as we have said works out with far greater richness than the reader is at first given to expect, "The Vehement Flame" is a novel remarkable alike for its characters, its dramatic quality, and its truth to life. It is unreasonable to demand more.

THE VEHEMENT FLAME. By Margaret Deland. New York: Harper & Brothers; $2.

New Books Received.

THE ALTAR STEPS. By Compton Mackenzie. New York: George H. Doran Company; $2. A novel.

SPELLBINDERS. By Margaret Culkin Banning. New York: George H. Doran Company; $2. A novel.

ON TIPTOE. By Stuart Edward White. New York: George H. Doran Company; $1.75. A romance of the redwoods.

ONE THING IS CERTAIN. By Sophie Kerr. New York: George H. Doran Company; $1.90. A novel.

WHISPERING SAGE. By Harry Sinclair Drago and Joseph Noel. New York: The Century Company; $1.75. A Western romance.

MUMMERS IN MUFTI. By Philip Curtiss. New York: The Century Company; $1.75. A story of theatrical life.

LETTERS TO A DYINN. By Grace Zaring Stone. New York: The Century Company; $1.75.

A series of letters from the South Seas. WHEN THE WEST WAS YOUNG. By Frederick R. Becholdt. New York: The Century Company; $1.75.

A book of true Western stories.

ONE WORLD AT A TIME. By Margaret Fuller. New York: The Century Company; $2. A story of the old South.

SENTINELS ALONG OUR COAST. By Francis A. Collins. New York: The Century Company; $2. The story of America's lighthouse service.

THEY CALL ME CARPENTER. By Upton Sinclair. New York: Boni & Liveright; $1.75. "A tale of the second coming."

THE SINGING CAPTIVES. By E. B. C. Jones. New York: Boni & Liveright; $2. A new novel by the author of "Quiet Interior."

BABEL. By John Cournoos. New York: Boni & Liveright; $2.50.

By the author of "The Mask" and "The Wall."

THE TRAIL OF THE SPANISH HORSE. By James Willard Schultz. Boston: Houghton Mifflin Company; $1.75. Juvenile.

LETTERS OF A RADIO-ENGINEER TO HIS SON. By John Mills. New York: Harcourt, Brace & Co.; $2.

An account of the fundamental principles of radio communication.

A MOTHER'S GARDEN OF VERSE. By Rosalind Huidekoper Greene. Boston: The Stratford Company; $2.

STURBLE. By George Looms. Garden City: Doubleday, Page & Co.; $1.75. A novel.

Colley Cibber as a Poet.

Perhaps the most picturesque wearer of the laureate's wreath was Colley Cibber, says the Boston Transcript. He was not merely a poet of note in his day; he was also an actor, a dramatist and a theatre manager. He was appointed laureate when he was fifty-nine and thence onward until his death in 1757, at the age of eighty-six, he produced every year his New Year and Birthday Odes. It is said that his appointment came as a reward for a play written by him, "The Non-Juror," which satirized the Jacobites, and he in his turn was cruelly satirized by Pope and others as a singular object of their derision.

As a matter of fact, however, Cibber knew and acknowledged his limitations as a poet. "It may be worse to write bad poetry for twenty-seven years," says Professor Broadus, "and be blithely aware how bad it is all the while than to write bad poetry unwittingly. It may be worse—but at least it is more engaging. And Cibber not only knew it was bad, but quite openly said so. 'No Man worthy the Name of an Author,' he said in the Apology, 'is a more faulty writer than myself; that I am not Master of my own Language, I too often feel, when I am at loss for Expression'; and in 'The Egoist, or Cibber upon Cibber' (1743) he frankly declared that his odes were poor stuff. The ridicule which was poured out upon him on every hand he met with unshakable good humor. When a group of his friends challenged him to read some of the burlesques aloud he not only did so, but wrote a political satire upon himself." It is probable that he considered the laureateship a joke, as have many others. As a contribution to the stage of his day, his work was voluminous. In common with many others he rewrote Shakespeare, and it was his version of "King Richard III" that was known exclusively to the theatre-goers of a half-century and more ago. Many of its phrases, notably "Richard's himself again" and "Off with his head; so much for Buckingham," were Cibber's, and not Shakespeare's.

The 500 California manufacturing establishments reporting to the state bureau of labor statistics showed 105,976 employees at work during August, a gain of 11,754 over June, and of 11,615 over August, 1921.

IT'S THE WATER.

Prepared with Glacier Water from Shasta Springs

AT ALL DEALERS

SHASTA WATER COMPANY

Booth Tarkington at Three.

When Booth Tarkington was very young he possessed a pair of red-topped boots that would have delighted the soul of any Penrod of forty or fifty years ago. Senator Harry New tells about the first time he saw them adorning their owner, aged three.

"I won't tell you how long ago it was," said the senator, "but anyway I guess I am a little older than Booth, and that is why I remember my first view of him so well. It was at his home in Indianapolis. I saw a tiny figure emerge from around the corner of a frame house.

"All I could see at first was a pair of boots. My first impression was that the boots were taking their wearer somewhere. He hadn't grown up to them at all, but it was plain to see he was proud. And why shouldn't he be? They were red-top boots and they had copper toes. Boys who have grown up since the days of the red-top boots have never known the thrill that comes but once in a lifetime.

"After getting an eye full of Booth's boots, I then looked at Booth," said the senator. "He had on a little white dress. The combination of that dress and the boots made a picture which has never gone from my memory. Booth was about three years old. We became friends at once and always remained so."

CHARLES G. NORRIS'

BRASS

A Novel of Marriage

The demand for 52 editions shows the widespread, continued interest in this penetrating novel.

$2.00 at any bookstore, postage extra

E. P. DUTTON & CO., 681 5th Ave., N.Y.

The Wright Magazine

("Not for self, but for others")

Only $1.00 a Year.

Besides a serial and short stories it contains departments for literary and music, women and children, farm and garden, a people's forum, manuscript markets, radio notes and other interesting features.

THE WRIGHT MAGAZINE
P. O. Box 894 Little Rock, Ark.

A Programme and a Partnership

"The contract which we have made with the Spring Valley Water Company assures us of our ability to construct the Bay Division of the conduit without costing the taxpayers a cent, as the company will pay the interest charges from the time construction starts. It will also assure us an immediate needed increment to our water supply."

This quotation is from Robert M. Searls, Special Counsel for the Hetch Hetchy Water Supply, speaking at the Commonwealth Club on the water supply problem of San Francisco.

The conduit mentioned is the Hetch Hetchy conduit. The Bay Division of the conduit is now under construction.

When completed it will be used by Spring Valley to bring Calaveras water from Irvington to Crystal Springs Reservoir. The water company will pay the city for this use.

Spring Valley is raising the height of Calaveras Dam, and will also provide facilities for carrying Calaveras water as far as Irvington, where it will enter the Hetch Hetchy line.

The city and water company, in other words, are cooperating to solve the immediate problem of more water for San Francisco.

Cooperation of this sort, resulting in a virtual partnership between the city and water company, is a new thing in American water service.

When the city and company complete their respective parts of the present programme, the daily supply will be increased from 42 to 66 million gallons.

The addition of 24 million gallons daily to the supply will not exhaust the possibilities of the big Calaveras Reservoir in Alameda County.

But that much more water added to the present supply will solve the immediate water problem in San Francisco.

SPRING VALLEY
WATER COMPANY

"NICE PEOPLE."

This play at the Columbia is showing the flapper as she flaps, and the cockerel emitting inebriated crows. The author, Rachel Crothers, always quick to adapt herself to the stage needs of the moment, has perceived what entertaining stage material resides in the nonchalant personalities of the dashing young girls of the present era.

So there they are, beautifully dressed, pretty as a box of variegated candy, smart, graceful, assured. Badinage and verbal audacities sparkle. They are clever. They know it all; or think they do, because they are early acquainted with man's weakness and woman's power.

When the girls are alone their jealousies, rivalries, and pugnacities come to the surface. And the quick-wittedness of youth is there, ready of tongue to reinforce the keen detections of the precociously observant mind. But all the time these young persons are playing over the surface of things, quite unconscious of the depths that have escaped their observation.

It is highly entertaining; more particularly because they are so smart and pretty. Their elders look on helpless, complaisant, from necessity. Life to the young things is an exhilarating whirl, a mad, gay, pleasurable chariot race, and they hold the reins. They have wrested them from their seniors, and they mean never to give them back.

There are little murmurs in the audience here and there from parental lips: "Isn't that like Di?" Or, "Kate, do you recognize yourself?" For the young actresses in the company play their rôles of the little exclusive group of "nice people" with cleverness, dash, and naturalness; the naturalness of people who know each other well and have nothing to conceal except their amative preferences.

Rachel Crothers has done it well, and Producer Sam Harris has picked out the right people to express the demeanor and character of these gay young devotees of pleasure.

The centre of the group is "Teddy" Gloucester, whom we shortly perceive to be a girl of intrinsic character, underneath the exuberant superficialities of her life. Teddy is very dashing and bewitchingly acted by Mary Newcomb, whose pretty face has piquant charm, and who bestows on Teddy just that mixture of winning, careless frankness with the foolhardiness of a self-willed girl who has never allowed herself to be crossed.

Miss Newcomb also adopts a quick, impetuous manner of speech suitable to the character of the pretty madcap who, in her youthful ignorance, makes self-will her god.

Another very clever and extremely pretty member of the company is Maureen Olson, who plays the ungrateful rôle of a lithe cat who takes you off your guard by sudden scratches, purring melodiously the while.

There are several lively verbal scraps between Teddy and the cat, which I regret to say we all enjoyed with unethical delight. But the dialogue is clever and natural, and the two girls did it so well, Mary Newcomb as Teddy with gallantly fearless charges and full-front attacks in the enemy country, Hallie, the cat, receiving each keen-bladed rapier thrust with surreptitious dagger jabs that an umpire would call foul.

Teddy is an example of the girl who has character-substance behind her fluff, Hallie of the feline materialist who has become one chronic Grab. Eileen—very prettily played by Barbara Gurney, who also carries her clothes smartly—supplies an instance of the girl with a nice nature who vibrates between that nature and external influences, and doesn't realize herself.

Theodore von Eltz plays "Scotty," a young knight-errant of pleasure with whom Teddy is rather slipping and sliding into the "in love" condition; and Thomas Chatterton, long and favorably known at the Alcazar, plays the nice young man who wins Teddy to a better way of thinking and living when she comes a cropper, endangering her reputation by a mad exploit of wilfulness done to discipline a recalcitrant parent.

I must confess, however, that like our little friends who clamor for a story about a Bad Boy, I enjoyed the first act the most. It was so entertaining, so up to date, so well done. It is a real picture, and highly diverting.

That, really, is the real reason of the play; to give a picture of delightfully pretty and what ought to be attractive girls going calamitously the wrong way. And of course the girl who was the leader and whom we admired the most and liked the best, had to be picked up from her stumble, dusted off, and set with her feet pointing in the right path.

Fortunately Mary Newcomb was at all times attractive to look at and to listen to. Her creator has given Teddy lots of snappy dialogue, and Miss Newcomb does it snappily. It was rather clever, the contrast between the two girl antagonists when Teddy made her rapid, gallant charges, and Hallie drawled, and opened wide her blue eyes with an air of false innocence.

Both Theodore von Eltz and Thomas Chatterton did their parts very well, but I think their rôles should be exchanged, as Mr. von Eltz's appearance and personality would better accord with the character of the young man who was faithful to his ideals, while Thomas Chatterton's good looks and physiognomy adapt him better to the character of the ornate young social darling for whose favor the girls competed.

Pauline French as Margaret Rainsforth, the aunt, speaks her lines well, and has a very agreeable voice. But she doesn't understand the psychology of dress, for it was most unfitting for a lady supposed to have the maturity of an aunt to pass strictures on the too revealing costumes of the girls—which, by the way, didn't deserve the reproach—while she herself wore a very décolleté and closely entwined costume which looked like that of a professional vamp.

Mr. Hugh Metcalf played a rather weak and unreasonable father satisfactorily, and Messrs. Hoagland and Tyrone gave that clever little touch of comedy to the characters represented that made them stand out in due relief, while Fred Manley was satisfactory as a rather conventionally staid rural character.

The piece is light; doesn't aim to be anything else; and the moral is rather too obvious for this sophisticated era. But it was written to entertain, and in that it thoroughly succeeds because as a playwright Rachel Crothers is a well-trained entertainer, and because the personnel of the company is just right.

A LOST OPPORTUNITY.

It is, in my opinion, most regrettable that a skilled and intellectually sympathetic representation of Ossip Dymow's psychologically subtle drama, "Nju," should not have attracted the attention or received the support of the intellectual minority who wish to keep abreast of modern drama.

True, the majority of newspaper criticisms were adverse, but what is surprising is that a play that had had runs in the capitals of Europe should not have at least appealed to the curiosity of the more discriminating.

The company that represented the piece is largely professional, Evelyn Vaughan's and William Rainey's work in "The First Fifty Years" being of a merit to inspire full confidence, quite aside from the past achievements of these favorites.

"Nju" ran a week. It is a play that challenges the artistic intelligence of both players and spectators because of the depths of its thoroughly modern psychology.

It was not written to please sentimentalists, but to depict two men and a woman in the grip of the master passion, and to show how primitive love works when its instinctive outflow is complicated by the demands made by civilization and the social and moral code.

The conventionalist can not but be startled by the strange woman's ruthless breaking of her bonds, the moralist by the lover's serene belief that the world, and all the women who please him, are his oysters. The husband alone inspires general sympathy.

But Dymow is one of those sombre Russians whose tendency to a cynical acceptance of the unsentimentality of human beings when they want hard enough is thoroughly national. There is no sunshine in his mental make-up as there is in Tchekov's, purely modern though the latter is. Tchekov reveals the faults and foibles of the national character humorously, but lovingly. Dymow, with a strange mixture of baffling reserve and stark simplicity, shows his characters working out their destiny. Those who like the drama to be writ in the large and childish print suitable for babes to read would not care for "Nju," because the author does not tell everything.

In that he bears some resemblance to Joseph Conrad, who is not loved by the literal, but who is adored by those who sympathize with his adherence to the method of real living, in which we often have to feel our way in the twilight, exercise our intuitions, join our stray gleams of surmise together, and then not positively know.

Each to his taste, therefore. It is perfectly comprehensible that the many would not care for "Nju." A tenderly loving mother would be outraged by the mother's desertion of her child, a faithful wife by her cold resistance to her husband's importunings.

But, whether or not the author sympathized with her—and of course he did—she is most challenging to the interest of those who are curious about the psychology of other peoples.

Æsthetically, emotionally, ethically, Evelyn Vaughan made her most interesting; William Rainey grew into the character during the week, and gave it with greater ease and with a touch of the necessary worldliness, Ben Erway gave an extremely sympathetic portrayal of the anguished husband, and just when a strange, fascinating, unusual dramatic representation was in a state of high polish it had to be withdrawn.

However, I rather imagine that the players derived keen artistic pleasure from the representation, in spite of the lack of support. There is so much that is banal and crassly obvious on the stage. But there is little in "Nju" that is obvious. Even the grim humor and bitter irony of the final scene would probably affront the more homely or more literal spectator, who likes characters to be folksy and everydayish, and who prefers that humor should be open and frolicsome instead of grim.

Dymow's stage technique—and, by the way, the play was directed and staged with notable intelligence—is sui generis. He has a scorn for the theatrical curtain, and his simplest effects are used in closing each scene. But on occasion his diction rises to eloquence and beauty, while always retaining its expressive simplicity.

Really, I could almost find it in my heart to be sorry for those unenterprising ones who would have appreciated "Nju," but who have lost an opportunity to see a play that has won honors in Europe and a performance that did justice to it. One also in which Evelyn Vaughan in the series of graceful and exotically beautiful costumes that so fittingly enshrined Nju's mystic and baffling charm gave a portrayal that rose to real distinction.

ORPHANS IN PARIS.

France is a nation that is popularly regarded as the country-seat of reason; there being no other people so clearly, coolly logical as the French. And yet here is a popular outbreak in a motion-picture house in Paris over "Orphans of the Storm."

It must be caused by a residue of the emotionalism left by the storm. Other peoples—notably the Germans and the Americans—have since the war snatched eagerly at such gayeties as will offer surcease of sorrow; although we can but admit that in America we have much less to forget than any other of the nations involved.

But France is still sad, and bitter in the extreme against all who will not acknowledge the extent of her injuries and the righteousness of her demands.

The "Orphans," of course, have nothing to do with war devastation, but the wrath which made Parisian spectators boil over when the first production of the picture was made in Paris has its roots in the devastated territory of northern France.

The young men who started the disturbance in the theatre by hotly protesting against what they conceived to be an attack on the general character of the Bourbon régime, as depicted in the picture, were supported by almost the entire audience. The press took it up, and to the stupefaction of the producers, they suddenly found themselves floundering in a very lively kettle of fish.

Whether the fish will turn out to be whales does not yet appear, but the incident is too much in the nature of that attending the first performances in America of Synge's famous "Playboy of the Western World." Irish auditors conceived it to be an attack on Irish character, and of course all Irish lovers of a shindy joyfully hastened to see the play and to join in the row.

As quickly, however, as the disturbance boiled and bubbled up it simmered down. And no doubt, after the present matter has been threshed out in the Paris press by more reasonable-minded editors, the volatile public will forget all about it, and go to see the play in great numbers.

The joke of the thing is that while the Parisian youth who incited the hostile demonstration were wrathful because the French ruling class of the era represented in the picture were held up to reproach, in America, when "Orphans of the Storm" first came out, the labor press went for Mr. Griffith because in reproaching mob rule he was, they asserted, upholding capitalists.

By this time, no doubt, the whole fuss is over and done with. It certainly is a tempest in a teapot, and is not founded on genuine sentiments. Mr. Griffith, when the matter was drawn to his attention, very reasonably pointed out that in the picture the cruelties of the Terror were greatly softened for artistic reasons, and that Charles Dickens made the account of the oppression of the ruling class much stronger in his "Tale of Two Cities," upon which famous work Mr. Griffith drew for the majority of his incidents depicting the Terror.

It is certainly curious that in a once great militaristic empire that has become a republic, and that has successfully held monarchy at bay for over fifty years, even a small group of people could succeed in stirring up a large audience against a play which was more particularly on the side of the people, and which, furthermore, so carefully skirted the danger point; for it will be remembered that while it showed up the martyrdom of the plain people it also exhibited the fearful perils attending mob rule; and while it depicted the ruthless cruelties of the aristocrats it elevated to the post of hero of the play a humane young scion of an aristocratic family; which does not seem to leave the disturbers a leg to stand on.

THE FARRAR CONCERT.

Geraldine Farrar has sung in concert on a previous occasion in San Francisco; but it is probable that she will on this visit attract much larger audiences. It could scarcely be mere curiosity to see her, that emotion having been amply gratified during her appearances in grand opera last fall, when her unprecedented drawing power greatly lessened the financial losses attending an unsuccessful season; unsuccessful, indeed, only on the nights when she did not appear.

But San Franciscans have discovered that Miss Farrar is, supremely, an artist; and though her dramatic gifts almost outshine her powers as a vocalist, she is, too, in her vocalism greatly the artist. She has not, perhaps, a really great voice, but she can convey so much emotion with a comparatively light vehicle—for grand opera, at least—that she wins a like response. And as the air lady has a voice of sweetness and thrilling emotional expression, and the beauty which reinforces her artistic gift, it is probable that many San Franciscans who have already heard her once or twice will be eager to repeat the pleasure; more especially as Miss Farrar had in contemplation at one time the idea of renouncing further vocal triumphs and going into purely dramatic work.

JOSEPHINE HART PHELPS.

Miss Mary Hoyt Wiborg's negro play, "Taboo," has been successfully produced by Mrs. Patrick Campbell in Edinburgh and is scheduled for London. In New York it was not highly spoken of and murmurs have been heard against the local critics, says the New York Times. The following fact is cited as a warning to playwrights: In one place Miss Wiborg repeated a "cue" word further along in the dialogue, with the result that the actress, when she came to it, went back and repeated the entire stretch of dialogue between. This happened again and again. It was as if a squirrel, leaping freely from limb to limb, should suddenly find himself running in a cage. The whole play was held up in a circular whirl of dialogue until the other actor in the scene altered the second cue and thus liberated the bewildered squirrel. If the critics found the play verbose and repetitious, whose fault was it? In England apparently Miss Wiborg "minded her p's"—and especially her cues.

Germans are rioting because of the high cost of living. It does not seem to reduce it.

ESMOND'S

"THE CAKE SHOP"

253 Grant Ave.

We offer a large variety of pies, cakes and pastries—all of the highest quality and flavor.

"ECCLÉS CAKES" Our Specialty

The Place with an "atmosphere"

WHILE delicacy and distinctiveness (accompanied by exceptional moderation in price) characterize every dish prepared, the latest achievement, "The Chef's Special" may be described as the final explanation of the front place occupied by the

Pig'n Whistle

"Where good digestion waits on appetite"

33 POWELL ST. NEAR MARKET SAN FRANCISCO
130 POST ST. NEAR GRANT
511 FOURTEENTH STREET, OAKLAND

FOYER AND BOX-OFFICE.

The Columbia Theatre.

The Rachel Crothers comedy-drama, "Nice People," is meeting with well-deserved success at the Columbia Theatre, where next Monday night it will enter upon the second week of its stay.

The next Columbia Theatre attraction will be John Golden's production of "3 Wise Fools," with Thomas Wise as the star of the cast. This comedy won a distinct success here last season.

John Golden's prescription for theatre patrons is laughter and plenty of it. He has kept this in mind when producing all his successes, "Lightnin'," "Turn to the Right," "The First Year," "Dear Me," "Thank-U," and "3 Wise Fools." In the latter comedy laughter predominates, although there is a pretty romance woven in with a lot of mystery. The play is by Austin Strong, a Californian.

The Wizard Returns.

Once again will Kibosh, the Persian magician, who is sentenced to relieve Egypt of drought by causing the Nile to rise, stalk the boards, and once again will Ferris Hartman bring out the well-known "gag-line" and the topical song when the Hartman-Steindorff season of comic opera gets under way at the Rivoli Opera House Monday evening, October 2d, with a revival of Victor Herbert's melodious favorite, "The Wizard of the Nile."

Advance indications are that the atmosphere that surrounded the old Tivoli days will be re-created as far as it is humanly possible. Hundreds of patrons of the old Tivoli have reserved seats for the week, and to lend the exact touch of local color a bar (Volsteadian in character) has been erected in the rear of the house and a search is now under way for some of the old bar attendants of former times.

In many ways the choice of "The Wizard of the Nile" as the opening bill is regarded as a happy one. The piece has received the highest number of preferences in the voting contest which is being carried on for the purpose of determining the operas to be played, and it affords a splendid opportunity for the introduction of the members of the Hartman-Steindorff organization to theatre-goers. The comedy is of the situation kind which gives Hartman an opportunity to scintillate, the chorus numbers are pretty and frequent, and the solos and the duets contain some of the most popular melodies in the realm of lighter music.

The piece, it will be remembered, introduced the one-time popular line, "Am I Wiz?" and the topical song, "Dreaming," which swept the country.

The painters, decorators, and carpenters who have been engaged in remodeling the Rialto Theatre for the past two weeks have completed their work and the house, which will be formally rechristened the Rivoli Opera House, has been converted into one of the most attractive in the city. Among the improvements have been the remodeling of the interior, the extension of the stage, and the installation of new chairs, new drapes, and new hangings.

Excellent acoustic properties have always been a feature of the house and the announcement is made that each seat commands an unobstructed view of the stage. The size of the theatre gives it the degree of intimacy essential to the proper enjoyment of comic opera.

Features which will mark the season will be the revival of standard comic opera in accordance with the preferences of the patrons expressed at the box-office, season tickets enabling music lovers to take advantage of every production at reduced rates, exceptional musical interpretation of the scores of the operas by Paul Steindorff, choragus of the University of California, and a selected symphonic orchestra, capable comedians, talented singers, a singing beauty chorus and "newart" scenery by Harry Tyler and his wife, Bertha, protégés of Joseph Urban and Maxfield Parrish.

The cast of principals includes Lavinia Wynne, well-known San Francisco actress, with experience in grand and comic opera; John Van, tenor, heralded by Hartman and Steindorff as a distinct "find"; Edna Malone, a charming little dancer who has built up a state-wide reputation by her work; Hazel Van Halten, Rafael Brunetto, Robert Carlson, and George Kunkel, who is coming from New York to act as associate comedian with Hartman.

The Orpheum Next Week.

In a dramatic playlet entitled "The Unknown," Henry B. Walthall, star of motion pictures, will open his Orpheum tour. He has been a movie favorite ever since his exquisite portrayal of "The Little Colonel" in "The Birth of a Nation."

Karyl Norman, "The Creole Fashion Plate," has proved a great attraction.

"Doc" Baker is a lightning change artist, and with him is a company of beautiful girls in a production called "Flashes." The novelty of a revue built around a protean artist is enough to insure entertainment.

Chic Yorke and Rose King are giving new life to the old family tintype. Mr. Yorke has a droll manner and Miss King sings prim ditties.

Fisher and Gilmore are a sophisticated Juliet and a boob in a snappy skit, "Her Bashful Romeo." It is a speedy, lively farce.

No more witty or refreshing monologist has ever been on the Orpheum Circuit than the solemn Senator Ford.

Smith and Strong charm their audiences with their "Golden Voices from the Golden West."

Herbert and Dare are graceful gymnasts.

At the Paul Elder Gallery

Lieutenant-Colonel Charles Wellington Furlong, fellow of the Royal Geographical Society, explorer, author, and soldier, will visit San Francisco to lecture in the Paul Elder Gallery, Saturday afternoon, October 7th, at 2:30 o'clock. His subject will be "The Passing of the Old West," in which he tells the story of the range life now all but disappearing. He will show a colored screen panorama of the early cattle country and the cowboys at their range sports in the annual round-up.

Other events scheduled for the Paul Elder Gallery will be the lecture by Sukumar Chatterji on the "Literary Heritage of the Hindus," to be given Tuesday afternoon, October 3d, at 2:30 o'clock; and a review of W. J. Locke's latest novel, entitled "The Tale of Triona," by Raine Bennett, dated for Thursday afternoon, October 5th, at 2:30 o'clock.

BORN TO THE STAGE.

In writing of heredity, the word "environment" pops up as quickly and as inevitably as does the far end of a see-saw when, with firmness and conviction, you plant yourself on the other, says Alexander Woolcott in the North American Review. It is difficult always to say of any player that he was born with his talent, since, just because he was born in the theatre, he wandered early upon the stage, and so was bent and shaped to its needs while he was young. One does not have to be a profound student of the stage to see the tremendous advantage that is held on it by those who begin their work there so early in life that they are as unconscious of it as of the air they breathe and of the sun that warms us all. They are growing up in the theatre in the precious years when the rest of us are outside, not only not learning how to act, but, by every experience and precept and taboo of the breakfast-table and the sidewalk and the schoolyard, are busily learning not to act at all.

Consider for a moment the most beautiful art which the theatre of our time has known, the incomparable art of Eleanora Duse. Her biographical note in "Who's Who in the Theatre" starts off with the single, significant line, "Born of strolling players." Are we to find the explanation of her art in that fact? Or is there no need to go back of the mere fact that she went on the stage as a baby, so young that by the time she was seven she was experienced enough to take over the post of prompter, and by the time she was sixteen she had had enough training to play the foremost rôles; enough, at least, to play Juliet in a production at Verona. Sixteen and playing Juliet at Verona! The next Vassar girl who writes down in April to Mr. Belasco that every one is so good as to call her pretty and that they did all admit she was perfectly splendid as Tweneen in "The Admirable Crichton," and that she is only twenty-one, and please would he take her under his instruction and make a star of her some day—such a one might well receive back from him just a little engraved card with this legend on it: "When she was sixteen, Duse played Juliet at Verona!"

That biographical note of hers, so rare in its bluntness among the more pretentious paragraphs which are carefully and sometimes cryptically edited to adorn such records, might, as a matter of fact, be written after most of our best names in the theatre. Minnie Maddern Fiske, E. H. Sothern, Maude Adams—born of showfolks and born while those folks were on tour. That was why it was possible for Maude Adams to make her first appearance on the stage at the age of nine months—her first entrance was on a platter—and why when little Minnie Maddern made her New York debut at the age of four it was as an actress who, though the advertisements of the time mendaciously announced it as her first appearance on any stage, had already played a dozen rôles in as many towns and simply reeked of experience.

THE GALLERY AND THE GODS.

The Equity Players announce that during their season at the Forty-Eighth Street Theatre they will charge only half a dollar for gallery seats, even on Saturday night, and that for Tuesday matinee the price will be a quarter, says the New York Times. This is not a philanthropic move; it is a pure matter of business. At the price of a seat in the motion-picture palaces, the Olympus of the gallery is empty. But will the gods return? Most managers now build theatres with no gallery, believing that the old gods have passed beyond even a Wagnerian twilight.

If true, this is a pity. More than a high seat is comprised in true godhead. Wisdom

COMIC OPERA LOVERS

We are reproducing below a card so arranged that you may let us know what comic operas you would like to have us revive during our season at the Rivoli Opera House (formerly the Rialto Theatre) at Market and Seventh Streets, and also an application blank for season tickets which will enable you to see all of our productions at reduced prices.

We ask that you kindly clip and send in to us at the theatre at your earliest possible convenience. Our season will start Monday, October 2d.

FERRIS HARTMAN PAUL STEINDORFF

Place a cross opposite the twelve operas you prefer in the following list. If we have omitted any of your favorite operas add them to the list.

- "The Idol's Eye"
- "Woodland"
- "Chimes of Normandy"
- "Wizard of the Nile"
- "Robin Hood"
- "The Chocolate Soldier"
- "Babes in Toyland"
- "The Wedding Day"
- "The Toy Maker"
- "When Johnny Comes Marching Home"
- "Belle of New York"
- "Madame Sherry"
- "Wang"
- "Mlle. Modiste"
- "The Red Mill"
- "The Serenade"
- "Rip Van Winkle"
- "The Mascot"
- "The Highwayman"
- "The Geisha"
- "Sho-Gun"
- "Fortune Teller"
- "Boccaccio"
- "Bohemian Girl"
- "Maritana"
- "King Dodo"
- "The Campus"
- "El Capitan"
- "Love Tales of Hoffman"
- "Fra Diavolo"
- "Erminie"
- "Pinafore"
- "Katinka"
- "Maytime"
- "Pom Pom"
- "Mikado"
- "Olivette"

For the season of Comic Opera to be given at the RIVOLI OPERA HOUSE (formerly the Rialto), Market near 7th, by FERRIS HARTMAN and PAUL STEINDORFF, a book of twelve (12) tickets will be sold for ten (10) dollars. These tickets to be exchanged for the best reserved seats for any performance.

I subscribe for the number of books opposite my name below.

Name .....

Address .....

No. of Books.....

and its sportive child, wit, were attributed to the gallery of old. During the first crucial weeks of a run, manager and playwright rubbed their bald spots against the ceiling as they watched for the authentic verdict there on high. On Olympus was felt the first warm breeze of success, the first blast of failure. It is true that the gallery was conservative, scorning strange arts and new delights. When have the gods not been so? But their hearts were at one with established canons. Many of them were children and received there the training in fundamentals that qualified them later as steady and acute patrons in the lower theatre levels. The gallery was at once a citadel of tradition and a source of progress. If it has passed, the theatre is permanently poorer.

This is the day of the equalitarian—of the sort of equality, that is, which demands for everybody the material best. What matter if one slumbers first class, in a luxuriously upholstered chair. What profits the art of the theatre if the aroused consciousness sits apart, in a world remote from the temporal vale of bliss? It is the same throughout the world of a new democracy.

In Paris Romain Rolland, with certain of his fellows in the love of poor humanity, set up a People's Theatre in which plays of Molière and Corneille and Shakespeare were interspersed with advanced compositions of their own. Once or twice workmen came with their families. But they were neither allured by low prices nor flattered by having a theatre dedicated to their class. As Rolland sadly concedes, the poor of today set small store by the treasures of the spirit. They prefer to mingle with the bourgeoisie—into the world of which, as suggested by the more luxurious house and pictured upon the silver screen, they firmly intend to rise.

The Catacombs of Cypress Lawn

Comparable with the luxurious tombs of ancient Egyptian kings, yet within the means of people of moderate circumstances.

A stone edifice, highly artistic in appearance, containing a magnificent chapel. Eleven Tomb Rooms, 425 Crypts.

Cypress Lawn Cemetery Association

Phone Douglas 4772 995 Market St.

MOST BEAUTIFUL

Rota-Gravure Section

in the world

Published Each Sunday

by the

San Francisco Chronicle

ONLY

$5.20

a

Year

Including Every Sunday Feature of the CHRONICLE

COLUMBIA THEATRE

Leading Playhouse of the West

Geary at Mason Phone Franklin 150

Second Week Begins Monday, Oct. 2

Matinees Wednesday and Saturday

MARY NEWCOMB

In Rachel Crothers' Comedy-Drama

"NICE PEOPLE"

Delightful Performance of a Delightful Play

TICKETS NOW!

At Sherman, Clay & Co.'s Music Stores, Fresno, Sacramento, Oakland, San Francisco

For CONCERTS

GERALDINE

FARRAR

Oct. 5th—Fresno Municipal Auditorium.

Oct. 6th—Oakland Auditorium Theatre.

Oct. 8th—San Francisco New Curran Theatre.

Oct. 9th—Sacramento State Armory.

Management FRANK W. HEALY

MATINEES 25 and 50c

DAILY EVENINGS 25c TO $1.25

Except Sats., Suns. and Holidays

ALWAYS A GREAT SHOW

SMOKING PERMITTED IN DRESS

CIRCLE AND LOGES

VANITY FAIR.

The cartoonists have neglected a change that has been creeping over one of their favorite characters of late. John Bull is still represented in the papers with his old upholstering of adipose tissue, whereas he should look shrunken and weakened from all his troubles, slack in the "westkit" and the waistband of his trousers, chap-fallen, spindling and pathetic, and bewildered, as though some one had sat on his hat. He has had much to worry him of late, and one of his pressing troubles is anxiety about the shrinkage not so much of his middle as of his middle class. It may be remembered that Robinson Crusoe's father highly commended to his restless son the advantages of the middle station of English life. It is to be questioned if he would do so now. It is in danger at the top and at the bottom. It appears that the British laboring man no longer aspires to rise into the middle class, being content to consume its substance with his beer, in wages operating through the high cost of living, and to have the politicians take what is left in the form of taxes—which the war would have done to an alarming extent anyway. But the members of the middle class have not ceased to aspire to the upper class, and it has been the policy of Lloyd George's government to promote a tremendous number of them—the successful brewers, distillers, manufacturers, journalists, even butchers and bakers and brokers; "city men" in general. This process of baling out the middle class at the top had always before been offset by recruits at the bottom. It is so recruited no longer, but the baling-out process has been accelerated by every evil necessity of British politics in these particularly evil times. And, most significant of all, the middle-class birth-rate has fallen. Fewer marriages are contracted, and what with the taxes and the high cost of living, an abnormal percentage of these prove sterile through the shifts and restraints of domestic caution. The British middle may be willing to be led to the altar, but he draws the line at becoming a father any more numerous than he can help. Thus the pillars of empire broaden at the base, and flower at the top, but in the centre they are being drawn down to a perilous tenuity. Lloyd George should try picking out a few able but recalcitrant lords and demoting them into manufacturers and skilled capitalists as a proper support of the English social order.

Some of these long skirts have a curious effect when suddenly encountered: they look as though the waistband had broken, and one wonders what will happen next.

In France the female ankle is ceasing to be an object of admiration and becoming an object of solicitude. The theory of the fussers and worriers is that women have so long gone without the support of boots that they have contracted a sort of simulated elephantiasis. This is especially apparent among those that eat too well and so put added burdens on the lower extremities. It gives them a tendency to "upset," or mushroom, just above the slipper top, which tends to disappear in an annular fold of soft flesh. It is now proposed by the Paris style-smiths to equip women with boots, not merely to conceal the ankle, but to restore its recent properly converging lines of grace and beauty. The tanners are taking notice of a probable doubling of the demand for leather. For those that have retained the well-turned lower joint there are to be open-work boots, cut out, with the hose showing. They have appeared in San Francisco and look sufficiently ridiculous to attract the most charming women.

Among her other conventions, San Francisco has been enjoying a meeting of dance teachers on the roof of a leading hotel. New steps have been introduced into this peculiar form of locomotion that are guaranteed to make the stepper as graceful as a sea-gull. There is a tango fox trot, as though the old one were not strenuous enough for bald and short-winded persons. There was the Tire Bouchon, said to represent a corkscrew, in spite of what Mr. Volstead has done about persons that use such things. There was also a Volstead waltz, probably suggesting the gyrations of a thirsty soul who had indulged in wood alcohol. Perhaps frail humanity could not have stood prohibition and this new agony at the same time. But it has all been overshadowed and diminished by a new sort of shiver dance introduced by the Shah of Persia at Deauville. We have not been supplied with plans and specifications of this fresh convulsion of nature, but understand that it surpasses anything ever seen in any Persian harem since Thais touched a match to Persepolis. Up in Canada, however, the Indians will tolerate no such doings. Chief Redhatchet, who leads the band on Walpole Island, Ontario, is putting his foot down hard on those squaws whose supple shoulders imitate the human orchids of Broadway, and those bucks who have been learning the ways of the cabarets. He says the luring, teasing invitations of the saxophone are merely the artfully modulated challenge of the amorous bull moose, and shall not seduce his people from the old sun dance and ghost dance that had to suffice for their ancestors. "Once," says the chief, "they were satisfied with an ordinary band. Now they want bad music. They want to dance all night, and next day nobody wants to work." Which shows that the American Indian is our blood brother after all.

Mrs. Ganna Walska McCormick has lately been at Karlsbad taking the cure. A great many persons take the cure there without taking the trouble to inform an anxious world for what, but in this case we are told for what—it is for weight. She is said to have lost twelve pounds in six days, which looks bad for Mr. McCormick. That lady evidently means business. Mr. McCormick has also been taking the cure, but with more probability of making the weight. They have occupied separate training camps, but have pursued much the same method. Mrs. Ganna's second, or at least training adviser, appears to be Elinor Glynn. The régime recommended has included rising at 9 o'clock, drinking two quarts of water, taking some mud baths, with massage, road work, dry sweats, a glass of water, and then to bed. Neither is to worry. But the odds are on Mrs. Ganna, provided she can keep it up. She is still heavy, but her wallop is harder. When Brady was informed that Casey had married a woman who weighed 250 pounds, he said: "The damn coward! He knows no woman can fight at that weight." Mrs. McCormick should soon be ready for the ring.

A special dispatch to the New York Herald says: "The average Frenchwoman pays for her clothes today three times as much as they cost before the war, according to figures which have just been compiled. Whereas in 1913 it cost 5500 francs a year it now requires 15,000 francs, and this only allowing for necessities. A tailored costume which formerly cost 250 francs now sells at 700; two street dresses which cost 600 francs each nine years ago now cost 1300; two evening dresses cost 3200 each against 1000 in 1913; shoes have doubled in price and lingerie is three times its pre-war cost. Women of the moderate class of dressers who before the war could manage to dress on 2000 francs a year by transforming and renewing their out-of-style garments now find 10,000 insufficient. It is this type of Parisienne who although employing winter trimmings on summer hats must still pay 500 francs for ordinary lingerie and 80 francs for very ordinary stockings."

In Tibet the women are under no legal disabilities whatever. If there is no son, the eldest daughter inherits the paternal estate, and she then has the privilege of marrying one man at a time and of retaining him as husband as long as she pleases. To get rid of him no formality is necessary. Though he can not leave her except for gross misconduct, she can put him out of doors on small provocation or none at all.

There are now 253 treaties recorded with the League of Nations.

TIPPERS AND "NEITHERS"

Stories of chalk marks being made on baggage and threads tied to coats by hotel attendants to indicate persons who do not give tips, says a London correspondent of the New York Herald, fade to insignificance beside the experience of a well-known London man whose wife received the following letter from the head waiter of a famous northern resort hotel where they stayed for a vacation:

"Dear Madam: I trust you will excuse me for taking the liberty of writing, but since your departure I have received urgent requests from my staff to take up the matter, but before doing so I feel it my duty to let you know before taking action. Your husband left without leaving any gratuities to any of the staff, which is a most disgraceful thing for a man of his standing—your friends you left behind think the same. Anyhow after seven days from your departure from this hotel I feel it to be my duty to forward your names to my club and association so that every hotel in England, Ireland, Scotland and Wales may know your name and the ungenerous way you treated the above hotel staff.—Yours faithfully, Head Waiter."

The recipient of the letter explained that no tips were paid because the husband and wife each thought that the other had attended to the matter. The letter, which was written on the hotel's stationery, was promptly returned to the management, which extended a profound apology.

Inquiries in many quarters in London failed to reveal the existence of anything like an organized tip-extorting system of which the head waiter hinted. The head of the union of both British and foreign waiters laughed when asked if such a system existed. "There is no need of asking that," a well-known hotel waiter said to the New York Herald correspondent. "We are pretty well able to tell the unpunished man, as you say in New York, when we see him."

He admitted, however, that there was much changing back and forth among waiters and hotel servants in the same district, and a persistent non-tipper was sure to suffer in the service he got. The practice extends, not only to fashionable and expensive hotels, but to many popular-priced restaurants—many in which the non-tip rule is emblazoned on all menus, with the notation that the penalty for accepting tips is dismissal.

"Neither" is what the waiters call the non-tippers here, and the word is rapidly passed when one of them enters. A. S. Haller, secretary of the Union of Helvetia, the largest hotel and servants' organization in the world, said it would be folly to organize such a system as that waiter's letter hints at, for it would be too expensive and at the same time probably libelous.

"No tips at all is the answer to the problem," said one of the managers of Joseph Lyons, Ltd., a firm operating a chain of tea shops, restaurants, and hotels where the non-tip rule prevails. "The public should realize that thousands of servants, particularly the British, dislike the tipping system altogether. We have a constant waiting list of those who seek posts in our non-tipping establishments. The head waiter should have been reported to the Hotel Proprietors' Association. They would have taken action to sharpen the supervision of his employers."

The New York Herald correspondent discussed the tipping system with scores of Americans a few days ago—tourists who have sampled both the ordinary system and the system prevailing in Italy and some parts of France, where 10 to 15 per cent. is added to the bills in lieu of tips and no other tips are expected. Though many favor the latter system, more experienced travelers prefer the old method because, they say, they find that when a fixed percentage is added to the bill they have to give small gratuities anyway in order to obtain better attention. Few Americans, however, report anything like persecution when they fail to tip either through inadvertence or because they have not received good service.

Foreign Decorations.

Hereafter foreign decorations presented to members or former members of the army must be tendered through the State Department and their delivery authorized by special act of Congress, says the Washington Star. This action is made necessary by the War Department, due to the expiration of the limit of the statute which authorized members of the army of the United States to receive military decorations from the powers with which our government was associated during the world war.

The War Department has conferred 7812 decorations, of which 703 were presented to members of foreign armies and civilians, and 17,787 foreign decorations have been awarded to the personnel of the United States Army, members of American welfare organizations, and American citizens connected with the American and Allied armies and interallied commissions.

In a West African village the sight of a white man fills the infant with terror.

BALFOUR, GUTHRIE &amp; CO.

SAN FRANCISCO AND LOS ANGELES,
PORTLAND, SEATTLE, TACOMA,
AND VANCOUVER.

MERCHANTS

EXPORTERS AND IMPORTERS
MARINE AND FIRE INSURANCE
AVERAGE ADJUSTERS

Agents of

HARRISON DIRECT LINE OF STEAMERS
TO AND FROM EUROPEAN PORTS
and
COMMONWEALTH GOVERNMENT LINE

Redwood Export Company

California Redwood
Lumber and Ties

Cargoes and Parcels

"To off shore markets only"

260 CALIFORNIA STREET
SAN FRANCISCO, CALIF.

Phone Sutter 2163

UNION LUMBER CO.

CROCKER BUILDING

SAN FRANCISCO, CALIFORNIA

MANUFACTURERS and WHOLESALE

— OF —

REDWOOD LUMBER
RAILROAD TIES
TELEGRAPH POLES
SHINGLES

— AND —

SPLIT REDWOOD PRODUCTS

E. C. EVANS &amp; SONS, Inc.

(Established 1881)

STEAMSHIP AGENTS

SHIP AND INSURANCE BROKERS

260 California Street, San Francisco
Phone Douglas 8040 Cable Address "DEWGRIP"

GENERAL PETROLEUM CORPORATION

Offices at

SAN FRANCISCO LOS ANGELES
Alaska Commercial Bldg. Higgins Bldg.

HAMMOND
LUMBER COMPANY
260 CALIFORNIA ST.
REDWOOD, DOUGLAS FIR
AND PILING

THE CHARLES NELSON CO.

MANUFACTURER and WHOLESALE

of

REDWOOD, DOUGLAS FIR,
SPRUCE, HEMLOCK,
SUGAR & WHITE PINE.
CEDAR SHINGLES & POLES.
230 California St. San Francisco

Geo. E. Billings Roy C. Ward Geo. B. Dinsmore
J. C. Muessdorffer Jas. W. Dean

GEO. E. BILLINGS CO.

ALL FORMS OF INSURANCE
EFFECTED

312 California St., San Francisco, Cal.
Phone—Douglas 6400

BONESTELL &amp; CO. PAPER

The paper used in printing the Argonaut is
furnished by us
CALIFORNIA'S LEADING PAPER HOUSE
118 to 124 First Street, corner Minna,
San Francisco

Argonaut subscribers may have the paper
sent regularly to their out-of-town address
during the vacation season promptly on request.

"Travel Without Trouble"

COOK'S TRAVEL SERVICE

World wide—Complete—Efficient

Inclusive Tours for Individual Travel
arranged, to start any day by
any route.

Explanatory circular on request

THOS. COOK & SON
(Est. 1841)

Agents for the best lines for travel by
Land, Water or Air

128 SUTTER STREET

(COOK'S BUILDING) Phone Kearny 3512

LAKE TAHOE
THE SCENIC DAYLIGHT WAY

Round
Trip Only $16.50

Leave San Francisco 7:20 a.m.

Lunch Placerville

Arrive Lake Tahoe 6:00 p.m.

SAN FRANCISCO-
SACRAMENTO R. R.
AND PIERCE-ARROW STAGE

Press Clippings

Are money-makers for Contractors, Supply
Houses, Business Men and
Corporations

ALLEN'S PRESS CLIPPING BUREAU
Phone Douglas 5119 121 Second Street

STORYETTES.

Grave and Gay, Epigrammatic and Otherwise.

A story dating back to the war is of the little shop on the Bowery with a large service flag decorated by thirty-eight stars. Passers-by occasionally inquired, "Surely you haven't lost thirty-eight members in your family?" "No," was the serene retort. "Worse than that. Customers."

The partners, who were financiers, suspected the office-boy of tampering with the petty cash. One of them wished to send for the police. The other, a more moderate man, was inclined to take a human view of the situation. "No, no," he said deliberately. "After all, we began in a small way ourselves."

Angel Valentine, lady of color, cooked for a San Francisco family. One day she approached the daughter of the household with a piece of shoestring. "Oh, Miss Annie," she said beseechingly, "I got such a misery in mah hair! Won't you take an' tie up mah top hair? Tie it up jes' ez tight ez you kin—mah palate's fallin' down."

The nervous patient, about to have gas administered, anxiously inquired, "Will it make me sick, doc?" "Not at all," replied the anesthetician. "How long will it be before I know anything?" was his last question, as the mask was adjusted. Probably the gas mercifully shut off the doctor's retort. "Aren't you asking a good bit of the anesthetist?"

Two sailors got into a discussion over the exact definition of a heifer. One claimed that a heifer belonged to the hog family, the other that it was a variety of sheep. They decided to refer the question to a disinterested critic. "Bill," they asked the boatswain, "what's a heifer? We're having an argument." Bill bit off a large chew reflectively. "To tell you the truth, mates, I dunno much about poultry."

The original of all the mother-in-law stories is said to be the following: As the cave man was gnawing at a bone one morning the cave woman rushed in yelling, "Quick! Get your club! Quick!" "What's the row?" growled the cave man. "Saber-tooth tiger chasing mother," gasped the cave woman breathlessly. "Oh, hell!" said the cave man. "What do I care what happens to a saber-tooth tiger?"

The head of the department of physics in a certain mid-western college was returning from his vacation. On the train he sat next a man whom he thought he knew. They drifted into a conversation and finally the professor said, "You look very familiar. I wonder if I've ever met you before." The other man smiled and said, "I think you have. I'm a student in some of your courses and I live at your house."

Samuel Gompers' favorite labor story is of Joe Gillingovitch. Joe was busily engaged smoking and watching a large building operation when the boss come up to him and said, "Want a job?" Leisuredly removing his pipe, Joe said, "I can only work in the mornings." "Why can't you work afternoons?" suspiciously demanded the boss. "In the afternoons," Joe unblushingly explained, "I have to carry a banner in the unemployed parade."

H. H. Kohlsaat tells a story corroborating the legend that Eugene Field was a cheerful debtor. William E. Curtis, of whom Field had borrowed $150 some years before, visited the poet in Chicago and reminded him of the debt. The following day Field printed this paragraph in his column: "William E. Curtis, the well-known correspondent of the Chicago Record, is in the city for a few days looking after some of his permanent investments."

A gentleman who kept two darkies to take care of his lawns and gardens observed one day that one of them was missing. "What's the matter, Mose? Hasn't George showed up this morning?" "Why, boss, doan' you all know? George, he's in de hospital!" "Hospital? How did that happen?" "Well, boss, yo' see George he's been tellin' me every day foh a week that he's gwine to lick his wife foh naggin' him. Well, yestiddy she done ovaheah him."

An actress was brought before a magistrate for speeding, and was asked by him what she was trying to do. She confessed with a smile: "I was just trying to seriously split the air." The judicial retort was: "Well, if you did it as well as you split the infinitive I think it is no more than fair for you to split a hundred-dollar bill and leave it with the court." The dazed lady paid her fine, but confided to her friends that she would not know what an infinitive was if one leaped into her car.

Senator Phelan, addressing the Commonwealth Club, illustrated his traveling propensities by the story of the Irishman who became concerned about a friend's mixture of blood. "Phwat koind of blood have yez, anyhow?" this Irishman asked. "Why," said his friend, "on my father's side I am part Portuguese, some Spanish, some Italian, and a little Dutch." "By gorra!" said the Irishman, "yer mother must have been a wonderful traveler."

The noted Chicago lawyer, Emery Storrs, attended a banquet of stock-breeders in the old Leland Hotel some thirty years ago. Called upon to speak, he said: "Gentlemen, I have listened with great interest to the merits and good qualities of the Jersey, Holstein, and other fine breeds of cattle, but as an attorney for railroads I can assure you the most valuable and highest-priced animal in the world is the offspring of an ordinary cow crossed by a locomotive."

Attorney-General Daugherty's decision that church property can not be enemy property because it is God's, recalls an incident in the career of Sam Brannan. Brannan was a Mormon and San Francisco's first millionaire. Hearing of his growing prosperity, Brigham Young sent for his tithes, saying a tenth of all he made belonged to God and must be turned in at the Tithing House in Salt Lake City. Brannan replied: "If 10 per cent. of my fortune belongs to God, let God come and get it." Brigham's arm was long, but it did not reach to San Francisco, so Brannan kept the money.

The current of the Amazon is felt 150 miles at sea; by those that are there.

THE MERRY MUSE.

Pan.

Long time agone in Arcady, across the fields of Arcady,
Strode Father Pan a-piping to the shepherds in the glade,
While fauns with roses garlanded danced gayly to his melody,
And nymphs came trooping merrily to frolic as he played.

The shepherd folk of Arcady forsook their flocks with rustic glee
To follow in the wood god's train across the scented mead.
The violets and daffodils in rhythmic time swayed lazily,
While Father Pan adown the field went piping on his reed.

But now there stands a large hotel where once were fields of asphodel,
And all night long in Arcady the blaring trombones play.
And there Pan plays the saxophone, the clarinet and traps as well,
For Father Pan, where once he ruled, plays in a cabaret.

He sways his body wearily in cadence with the melody
And dreams of Spring in Arcady—the only dreams he has.
The wild-eyed dancers leap and whirl in Corybantic revelry.
The gods are gone from Arcady and Pan is playing jazz.

—Flaccus in Life.

In Palmyra, Syria, there is a flying physician who locates and visits his patient among the wandering Bedouin tribes by means of an airplane.

Reciprocity.

According to an English funny paper a popular and talented pen-and-ink artist not long ago received the following circular from a firm of motor-car dealers: "You are cordially invited to participate in our grand £20 prize-drawing contest. Each participant may submit one or more drawings advertising our motor-cars, and the winner will receive a grand prize of £20. Drawings must be sent prepaid, they must be original, and all unsuccessful drawings will remain the property of the undersigned." Now the artist, who can scarcely be persuaded to make drawings at £20 apiece, smiled over this printed circular. Then he took a sheet of notepaper and wrote to the motor-car firm: "You are cordially invited to participate in my grand £22 prize motor-car contest. Each participant may submit one or more motor-cars, fully equipped, of his own manufacture, and the winner will receive a grand cash prize of £2 in notes. The motor-cars submitted should be brand new, and must be shipped freight prepaid. The unsuccessful motor-cars will remain the property of the undersigned."

The calendar of the Fort Washington Presbyterian Church, Broadway and Forty-Seventh Street, New York, has a paragraph which says, "Don't sleep out loud during the service."

Owners of thoroughbred horses in England are said to put spectacles on them that make the ground seem nearer so they will step high. A horse with large, horn spectacles, stepping high, would be a rare sight in a dry country.

DESTRUCTIVE "Sulpho" compounds are the cause of motor oils breaking down rapidly under engine heat. An enormous amount of money is annually lost through the presence of these unnecessary properties in oils.

Cycol will save engine owners this tremendous amount of money lost through wasted oil, wasted fuel, preventable repairs, because it is free from destructive "sulpho" compounds. These have been removed by the new Hexeon Process used exclusively by us.

When your oil contains destructive "sulpho" compounds it breaks down rapidly under engine heat. Its lubricating value becomes quickly impaired. The oil film is broken and serious damage may result.

Have your crank case thoroughly flushed—not with kerosene. Use the correct grade of Cycol as shown on the Cycol Recommendation Chart. Use Associated Gasoline. Then notice the improved performance of your motor.

ASSOCIATED OIL COMPANY
SAN FRANCISCO

CYCOL
MOTOR OIL
FREE FROM DESTRUCTIVE "SULPHO" COMPOUNDS

PERSONAL.

Social Notes.

Miss Antoinette Naglee Burk, daughter of Mrs. A. Naglee Burk, and Mr. Frederic Johannes Spruyt of Holland were married in Saratoga on Saturday, September 23d. The ceremony was held in St. John's Episcopal Church, the Rev. Dr. Collins officiating. A wedding breakfast at the country home of the Naglee Burks followed the ceremony. Attending the bride were Mrs. Millen Griffith of Ross as matron of honor, Miss Barbara Sutton, Miss Betty Gayley of Berkeley, and Mrs. Henry Swift as bridesmaids. Mr. Spruyt was attended by Mr. Gerald Francken. Mr. and Mrs. Francken came from Holland recently to attend the ceremony. Mrs. Spruyt is the granddaughter of the late General Naglee.

For Miss Betty Schmiedell, whose wedding to Mr. James Moffitt is to take place September 30th, Miss Geraldine King of Piedmont entertained at luncheon at the Francisca Club. Miss King's guests included Mrs. Marshall Madison, Mrs. Wakefield Baker, Mrs. Horace Van Sicken, Mrs. Dearborn Clark, Mrs. William Hendrickson, Jr., Miss Edith Grant, Miss Josephine Grant, Miss Mary Kennedy, Miss Frances Lent, Miss Mary Julia Crocker, Miss Hélène de Latour, Miss Margaret Buckbee, and Miss Katharine Bentley.

In the evening Miss Mary Martin gave a dinner at her Burligame home in honor of Miss Schmiedell and Mr. Moffitt.

On Friday, Miss Hélène de Latour entertained at luncheon for Miss Schmiedell at the St. Francis Hotel.

Mr. and Mrs. Herbert Hall entertained at a bridge party on Monday evening, September 25th, in honor of Miss Elva Ghirardelli and her fiancé, Mr. John Welby Dinsmore. The Piedmont home of Mr. and Mrs. Hall was the setting for the affair. The wedding of Miss Ghirardelli takes place September 30th.

Mrs. George W. Kelham was hostess at a luncheon at her Sea Cliff home on Wednesday in honor of Mrs. Frederick Sharon, who leaves for New York on October 1st. Mrs. William Mayo Newhall, Mrs. William Babcock, Mrs. Osgood Hooker, Mrs. James L. Flood, Mrs. George Harry Mendell, Jr., Mrs. William H. Taylor, and Mrs. Louis Parrott were Mrs. Kelham's guests.

Miss Mollie McBryde gave a bridge-tea last Saturday, complimenting Miss Evelyn McGaw, fiancée of Lieutenant-Commander Ellsworth Van Patten. The Francisca Club was the setting for the affair. Mrs. Bradley Wallace, Miss Virginia Chadbourne, Miss Helen Deamer, Miss Jeannette Sessions, Miss Isabelle Wheaton, Miss Cornelia Gwynn, and Miss Carol Andrews were among Miss McBryde's guests.

Mr. Milton Esberg, Jr., was host at an informal party at his Ross Valley home on Sunday. Swimming, dinner, and dancing entertained his guests, among whom were Miss Jean Howard, Miss Hélène de Latour, Miss Betsey Dibble, Miss Kathleen Bradley, Miss Isabelle Wheaton, Mr. Preston Stuart, Mr. David Pierce, Mr. Bert Innes, Mr. Robert Carson, and Mr. Jackson Kennedy.

At the Marin County home of Mr. and Mrs. William Kent at Kentfield the annual grape festival, which takes place this year on October 7th, will be held. Proceeds of the unique affair go toward maintaining the Presbyterian Orphanage in Marin County. From the sale of the grapes, attractively arranged in baskets, and the refreshments a large sum is raised annually, which together with annual contributions made at this time take care of the orphanage for a year.

On Tuesday evening, September 19th, Miss Doria Fernanda (Miss Fernanda Pratt) gave a delightful concert in the Colonial Ballroom of the St. Francis Hotel. As Miss Fernanda has been in the East for some years, much interest centered about the concert. Mrs. Charles Crocker, Mrs. Marcus Koshland, Mrs. Joseph Grant, Mrs. Charles C. Moore were among the box-holders who entertained parties of friends on the occasion.

Mrs. Robert Hays Smith was luncheon hostess to a group that included Mrs. Ross Ambler Curran, Mrs. Walter Filer, Mrs. George Cameron, and Mrs. R. Walker Salisbury at the Hotel St. Francis Monday. Mrs. Ritchie Dunn entertained Mrs. R. F. Schwerin, Mrs. Bernard W. Ford, and Miss Celia O'Connor in the Fable Room. One of the groups at luncheon included Mrs. Alexander Rutherford and Mrs. Rudolph Spreckels. Mr. and Mrs. Charles Templeton Crocker were with a small group for luncheon in the Fable Room.

Others who entertained at luncheon in the Garden of the St. Francis included Mr. and Mrs. R. J. Hannah and Miss Helen Garrett. Mrs. Abraham Haas was hostess at a dinner party for seven in her Hotel St. Francis apartments on Saturday evening, and Mrs. Henry Sinsheimer entertained a few friends at dinner on Friday evening last in her apartments.

For a Stronger Chamber.

"Make San Francisco Supreme" is the war cry of the membership campaign of the Chamber of Commerce. The campaign is an expansion movement to create a stronger chamber, and one whose membership will be representative of civic interests.

More than five hundred business and professional men have volunteered their services to bring about this increased strength, and have dedicated two hours of each day during the drive to the solicitation of memberships.

During the expansion campaign an effort will be made to acquaint San Franciscans in general with the big problems that have been faced by the chamber, and the accomplishments that have been scored.

Directors of the chamber believe that upon the success of this appeal depends much of the future growth and development of the city. It is pointed out that Los Angeles leads American cities from the standpoint of Chamber of Commerce membership based on population. The Los Angeles chamber has a membership in excess of 9000, whereas the San Francisco Chamber of Commerce barely passes the 5000 mark. It is believed that much of the present development and success of Los Angeles has been made possible through a strong and active chamber.

The goal of the present membership campaign is for 2000 additional members. Every effort will be made to exceed this quota.

At Del Monte.

Nobles and their ladies of Islam Temple of San Francisco enjoyed a delightful outing at Del Monte the past week-end. A golf tournament was the feature sport event, which provided diversion and interest for the gathering. Among those who were in attendance were High Potentate and Mrs. Ira W. Coburn, Mr. and Mrs. C. G. Gebhardt, Mr. and Mrs. H. K. McKevitt, Mr. and Mrs. J. A. Bernhard, Dr. and Mrs. H. F. Wilson, Mr. and Mrs. Phil Prather, Mr. and Mrs. H. C. Hogrefe, Mr. and Mrs. H. A. Nauman, Mr. and Mrs. C. T. Traung, Mr. and Mrs. W. G. Gilmour, Mr. and Mrs. A. E. Lorber, Mr. and Mrs. A. C. Lackenbach, Mr. and Mrs. W. T. Powell, Mr. and Mrs. C. W. Pellage, Mr. and Mrs. H. N. Wentz, Mr. and Mrs. J. A. Ferguson, Mr. and Mrs. C. H. Whitley, Mr. and Mrs. H. H. Kilp, Mr. and Mrs. H. A. Jonas, Mr. and Mrs. E. John Houston, Mr. and Mrs. E. L. West, Mr. T. L. Hill, Mr. P. C. Gerhardt, Mr. Walter Hood, Mr. A. C. Van Ness, Mr. A. W. Van Ness, Mr. W. L. Boskette, Mr. Harry Maundrell, Mr. Phil Clapp, Mr. J. L. Lewin, and Mr. Edwin Bernhardt.

The Olympic Club is coming to Del Monte next week-end for its annual fall golf tournament and outing.

Mr. and Mrs. William Reis of Pasadena are at Del Monte for a stay. Mrs. A. G. Murphy and daughter and Mrs. Carson Ricks and daughter are with their parents.

Mr. and Mrs. E. K. Boisot returned from their home in Pasadena last week and intend making a stay of another month or so at Del Monte. They spend much of their time with their daughter, Mrs. Byington Ford, who has a home at Pebble Beach.

Miss Madeleine Sisson, daughter of Mrs. Albert Sisson of San Francisco, is a guest of Mrs. Mary J. Fatjo at Pebble Beach. Miss Sisson will make a stay of a week or ten days. She will be the incentive for several dinners and teas.

Among the recent arrivals at the Del Monte Lodge are Mr. and Mrs. G. W. Hill of New York, Mr. and Mrs. J. A. Hughes of Bakersfield, Dr. and Mrs. Hartland of San Francisco, Mrs. Bertha Holt Clark, Mrs. Howard H. Lowry, Mr. and Mrs. E. A. Holt, all of Pasadena, Mr. and Mrs. W. H. Code of Hollywood, Mrs. Henry B. Capin and Miss A. M. Revue of Boston, Mr. and Mrs. James W. Harle of Coronado, Miss C. Codman, Mrs. R. Codman, and Miss C. E. Ward, all of Boston, Mr. and Mrs. T. P. Merchant of Los Angeles.

Episcopal Old Ladies' Home.

The annual reception and donation day of the Protestant Episcopal Old Ladies' Home will be held on Friday afternoon, October 6th, from 2 until 6 o'clock, at 2158 Golden Gate Avenue. This institution, which provides homes for aged gentlewomen, offers an opportunity to its friends each year, not only to assemble for a cup of tea with "the family" and the board of managers, but to bring gifts to help provision the larder for the coming year. In many cases a sum of money is left instead, all helping materially toward providing dainties for the sick and essentials for the home. Mrs. A. L. House is president of the board, the other members being Mrs. A. B. Hammond, Mrs. Seward B. McNear, Mrs. B. M. Gunn, Mrs. W. M. Fitzhugh, Mrs. N. L. Nokes, Mrs. A. S. Baldwin, Mrs. H. S. Crocker, Mrs. George Caswell, Mrs. George Reid, Mrs. John Harold Philip, Mrs. Warren D. Clark, Mrs. J. K. Armsby, and Mrs. Lewis P. Hobart.

Mills College Music Club.

The Music Club of Mills College, California, is the centre of musical activity on the campus, and the programme which it has announced for the autumn meetings promises to be of exceptional interest. French composers have been discussed. Others will be considered in the following order: October 3d, English composers; October 10th, social meeting at Mr. Carruth's studio; November 7th, Russian composers; November 21st, social evening (faculty evening); December 5th, Scandinavian composers.

A place on the membership roll of the club is open to all students in the music department theoretical branches.

The club has a fourfold purpose: it aims to promote cooperation between students and faculty of the department of music, it hopes through its monthly programmes to encourage the study of American composers, of foreign composers, ancient and modern, and of musical interpretation, appreciation, and criticism, it has supervision of musical affairs and concerts in connection with the college, and it keeps the campus informed concerning concerts, recitals, and events of musical interest taking place in the Bay region.

A Rare Monologist.

A recital which is something of a novelty is to be given by Mrs. Henry Lund, Jr., on Monday evening, October 9th, in the ballroom of the Fairmont, in which that lady will demonstrate her skill in the art of the diseuse; an art which, since Yvette Guilbert first demonstrated to Americans its power to interest and entertain, has become immensely popular in New York.

Mrs. Lund gives humorous character sketches, and impersonations of noted lights of the American stage; whose special idiosyncrasies she is able to catch and convey. For this ability the lady has won encomiums from such distinguished judges as Gertrude Atherton, the novelist, and Brock Pemberton, the well-known New York producer.

This is Mrs. Lund's first professional appearance in San Francisco, the diseuse having made her more frequent appearances in Southern California and New York, in which city she won many plaudits both from fashionable private and large public audiences.

Wanted, House Manager in

Girls' Boarding School. Household of one hundred. No other duties. Must have had training and successful experience. Salary $1,800 and home. Write in full regarding experience and references. Box H, The Argonaut.

El Encanto Hotel and Bungalows

SANTA BARBARA, CALIFORNIA.

LOCATED on the Riviera 500 feet above sea level, overlooking the city, ocean and distant islands. Street-cars within a block. Fifteen minutes to the beautiful beach, or to La Cumbre's unsurpassed Golf links. Horseback Riding over glorious mountain trails. Tennis Courts and Putting Course in hotel grounds. Purest milk, cream and butter from El Encanto Dairy. Fresh vegetables from our own gardens. Highest standard cuisine.

RATES MODERATE
Liberal discount for long stay

DEL MONTE

The Largest Resort Hotel Plant in the World Where "Thinking People" can find Recreation in Hotel del Monte's Comfort, Service and Outdoor Life. "Here every sportsman can find his chosen recreation."

TWO CHAMPIONSHIP GOLF COURSES
CARL S. STANLEY, Manager
DEL MONTE : : CALIFORNIA

San Ysidro Ranch

Furnished bungalows of various sizes; situated on the foothills among the orange groves, overlooking the sea. Central dining-room, electric lights, hot and cold water. Good tennis court. Six miles from Santa Barbara, two miles from ocean. Booklet. Address MANAGER

San Ysidro Ranch, Santa Barbara

HOTEL RAFAEL

Outdoor Life

—and comfort, too! Modern appointments and home conveniences at HOTEL RAFAEL make it possible for you to get a full measure of rest and recreation if you come here for your week-ends. 200 outside rooms; rates $1.50 per day and up. POPULAR DINNER DANCE
Saturday 8 to 12

JOSEPH'S
American Beauty Roses

This beautiful rose will be found this season exclusively in our establishment.
Phone Sutter 423 233 Grant Ave.

FLORISTS

BOND DEPARTMENT large bank has splendid opportunity for ambitious, well-educated young man. Experience not necessary. College graduate preferred. A real business education is available for young man who is willing to place opportunity before immediate remuneration. Give full particulars when answering.

Address Bond Department, care The Argonaut.

Autumn Excursions to Los Angeles

Tickets on Sale During October and November

$30.00 Round
Trip

On Sale Daily
Return Limit 4 Months

$22.50 Round
Trip

On Sale Daily
Return Limit 1 Month

The "Daylight Limited"

Will continue to operate Fridays and Saturdays, leaving Third-street Station 7:45 a.m. and arriving Los Angeles 8:45 p.m.

7 Regular Trains
Each Way Daily

Our Agents will gladly give you additional information

Southern Pacific Lines

Ferry Station

50 Post Street

Phone Sutter 4000

Third St. Station

STRINGER STORAGE COMPANY

Sutter near Fillmore
and
Steiner near Sutter

Conducting a Storage
Business Founded
in 1880

Storage--Shipping

Expert Packing, Protection
and Dispatch

A fully informed representative, anxious to give you any desired information,
will respond to your phone call.

Phone West 999

PERSONAL.

Movements and Whereabouts.

Mr. Louis Welch has gone to New York on a visit to his brother, Mr. Charles Welch, on Long Island.

Mr. and Mrs. Charles Clark Keeney are occupying the apartment of Mrs. Keeney's mother, Mrs. William Griffith Henshaw, during her absence abroad. Mr. and Mrs. Keeney expect to occupy their new home in Piedmont before winter. Mrs. Victor Maxwell (Miss Doris Crane) has returned to San Francisco from her wedding tour.

Dr. David T. Day of Washington, D. C., is in San Francisco, staying at the Palace Hotel.

Dr. Henry Suzzalo has spent his vacation in California, and is at present in town at the Clift Hotel.

Mr. and Mrs. Leo Clayburgh are again occupying their home in town, after a long absence at Lake Tahoe and Del Monte.

Mr. and Mrs. C. O. G. Miller arrived in the East last week on their return from Europe. They plan to start for San Francisco the last of September.

Mr. and Mrs. James K. Armsby are in the East at present, planning to start for California soon. Mr. and Mrs. Armsby will travel home by motor.

Mr. and Mrs. Wilbur Rice, Jr., are in San Francisco, coming from Schenectady, New York. They are at the St. Francis Hotel.

Mrs. Thomas A. Driscoll and her two sons, who have been in Santa Barbara all summer, will return to their San Mateo home the last of September.

Mrs. Herbert Payne has decided to come to California about the middle of November, instead of going to Europe, as she had originally planned.

Governor William D. Stephens was in San Francisco for a few days last week, coming to San Francisco for the first time since the primary election.

Mr. and Mrs. Herbert Fleishacker have returned to their home, after a short trip to Del Monte.

Mrs. Frederick Sharon will leave for New York the first week in October, to spend the winter there.

Mr. and Mrs. Harry Mendell are leaving the first part of October for New York and Europe, where they will spend the winter.

Mr. and Mrs. L. C. Brown are at Beresford, where they plan to be until late in September or early October.

Mrs. James Ward Keeney left last week for New York to be the guest of her son-in-law and daughter, Dr. and Mrs. George Bolling Lee.

Mrs. George Harding returned to her home in the East about two weeks ago, having spent the summer in California.

Mr. and Mrs. Melville Schweitzer have returned to their apartment in San Francisco and closed their Sonoma County home.

Mr. and Mrs. Alfred Esberg have decided to take a house in San Francisco for the winter.

Senator James D. Phelan has recently returned from a tour of the world.

Mr. and Mrs. Joseph T. Grace and Miss Geraldine Grace of Santa Rosa are spending some time in San Francisco, and are staying at the Palace Hotel.

Mrs. William Oge and her daughter, Miss Alice Oge, who have spent the summer in San Rafael as guests of Mrs. Oge's daughter, Mrs. Truxton Beale, returned during the week to their Hollywood home.

Mrs. Truxton Beale will shortly close her Marin County home and return to Washington, D. C., for the winter.

Mr. and Mrs. Talbot Walker and their small son returned during the week to their Montecito home, having come to San Francisco for a short time.

Mr. and Mrs. Henry E. Bothin expect to leave next month for their Montecito home for an extended stay. Mr. and Mrs. Bothin have spent the summer at their home at Ross Valley.

Mr. and Mrs. Samuel Pond have opened their Scott Street home for the winter.

Mr. and Mrs. L. C. Brown plan leaving about the first of the month for New York and Boston, to be away for some months.

Mrs. John Burke Murphy and her daughter, Miss Virginia Murphy, who have been visiting Mrs. Murphy's grandmother, Mrs. Augustus Rodgers, at her Broadway home, left on Saturday for Fort Leavenworth, Kansas, to join Colonel Murphy.

Mr. and Mrs. Kenneth R. Kingsbury have returned to San Francisco, after a summer spent at Ross. They leave shortly for a trip of several weeks to New York.

Dr. and Mrs. Alfred Roncovieri will leave October 3d for a two months' stay in New York.

Mr. and Mrs. Georges de Latour, after a week's visit in town, returned to their Rutherford home. They plan coming to San Francisco for the winter.

Mrs. Robert Franklin McMillan, who has spent the summer with her father, Mr. Theodore Blake-man, in San Francisco, has returned to her New Orleans home, where Colonel McMillan is stationed.

Mrs. Reginald Knight Smith and her children have returned from their country home and reopened their Jackson Street home for the winter.

Mr. Rennie Pierre Schwerin, who returned a week ago from an Eastern trip, is leaving for Japan on October 14th.

Mr. and Mrs. Henry W. Taft and their son, Mr. Howard Taft, have returned to their Eastern home, after a visit here of two months.

Mr. and Mrs. Kenneth MacDonald and their family have opened their Forest Hill home for the winter.

Dr. and Mrs. Harry E. Alderson and their little daughter, Miss Jane Alderson, have returned to their home in San Francisco, after a summer at the Hotel Rafael in Marin County.

Mr. and Mrs. Charles Jay Foster, who have made their home in Ross Valley for the past twenty years, will shortly take possession of a new home in Piedmont.

Mrs. Patrick Calhoun, who has been in California during the summer with her daughters, returned recently to her home in Kentucky.

Mr. and Mrs. Arthur Hill Vincent have gone to New York, en route to Europe. They sailed September 26th.

Mr. Francis V. Keesling has returned from his Eastern trip.

Mrs. George Barr Baker is returning shortly to her home in New York.

Mr. and Mrs. Farmer Fuller have recently returned from New York.

Judge and Mrs. James Cooper and Miss Jane Cooper, who have been at Santa Barbara for the summer, have returned to San Francisco for the winter.

Mr. and Mrs. Wallace Alexander, who have been making their home at the Fairmont for some time, left last week for an extended Eastern trip.

Miss Sophia Brownell daughter of Dr. and Mrs. Erle Brownell, returns within the week to her Eastern school.

Mr. and Mrs. Malcolm Whitman and their children returned to their New York home on Monday, after spending the summer in California.

Dr. and Mrs. David Starr Jordan sailed for the Orient on Thursday. Miss Alice Richardson accompanied Dr. and Mrs. Jordan on their trip.

Mr. and Mrs. Francis L. Bosqui and Miss Marjorie Bosqui, who have been living for some time at New Canaan, Connecticut, will spend the winter in New York.

Mrs. César Bertheau is abroad with her two sons, Messrs. Rudolf and César Bertheau, Jr., and will probably remain away until spring.

Among those recently registered at the St. Francis are Mr. W. S. Brooks, Colusa; Mr. Jules Alexander, Susanville; Mr. Louis Katz, New York; Mr. Ben C. Holt, Spokane; Mr. R. S. Springer, Stockton; Mr. W. S. Van Nostrand, Binghamton, New York; Mr. A. Lee Krick, Los Angeles; Mr. L. M. Tynan, Salinas; Mr. Ben Ettelson, Portland; Mr. L. B. McCormick, Salt Lake City; Dr. John Favill, Chicago; Rev. R. E. Bristol, Camden, New Jersey; Miss Pauline French, New York; Mr. B. M. Bloom, New York; Mr. A. N. Wyson, Portland.

Hother Wismer's Concert.

Hother Wismer, the violinist, will give a concert at the Sorosis Auditorium on Thursday evening, October 5th. Edgar Thorpe will preside at the piano and Miss Dorothy Pasmore, the 'cellist, will assist. Among the numbers will be the prelude and fugue in A minor for violin alone, the Joachim D minor violin concerto, and some rarely heard duets for violin and 'cello, including the "Passacaglia" by Handel and a sonata by Hayden.

Lars Hanson's performance of "Richard III" at the Intiam Theatre, Stockholm, caused a well-known English critic to announce him as one of the few "great" portrayals of that rôle. Hanson introduces a novelty in the last scene, however, which causes one to miss the final note of majesty, scorn, and defiance of this much-calumniated monarch. His Richard dies off stage—perhaps a more artistic ending for the imaginative playgoer, but surely a loss to the listener for those well-known lines of the bard. Mr. Hanson is a Swedish film star.

Turkey will be represented in the Olympic games of 1924 in Paris, Prince Eumer Farouk Effendi, son of the heir apparent and chairman of the Turkish Sports Federation, has declared. The chief Turkish strength will be in the weight-throwing events and much is expected of the wrestlers. The team will be equally representative of the Greek, Armenian, Jewish, and Turkish populations of the Constantinople district.

Graduate Cosmetic Specialist
Peggy Jane
Beauty Shop
(ESTHER M. FISHER)
Wrinkle Eradicating
Studio 203 545 Sutter Street
Garfield 576

CURRENT VERSE.

Vista Del Mare.

(Genzano lies on the Appian Way running southward from Rome, and is celebrated for its wines and the beauty of its women. It looks out from a spur of rock over the untitled plain stretching toward Civita Vecchia, the ancient port of the Emperor Trajan, with the sleek but scarcely visible Mediterranean beyond it.)

Genzano wines are good wines, Genzano girls are chaste.

Genzano from its hill top looks out across the waste.

And as you sip the white wine or as you sip the red,

Far, far away a beam of light,
A faint and furtive gleam of light

As hazy as a dream of light,
Shines forth and then is fled.

Genzano lads are brave lads, Genzano mules are strong;

In painted carts, with nodding plumes they draw the wines along.

And if the load be full casks or empty ones and light,

The lads they drive their cattle on Where Romans once did battle on

The dusty road, and rattle on
From morning until night.

Genzano town has proud men; in palaces they dwell,

And gaze across the waste land below their citadel;
And whether they be single or husband a good lass,

The gladness all men ask of wine

Is theirs in many a cask of wine,
Or wicker-waisted flask of wine

They tilt into the glass.

Genzano girls have long locks and wavy locks and black

That lie in coils upon the head or twisted down the back.

Their eyes are shining darkness, a mine that's full of fire;

Like fillets with their tails a-drift
They walk amid the males a-drift,

And see them not. The sails a-drift
Are all their eyes desire.

Genzano girls are lovely. I know on what they muse.

It isn't on the wine-casks and whence they are or whose;

But why they flaunt a red cheek or why they bide a pale

Is that far-shining beam of light,
The faint and furtive gleam of light

As hazy as a dream of light,
That shows a lover's sail.

—Wilfrid Thorley in the London New Witness.

Very Full of Laughter Is the Old Man.

Very full of laughter is the old man.
The air is full of wings

Of the little birds of laughter
Which the old man flings

From his mouth up to the rafters
In the whitewashed ceiling

That vibrates with his laughter
And quivers and sings;

Till the little birds come stealing
To the lips whence they came,

And you only hear the laughter
In the shaking of the flame,

In the tapping of the leaves,
And you only hear the laughter

Where the round cat heaves,
And you only hear the laughter

Very faintly if at all;
Until, as you drowse, suddenly once more

He awakes with a roar,
And the laughter goes flapping from the ceiling to the wall.

Very full of laughter is the old man.
Very full of laughter is the old man.

I know not what I say,
I mistrust what I hear.

There's an evil tongue licking where the log-fires play,

The round cat heaves with a laughter and a fear.

There are wells lying deeper
Than the laughter in his eyes,

There are glooms lying deeper
Than the lost lands of the sleeper;

There are sounds behind the laughter
Which I dare not follow after,

There's a choked heart tolling and a dumb child cries.

There's an old mouth full of laughter
But a dumb heart cries.

Very full of tears is the old man.
—Louis Golding in the New Witness.

Diarists.

They catalog their minutes: Now, now, now,
Is Actual, amid the fugitive;

Take ink and pen (they say) for that is how
We snare this flying life, and make it live.

So to their little pictures, and they sieve
Their happinesses: fields turned by the plow,

The afterglow that summer sunsets give,
The razor concave of a great ship's bow.

O gallant instinct, folly for men's mirth!
Type can not burn and sparkle on the page.

No glittering ink can make this written word
Shine clear enough to speak the noble rage

And instance of life. All sonnets blurred
The sudden mood of truth that gave them birth.

—Christopher Morley in New York Review.

Slot Machine Radio.

Wireless apparatus in the not distant future will be installed in practically all hotels and play an important part in entertaining the guests, prophesies the New York Hotel Association Messenger. Improvements in radio communication are coming so fast and exciting such widespread interest that its possibilities as an accessory to hotel equipment may be said to be almost without limit.

Numerous hotels in the United States already have instituted radio service for their patrons and others are preparing to do so. A recent striking indication of the drift is seen in the announcement that a New York company, manufacturing radio apparatus, has contracts for 25,000 receiving sets which operate only on deposit of a quarter, the orders coming chiefly from hotels and hospitals.

If a guest in a hotel room, or a patient in a hospital so equipped, desires a little entertainment he has merely to drop in his coin exactly as if the set were a chewing-gum or penny arcade machine, and he gets everything that comes over for the next twelve hours, jazz, weather reports, baseball scores and so on.

The cost of installation under the system will be borne equally by the company and the hotel or institution, and the profits or loss will be divided equally between them. The machines are expected to be in operation within a very short time.

In New York City the recent growth of the radio has been so rapid that it is estimated there are now from 75,000 to 100,000 apartments equipped with receiving sets. Wireless equipment has, in fact, come to be considered so indispensable that plans now being made for many new apartment houses provide radio equipment for each apartment.

There will be a central receiving station connected with the apartment, and in charge of an experienced radio operator, similar to the switchboard operators in apartment buildings. Radio broadcast concerts and news will be received by the central station and radiated to each apartment, which will be furnished only with a loud speaker, since all the radio instruments will be in the central radio room, where the complete tuning will be done by the expert in charge.

The term "Bridport dagger" is not so familiar in this country as it is in England. It is occasionally encountered here, but seldom in its correct sense. Its derivation appears in a book called "The Soul of Dorset" (Houghton Mifflin), which has already appeared in England under a different title. Mr. E. J. Darton, the author, speaking of Dorset Bridport, gives the explanation of "Bridport dagger." He says: "All the rope for Nelson's ships was made in Bridport, which for 800 years had maintained the same industry, so that a 'Bridport dagger' became a proverbial saying. To be stabbed by that weapon—a halter—was the same thing as falling off a platform while engaged in conversation with a clergyman, and resulted in your being put to bed with a shovel."

Fred S. Mansfield, the veteran lawn tennis umpire of New England, has officiated in more than 25,000 tourney games during his career and still is active.

MILLS COLLEGE SCHOOL OF MUSIC

EXTENSION OPPORTUNITIES

New equipment in instruments and studio space makes possible a limited number of extension students in the study of: Piano, Organ, Voice, Stringed Instruments and Theory.

For information call
Elmhurst 10, or write to

LUTHER MARCHANT
School of Music, Mills College

THE SANTA BARBARA GIRLS' SCHOOL

Resident and Day Pupils. Eleven acres. Country Life and Sports. Sleeping-porches. Open-air school rooms. Riding. Swimming all the year round. Basis of work, clear thinking.

MARIAN L. CHAMBERLAIN, A. M., Principal
P. O. Box 548, SANTA BARBARA, CAL.

William Warren School for Boys

MENLO PARK, CAL.
Write for Catalogue

The Katharine Branson School, Inc.

ROSS, MARIN COUNTY, CALIFORNIA

A COUNTRY SCHOOL FOR GIRLS

DAY AND RESIDENT COLLEGE PREPARATORY

Heads: Katharine Fleming Branson, A. B., Bryn Mawr
Laura Elizabeth Branson, A. B., Bryn Mawr

THE ALLEGED HUMORISTS.

"Is Joe very simple?" "Simple! He thinks necking is a new kind of scarf."—Brown Jug.

Prof.—Late again! Soph.—Not a word, Prof.; so am I.—Yale Record.

"I think I'll have my beauty nap now." "Take a good long sleep, dear."—Life.

"I had a wonderful poker hand last night." "Clean up any money on it?" "No—we were playing rummy."—Judge.

"Papa, what is a pedestrian?" "An individual, my son, that is always found in front of automobiles."—Paris Le Rire.

Rich-Quick—That there's a beautiful bust you've got, Mrs. Inrigh. Mrs. Rich-Quick (sotto voce)—"Burst, Henry!"—Life.

"Fellow tax dodgers," began the candidate. And that put him in right with his audience at the start.—Louisville Courier-Journal.

Chinese beggars are organizing a union. What happens when a beggars' union strikes? Do its members go to work?—Boston Transcript.

"Actors must be a delicate lot of people." "Why?" "I always see their names attached to patent medicine advertisements."—Stockholm Kasper.

He—They say that people who live together grow to look alike. She—Then you absolutely must consider my refusal as final.—New York Medley.

Hubby—Don't worry so about the cook's impudence, Jane. Don't take any notice of her. Wifey—I have to; she's just given it.—London Weekly Telegraph.

Traffic Cop—What is your number? Speeding Autoist—1932. Traffic Cop—I didn't ask when you were born. I asked for your number.—Stockholm Soudags Nisse.

First Weary Willie—I dealt you a hand of spades then, didn't I? Second W. W.—How did you guess it? First W. W.—I saw the frightened look on your face.—Oregon Lemon Punch.

Muriel—They went to the Lake district for their honeymoon, and Gladys was miserable. Nell—Why, what was the trouble? Muriel—Jim fell in love with the scenery.—Buffalo Express.

"What is your idea of a true statesman?" "A true statesman," replied Senator Sorghum, "is a man who could get elected to any office with ease if posterity had a vote."—Washington Star.

Naval heavyweight (with creative mind)—The old admiral wasn't arf pleased when I won larst night. "Ginger," 'e sez, "you aint arf walloped old Nobby—my blinkin' oath, you aint. Put it there, Ginger, ole pal," 'e sez;

"I allus did like ye, an', moreover, now I sees yer close to," 'e sez, "I even likes yer face."—Punch.

College—Hey, who got my black shoe? I've got one of somebody's tan pair. Education—Don't that beat hell! I'm in the same fix and trying to make an 8 o'clock.—Stanford Chaparral.

Chap (hiring car for use over week-end)—How many will she hold? Native Owner of Car—Well, she generally holds four, but seven can get along if they're real well acquainted.—Princeton Tiger.

"Europe is now asking, 'Who is the greatest statesman?'" "Not exactly," commented Senator Sorghum. "What Europe is asking just now is, 'Who is the greatest financier?'"—Washington Star.

Old-Fashioned Mother—I'm sure Adelbert would make an ideal husband, my dear. He understands women thoroughly. Modern Daughter—But, mother, I don't want to be understood.—Life.

Her Girl Chum—Did the minister make Ferdinand use the words, "With all my worldly goods I thee endow"? Mrs. Justwed—No. Why put him on his guard? I'll get 'em anyway.—Judge.

"My boy, I hear you are hanging around stage doors." "Why—er—dad, I'm thinking of writing a play." "You can't learn anything about Shakespeare from a chorus girl."—Birmingham Age-Herald.

Host—Those, my dear, are my great-aunt and uncle. Small Guest—I suppose they are dead? Host—Yes. Small Guest (after a pause)—May I ask whether they died of illness or oldness?—Punch.

"Can't you make fifteen or twenty words out of that, Helen?" said Mrs. Newrich as her daughter was writing a telegram. "I don't want the clerk to think we can't afford more than ten words."—Boston Transcript.

Among the questions that young Malachi recently put to his father was this: "Dad, was time invented in Ireland?" "What an idea! Why did you ask?" "Because it is spelled o'clock."—Philadelphia Public Ledger.

"Never been in Peewecuddyhump before, I reckon?" insinuated the landlord of the tavern. "No!" snarled the traveling salesman who had not taken as many orders as he felt his importance deserved. "That is the reason I am here now."—Kansas City Star.

Fame? It is a bubble. Listen! Bernard Shaw was walking along Adelphi Terrace, and the following dialogue took place behind him: "See 'im?" "That bloke? Yus. Who is 'e?" "Shaw." "Shaw?" "The great vegetarian eater." "Go on!" "Fast."—London Tit-Bits.

First Chautauquan—You know, the thing that makes Bryan such an effective speaker is the fact that he pauses between his sentences. Second Chautauquan—Yes, and if he would pause between his speeches his speeches might be appreciated.—Louisville Courier-Journal.

"What's the matter?" asked the policeman of the man in a high state of intoxication who was shouting most vigorously at a lamp-post. "Oh, never mind, mishter," was the reply. "Thash all right. I know she's home, all right—I shee a light up-shairs."—Everybody's Magazine.

The collection of gems owned by the Gaekwar of Baroda is believed to be worth over $10,000,000. Among the items is a necklace containing a diamond worth $400,000, known as "The Star of the South."

Argonaut Readers, Attention!

It is safe to say there is scarcely one of our readers who has not some valuable paper at home or in an office safe, where it is liable to destruction in case of fire.

In case of death, the estate is guarded as it should be if your papers are kept in a safe deposit box. One can be had for $4 a year at the Crocker Vaults.

Crocker Safe Deposit Vaults

Crocker Building

Post and Market Sts.

Where Competition Is Invited.

A transportation war has just broken out in London which is attracting considerable attention from the entire city, or at least that portion of it which rides on the buses. The city's great combine, the underground or tube, which controls all the subway and bus lines, is seriously worried by the appearance of a competitor in the field.

A week ago there suddenly appeared new buses, which a new corporation had put on the street, the vehicles being practically duplicates of the old ones except for paint of a different color. They made their first appearance on one of the most profitable routes, running from Victoria Station through Westminster and the Strand. They did a thriving business, charging the same fares, despite the efforts of the older company, which sent out its own buses in an effort to blanket the intruders at all stops.

Now others have appeared, running from Piccadilly Circus to the Marble Arch and through the heart of the shopping district. These are carrying passengers for a penny while the older company is charging tuppence. At the last session of Parliament the subway concern tried to obtain the exclusive rights to the streets now occupied, in return for extensions of the routes—a project which it was also promised would provide relief for unemployment. But Parliament refused and considerable publicity was given to the fact that the old bus lines did not have the exclusive rights to the streets they operated in. Any bus satisfactory to Scotland Yard and up to the standard of safety and cleanliness can ply for hire.

The latest invaders are using their buses also for country trips, and the manager says that with the waning of the summer season he is determined to see if he can't make the city business pay.

Iodine and Goitre.

A new food product brought into existence through chemistry is of great value in the treatment of goitre, said J. W. Turrentine of Los Angeles, who presented a paper on the subject at the meeting of the American Chemical Society at Pittsburgh.

"From the seaweed kelp there is prepared a carrier for the iodine in both organic and inorganic combination," said Mr. Turrentine. "It is agreed by all students of goitre that the disease is attributable to the deficiency of iodine in the diet. It follows, therefore, that the alleviation and probable eradication of goitre can be accomplished by supplying that element to the diet."

The new food, he declared, would take the place of a sea food, which constitutes an important part of the diet for goitre treatment.

Prehistoric Curios From Haiti.

Recently Dr. W. L. Abbott of Philadelphia brought back from San Domingo (Haiti) some very curious little images carved out of marble and sculptured with human faces, the teeth fiercely displayed, says the Philadelphia Public Ledger. He ascertained beyond a doubt that they were prehistoric amulets, worn by aboriginal warrior chiefs when they went into battle. They were supposed to ward off hostile weapons.

When Columbus landed on the island of Haiti in 1492 he was surprised to find that the native inhabitants wore no clothes whatever. They did not need to, in that latitude.

They were Caribs. But, although tradition assigns to the Caribs of the American Mediterranean (which from them gets its name of Caribbean Sea) a keen appetite for human flesh, it does not appear that the aboriginal folks met by Columbus in Haiti had any such addiction. They did tell him, however, that on an island to the eastward were people afflicted with so great a weakness in this regard that they would take bites out of persons they met. This island (Porto Rico) they called Caniba—whence our word cannibal.

The amulets may connote more than science yet knows.

By living on Fifth Avenue the toucan has developed a new power, says the New York Times. This bird has always been able to detect the approach of a thunderstorm. Something about its half-pint bill may respond to the electricity in the air. At any rate, it gives a penetrating musical call when thunder is brewing. The toucan is gregarious and this is a warning to its colleagues. The recently discovered faculty is that of detecting airplanes miles away. Long before a human being can catch the faintest purring of a motor, the toucan is calling frantically. As a rule, a few minutes later, the airplane motor comes within the hearing of humans in the same vicinity. The toucan has not shown sensitiveness to the noise of automobile motors on Fifth Avenue, but it may be too well broken in to them. The evolutionary origin of this response to air vibrations may have been in the development of a sense of detecting the approach of enemies in the air, big predatory birds which slaughtered the toucans. Why the toucan ever cultivated its gigantic beak is one of the puzzles at which biologists have guessed in vain.

The feminist movement has made rapid strides in Japan. It is not unusual for the male members of the population to wear "votes for women" badges bought from woman suffragists along the thoroughfares.

In Turkey, Syria, and Armenia the women wear garments of celestial blue as an emblem of mourning.

FOR A

CLEAR COMPLEXION

and a

HEALTHY COLOR

eat

FLEISCHMANN'S YEAST

Three Cakes a Day

ENGLISH
CASEMENTS
and Windows
for banks, offices, schools,
hospitals, etc

for artistic residences and
other substantial buildings

Made in varied designs
to meet all conditions

CRITTALL
Steel Casements

Coast Representatives

J. E. DWAN, Los Angeles

F. T. CROWE &amp; CO., Tacoma and Seattle

WATERHOUSE-WILCOX CO., San Francisco

J. McCRAKEN, Portland

Crittall Casement Window Co., Detroit, Manufacturers

KING
COAL

High in Heat Units
Low in Ash

FOR SALE BY ALL DEALERS
IN CALIFORNIA

KING COAL CO.

Main Office
EXCHANGE BLOCK
San Francisco

Wholesale Only

The Argonaut.

VOL. LXXXI. No. 2376.

SAN FRANCISCO, OCTOBER 7, 1922.

Price Ten Cents

PUBLISHER'S NOTICE: The Argonaut (title trade-marked) is published every week by the Argonaut Publishing Company. Subscriptions, $5.00 per year; six months, $2.55; three months, $1.50, payable in advance—postage prepaid. Subscriptions to all foreign countries within the Postal Union, $6.00 per year. Sample copies free. Single copies, 10 cents. News Dealers and Agents in the interior supplied by the San Francisco News Company, 747 Howard Street, San Francisco. Subscribers wishing their addresses changed should give their old as well as new addresses. The American News Company, New York, are agents for the Eastern trade. The Argonaut may be ordered from any News Dealer or Postmaster in the United States or Europe. Special advertising rates to publishers. Address all communications to The Argonaut, 207 Powell Street, San Francisco. Make all checks, drafts, postal orders, etc., payable to "The Argonaut Publishing Company."

Entered at the San Francisco Postoffice as second-class matter. The Argonaut can be obtained in London at the International News Co., Breams Building, Chancery Lane; American Newspaper and Advertising Agency, Trafalgar Square, Northumberland Avenue; and at Daws Steamship Agency, 17 Green Street, Leicester Square, and can be ordered from any of the news-stands of W. H. Smith & Son. In Paris, at 37 Avenue de l'Opéra. In New York, at Brentano's, Fifth Avenue and Twenty-Fourth Street. In Chicago, Western News Company. In Washington, at Adams' News Agency, Ninth and G Streets.

The Argonaut is on sale at the Ferry Station, San Francisco, by Foster & Orear; on the ferryboats of the Key Route system by the news agents, and by the Van Noy-Interstate Company on Southern Pacific boats and trains.

Telephone, Kearny 5895. Publication office, 207 Powell Street. WM. J. MILLIKEN, Business Manager.

FORTY-SIXTH YEAR

ALFRED HOLMAN - - - - - EDITOR

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

|  |         |
|--|---------|
| EDITORIAL: The University and the Argonaut—Mainly Political—"Damned Smartness," and Where It Hurts—Colonel Harvey and His Critics—An Administrative Incident—The Milk in the Coconut—Editorial Notes . . . . . | 225-227 |
| LETTERS TO THE EDITOR . . . . .  | 227     |
| CONSTANTINOPLE: It Was the Bank of Deposit for Occidental Thought and Culture During the Dark Ages . . . . .   | 227-228 |
| OLD FAVORITES . . . . .  | 228     |
| INDIVIDUALITIES: Notes About Prominent People All Over the World . . . . .   | 228     |
| MAIDS OF HONOUR: Some Studies of Moods and Tenses of Various Female Charmers at the Court of Great Elizabeth . . . . .   | 229     |
| BANKING AND INVESTMENT NEWS . . . . .  | 230-231 |
| BOOKS ON THE TABLE: Notes of Books and Authors . . . . .   | 232     |
| REVIEWS AND NOTICES: New Books Received . . . . .  | 233     |
| DRAMA: The Plaza Opens; Old Tivoli Days Return. By Josephine Hart Phelps . . . . .   | 234     |
| FOYER AND BOX-OFFICE . . . . .   | 235     |
| VANITY FAIR: Love and Fences—Onerous Paternity—Forbidden Fruit . . . . .   | 236     |
| STORYETTES: Grave and Gay, Epigrammatic and Otherwise . . . . .  | 237     |
| THE MERRY MUSE . . . . .   | 237     |
| PERSONAL: Social Notes—Movements and Whereabouts . . . . .   | 238-239 |
| CURRENT VERSE . . . . .  | 239     |
| THE ALLEGED HUMORISTS: Paragraphs Ground Out by the Dismal Wits of the Day . . . . .   | 240     |

The University and the Argonaut.

In the course of kindly comment on the introduction of Mr. Morton Todd to the readers of this paper the Fresno Republican speaks of "the animus of the Argonaut against the University of California."

Nothing is more dangerous to rational inference than ascribing motives. The Argonaut has no animus against the university, which it regards as the state's most valuable institution. But because the university is the state's most valuable institution, it must not be permitted without admonition to follow certain fatal tendencies in education that are asserting themselves throughout the country. The Argonaut's criticisms have been wholly constructive in purpose. It believes that certain unthinking and superficial demands for material results have been misinterpreted as substantial public opinion, and that the spirit of the undergraduate body has been to some degree impaired by a confusion of standards and an uncertainty of aim on the part of the Academic Senate—in which the Academic Senate is not singular in the drifting educational world of today. What the Argonaut believes on a matter of importance it is quite likely to say; clearly, so that its readers may understand it. Nor is it unmindful of the risk of being itself misinterpreted. No publication can be issued without being misunderstood in some paragraph by some one—probably in every paragraph. For example, the Fresno Republican itself, judicious as it usually is, mistakes a pleasantry for an expression of hostility.

The University of California is particularly the business of the public of California, not merely because of the taxes the public pays for its support, but because it is the real hope of the state. It could do the institution no good for it to get the feeling that it was above criticism. On the contrary, it would be infinitely harmful to it. And we are greatly mistaken if the whole faculty would not agree with that conviction.

Mainly Political.

Attempts to forecast the outcome of the November congressional elections are made practically futile by the fact that the various contests are mainly individual. Party authority has little to do with it; and for this the direct primary system is largely to blame. It tends to transfer the centre of gravity from national to local issues and to considerations of individual popularity. Then there are many "ifs" in the case. If we have an open October, if unemployment is reduced, if industry and commerce are prosperous, it is safe to assume that those Republicans who are manifestly downcast and fearful will find that their predictions of a tremendous shrinkage in the Republican majority of Congress have been baseless. It is inevitable that the present majority is to be reduced, and on many accounts it is desirable that it should be. But it is a good guess that the reduction will be less than has generally been expected. This is about all that can truthfully be said regarding the outcome in November. Nobody knows anything about it; nor will anybody know until the returns are in and counted.

The bald fact is that the chief consideration tending to maintenance of party solidarity, or anything like it, hinges upon the attitude of the country towards the presidency. Always in the second year of a presidential term there comes a slump in popular estimation of the incumbent. Human nature has much to do with it. Extravagant hopes which hail every incoming administration are always more or less disappointed. Then there is lukewarmness on the part of many party men who have expected favors that have not materialized. The new heaven and the new earth that enthusiasts are always looking for never reaches the mark of pre-election prophecy. In the immediate instance the railroad strike and the coal strike have served as contributing adverse facts. While President Harding has suffered, as others have before him, it still remains that he has a strong hold on the popular affections if not upon what passes for popular political convictions. Even the great Democratic papers, like the New York Times and the New York World, exhibit a kindly regard for him, even when they feel it necessary, on partisan account, to speak slightly of him. There has of late been a disposition to arraign him as a weak man, afraid to use the big stick even where it might be needed. But this charge lost its force in respect of his courageous assertion of the right of every man to work upon his own contract, with the concurrent right to demand and receive protection at the hands of the government. Further, it becomes ridiculous in view of his veto of the bonus raid.

Settlement of the railroad and coal strikes makes a situation that tends to Republican hopefulness. The country seems all set for a wave of prosperity. The great obstacles to business are out of the way. Things are moving at least. And if October shall prove an open month business in every line, including employment, is in the way of stimulation. The country is actually running a race with the weather. An extended cold wave would check the movement of coal with the result that the furnaces which support industry would shut down, dwellings would grow cold, the people would be aroused in a resentment that would find expression at the polls in November. Wherefore, Republican hopes and interests centre in the weather. Happily in California this phase of the situation does not enter into industrial or political calculations.

The whole campaign stock in trade of the Democrats is the new tariff bill. It has been easy to summon Republican witnesses, individual and journalistic, of high standing in support of the theory that the new law is an iniquity, that it was created by the rottenest kind of log-rolling, and that in operation it will rob the ultimate consumer. Offhand, it may be said that the situation is not unlike that in 1910, when the Payne-Aldrich tariff bill proved the undoing of the Republican party. But we have to consider certain considerations that made no figure in 1910. First and foremost is the fact that the effects of the new law will not be impressed upon the country prior to November 7th. Again, it is manifest that the country has much less interest in the tariff in the year 1922 than it had in the year 1910. So many really great issues have been forced upon public attention in the last five years that a tariff law becomes relatively an uninteresting matter. Federal taxes are plainly going down while Liberty bonds are going up. The Democratic managers have to face the fact that whatever the derelictions of the past year and a half of Republican authority in the government the taxpayers of the country are paying into the national treasury this year about a billion dollars less than in 1920, and that in the same period the sum of public debt has been reduced by another billion dollars.

There is growing hope that the affairs of the government will so adjust themselves that there may be no need for a special session of Congress next year. Summers without Congress in session have been rare these twenty years past. There was an approach to that condition in 1920, when Congress stood adjourned from the middle of June to the first week of December. But there followed four years of summer Congresses. We can easily believe that a prayer goes up every night from the White House that the country may be spared in the summer of 1923. The thought makes a pleasant picture—no Congress in session, no elections at hand, long weeks of peace and serenity! Such a period would hold many advantages for the Pacific Coast. It is not to be doubted that there would be a general movement of high officials to this land of salubrious summer airs. President Harding, it is well known, wishes to pay the Coast a visit and has only been deterred by the conditions that have held him at Washington. Given a summer free from a special session of Congress and we would surely have him as a guest, probably accompanied by a majority of his Cabinet. It would be a good thing all around in that it would give those who make up the government a chance to get away from Washington and renew acquaintance with the country.

"Damned Smartness," and Where It Hurts.

A young co-ed was sentenced to two days in jail for speeding last week. She served her time rather than accept the alternative of having her driving license revoked for ninety days. She enjoyed her incarceration, her "stretch" as an habitual criminal would call it, and declared that it gave her an opportunity to do some real studying. In addition she found to her satisfaction that prisoners in the Alameda County jail are well treated and supplied with good food. That ought to gratify our sentimentalists who are forever fearing that our jails are not sufficiently attractive.

Putting students in jail might be a good way to induce some of them to study, but there may be a better ray, in some cases, to induce careless persons to stop speeding. There is no doubt that jail sentences for speeders are good, and that in many cases they act as a deterrent, especially when they are made long enough. But inasmuch as this young lady found it interesting, and amusing, and even profitable, to spend two days in jail, there may be some doubt as to whether the short sentence usually imposed will cure many speeders. Some may be cured by them, and some may need something else. The Argonaut suggests publicly sentencing some of them to assist in hospitals on cases of injury due to illegal driving.

With many young persons who are not guilty of driving while intoxicated (of course, a man that will drive an automobile while intoxicated ought to do at least a year at hard labor in the penitentiary) speeding is a matter of thoughtlessness and the disposition of youth to take a chance, regardless of the fact that another is compelled to share it. Such a person sentenced to serve in a hospital and actually see some of the results of speed and disregard of road rules would probably be impressed with the enormity of the crime he or she had committed in subjecting others to such cruel risks. There are plenty of victims of automobiles lying in the hospitals of every large city in this land, who have been a year in bed and will never walk naturally again; who will never again know health and soundness and freedom of movement. There are children who will grow up cripples, women whose lives have been blighted, useful men whose usefulness has been forever impaired, by the selfishness of motor drivers. They have lain on beds of pain for months, they have passed the long days and nights in agony and despair relieved only by drugs, just because somebody was having a heedless good time and disregarding laws made in the interest of public safety. The authors of such trouble have paid no attention to the reasons why such laws were passed, and only think it smart to evade them; some even pay no further attention to the victims they have ridden down. If they could see the human wreckage caused by such evasions, they would be shocked, horrified. A young schoolteacher in San Jose recently lost a leg and the use of her hand for life, merely because of a few minutes' drunken fun on the part of a person she had never seen, and who had no reason for breaking the speed laws except that he wished to do it. The man has gone to the penitentiary for a year. When he comes out, he will still have two good legs and two good hands. His victim will not. Yet he will probably feel that he has been very cruelly treated.

Broadcast warnings that speeding is dangerous do little good. Short terms in a comfortable county jail do not appear much more effective. But a few days in a hospital where automobile cases are received should fill with contrition the heart of any reasonable human being that had persistently broken the traffic laws. It is hard to realize the misery such violations cause unless one has had cases under personal observation. Some speeders were laughing the other day at their own astuteness in slipping out of a trap, when an occupant of the automobile said: "I wish you fellows could see my wife, ten months in bed with a paralyzed arm and a broken thigh that won't knit because a man cut a corner just as she stepped off the curb. You wouldn't think you were so damned smart." And that is what is involved in breaking road rules—damned smartness, of the most cruel character.

Colonel Harvey and His Critics.

Certain light-minded statesmen, seconded by the light-minded press, continue to amuse themselves by baiting our ambassador to the British court. The fact that upon occasions of ceremony Colonel Harvey wears the dress prescribed by custom—not, we suspect, from choice and assuredly not from vanity—is regarded as a proper subject for hilarious jeering well seasoned with sneers. This is far from being harmless fun, since there is involved in it a belittlement of an official who has serious and difficult work to do and whose dignities as a representative are affected by what is said of him at home. The truth is that Colonel Harvey has made and is making a highly creditable representative of his country at the Court of St. James. Whether or not President Harding might better have made another selection is beside the point. Whatever else may be said of Colonel Harvey, he is beyond question a man of great mental brilliancy; and it may be further said that he is intensely and entirely an American in his sentiments and general attitude. That he has won respect in the country to which he is assigned is the testimony of every observant American who has recently visited England, including Chief Justice Taft.

The basis of Colonel Harvey's success lies primarily in a sympathetic social instinct combined with very unusual powers of expression and exposition. No man better than Colonel Harvey understands the American mind; and no man who has ever represented the United States officially at London has been able better to interpret the American mind to our British cousins. The very lack of formality or of pose which characterizes Colonel Harvey's addresses has commended him to the British officials with whom he has to deal. It is not easy for the British mind to take in the conditions of American politics which differentiate our system from theirs; and not every American ambassador has had the art or the essential American self-respect to interpret effectively the atmosphere of American political life with the reasons why some things may be done and why other things may not be done. It is at this point that Colonel Harvey has achieved a notable success in his personal contacts and in his public addresses. He goes straight to the mark, and in the slang of the day he unfailingly "puts it over." Where concession in minor, including ceremonial, matters is a point he concedes; where straight talk is necessary he has the force requisite to the situation. Speaking broadly, he is making of his mission an absolute success; and this being so, he merits respect at home as he has won respect abroad.

It is perhaps well for his American critics that Colonel Harvey's official position debars him from retort—retort whether with bludgeon or rapier. There are few capable of meeting the Colonel in intellectual combat—certainly none of those who find amusement in a persistent course of pin-pricking. We can but suspect that a day of retribution is coming when the Colonel, freed from official restraint, shall put aside his famous "knee pants" and roll up his sleeves for action against certain of the more impertinent of his critics.

The Milk in the Coconut.

The glee with which certain spokesmen of Senator Johnson's machine, including Mr. Hearst's Examiner, have greeted Mr. Richardson's indiscretion in repudiating Boynton as the head of the Republican State Committee has logical inspiration. The declared purpose of Richardson, if he shall be elected, is so to reorganize the state government as to substitute business standards for the purposes of personal politics; and this obviously implies destruction of the Johnson machine, which lives on state patronage—in other words, upon funds drawn from the state treasury.

Richardson's repudiation of Boynton gives a species of excuse—not much of an excuse, to be sure, but better than none—for bolting the party nominee and supporting his Democratic rival, Mr. Woolwine. It is presumed that if the latter can be brought into the governorship by help from the Johnson machine he will be open to arrangements under which at least a share of the official patronage of the state may be left in the hands of the Johnsonites. But even if Woolwine in the governorship should prove intractable, Democratic control of the state treasury would at least serve to prevent Republican reorganization in opposition to or out from under Senator Johnson's hand.

Richardson proposes curtailments and economies that would be fatal to the machine. It must have the commissionerships, the attorneyships, the clerkships, the stenographerships, the tide-waiterships, the state automobiles, etc., else it perish. This since it has not within itself—with the door of the state treasury barred against it—means of continued existence. This it is—the need for retaining its hold upon the state treasury—that inspires the desperate effort to beat Richardson and put Woolwine in the governor's chair.

It should be apparent to every Republican and to every taxpayer that the main hope of the greedy organization that now for ten years has had its hand upon the throat of the California taxpayer lies in the defeat of Richardson. His programme is simple, but in its promise effective. He pledges himself to curtail the clutter of commissions into which the administration of state affairs is now partitioned, to dismiss numberless salaried attaches whose business is less related to public welfare than to promotion of the machine, to establish business methods in state affairs. He estimates the saving to be brought about by these reforms at approximately a million dollars per year—a sum now drawn from the state treasury to feed the Johnson machine.

An Administrative Incident.

Young Teddy Roosevelt, Assistant Secretary of the Navy, now and again exhibits flashes of the paternal form. A recent incident is in point. While Secretary Denby was in Japan, and while Roosevelt was working out economies in the administration of the Navy Department, he determined to close up the purely political navy yard at Charleston, South Carolina. That, as the country will recall, is the yard which old Ben Tillman forced upon the country when he was chairman of the Senate Committee on Naval Affairs during the first Wilson administration. To make a channel to the yard it was necessary to alter the landscape materially. At great expense a considerable area of land was eliminated. This was all to the good from the Daniels standpoint, since the more money spent in the South, the better. Young Roosevelt's proposal to shut up the Charleston yard soon encountered negative action on the part of the senators from South Carolina. They induced ten of their associates—making an even dozen in all—to sign a round robin declaring that they would oppose with their influence and their votes the President's ship subsidy bill if the Charleston yard was closed, unless the government at the same time should also close some Northern navy yard. They took this threat to Lasker, chairman of the Shipping Board. Lasker is the field agent of the ship subsidy proposal. He carried the paper to the White House, and very shortly thereafter Roosevelt received formal and written instructions from his commander-in-chief to cancel the plan for dismantling the Charleston yard. Of course, Roosevelt was peeved. Especially he resented Lasker's part in the affair. Orders being orders, he obeyed—but technically rather than in spirit. For immediately he exercised the power of the department and withdrew all ships from Charleston, leaving the yard with nothing to do. A few days thereafter Secretary Denby came home, and being more subservient, reversed his young assistant's policy, but not in an offensive way. Adroitly he brought about the creation of a board of naval officers to make a new study of navy yard needs, preserving the existing status.

Editorial Notes.

The farm bloc, the Department of Agriculture, and the professional conservationists are making combined effort to "save" the forest service from transfer to the Department of the Interior, where it properly belongs and from which it was withdrawn to please Gifford Pinchot and has since been maintained at great expense. The combine makes a showing, very adroitly worked up, that the service as now organized derives a revenue of approximately two and a half million dollars. While it is true enough that the forest service actually gets in this amount of money, the costs of its operation are such as to leave a deficit. As a matter of cold fact the service spends something like three million dollars each year more than it takes in.

Athens has been greatly agitated over the prospective loss of Thrace, which "produces nearly all the cereals used by Greece." For our part, we do not eat cereals, and would probably remain dry eyed if the Turks took Battle Creek.

A striking exhibit of the demoralization of party responsibility and discipline in California is supplied by declarations of policy on the part of both Republican and Democratic candidates for the governorship. Prior to the conventions held at Sacramento last week both Mr. Richardson and Mr. Woolwine made public the lines upon which their appeals are made to the voters of California. Mr. Richardson ignores all issues save that of economy. A promise to cut down the cost of the state government was both the foundation and superstructure of his primary campaign and he proposes to proceed along the same line with no attention to anything else. Having tested the potentiality of this one idea he will not mix things up by recognition of any other. Mr. Woolwine announces himself as against the Volstead law and as favoring allowance of wines and beers. His appeal, he declared, would be to the sentiment that resents interference of government in individual affairs. Mind that neither of these candidates, although nominated under party banners and assuming to represent party purposes, has left it to the parties in their organic character to name the conditions of the contest. It would seem that neither Republicans nor Democrats, other than the candidates themselves, are to have anything to do with outlining the principles upon which those who nominally represent them are to stand for election this fall.

The issue of personal liberty as related to the traffic in liquors is almost as serious a matter in British Columbia as with us, although upon a different basis. Under existing law liquors may be had in sealed packages from government stores by persons presenting license to purchase, such license being obtainable for a fee of five dollars. The license requirement is resented by many, who maintain the right of a British subject to buy at his pleasure in open market without special permit from an official. A further demand is made by those who represent the sentiment of the working classes for the right to buy beer by the glass. There is no general demand for the return of the saloon—on the other hand public sentiment supports its continued suppression—but at the same time there is insistence that a way shall be provided by which the working man may have his glass of beer without being forced to acquire a license and to lay in a stock. These issues are to be made subject of action by the provincial legislature, which is to convene on the 20th instant at Victoria. Public sentiment is divided and a hot session is in prospect. The present provincial government is committed to support of the existing law and common expectation looks to a political turn-over that will bring in a new organization of the provincial government.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR.

Admiral Sims on San Francisco Bay as a Naval Base.

NAVAL WAR COLLEGE

NEWPORT, R. I., September 23, 1922.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE ARGONAUT—Dear Sir: The enclosed clipping from the Army and Navy Register quotes your editorial, "The Proper Fleet Base," in your issue of September 9th.

I have read this editorial with great interest, and it hits the nail squarely on the head. What the navy needs is, of course, a naval base; that is, a position from which the fleet can operate as a unit, that position having the necessary facilities for repairing and supplying a fleet in the shortest possible time. A navy yard is something entirely different. We might have fifty navy yards on the coast, each one of which was capable of a certain amount of repair work, but they would not be adequate for our purposes in war unless we had, in addition, a real naval base. If we had a real naval base we would not need the other positions. One of the commonest mistakes made in discussing such matters is to suppose that scattered naval bases are necessary for the protection of the coast. If we have a fleet that is stronger than the enemy can bring to bear on our coast, and if its maximum efficiency is secured by keeping it together at an adequate naval base, it protects the whole coast, no matter how many hundred miles long it may be.

Very sincerely yours,
WILLIAM S. SIMS,
Rear-Admiral, U. S. Navy.

Accepted, With Thanks.

The Seattle Town Crier says in a recent issue: "Among all the hundreds and thousands of daily and weekly papers published in the United States, there is none whose editorial observations are held in higher esteem by the discriminating than the Argonaut of San Francisco. Accuracy and amplitude of information, poise, understanding, fairness, sanity, honesty, and a superlative gift of interpretation are all the Argonaut's."

A San Franciscan in Germany.

DRESDEN, August 22, 1922.

DEAR MR. HOLMAN: Before I left San Francisco for this trip to Europe it frequently had been stated and it appeared in the press that Americans were not well treated in Germany. I suspected that our people were imagining much of this, but from my own observation I am inclined to think that there is a foundation for some of it. Frankly I do not think they want us here, and while in that frame of mind they must inevitably show it. Personally I would advise Americans to avoid Germany until a little better feeling is aroused and the animosity, if that be it, is removed.

Much of the annoyance, I must admit, comes from my lack of acquaintance with the language, for many of the towns could not produce a single person to whom a question in English could be addressed. A conductor or any one connected with the train or station who could understand an American was indeed a novelty, and so refreshing that one would forget himself for a moment.

Many of those side trips involve one, two, or three changes, yet if you say to the conductor that, for instance, you are going to Dresden, he will not tell you when to change cars, nor will he advise you when the point is reached. Of course it is my duty to know their language if I expect to travel in their country, but such is not one of my accomplishments. If one is fortunate enough to find one who can speak both languages much trouble is obviated, but it must in truth be added that the conductor can not always give accurate information, which I found to my sorrow.

If one be fool enough to travel first class, and that coach is full, he must take second class, or even third. But if a German enters the car with a third-class ticket and takes a second-class seat he will not be forced to vacate for you. On the other hand an American holding a second-class ticket must vacate a first-class seat, even though not occupied, or pay the difference. In most of the hotels here the service is poor, no doubt due to conditions which these unfortunate people can not for the present remedy. At the Hotel Weber, one of the best here, I could not get an egg for breakfast—"all out." If your room is on the fourth floor and you ring for the "lift" it may come up that day or next.

They openly boast of one price for the resident and another for the American. If prices are not in open figures in the stores you will pay much more.

The San Francisco German consul gave me a permit to go in and out of Germany once and charged me $20, while to another he gave a year in and out for the same money. In New York and Chicago the charge was $10 for a couple and in Italy you may obtain a visé for $5.

While at Geneva I told the German consul that he could renew my visé for Germany without charge or I would go to Paris and thence to Belgium and Holland. He complied, and yet others there paid again. In both Germany and Austria once you leave the country that cancels your visé and another golden eagle must be forthcoming. In a number of cities, after entering Germany, you must again present your passports, and a charge is made for the privilege of entering the town. In some places you may be called at any hour of the night to produce your passport. To me this only occurred once, but other Americans recounted several instances. If you buy anything in this country they will tax you on export at the border, but that is purely an economic measure and I have no concern regarding it.

They have coined a new word, "Valutostok," meaning an American who visits Germany or Austria and lives like a prince for a very small amount of money; and yet the town of Innsbruck, Austria, was crowded while we were there with Germans hikers who can beat the game by leaving Germany, going into Austria and exchanging the already depleted mark for a meaningless Krona. I must confess some guilt of "Valutostok" myself while in Austria, for the bank quite willingly gave me 165,000 krona for $5. Ease and comfort for little money, but not otium cum dignitate. There are many Americans who tell me that they have had no troubles, and my own were quite insignificant as compared with some I witnessed and others told to me. It is apparent that the wide publicity given this subject by our countrymen has in a great measure modified the German activities, but it is still in the air; you feel it and don't just know how. I regret it exceedingly on account of my German friends who placed letters in my hands.

Obviously it should not be assumed that all my moments in Germany were unpleasant, for I could recount many instances to offset the unpleasantness. However, Americans visiting here must expect no such cordial treatment as is accorded to us in Switzerland, a most wonderful, charming and beautiful country to travel in.

P. S.—How I miss my Argonaut!

R. W. OSBORN.

The Canadian Reciprocity Campaign.

SAN MATEO, October 4, 1922.

TO THE EDITOR—Sir: Under the caption "Canada and Our Tariff" in your issue of the 30th ultimo you state a case which is only partly true, as will be seen from a recital of the following facts.

Reciprocity was defeated in Canada in 1911, not on its own merits, but principally because the Liberal government, under the late Sir Wilfred Laurier, had become stale and was due for defeat. The old gentleman chose a great national issue rather than the weakness of his cabinet to go down on. The Conservative party (then forming the loyal opposition) in its fight, while playing up the imperial end of the trade relations and using President Taft's ill-advised remark that "Canada would be an adjunct of the United States," with great dexterity, laid much greater stress on the extravagances of the government with its railway and naval policies.

Probably the greatest factor was the so-called "Tippot Navy" of the Liberal government. Previous to the calling of the election the Conservative leaders were all in favor of a Canadian navy, but as soon as the Liberals adopted it as a definite policy words could not be found sufficiently scornful to be used in describing the nucleus of the Canadian navy. Nothing would suit the Conservative party but the gift to Great Britain of three dreadnaughts for the imperial navy. This carried great weight in Canada because the British navy is the pride of all British peoples and its traditions represent its highest ideals. It was very potent in English-speaking Canada, while in Quebec—the stronghold of Sir Wilfred Laurier—it served as putting militarism further away. The Conservative party actually spread the propaganda in Quebec that Laurier with his Canadian navy was going to take the young French-Canadians and send them away to fight England's battles.

You and your readers know how the political game is played here. There is little difference in Canada. The Liberals are again in power and have intimidated their desire for reciprocity. There is no doubt of their substantial backing by the people on that policy, and we shall hear more of it from those on this side of the forty-ninth parallel as soon as the people get around to it.

A CANADIAN.

Hail to the Chief

SAN FRANCISCO, September 25, 1922.

TO THE EDITOR—Sir: Friend W. Richardson was nominated for governor "on his own" in a taxpayers' revolt. According to his catchy pre-primary slogan, "More Business: Less Politics," his election would seem to indicate an intention to return to conservatism, a consummation devoutly to be wished by thousands of Californians. That his nomination was the result of such a belief is beyond question, for he was nominated despite the machine. Partly because of that belief he will receive thousands of Democratic votes.

Who would have supposed that the senior senator from California would have been so lacking in political acumen as not to realize that the verdict of the Republican primary nominating Richardson was the verdict of the plain people in the face of the bitter opposition of the machine, and yet it is obvious that the action of the Republican State Central Committee in electing Boynton as its chairman was the action merely of that discredited machine.

There is grim truth in the old classic legend: Whom the gods would destroy they first make mad!

EDWARD A. BELCHER.

According to the London Post, Limerick, where the Irish rebels had their headquarters, has one of the most beautiful peals of bells in the world. They were made in Italy by a young workman, who, after the toil of many years, produced a peal of bells which were so perfect in tone that even his critical judgment was satisfied. The bells were hung in a neighboring convent, but in the course of years war swept across that part of the land, and the bells were lost. Misfortune overtook the bell-founder, and he left his native land, wandering about the world for years. Then, hearing that his bells had been taken to Limerick, he set out to hear their sweet tones once again. As his vessel sailed up the Shannon, borne upon the evening air from the towers of the cathedral came the music of his bells. He went forward and sat, listening, his gaze fixed upon the distant cathedral, but when the vessel came to anchor and they went to rouse him he was dead.

One of the popular French broadcasting radio stations is the Eiffel Tower.

CONSTANTINOPLE.

It Was the Bank of Deposit for Occidental Thought and Culture During the Dark Ages.

I.

When Byzas picked on the point of land at the corner of the Bosphorus and the Golden Horn to found a colony of Megarian Greeks, he proved himself one of the best realtors of classic times; and the use of a modern commercial term does those times no injustice, for the classic Greeks were a thoroughly commercialized people. Their bickering little governments were probably founded for the protection of their trade, and they whip-sawed each other with every trick and device they could invent; and they were very inventive. Megara, on the Corinthian isthmus, went in for colonies, as all the Greek communities did, which would give the merchants of the fatherland a monopoly of business and shut out the other Greeks. A modern Greek would be as much disposed to give another half of his coffee and doughnut joint as an ancient Greek would be to let one from the next-door country trade with his colony. So every little Grecian state wanted its own. Perhaps that shows why they never united.

Thanks to Byzas, Megara got a good colony. The Bosphorus was the original Golden Gate. If you wanted to go anywhere in particular in that part of the world, that was where you had to go. Io once passed that way from Asia into Europe in the form of a heifer, which was a disguise Jupiter wished on her to conceal his philanderings from his wife; and as even the ancients knew that the right name for the family cow was Old Bos, they called the waterway the Bosphorus, or cow-ford, as the English later called a shallow place in the Thames Oxford. Place names are wonderful records. Without the Bosphorus, and the Ionian Sea, the story of Io would be hard to swallow.

Byzantium stood at the cross-roads of the ancient world. Traffic between two great continents and two great seas had to pass it. It was the Forty-Second and Broadway of its times. It would have been the greatest place on earth for electric-lighted billboards, but in the days of Byzas there were none. There were no Camel nor Chesterfield cigarettes, there was no Spearmint gum, no Beeman's Pepsin, there were no cord tires, each guaranteed to be better than all the others; in fact, there was very little of what we call civilization. But Byzantium was on the main highway of such civilization as there was. Jason sailed by it in the Argos on his hunt for the Golden Fleece, supposed to be placer gold from the vicinity of Trebizond on the southern shores of the Black Sea. It was the toll-house on the natural canal between the Grecian world in the Mediterranean and the vast wheat fields on the black soil of what we call the Ukraine. When it came to picking property, Byzas was a good picker. Not a real estate in Los Angeles could beat him. That is about all we have on Byzas. He probably had a hard time getting any tolls out of the other Greeks.

Constantine was another good realtor. Diocletian recognized that the main administrative troubles of the Roman Empire were in the East, with the Persians and Armenians and Sythians and other turbulent peoples on that border, and removed his capital eastward, but he missed the best location by passing up Byzantium for Nicomedia, or Ismid, what an American would call Smithville; where Mustafa Kemal went recently to be near his "great and good friend" the Sultan. Constantine was a shrewd politician and business man, and did not make Diocletian's mistake. He was practical and believed in the wisdom of Senator Sorghum, "if you can't lick 'em, jine 'em"; so he jined the Christians, then becoming the most numerous sect in the empire. But as baptism was efficacious but once, he postponed it until toward the close of his life, so that he could get a sort of wholesale rate on sin. He took Byzantium in 323, A. D., and began turning it into a new city five years later. It soon became known by his name, but that of Byzas is preserved in the adjective.

At this time the Atlantic Ocean was practically unoccupied. There was no such city as London, and lonely, long-legged liver birds were the only inhabitants of Liverpool. New York was not yet on the map; in fact, there was no map. A great commerce for its day moved through the Bosphorus, and Constantinople became the London, Liverpool, and New York of the early Christian world. It was the key of the Eastern Hemisphere. But it was far more than that. It is difficult to speak of Constantinople except in superlatives, nor is it possible to indicate in any reasonable compass a fraction of what it has meant in human affairs. Cities are the greatest works of mankind, embodying the triumphs of social, industrial, and commercial organization. The very name "city" is, in its Latin form, the root word of civilization, because civilization is so much the flower and fruit of city life. And Constantinople has been a great city, one of the greatest. Because of its position, its power, its majesty and authority, it stood like a tall rock amid the barbarian flood that submerged the Roman order, and it became the bank of deposit for the intellectual treasures of antiquity, a bank from which those treasures could be and were withdrawn when the time came for men to use them. So much was this its character that part of the serpentine tripod of the Delphian Oracle, that supreme spiritual authority of the Grecian world, stands today in the old Hippodrome, still inscribed with the names of thirty-one Greek cities that fought against the Persians at Platea.

It is said that Rome gave the Western world its juridical foundation in the Roman law. That is not strictly true. Rome developed that grand system of jurisprudence, but Constantinople gave it to the world. If Justinian, Emperor of the East, had not caused to be compiled, by Constantinople scholars, the Pandects, the Code, the Institutes, and the Novellæ, our lawyers and judges would only be guessing today at how the Roman courts had solved some of the knottiest problems of human rights.

At such a place, wealth will not only be made in quantities, but it will converge there from without. A great deal of money is made in New York, but more is spent there—money that is made in Pittsburgh, in Chicago, in Sioux City, in Davenport, in Colusa. Constantinople was not only a place where embattled secretaries slew one another in thousands trying to settle whether God the Father and God the Son were made of the same substance or like substances, or whether an omphalopsychite that had gazed at his own umbilicus until he went crazy had really seen the Light of the Transfiguration or had merely overstrained his optic nerve; but it was a place to which the fastest horses were brought from Arabia, the choicest gems from Golconda, and the finest weaves of silk on camel trains from Shantung across the uplands of Turkistan and Central Asia. Its wealth was incredible. Gibbon could not believe his own authorities on it. It was the "Queen of Cities," where the tribute of the empire was annually paid, whose emperor daily received the revenues "from the shops, the taverns, the markets, from the merchants of Persia and Egypt, of Russia and Hungary, of Italy and Spain, who frequent the capital by sea and land"; a revenue so rich that one of the porphyrogenetous emperors inherited 109,000 pounds of gold and 300,000 pounds of silver, and came to have before his death a sum equal to 8,000,000 pounds sterling buried in the vaults of the palace.

Constantinople was enriched with innumerable works of art when Rome was in pitiful ruins. The Hippodrome, 1400 feet long and 400 wide, was adorned with the images of victorious charioteers. There was a statue of Helen, probably comparable to the Venus de Milo in the Louvre. There was a Hercules of Ly-sippus, of noble size, a colossal image of Juno from her temple on Samos, and there were the wonderful bronze horses that now form the quadriga over the portal of St. Mark's in Venice. These were but a few. The city evolved an architecture. The Roman arch, rotated on a vertical axis, would describe a dome, and this superbly beautiful form crowned the Byzantine churches. Under those domes the supporting pillars and pendentives were encrusted with mosaics of semiprecious stone, the altars set thick with gems; the whole was ornamented with an overdone, prodigal embellishment.

This was a city of great churches, of domes and towers, of palaces and convents and public baths and libraries and theatres, and of open-air shelters wherein the incessantly disputatious people could split with rhetorical razors the single hair that divided the Arian and Athanasian doctrines, or some other subtlety of the Nicene creed—the free silver or protective tariff question of their day. It was filled with artists, critics, connoisseurs, savants, dillettantes, theologians, rhetors, ranters, metaphysicians, pamphleteers, authors. It seethed with intellectual activity, it was the seat of a learning and a culture which, while not creative, at least preserved some of the values of a mighty past. If there had been printing presses there would have been a dozen daily newspapers and they would have had extras on the street every thirty minutes.

A city so placed, and drawing to itself its tribute of the riches of the world, is in an exposed position, an object of the conqueror's desire. It was taken many times. It was taken by the Persians and the Spartans, by Alcibiades, Lysander, Alexander, Septemius Severus, and Constantine. After Constantine its emperors presided, with the majesty of Augustus, over the dying Roman Empire. Probably they did not hasten its fall; more likely they kept life in it long after its normal time to die. They had their proportion of great men and sometimes the name of a Comnenus or a Paleologus is almost fit to shine with those of some of the western Cæsars. They had a hard part to play. Through the Middle Ages civilization was not rising for them; it was going down, authority was weakening, the barbarian was coming closer every decade. There are those that believe our own civilization is in that sort of decline today, and that the barbarian is coming upon us. A widespread devotion is not easy to detect at the time; but as long as we have such institutions as the General Electric Company, the United States Steel Corporation, the Remington and the Winchester arms works, and some good battleships we are still a jump or two ahead.

There was a lively trade in the ninth and tenth centuries, and before, between the Russians and the Mediterranean world, through Constantinople. A fleet of rude boats annually visited it with slaves, furs, honey and wax, hides; and returned with wine and oil, Indian spices and Greek manufactures, to the enrichment of the brokers and warehousemen serving this profitable business. But the Russians coveted the riches of the city even then, and within two centuries tried four times to take it; and inasmuch as neither human nature nor geography undergoes much alteration, whoever holds Constantinople must look out for the Russian. It was believed that a statue in one of the squares was inscribed with a prophecy that Russia should one day be master of Constantinople, and this encouraged Russian hope. That hope still lives, supported to some degree by a sort of legal claim arising out of the marriage of a prince of Moscow with an heiress of the Eastern Empire. As in many cases of the sort, it is largely a matter of getting possession, but the present tenants are hard to evict, and the neighbors will not help.

MORTON TODD.

OLD FAVORITES.

Song of the Greek Poet.

The isles of Greece, the isles of Greece!
Where burning Sappho loved and sung,—
Where grew the arts of war and peace,—
Where Delos rose, and Pæbus sprung!
Eternal summer glids them yet;
But all, except their sun, is set.

The Scian and the Teian muse,
The hero's harp, the lover's lute,
Have found the fame your shores refuse;
Their place of birth alone is mute
To sounds which echo farther west
Than your sires' "Islands of the Blest."

The mountains look on Marathon,
And Marathon looks on the sea;
And musing there an hour alone,
I dreamed that Greece might still be free;
For, standing on the Persians' grave,
I could not deem myself a slave.

A king sat on a rocky brow
Which looks o'er sea-born Salamis;
And ships by thousands lay below,
And men in nations,—all here his!
He counted them at break of day,—
And when the sun set, where were they?

And where are they? and where art thou,
My country? On thy voiceless shore
The heroic lay is tuneless now,—
The heroic bosom beats no more!
And must thy lyre, so long divine,
Degenerate into hands like mine?

'T is something, in the dearth of fame,
Though linked among a fettered race,
To feel at least a patriot's shame,
Even as I sing, suffuse my face;
For what is left the poet here?
For Greeks a blush,—for Greece a tear.

Must we but weep o'er days more blest!
Must we but blush?—our fathers' blood
Earth! render back from out thy breast
A remnant of our Spartan dead!
Of the three hundred, grant but three
To make a new Themoplaë!

What, silent still? and silent all?
Ah, no! the voices of the dead
Sound like a distant torrent's fall,
And answer, "Let one living head,
But one, arise,—we come, we come!"
'T is but the living who are dumb.

In vain,—in vain; strike other chords;
Fill high the cup with Samian wine!
Leave battles to the Turkish hordes,
And shed the blood of Scio's vine!
Hark! rising to the ignoble call,
How answers each bold Bacchanal!

You have the Pyrrhic dance as yet,—
Where is the Pyrrhic phalanx gone?
Of two such lessons, why forget
The nobler and the manlier one?
You have the letters Cadmus gave,—
Think ye he meant them for a slave?

Fill high the bowl with Samian wine!
We will not think of themes like these!
It made Anacreon's song divine:
He served, but served Polyocrates,—
A tyrant; but our masters then
Were still, at least, our countrymen.

The tyrant of the Chersonese
Was freedom's best and bravest friend;
That tyrant was Miltiades!
O that the present hour would lend
Another despot of the kind!
Such chains as his were sure to bind.

Fill high the bowl with Samian wine!
On Suli's rock and Parga's shore
Exists the remnant of a line
Such as the Doric mothers bore;
And there perhaps some seed is sown
The Heracleidan blood might own.

Trust not for freedom to the Franks,—
They have a king who buys and sells;
In native swords, and native ranks,
The only hope of courage dwells;
But Turkish force, and Latin fraud,
Would break your shield, however broad.

Fill high the bowl with Samian wine!
Our virgins dance beneath the shade,—
I see their glorious black eyes shine;
But, gazing on each glowing maid,
My own the burning tear-drop laves,
To think such breasts must suckle slaves.

Place me on Sunium's marbled steep,
Where nothing, save the waves and I,
May hear our mutual murmurs sweep;
There, swan-like, let me sing and die.
A land of slaves shall ne'er be mine,—
Dash down yon cup of Samian wine!—Lord Byron.

INDIVIDUALITIES.

Mme. Daudet, the widow of the celebrated French writer, has just been made a Chevalier of the Legion of Honor.

Mrs. Emma Tafanelli Korn of San Francisco is America's first veritable Portia, for Mrs. Korn is so far our only woman lawyer of Italian descent.

Miss Lucille Atcherson of Columbus, Ohio, has the distinction of being the first woman appointed by the United States government to a diplomatic post. President Harding recently announced her nomination to be secretary of embassy, Class 4.

Richard Mulcahy, Michael Collins' successor as commander-in-chief of the army of the Irish Provisional Government, is a man of uncommon brains, according to the Manchester Guardian, and of the particular kind of scientific imagination needed in warfare.

Noel Sargent, who is manager of the open-shop department of the National Association of Manufacturers, has taught economics and political science at the College of St. Thomas and the University of Minnesota. He is a graduate of the University of Washington.

E. V. Lucas, the essayist, whose writing is so reminiscent of Lamb and who has written the best biography of Lamb in the language, is assistant editor of Punch and literary director of Methuen's publishing house. It is said that though Lucas knows every one, he eschews literary circles and prefers actors and prize-fighters. The essayist is an ardent cricket fan and enjoys a reputation as a gourmet.

It is said of Sir William Orpen, the English portrait painter, that only serevants succeed in calling him Sir William. All men call him Bill and all women Orps. As an R. A., he was duly elected to the Athenæum Club, but it is said that he has never had the courage to enter that haunt of bishops and other staid persons. Orpen is by common consent a great painter and a great success. He has literally queues of distinguished persons waiting their turn to sit to him for their portraits.

The Maharajah of Rajpipla, the pure cast Hindu ruler of the Rajputana state, is visiting this country to study our institutions and our agriculture. The Maharajah is said to be one of the wealthiest of Indian princes—his annual revenue is in the neighborhood of $50,000,000—and one of the few not affected by the present native unrest. He belongs to the Sesodia régime and has most enlightened views. His itinerary includes the grain fields of Canada, where he will study the implements in actual use with a view to their adoption in India.

The Countess Carola Frederique Festetics de Tolna, who has arrived in New York to pass the winter in this country, is one of the most interesting and most modern of European semi-royalties. The Countess Carola is the youngest of the three daughters of the Prince Festetics and his wife, the former Lady Mary Hamilton, the divorced wife of the late Prince of Monaco. The countess, who is of the emancipated type of European woman, has maintained an extensive Paris establishment for some years and belongs to an advanced philosophical cult.

George H. Sutherland, now Associate Justice of the Supreme Court, whom President Harding appointed to succeed John H. Clarke when he recently resigned to devote himself to "reading, reflection, and the good of humanity," was formerly United States senator from Utah. The new Associate Justice was born in Buckinghamshire, England, 1862, educated in Utah and at the University of Michigan, married in 1883 to Rosamond Lee of Beaver, Utah, was admitted to the bar the same year, and began the practice of law in Salt Lake City in 1893. He was a member of the first Utah senate in '96. His terms in the National Senate were 1905-1911 and 1911-1917. He was president of the American Bar Association, 1916-17. Mr. Sutherland is the author of "Constitutional Power and World Affairs."

Mrs. Harriet de Kraft Woods, who was recently appointed superintendent of buildings and grounds of the Congressional Library—a post sometimes known as "housekeeper to the Congressional Library"—is the first woman to hold that feminine position. Mrs. Woods is the daughter of the late Admiral de Kraft, U. S. N., and the widow of Arthur T. Woods, professor of mechanical engineering in the University of Illinois. During her husband's life she aided him in all his technical writing, and after his death in 1893 became the secretary of a well-known consulting engineer of Chicago. In three years she had become manager of the Chicago office of the Railroad Gazette—of which her husband had at one time been associated editor. Concurrently, she acted as librarian of the Western Railway Club of Chicago. So it will be seen that Mrs. Woods brings to her new job an unusual degree of executive training. Her library career began twenty-two years ago in the humble capacity of a clerk. When her recent appointment was offered her she was in charge of one of the most important divisions of the copyright office. Her new duties involve the direct supervision of the laboring force—engineers, gardeners, charwomen, etc.—at work in the upkeep of the buildings and grounds of the Congressional Library.

MAIDS OF HONOUR.

Some Studies of Moods and Tenses of Various Female Charmers at the Court of Great Elizabeth.

Elizabeth had the sour fortune to be a great statesman in the form of a woman. She took her England through its most critical infancy, playing with Philip, teasing Alençon, beguiling the weary hours with the attentions of Leicester and Raleigh and Essex and no one knows how many more, but always with England uppermost. If she ever had any physical charms she outlived them, and died a poor, yellow old woman, with yellow teeth, and hair that had been golden or auburn, but looked like ashes at the last. And if her claims to strict propriety are faint, much may be forgiven. She seems often to have been in love and never to have held a lover's fidelity for long. But her court was brilliant, her day was dazzling, and she was a spiteful, cantankerous, crafty, wise and wonderful monarch. Hers was a day of great men rather than of idle gallantries. There was intrigue enough between the Catholic and Protestant parties, with plenty of menace from abroad. But she brought England through, not always honestly, but with the guile of those water fowl that pretend a broken wing and lure the hunter away from the nest and the fledglings. So Philip waited too long, and when he struck there was Great Drake supporting Great Elizabeth; and Great Howard, and all the other worthies of a great age, and Philip's kingdom began to go to smash and kept on going and all the gold of Peru couldn't stop it.

"Queen Elizabeth's Maids of Honour," by Violet Wilson, touches but lightly on problems of policy, but at times reflects the doings of the world in which the Virgin Queen played so grand a part. Many young noblewomen are discussed here, and there are some grim pictures of Mary Fitton, of Catherine Grey, of Mary Sidney, Countess of Pembroke, and Elizabeth Howard, and more—all with hard, naked foreheads, huge ruffs around their necks, and sleeves that looked stuffed with a feather bed. The gallery is rather full up with Elizabeths—Vernon, Bridges, Vere, et al. Not so gentle a galaxy as Mary Stuart's, but in some ways more sprightly; for:

Clever herself, Elizabeth had no patience with stupidity, but liked to surround herself with people whose quick brains were attuned to her own. The maids of honor were famous for their accomplishments: they spoke several languages, were good musicians, clever needle-women, graceful dancers, and proficient horsewomen. Nor were they behindhand in their domestic pursuits, being ever ready to try their hands at cookery when the palace cooks, usually "musical-headed Frenchmen," could be prevailed on to demonstrate the mysteries appertaining to sugar-plate, kissing comfits, ginger-breads, sugar meats, or the most delectable confectionery known as marchpane.

From their nearness to the queen's person, the maids of honor were objects of solicitude to the courtiers, who pressed, and not infrequently bribed them to further their suits with the queen. Sometimes they were successful, often they were not; so much depended on the nature of the favor sought, the personality of the suitor, the influence of the lady, and the caprice of the queen.

Walking the tightrope of propriety and statecraft was what was required of Elizabeth, and she had to do it. She did not wish to marry, as a husband would have been an encumbrance and she had a hard race to run. If she had married a Spaniard she would have incurred the enmity of France, and of Spain had she married a Frenchman. For like reasons she could not marry a Protestant, nor a Catholic. She could not make open war on Spain with her weak little island kingdom as it then was, and she would not let Spain alone. She took stock in the ventures of the profiteers of her day, then known as privateers, yet would grant them no letters of marque to distinguish them from pirates or protect them from the Spaniard or the hangman. Her whole life had to proceed on such a basis, clear to the end, and she saw it through with hardly a whimper. The Tudor blood was Welsh. So is Lloyd George.

Of her dangling with the widowed Lord Robert Dudley, Miss Wilson has this to say, in part:

At this crisis Elizabeth threw both parties into equal perplexity by creating Lord Robert, Earl of Leicester (accompanying the honor with the gift of Kenilworth Castle), at the same time saying that as she esteemed him "as her brother and best friend" he would make a suitable husband for Mary, Queen of Scots.

No one knew what to think, least of all Leicester, who regarded the suggestion as the work of Sir William Cecil, and expressly designed for his undoing. In perplexity he consulted Sir Nicholas Throckmorton, who suggested that he should test the queen's affection for himself by flirting with one of her ladies.

Leicester, being at his wit's end, said he would, and fixed on Lettice Knollys, the beautiful young Countess of Essex, for the dangerous experiment.

Once begun, the flirtation proceeded apace, to the alarm of the ladies trembling at the thought of what would happen when the queen became aware of it.

As Leicester avowedly designed to arouse Elizabeth's jealousy, he ostentatiously deserted her for the company of Lettice, who, pleased with a seeming conquest, did all she could to lure him on. The queen drew her own conclusions and drew them strong, so that even Leicester was aghast at the storm he had raised. Lettice fell from her high place in Elizabeth's friendship forever, whilst the maids of honor had a sorry time listening to the ravings of a jealous woman who heretofore had never dreamt of a rival.

Perhaps part of Elizabeth's repugnance to marriage may be found in her statement that the English ran after an heir to the throne more than the reigning sovereign; and she dearly loved to be run after. The court must form a suitable stretch for such a pursuit, and all must be in order:

Elizabeth wished to emphasize the importance of royalty, by establishing a monopoly of everything likely to enhance a queen. This, with so many ladies eager to emulate, if they could not rival their mistress, she found by no means easy. Did the queen wear silk stockings, then no more cloth hose for the ladies of the privy chamber. With their ankles all alluringly outlined by silk stockings, they waited for Elizabeth to state a new fashion, which hotfoot they must have, too. Lace ruffs, kept in place by wire "supportasses," were common neckwear at court, but the year of Ann Russell's wedding saw the introduction of an innovation which revolutionized ruffs. Mistress Dinghen, a Dutch woman, came to England, and proceeded to demonstrate the uses of starch. Englishwomen, quickly appreciating the possibilities of this new method, flocked to Mistress Dinghen, eagerly proffering the £5 fee which she charged for initiating pupils into the mysteries of starching, with an extra twenty shillings for instruction in making starch. Steel or silver poking sticks were next used in preference to the old-fashioned setting-sticks, and a new industry sprang into being.

Higgins, a tailor, established a great reputation for his ruffs or picadels, and his shop, in a road above Westminster called Piccadilly, held infinite variety of them, "either clogged with gold, silver, or silk lace of stately price, wrought all over with needle work, speckled and sparkled here and there with the sonne, the moone, the starres, and many other antiquities strange to beholde. Some are wrought with open worke down to the midst of the ruffe and further, some with purled lace so cloyd, and other gewgaws so pestered, as the ruffe is the least parte of itself."

So that's where starch came from, and perhaps how Piccadilly got its name. And one clearly sees, from the ankles of the maids of honor, that silk stockings are not a vice peculiar to our age. Flappers have always worn them when they could find the price, and maids differ little from century to century.

When St. Louis asked his faithful De Joinville whether he would not follow the example of Our Lord and wash the feet of the poor, the marshal replied, "Sire, those villains' feet I will not wash." But St. Louis did, and so did Elizabeth, keeping her Maundy at Greenwich and washing the feet of some thirty-nine old women, who were made as passable as possible first. But there was one aspect of the recurrent ceremony she did not like:

The reiteration made of her thirty-nine years was the least pleasing part of the Maundy ceremony to Elizabeth, who much disliked anything that called attention to the passage of time. She had been much put out by the behavior of three of her rejected suitors who had recently taken unto themselves wives. Thereby they caused extreme annoyance to the virgin Queen of England, who liked to imagine them languishing in single blessedness; when, instead, they wedded less exacting princesses, Elizabeth conceived herself very grievously affronted.

The liveliness of the court was from time to time enhanced with theatricals, and while the Globe may not have had much scenery at first, they had it at court; and as much trouble with props as any motion-picture studio:

The Master of the Revels needed to be a man of resource, for the actors were frequently exacting in the nature of their demands. One company sent in a request for "Hobby horses, wheat sheaves, bodies of men in timber, dishes for devil's eyes, devices for hell, the hell-mouth." Another set of players could not perform without a vizard for an ane's face; also a monster; seven dozen imitation eggs, sham whiting, mackerel, flounders and snowballs. The Earl of Leicester's company proved insistent for a vizard with a black beard; one similar with a red beard, and sufficient fir poles to represent a forest. Others clamoured for a device for counterfeiting Thunder and Lightning, a country-house, a city, a live fox and a wax cake.

When properties were not in stock they had to be made, and the Earl of Warwick's actors being about to present "The history of the Burnyng Rock," were particular that the rock should be adequately represented. The Master of Revels, wishful to please, borrowed a cloud for the purpose; thereafter trouble and expense fell heavily upon him.

Painters set to work to transform the cloud into a rock, but the paint refused to dry, so fires had to be kept burning day and night. As it still partook more of a cloud than rock in appearance, a load of ivy was sent for, to cover its obvious deficiencies. Then aqua-vitæ being burnt on the rock, twelvence had to be expended in order "to alay the smell thereof."

The next performers raised trouble over the damaged cloud, so Edward Tilney had to get "a hope and blew linnen cloth to mend the cloude that was borrowed and cut to serve the rock in the plaie of the burning knight."

And there were tournaments, and once Elizabeth thought virginity could be overdone and she would wed, in spite of what she had always said about the advantages of the single state. A youthful swain from France, nineteen years her junior, Duke of Anjou and son of Catherine de Medici, was selected. It was a rather cruel sort of business, in which the maids of honor took no very honorable part at the end. The love-starved queen met him and let herself fall in love with him. There was a great to-do when the French party came over:

The annual tournament in honor of the queen's accession was held, as usual, at Whitehall on November 17th. Elizabeth in the gallery paid scant attention to her champion, Sir Henry Lee, and other valiant knights, so engrossed was she by Alençon, who wooed her with persuasive tongue and ardent eyes. Elizabeth, fairly carried off her feet, forgot she was a queen, forgot her years, her austere virginity; everything, indeed, save the magic of love. Taking a ring from her finger, she gave it to Alençon, so openly that he, and all who saw the act, regarded it as a definite pledge of betrothal.

Ambassadors hastened back to despatch special couriers with the news; Londoners heard the report with delour; peddlers leaving town that night advertised it through the provinces along with their wares.

Then entered policy, and the marriage had to be prevented. The anti-French marriage party besieged the maids of honor, and they besieged the queen:

Ladies of the bedchamber foretold diminution of her power and loss of the nation's affection; Blanche Parry recalled the unhappiness of her sister Mary with Philip of Spain; Mary Radcliffe requoted Elizabeth's own arguments on the superiority of virginity; maids of honor with gusto repeated reasons the queen had used to thwart their own love affairs. In united chorus they wrung their hands and besought her not to throw herself away upon a beardless boy.

Morning found the ladies exhausted but triumphant, and Elizabeth resolved to remain a spinster. Having dried their eyes and repaired the damage to their complexions, maids of honor assured the anxious courtiers without that all would be well, as Her Majesty had sent a message to Sir Christopher Hatton, requesting him to come at once in order to help her out of a very difficult situation.

Alençon paid an early visit with all the confidence of an assured lover, but his eager protestations of affection were chilled by the queen's evident aversion, and the presence of an undoubtedly hostile third party.

Elizabeth in eulogistic terms professed the deepest affection for monsieur, and though she had decided never to marry she begged that he would think of her as a sister.

Monsieur, angry and mortified, flatly refused to do anything of the sort; he declared that Englishwomen were as fickle as their climate, and burst into tears.

Elizabeth could not bear to see her "little frog" cry, and drying his eyes with her own handkerchief, endeavored to console him with words "even more tender than the occasion demanded."

The Spanish business began to blow up warm, and Miss Wilson gives us this succinct but vivid and human account of a passage between the queen and the Spanish ambassador:

Though the exploits of the explorers did much to enhance the prestige of English seamanship, they undoubtedly led to strained relations with Spain, who regarded their boldest exploits as sheer acts of piracy. Bernardino de Mendoza, the Spanish Ambassador, acting under instructions from King Philip, went down to see Elizabeth at Richmond, with a plain request that she would restore the plunder Drake had taken from Spanish treasure ships. The queen in pained surprise said it was the first she had heard of the matter; nor would she depart from ignorance, though Mendoza assured her that he had himself been telling her of it for the past three and a half years.

With cynical skill the Spaniard worked Elizabeth into a white heat of fury, by hinting that if she remained obdurately deaf it might be necessary to see if the roar of Spanish cannon could improve her defective hearing. Having conveyed the hint and set Elizabeth hectoring, he waived the matter as not worth disputing with "a lady so beautiful that even lions would crouch before her." "She is so vain and flighty that her anger was soothed at hearing this," wrote the ambassador in his account of the interview, when he referred to Elizabeth not as a lion-taming lady, but a "rusty old weather cock" veering with every breeze.

This proud but pathetic majesty had much to fear from the maids. They could not help it; nobody could. It was just human nature, imperfectly disciplined. She fell in love with the step-son of her old lover, Leicester; fell in love when she was old and lonely, with a young philanderer of the court, who abused his advantage and treated her with wilful caprice. He demanded a monopoly of her favors, and when she showed some kindness to a rival provoked a duel and got himself wounded, and after the caustic observation on Elizabeth's part that some one ought to take him down, he made it up in this crude fashion:

Essex soon made his peace, as well he knew how; a caressing gesture, a few endearing words, such were treasures to Elizabeth by their rarity. The flowing compliments which slipped so easily from Raleigh's facile tongue were difficult to Essex. Indeed, his flattery of the queen was so stilted that Sir Francis Bacon took him to task on the subject, saying, "a man may read your formality in your countenance; whereas it ought to be done familiarly and with an air of interest."

Frances Walsingham, Sir Philip Sidney's widow, could have told the queen the difference between my Lord of Essex's real and artificial love-making, for her he wooed, won, and secretly married. The news when it came to the queen's ears caused her paroxysms of jealous misery which preyed alike on mind and temper. The whole court in general, and the ladies of the privy chamber in particular, suffered vicariously, as an apprehensive courtier informed Lord Talbot:

"If she could overcome her passion against my Lord of Essex for his marriage, no doubt she would be much quieter; yet doth she use it more temperately than was thought for, and God be thanked, doth not strike all she threatens. The earl doth use it with good temper, concealing his marriage as much as so open a matter may be; not that he denies it to any, but for Her Majesty's better satisfaction is pleased that my lady shall live very retired in her mother's house."

Before long both queen and wife had common cause together, for neither could claim Essex's vagrant affection for long, and he began to pay great attention to Lady Mary Howard, Her Majesty's pretty cup-bearer.

And there is the note of bitterness on Ann Russell's wedding:

After the feast came a masque performed by the maids of honor. The girls had invented a new dance especially for the occasion, and "each had a shirt of cloth of silver, a rich waistcoat wrought with silkes and gold and silver, a mantell of carnation taffeta cast under the arme, and their hair loose about their shoulders curiously knotted and interlaced." Into the hall they came led by Mary Fitton, "and delicate it was to see eight ladies so pretty and richly attired."

The masque ended in great applause from the on-lookers, when vivacious Mary Fitton, approaching the queen, entreated that she would come and join in the dancing.

"Who art thou?" inquired Elizabeth.

"Affection," replied Mary Fitton, and the word stung the queen to the quick.

"Affection! Affection is false," quoth she bitterly. "Yet Her Majestie rose and dawnsed."

The reader of this book will find in it a great deal of interest about the maids of honor, but the best of it serves as a mirror to reflect the Virgin Queen, and reflect her as a human being rather than a depersonalized agency of statecraft. The treatment is sympathetic and the reader may supply the analysis himself. As a view of a great age it is well worth while. The illustrations are especially interesting and historically valuable, and include a reproduction of a painting in the collection of Lord De L'Isle and Dudley, showing Elizabeth dancing with the Earl of Leicester.

QUEEN ELIZABETH'S MAIDS OF HONOUR. By Violet Wilson. New York: E. P. Dutton & Co.; $8.

BANKING AND INVESTMENT NEWS.

San Francisco bank clearings for the week ended September 30, 1922, were $149,600,000; for the corresponding week of last year, $140,000,000; an increase of $9,600,000.

There appears on the horizon no other adequate source of help but the United States if Europe is to be brought back to a healthy condition within the near future, Dr. Henry A. E. Chandler, economist of the National Bank of Commerce in New York, declares. "During the four years that have elapsed upon business conditions with sufficient force to prevent the restoration of the productive power of some of the principal nations of Europe.

"On the other hand, there is a deadlock in international opinion which in many ways is the more difficult to solve. The latter arises chiefly from the inability of the nations to understand the insurmountable difficulties in each other's problems.

"The fact is that there exists in France as in Germany a very complicated and difficult condition of affairs. Just as it appears impossible for Germany to get upon her feet without a respite, so it appears impossible for France, without reparations or financial help from other countries, to meet the obligations that face her. And even if Great Britain could afford to, and were willing to, cancel the entire French debt to her without relief from her debts to the United States, France could not entirely forego reparation payments for any considerable time without other substantial financial help from the outside.

"This is the central fact of the situation in Europe. It does not, of course, include many important factors that must be considered before sound conditions can be established. Many of these questions, notwithstanding the pressing nature of some of the situations they involve, must wait for their final solution until the deadlock has been broken. The central fact in the present European situation, then, involves principally two things:

"First, whatever may be the theoretical capacity of several of the European nations, the governments (through which all national policy must in the end be expressed) face a combination of economic and financial burdens that they can not carry unaided.

"Second, partly because of this financial deadlock, and partly because of the misunderstanding of each other, European nations worn nerveless by long attempts at working out their own problems, have been driven farther and farther into a deadlock of opposing opinion.

"The evidence appears well nigh overwhelming that Europe is unable to pull herself out of this dilemma without help. Europe must have help in two ways:

With both coal strikes settled and the railway shopmen's strike practically over, surprise has been expressed in some quarters that the market did not respond vigorously to the good news. But this is not the way of Wall Street. The outcome had been long expected and discounted marketwise, so that on its announcement there was a wave of profit-taking whose effect has been augmented by efforts of the bearish element.

However, in a bull market it is quite normal to have a fair setback about the middle of September and, considering the extent of the previous advances, the declines have been moderate and have resulted in an increased short interest in many stocks and improvement in the technical position. Bears lay much store by the fresh complications in Europe brought about by the new snarl in the German reparations matter and, what is more serious, the danger of general war in the Near East in consequence of the Turkish successes and the Soviet attitude. However, this latter menace is likely to bring about ultimately a closed rapprochement between the Allies and the strong stand taken by Great Britain is apt to check very shortly the ambitions of the Turk.

Coal production is now being pushed to the utmost, and the question of adequate supplies is largely dependent on the railroads. For some months there will be undoubtedly a scarcity of coal in some districts and resulting high prices, but this condition is temporary. The steel industry is slowly getting back into its stride, with the prospect of continued improvement throughout the balance of the year.

Reports from the various industries continue in the main encouraging. The spectacular shut-down of the Ford works reflects conditions applying to that particular company, or, possibly, merely the mental attitude of its owner. The companies manufacturing railroad equipment are receiving a flood of orders. The locomotive companies are especially rushed and are steadily increasing operations. According to a recent statement of President Vaucrain, Baldwin, which is now operating at about 50 per cent. capacity, will be working at full capacity by the end of the year. The significance of this can be realized when it is remembered that this company can earn all charges and dividends with a liberal margin over when operations for the year average only 30 per cent. capacity. The locomotive business is peculiar in that it fluctuates enormously from year to year, and consequently large profits must be exacted.—The Trader.

It would seem to be a sign of increasing prosperity in Europe if people there have money to invest in America. In discussing bond market conditions this summer the Guaranty Survey, published by the Guaranty Trust Company of New York, calls attention to a recent growing demand from abroad for American securities: "This demand has come chiefly from Holland and Switzerland, where money rates are low and surplus funds in large amount appear to be available for investment. Interest is centered in Liberty Bonds and foreign dollar bonds issued in the United States, which are tax-free to non-resident aliens, as well as in the standard railroad issues with which foreign purchasers are familiar."

The ranks of those lined up against the dismemberment of the Southern Pacific-Central Pacific system in this state have been strengthened by the addition of the Central California Traffic Association, a body composed of traffic managers of some of the greatest business organizations in this part of the state.

Convinced that dissolution of this great rail system would mean added freight bills to the extent of several million dollars every year and inferior service due to the two-line haul, the executive committee of this organization, of which A. T. White, traffic manager of the Emporium, is chairman, passed resolutions backing up the chambers of commerce and civic organizations throughout the state which are going before the Interstate Commerce Commission to state the public's side of the case.

The shippers declare they are not interested in the success of any railroad, but in this case are convinced that if the Union Pacific secures the dismemberment of the S. P. C. P. system, as it asks, the men who pay freight bills will be the real losers.

The California Electric Railway Association, whose membership includes electric transportation companies in San Francisco, Los Angeles, Bakersfield, Fresno, San Jose, Stockton, Sacramento, San Diego and many other parts of the state, also has passed resolutions strongly protesting the unmerger, and has sent copies of the protest to the Interstate Commerce Commission and members of Congress interested.

Most of the organizations throughout the state which have heard arguments on the question of dismemberment have gone on record against it and have joined the shippers' committee against dismemberment in planning to present the public's case to the commission.

Essentially a product of evolution, the Investment Bankers' Association of America was formed as a result of conferences on other matters held between Eastern and Western bond dealers. Organization was perfected in New York on August 8, 1912, with 181 main and 13 branch offices on the rolls. Within the decade this number has increased to 555 main and 258 branch office memberships—a 200 per cent. increase in nine years.

George B. Caldwell, at the time with the Continental and Commercial Trust and Savings Bank, Chicago, was the founder of the organization and its first president, serving until 1914—a two-year administration. In addition to "the father of the association," as he is known, the following men played important rôles in initial activities, and the policies they laid down have been carried through to the present time by the organization without important deviation: Lewis B. Franklin,

BRADFORD, KIMBALL & Co.

FORMERLY
BRADFORD, WEEDEN & CO

DEALERS IN GOVERNMENT, MUNICIPAL
AND CORPORATION BONDS

SECOND FLOOR
Insurance Exchange Building
San Francisco

Allen G. Hoyt, William R. Compton, Warren S. Hayden, C. T. Williams, and a number of others. With a vastly larger membership than was registered in its early days, the association still stands committed to its original tenets.

The first convention of the organization was held in New York on November 21, 1912. It has met annually during the intervening years in the following cities in order: Chicago, Philadelphia, Denver, Cincinnati, Baltimore, Atlantic City, St. Louis, Boston, and New Orleans, where last year a record attendance of 890 was registered. St. Louis, in 1919, had recorded 700 delegates, Boston the next year reporting 650 in attendance.

There had come about, before organization among the bond dealers, a growing feeling of the importance that the investment banking business was assuming. The conviction had been gaining strength that investment banking occupied a distinct and separate field from

INVESTMENT SECURITIES

Government, Municipal and Corporation Bonds in denominations of $100, $500, and $1000 for the investment of Banks, Trust Funds, and Individual Investors. Inquiries Invited.

HUNTER, DULIN & Co.

THE SECOND FLOOR—
256 MONTGOMERY ST.

Los Angeles Pasadena San Francisco Oakland San Diego

general banking. While recognizing that competition is an incentive in any line of business, the dealers also faced the fact that the investment banking business is by nature somewhat coöperative, and that investment bankers of the United States and Canada have much in common. The formation of a syndicate is essentially the formation of a temporary partnership, it was clear.

With the increasing size of issues offered to the public many problems were presented for solution, to say nothing of legislation in the several states and in Congress. In addition public utility commissions and their rulings affected the value of securities. All these factors, together with many others, had created the feeling that some organized effort must be made to bring together the legitimate dealers of the country. Today the organization comprehends in its membership 95 per

NEW ISSUE

to Yield

6 1/4%
Tax Exempt

The obligation of an established agricultural community

FREEMAN
SMITH
&
CAMP
Co.

SECOND FLOOR
FIRST NATIONAL BANK BLDG.
Douglas 2121

since the armistice closed the great war there has always existed a strong hope that conditions in Europe were gradually improving, and that a solution would finally be found for the great conflict of interests that has been impeding Europe's recovery," Dr. Chandler writes in the October issue of the bank's magazine, Commerce Monthly.

"The occurrences of recent months, however, have finally brought many people all over

STRASSBURGER
private wires to principal financial and commercial centers.

STOCKS - BONDS
COTTON - GRAIN
COMMODITIES

133 Montgomery Street
San Francisco

Members San Francisco Stock & Bond
Exchange & Chicago Board of Trade
— Douglas 2220 —

the world to recognize what some of the ablest observers in Europe have long ago seen, namely, that there exists in the status quo left by the war and by the treaty of peace a series of economic, financial and political conditions that have been slowly but surely driving some of the principal European nations into a deadlock which in some ways becomes set harder and harder with each successive month.

"This deadlock is two-fold in nature. On the one hand, a series of economic conditions and inter-governmental financial obligations arising out of the war have forced governments into financial practices which react

McDONNELL & Co.

And Other Leading Exchanges
633 Market St., at New Montgomery
SAN FRANCISCO
TELEPHONE SUTTER 7676
N. Y. Office, 120 Broadway
Los Angeles, 634 So. Spring St.

PRIVATE WIRES

CARSTENS & EARLES, INCORPORATED

GOVERNMENT, MUNICIPAL
AND CORPORATION BONDS

ESTABLISHED 1891

Insurance Exchange Building
San Francisco

Telephone Sutter 4142

SEATTLE LOS ANGELES SPOKANE SAN FRANCISCO

Private Wires
Coast to Coast

E. F. Hutton & Co.

MEMBERS
NEW YORK STOCK EXCHANGE
HUTTON BUILDING
Montgomery and Bush Sts.
HOTEL ST. FRANCIS
DEL MONTE HOTEL

cent. of the better investment bankers of the United States and Canada.

As the association has grown the board of governors, which meets quarterly for this and other purposes, has exercised greater care in consideration of applications for membership quantity membership, with the result that admission to membership has become a desired privilege to be kept at high value.

Up to thirty years ago the distribution of investment securities had been carried on principally by houses located in New York, Boston, and Philadelphia. In those days the modern syndicate was unknown; in fact such and the listing of them is indicative of the scope and activities of the organization: business practice and ethics, constitution and by-laws, education, financing, and auditing, foreign securities, fraudulent advertising, government bond, industrial securities, irrigation securities, legislation, marine securities, membership, municipal securities, publicity, public service securities, railroad securities, real estate securities, syndicate agreements, and taxation.

As a rule the chairman of each committee is a member of the governing board, thus establishing contact of that body with committee work.

With an active board and committees at work, the secretary is concerned in keeping in touch with all, in referring matters between committees, carrying out the programmes mapped out, and conducting the general business of the association. The duty of appearing at hearings and stating the position of the association upon any public question comes from the president, the board of governors, or its committees.

Last year the organization took a great forward step in the formation of group organizations blanketing every geographical division of the country, California taking the lead in this expansion policy. The zeal and co-operation they exhibited was largely responsible for the enhanced growth the organization experienced last year.

When California won the 1922 convention at New Orleans last year the executive committee of the California group determined to stage, not only a successful convention, as far as thoroughgoing handling by the host committees could insure it, but to take maximum advantage of the opportunity to show their fellow investment bankers from beyond the Rockies an adequate cross-section of the scenic, agricultural, and industrial resources of the state. They pledged themselves to see to it that the men who have helped underwrite and market the securities of California's large capital enterprises, and who have been familiar with the development of those resources through absorption of analysis and reports, should see at first hand the reality. Hence the week's swing through Sacramento, Stockton, Fresno, Los Angeles, Santa Barbara, en route to Del Monte for the convention, October 9th-12th, with the post-convention day in San Francisco.

California and the bankers both will be material gainers as the result of the better acquaintanceship.—Cyrus Peirce.

At the regular meeting of the board of trustees of the Equitable Trust Company of New York, held September 20, 1922, a quarterly dividend of 4 per cent. was declared on the outstanding capital stock of the company, payable September 30, 1922, to stockholders of record September 22, 1922.

Stripped to its essentials, the so-called Water and Power Act proposes the issuance of $500,000,000 of state bonds to put the State of California into the electrical power business. This is six times the present bonded indebtedness of the state and twice the bonded indebtedness of the State of New York, which has four times the assessed valuation of California.

California today leads the world in electrical power development. Nowhere else is power so plentiful and so cheap. Private enterprise has accomplished this and may be depended upon to keep pace with the growing needs of the state.

But as the growth of California proceeds the state will need more and better country highways, more schools and more public buildings. The state will have to finance them. Private enterprise will not do it.

The issuance of $500,000,000 of bonds would stretch California's credit to the breaking point. Even if the Water and Power Act accomplished everything that its advocates claimed for it California would be no better off than it is at present, with the private producers of electrical power operating under the control of the state railroad commission. The people of the state have everything to lose and nothing to gain in the proposed experiment.

Why should California bond itself to the limit to go into the power business when it is going to need its credits to discharge properly the legitimate functions of the state government? The answer is obvious to every thinking person, and intelligent voters of California may be depended upon to defeat the preposterous water and power scheme at the polls next November.

Despite the recent strikes of shopmen and coal workers, resulting in traffic congestion on Eastern lines and a car shortage in the West, new records in the loading of freight cars with commercial products for shipment throughout the country were established during September by the Southern Pacific Company on its Pacific system.

Records revealed by J. H. Dyer, general manager of the company at San Francisco, show that the loading of cars during the past month increased 15 per cent., as compared with September, 1921, and September, 1920.

The large increase in loadings was considered as most gratifying by officials of the Southern Pacific Company. They pointed out that the report proved conclusively the recent shopmen's strike had not acted to curtail traffic on the lines of the company or to place large numbers of cars out of commission.

Completed reports from all districts of the system show that for the first twenty-seven days of September this year a total of 82,421 cars were loaded with consignments of freight. For the same period in September, 1921, the total was 71,782 cars. The loading for this period of September, 1920, totaled 71,361 cars.

The tabulation reveals that the average daily loading of cars for September of this year amounted to 3053 on the Pacific system, as compared with a daily average of 2659 cars for the same period a year ago, or an increase of 394 cars per day.

With records for the entire month of September of this year rapidly being completed, it was indicated the car loadings for the month amounted to approximately 91,500, as compared with a total of 79,400 cars for September, 1921, and 79,303 cars for September, 1920. This was an increase of approximately 12,100 cars for the past month over September a year ago.

Mr. F. A. Freeman, president, and Mr. Frank W. Camp, secretary of the Freeman, Smith & Camp Company are in San Francisco prior to the Investment Bankers' Convention at Del Monte in order to confer on matters affecting the California offices of the company.

The foremost question of the moment is whether the remarkable activity of the mid-summer months will be followed by a period of gradually and conservatively increased business or whether it is the forerunner of a period of secondary inflation. The indications point clearly to the conclusion that good business based primarily on domestic requirements is ahead for the autumn months, but that inflation in the generally accepted sense will not occur, says the National Bank of Commerce of New York.

Manufacture is on a satisfactory basis, excepting in so far as some industries have suffered from lack of coal and inadequate transportation facilities. Crop yields are excellent for practically all crops except cotton, according to the September estimates, and the forecast is for a cotton crop more than two million bales above that of last year. Unemployment is practically non-existent. Retail and wholesale business in the United States during the autumn will show considerable expansion over that of the corresponding period of 1921.

It must nevertheless be recognized that even though crops are large, dollar wheat, a considerable decline in the price of hogs since the first of June, and relatively low prices of other agricultural products have reduced the purchasing power of the farmer. The situation is similar in respect to other important classes of raw materials. These conditions and the fact that not far from one million men were continuously out of work as a result of strikes during the greater part of the summer are major factors which have effectively blocked inflation at this time. Business is being booked for requirements of the immediate future and forward buying is cautious. Good business is assured, but it is not reasonable to expect a boom.

Conditions abroad and the state of the exchanges are not such as to encourage any idea that there is to be any large increase in European business in the near future. Exports from the United States to countries where general business shows improvement, such as Australia, the leading South American countries, Central America and the West Indies, will probably increase somewhat, but these countries are primarily dependent on conditions in the international market for raw materials, chiefly agricultural, and their inhabitants are therefore in a position differing in no important way from that of the American farmer. They will unquestionably buy more freely than they bought last year, but not extravagantly.

It may well be that prices in some lines may continue to tend upward as price and wage readjustment proceeds, but any rapid general upward tendency in the prices of goods ready for the ultimate consumer would be checked by unwillingness and inability on the part of purchasers throughout the world to follow up the market. Manufacturers and merchants will still find it essential to pursue a policy of careful and economical operation, for the best prospect of profits lies, not in rapidly rising prices, but in operating efficiency and gradually expanding volume of business.

The probable course of money rates during the next few months must be judged in connection with several factors, namely, the degree of activity in general business, the course of government refunding operations, the amount of slack present in the leading capacity of the individual banks of the country and the change in the effect of crop-moving requirements on the money situation by reason of the operations of the Federal Reserve system.

One of the prime purposes of the establishment of the Federal Reserve system was to

LOGAN & BRYAN

STOCK, BOND, COTTON, COFFEE,
SUGAR AND GRAIN BROKERS

DIRECT PRIVATE WIRES

Pacific to Atlantic—U. S. and Canada

MEMBERS:

NEW YORK STOCK EXCHANGE
BOSTON STOCK EXCHANGE
CHICAGO STOCK EXCHANGE
NEW YORK COTTON EXCHANGE
NEW YORK COFFEE EXCHANGE
NEW YORK PRODUCE EXCHANGE
NEW ORLEANS COTTON EXCHANGE
PITTSBURG STOCK EXCHANGE
CHICAGO BOARD OF TRADE
MINNEAPOLIS CHAMBER OF COMMERCE
WINNIPEG GRAIN EXCHANGE
ST. LOUIS MERCHANTS EXCHANGE
SALT LAKE CITY STOCK EXCHANGE
LOS ANGELES STOCK EXCHANGE
PHILADELPHIA BOURSE
MONTREAL BOARD OF TRADE

SAN FRANCISCO BRANCH OFFICES AT
401 Montgomery Street

and
Merchants Exchange Bldg.

Telephone Garfield 3000

R. C. JENKINS, C. S. LAWRENCE,
San Francisco Managers

overcome the seasonal stringency which prior to that time had been a characteristic of the money market of this country. The abnormal business conditions which prevailed from the autumn of 1914 until midsummer of 1921 made it impossible to judge with any accuracy the probable effectiveness of the system in stabilizing the money market through the crop-moving season. During the autumn

5% Yield on a Government Bond

We offer Dominion of Canada 5's, due May 1, 1952, non-callable until 1942 and payable in U. S. Currency.

Canadian exchange has reached par. Obligations of the Canadian Government are everywhere in high standing and their security is unquestioned.

Call, write or telephone
for investment service!

ANGLO-CALIFORNIA TRUST COMPANY

COMMERCIAL SAVINGS TRUST BOND DEPARTMENT

"The City Wide Bank"

Market & Sansome Streets

San Francisco

MARKET-MCALLISTER

AND JONES STREETS

101 MARKET

MISSION AND 16TH

FILLMORE AND CEAR

THIRD AND 20TH

months of 1921 the dominant factor in the money market was the rapid liquidation of loans as a result of the general business readjustment then in progress. The current season is the first since the passage of the Federal Reserve Act when the machinery then established has had the opportunity to function under reasonably normal conditions.

INVESTMENT SECURITIES

COMMERCIAL PAPER
AND ACCEPTANCES

GOVERNMENT
MUNICIPAL

AND CORPORATION
BONDS

BOND & GOODWIN & TUCKER

AMERICAN NATIONAL BANK BUILDING

SAN FRANCISCO

LOS ANGELES SEATTLE PORTLAND

H. M. Hinchman W. B. Wentz W. L. W. Miller
Hinchman, Wentz & Miller
General Agents
Fire
Automobile INSURANCE
Liability
Plate Glass
Compensation
30 Leidesdorf St. SAN FRANCISCO
Telephone Sutter 437

a form of distribution really began to assume national proportions less than fifteen years ago. Ten or twelve years ago as corporate financing developed, as municipal financing grew in amount, the dealers found it necessary to cooperate more closely in distributing. About that time it was estimated that $1,557,146,000 in corporate securities and $400,000,000 in state and municipal securities were distributed to the investing public, as compared with $1,826,498,000 in corporate securities and $1,030,000,000 in state and municipal securi-

BONDS
$15,000,000
Cudahy Packing Company
15-Year Sinking Fund 5½% Gold Debentures
Due October 1, 1937
George H. Burr & Co.
KOHL BUILDING
SAN FRANCISCO
NEW YORK BOSTON PHILADELPHIA SCRANTON
LOS ANGELES ATLANTA CHICAGO ST. LOUIS
CLEVELAND DETROIT PITTSBURG SEATTLE
"A National Yet Personal Service"

ties for the latest available annual period. The policies of the Investment Bankers' Association are laid down by the board of governors and its officers, and these policies are executed by the standing committees of the organization. Appointed each year, these committees are active in fact and not theoretically. Appointment as a member of a committee means work and travel in conferences and entails study and a large correspondence. No individual is asked to serve unless willing to give of his time to the work to be undertaken.

Nineteen committees are now functioning.

Our First Concern
We are interested, first of all, in the excellence of the security behind any issue of bonds offered by us to investors. Then we are interested in securing for our clients the highest yield consistent with such security.
WM. R. STAATS CO.
Established 1887
Alexander Bldg., Montgomery St., cor. of Bush
SAN FRANCISCO
Telephone Kearny 301
LOS ANGELES SAN DIEGO PASADENA

is nevertheless noteworthy that although large crops were moved very rapidly during the fall months of 1921, the resultant demand for money did not check the steady decline in money rates.

On the basis of current conditions and the factors referred to above, there is no justification for expecting any sharp change in money rates in the near future, although such change as takes place is likely to be in the direction of slightly higher rates.

Captain Thomas Harold Messer, C. E., U. S. A. (retired), announces that he has resumed private practice as consulting engineer, with executive offices in the Mills Building, San Francisco. Telephone Garfield 733. With eighteen years of technical training and practical experience in building construction problems, architectural and landscape development, city and country planning, and civic betterment, he offers expert personal service.

Forty-six years ago there was only one telephone in the world. Today there are 14,000,000 instruments in the United States alone.

At a marriage ceremony in India the bride stands on a large plate filled with milk and rose colored sweetmeats.

BOOKS ON THE TABLE.

"This Freedom" suffers from the malady that afflicts all thematic novels—that of an arbitrary decision in a factitious case. It can not be otherwise with a thematic novel unless like a certain recent play it offers two endings, and then it is the reader's choice that is arbitrary. The moral of all which is that it is both fatal and impossible to generalize, though generalize one must to solve a general problem. The old query rears its head whether literature is a legitimate vehicle for moral questions. The answer, of course, depends on one's personal ethical convictions. But the query is a legitimate one, and there is the inevitable fact that a solution to a social, moral, or ethical problem is not equal to that of a mathematical problem. The former is written to support a foregone conclusion; the latter is the inevitable result of its premises.

But to leave formulas and get down to facts. Mr. Hutchinson has written a powerful defense for his brief, which is that a married woman's first allegiance is to her children. Stated thus baldly the case seems too obvious to need treatment. But it is the obverse of the medal that engages Mr. Hutchinson's interests and sympathies. Seen from the other angle of the paradox, the theme of "This Freedom" is whether or not a married woman has a right to an independent career. Beyond a doubt the individualists will chorus a mighty affirmative to this bald statement. The question is truly a vexatious one—in print. Personally, we have a theory that Rosalie's case would never arise in the three dimensions of reality, or if it did, would be in the freak case—and Mr. Hutchinson hints that his heroine was such a one—of a dual personality. There are women undoubtedly who are as engrossed in business or career as Rosalie was—that is, to the degree rarely achieved by either sex where the interest in work absorbs everything else. Such a woman, we maintain, would not have married, or if she had would have proved so unsatisfactory a mate that the marriage would not have endured long enough to work the havoc wrought by Rosalie's and Harry's. There may be—but we have not known them—women capable of the dual personality exhibited by Rosalie of business machine—she was a banker—and emotional parent. But at least, fortunately, their number is not great. The female of the species is usually either a characteristic example of the gentler and more emotional sex or she belongs, when reason outweighs emotion, to what is latterly called the third sex. Rosalie marvelously combined these two phenomena. It is hard to imagine that one so affectionate, so emotional as she would have so relentlessly and terribly sacrificed her family. Still, an extraordinary, a freakish dual personality might have done so. Only—we repeat—such are, by the law of chance, rare. Rosalie is admitted by her author to be an unusual character. Why apply her problems to ordinary mortals? The majority of her sex are by the nature of things primarily mothers. Surely we can afford the luxury of a few feminine bankers who are most likely spinsters, nine out of ten times.

Otherwise, and we have treated its problem first because it is that that will engage the instant and clamorous attention of the public, "This Freedom" is a striking piece of work, and a much more artistic one than "If Winter Comes." In both these novels Mr. Hutchinson's characterization is remarkably fine and the plot of "This Freedom" shows greater dramatic power than the former book. There is a wonderful drive about it. It is a thing that, having read, one could not forget. This is partly due to a rather mannered presentation of material in "This Freedom." Unless we are mistaken, Mr. Hutchinson has taken a leaf from Edgar Lee Masters' method in "Domesday Book." Sometimes the affectation of legal phraseology is identical. It is certainly not without power and it is conducive to verisimilitude. But let us pray all the gods that ever were imagined that the custom will not be generally adopted. Once in the case of Mr. Masters and twice in the case of Mr. Hutchinson are decidedly enough. If the legal treatment affected by these gentlemen, combined with their common delusion of being the god in the machinery of destiny, becomes general we shall eschew all novels and live happily ever after. Meanwhile, "This Freedom" is eminently worth reading—though we wish it were possible for its author to patent his method. Already we can see a ghastly long line of lesser gods from machines showing the strings with which they pull their puppets and philosophizing in a vein half way between Dickens and E. L. Masters between pulls. Please, Mr. Hutchinson, patent it! But as for the question answered by "This Freedom"—a novel can prove nothing. All this one proves is that A. S. M. believes a woman's place is in the home, and doubtless he knows. He is a bachelor. R. G.

Notes of Books and Authors

The author of a book of French recipes recently reviewed in these columns, Xavier Raskin, whose practice of French cooking has been largely got in America, has for many years been the chef in the family of Mrs. Elliott McAllister. M. Raskin's book, "The French Chef in Private American Families" (Rand, McNally & Co.), is an exhaustive treatment of French recipes adapted to American cooking conditions.

The Princeton University Press is preparing the fifth edition of Professor Edwin Grant Conklin's "Heredity and Environment in the Development of Men." This will be the ninth printing of this important book. Revised with every new printing, its sales, instead of dropping off, show a steady increase.

"Memories of Travel," by Viscount Bryce, will be published early in 1923 by the Macmillan Company. These observations and impressions of a veritable citizen of the world will carry the reader to such unusual scenes of travel as Iceland, the Altai Mountains, and the Marsh of Suworov, as well as showing fresh aspects of Palestine, the isles of the Pacific, and the scenery of North America.

In answering the question, "Which is your favorite among all the characters in your books?" put to him recently by the London Bookman, Mr. Locke made a characteristically "Lockean" reply, "Perhaps Septimus, who has always struck me as being rather a dear ass." Dodd, Mead & Co. have announced a new story by Locke, "The Tale of Triona," for early publication.

A book for artists, architects, and all other lovers of beauty is "Villas of Florence and Tuscany," by Harold Donaldson Eberlein (J. B. Lippincott Company). It consists of three hundred photographic illustrations of the finest examples of Italian villas, taken by the author and accompanied by five chapters of descriptive text.

It is not generally known that Gilbert Frankau, the author of "The Love Story of Alette Brunton" (The Century Company) new this year, "Peter Jameson," a success of yesteryear, etc., was at twenty-one president of a large corporation and a thoroughgoing business man. He sold out at great loss early in the days of the world war, enlisting in the British army as a private. He was a field gunner on the western front. Later he was sent to Italy on a special mission. He suffered shell-shock while on the peninsula expedition, and was invalided out of the service with permanent rank as captain. But Mr. Frankau never uses his military title.

Lord Dunsany's first work of fiction will be published this fall under the title "Don Rodriguez." He prefaces the book with the following: "I have chosen a pleasant tale for you in a happy land. I have youth to show you, and an ancient sword, birds, flowers, and sunlight, in a picture unharmed by any dreams of commerce."

"The Stage Life of Mrs. Stirling," by Percy Allen, has just been published by the Duttons. So long, so active, and so important was that life that the volume becomes practically a history of the London stage during the nineteenth century. Percy Allen, who is Mrs. Stirling's grandson, makes the narrative vivid and fascinating, filled with the color and the action of the days when the London theatres housed so many geniuses. For, as he well says, the story of her life links up the stage of the Siddons, the Kembles, and the Keans with that of the Irvings, Miss Ellen Terry, and the Bancrofts. There are many good stories of famous actors and actresses and the volume is illustrated with pictures of Mrs. Stirling and others, some of them reproduced from paintings in the Garrick Club.

Bonds for Investment

MUNICIPALS IRRIGATION DISTRICTS CORPORATIONS

Specialists in Safety

Anglo London Paris Company

One Sansome Street San Francisco
Phone Kearny 5600

What the Poets think of

A CRITICAL FABLE

FROM THE PUBLISHER'S MAIL BAG

"I intended only to dip into it and keep the rest for a forthcoming weekend in the Berkshires. But—almost against my will—I read the book without a break save those caused by punctuating chuckles. It is both a witty and incisive piece of work. . . . My congratulations."

Louis Untermeyer.

"'A Critical Fable' is not only far and away the cleverest thing I have seen in many a moon, but it contains the finest and most penetrating criticism I have ever seen of the poets in question. . . . I foresee that some poets, otherwise of the hour, may live by their mention in it. . . . The book sums up our poetic revival, or the leading figures in it, better than anything that has come out of the movement."

Jessie B. Rittenhouse.

"I don't know when I have been more amused by anything than I have by 'A Critical Fable.' It is a pity my collateral ancestor can not read his audacious imitator; he would enjoy him."

Amy Lowell.

WHO WROTE IT?

Picture cover
Title-page in two colors
$1.00

HOUGHTON MIFFLIN CO.

Boston New York San Francisco
612 Howard St.

The FRENCH AMERICAN BANK OF SAN FRANCISCO

108 SUTTER STREET
Commercial Checking Savings
RESOURCES OVER - - $16,000,000

A General Banking Business Transacted.

COMMERCIAL AND PERSONAL CHECKING ACCOUNTS SOLICITED.

Savings Accounts receive interest at the rate of 4 per cent. per annum.

SAFE DEPOSIT BOXES $3.50

OFFICERS

Leon Bocqueraz, President
J. M. Dupas, Vice-President
J. A. Bergerot, . . . . .
Vice-President
W. F. Duffy, . . . . .
Vice-President and Cashier
A. Bousquet, . . . . . Secretary
J. T. Irillary, Asst. Cashier
Chas. L. Eber, Jr., . . . . .
Asst. Cashier

Member Federal Reserve System and Associated Savings Banks of San Francisco The San Francisco Savings and Loan Society (THE SAN FRANCISCO BANK)

SAVINGS COMMERCIAL
526 California St., San Francisco, Cal.

MISSION BRANCH . . . . . Mission and 21st Streets
PARK-PRESIDIO DISTRICT BRANCH . . . . . Clement and 7th Ave.
HAIGHT STREET BRANCH . . . . . Haight and Belvedere Streets
June 30th, 1922

Assets . . . . . $76,170,177.18
Deposits . . . . . 72,470,177.18
Capital Actually Paid Up . . . . . 1,000,000.00
Reserve and Contingent Funds . . . . . 2,700,000.00
Employee Pension Fund . . . . . 385,984.61

A dividend to depositors of FOUR AND ONE-QUARTER (4 1/4) per cent. per annum was declared for the six months ending June 30th, 1922.

All Books that are reviewed in the Argonaut can be obtained at

Robertson's

222 STOCKTON ST.
Union Square San Francisco

THE HOLMES BOOK CO.

707 Market St. 152 Kearny St. 22 Third St.
Largest variety of new and second-hand books in the city. A visit to our stores will convince you of the truth of this assertion. We buy libraries or single books for cash. See us before selling. Phone—Douglas 3283.
SAN FRANCISCO, CAL.

IF YOU ARE A REAL BOOK-LOVER

Spend a pleasant hour in the real "Old Book Shop" at 2 TILLMAN PLACE, OFF GRANT AVENUE—below Sutter.

Rare Old Books Bought, Sold and Hunted For by GEORGE HARGENS (formerly of the White House)

The White House

The Valley of Content

By BLANCHE UPRIGHT

A San Francisco author's first novel—the dramatic version to be produced in New York this season, by Marjorie Rambeau. $1.90

Book Dept., Main Floor.

Raphael Wall & Co. Inc.

REVIEWS AND NOTICES.

With a Poet in the Rockies.

It is easy for admirers of Vachel Lindsay to cavil at Mr. Graham's book, for after the Rockies, the volume is concerned less with the poet than with the narrator. Admirers of Mr. Graham, on the other hand, will note with interest that he is the better mountain-climber of the two. Poor Vachel was so hard put to it to keep up with the agile Englishman that he didn't give voice to as many good things as one hoped. Still, the book is worth reading for its chapter on the Dukhobars and the Mormons in Canada; and for passages like these: "Springfield is not even on the main line from New York. But neither is Bethlehem." And of Springfield's cordiality: "It was very moving for one who had come right out of the bitterness and quarrels of Europe and out of the loneliness of London. They know something about living which we are forgetting." As for Lindsay himself, he admires "the chivalric, leisurely, and flamboyant genius of the South," calls Santa Fé "the spiritual capital of America," is more interested in Swinburne (whose "Ode to Athens" he recited with gusto) than in Whitman, wants two or three literary lights per year from Europe to come to us sponsored by our magazines and universities, and believes in primitive Christianity. Finally, "his political hero is John Randolph or Andrew Jackson, his literary god is Ruskin, his artist in marble is St. Gaudens, his pet hobby is Egyptian hieroglyphics, his passion is the road, and his ideal is St. Francis."

TRAMPING WITH A POET IN THE ROCKIES. By Stephen Graham. New York: D. Appleton & Co.; $2.

The Singing Captives.

Bearing in mind the delightful "Quiet Interior," E. B. C. Jones' book of a year ago, we began "The Singing Captives" avidly, but eagerness soon spent itself on the latter. Perhaps Miss Jones is experimenting—her work has not the quality of pot-boiling—or for one reason or another she may not be in her best form. But certain it is that "The Singing Captives" does not compare with "Quiet Interior," which, despite the neutrality of its tone and title, pulses with life. By contrast, the gayer, louder tune one expects from "The Singing Captives" limps and stumbles along most lifelessly.

This defection is probably due to its having an anecdotal backbone about sufficient for the vitality of a short story. By dint of much characterization, interesting but still uninspired, the author has spun this out to the dimensions of a rather slim novel with, we think, unfortunate results. Though again, we may be prejudiced by expecting too much from the author of "Quiet Interior." Is it possible that Miss Jones is resting on her laurels? We do not purpose to let her do so. Any one who could write Miss Jones' former book should be ashamed of the nonchalance exhibited in "The Singing Captives." For example, Carolyn tells her brother, Roden, "I'm lurching with Anne at Simpson's today. Will you come?" That was at 10 o'clock. "At noon Roden roused himself" and went down to lunch, where the family was assembled, including Caroline! This is a minor point assuredly, but it doesn't make for greater reality and the thing is obviously a slip—not intentional impressionism. Another error, more amusing, is the name of one of the characters, Evelyn Cashel. Evelyn, of course, is a man—we Americans are educated up to that. But Cashel! It is a pleasant sounding word and Miss Jones, we know, has a nice ear for well-sounding names, but we think Cashel a mistake. When Shaw gave it to his handsome prize-fighting hero it was with the intentional pun that cashel means, in Celtic, a ring. Nothing could have been more appropriate for Cashel Byron. Miss Jones may argue that it is a perfectly good proper name, but we maintain that in writing one must consider such fine points as literary association.

THE SINGING CAPTIVES. By E. B. C. Jones. New York: Boni & Liveright; $2.

Santa Barbara and Montecito

The story of the origin of the name of California is told by John R. Southworth in his valuable little book on Santa Barbara and Montecito. Mr. Southworth is obviously a mine of early California lore. He is the author of a dozen or more volumes on his specialty, and the present one, an encyclopedic treatment of Santa Barbara, past, present, and future, bears witness to his thorough knowledge of our Spanish background.

His account of the naming of California bears repetition. In the year 1510, according to Mr. Southworth, a novel was published in Seville in which an island, rich in minerals and precious stones, and inhabited by a tribe of Amazons, "robust, dark women of great strength and great warm hearts," was named California. This magical isle was supposed to be a terrestrial paradise, and as the book was something of a best seller in its day the name "California" was evidently familiar to Spaniards as a sort of isle of the blest. What more natural than when discovering Lower California and supposing it to be an island that the Spanish should name it, half jokingly perhaps, California?

Mr. Southworth, having thus begun at the beginnings of things, goes on to the discovery of Santa Barbara by Cabrillo, relates the history of subsequent expeditions of exploration and the entire history of Santa Barbara up to the very present. In fact the latter part of his book is a guide-book to the beautiful California resort, but we like better his picture of the halcyon days of the late eighteenth and early nineteenth century in the little settlement that was discovered on the anniversary of Saint Barbara's martyrdom.

SANTA BARBARA AND MONTECITO. By John R. Southworth. Santa Barbara: The Orena Studios.

New Books Received.

WHEN WINTER COMES TO MAIN STREET. By Grant Overton. New York: George H. Doran Company.

"Flying leaves from autumn books."

THE JUDGE. By Rebecca West. New York: George H. Doran Company; $2.50.

By the author of the "Return of the Soldier."

A KNIGHT AMONG LADIES. By J. E. Buckrose. New York: George H. Doran Company; $1.75.

"A romance over a garden fence."

NICOLETTE. By Baroness Orczy. New York: George H. Doran Company; $1.75.

A tale of old Provence.

OLD MOROCCO AND THE FORBIDDEN ATLAS. By C. E. Andrews. New York: George H. Doran Company; $3.

Travel.

PRIVATE DIARIES OF THE RT. HON. SIR ALGERNON WEST, G. C. B. Edited by Horace G. Hutchinson. New York: E. P. Dutton & Co.; $7.

British political history.

INDUCTION COILS IN THEORY AND PRACTICE. By Professor F. E. Austin, E. E. Hanover, New Hampshire: Privately printed; $1.

TOLD UNDER A WHITE OAK TREE. By Bill

IT'S THE WATER.

Prepared with Glacier Water from Shasta Springs

AT ALL DEALERS

SHASTA WATER COMPANY

Hart's Pinto Pony. Edited by his master, William S. Hart. With illustrations by James Montgomery Flagg. Boston: Houghton Mifflin Company; $1.

MEMOIRS OF THE MEMORABLE. By Sir James Denham. New York: George H. Doran Company; $5.

Recollections of great English statesmen, fighters, writers, and artists.

PEOPLE AND PLACES. New York: E. P. Dutton & Co.; $6.

An anonymous narrative of life in five continents.

MY BALKAN LOG. By J. Johnston Abraham. New York: E. P. Dutton & Co.; $5.

The story of the first British Red Cross Serbian Unit.

THE DIARY OF A JOURNALIST. By Sir Henry Lucy. New York: E. P. Dutton & Co.; $6.

Later entries.

LEGISLATIVE PROCEDURE. By Robert Luce. Boston: Houghton Mifflin Company; $5.

The first of four volumes covering in detail the whole subject of law-making and representative government in the United States.

FREQUENTED WAYS. By Marion Newbegin. Boston: Houghton Mifflin Company; $3.50.

A general survey of the land forms, climates, and vegetations of Western Europe.

THE FIGHTING EDGE. By William MacLeod Raine. Boston: Houghton Mifflin Company; $1.75.

A Western novel.

JOHN BURROUGHS TALKS. Boston: Houghton Mifflin Company; $4.

His reminiscences and comments as reported by Clifton Johnson.

DON RODRIGUEZ. By Lord Dunsany. New York: G. P. Putnam's Sons; $2.

Chronicles of Shadow Valley.

AN INSTRUMENT OF THE GODS. By Lincoln Colcord. New York: The Macmillan Company; $2.

Stories of the sea.

NEWBEGIN'S BOOKSTORE

358 POST STREET SAN FRANCISCO
Opposite Union Square

A Shop known for its courteous service, and a pleasant place to browse.

Information on books, authors and editions gladly given. Books bought and sold. Buyer will call. Telephone Douglas 2810

The Wright Magazine

("Not for self, but for others")

Only $1.00 a Year.

Besides a serial and short stories it contains departments for literary and music, women and children, farm and garden, a people's forum, manuscript markets, radio notes and other interesting features.

THE WRIGHT MAGAZINE
P. O. Box 894 Little Rock, Ark.

Three brakes on many cars ~ and one is always set

As much as 20% of the power at the rear or driving wheels of the automobile may be lost through the use of an incorrect oil. Too heavy an oil, or one lacking in certain qualities, acts as a brake on the car.

The ideal oil is the thinnest oil which will keep the bearing parts separated, and at the same time offer in itself the least frictional resistance to the engine power going to the driving wheels.

This oil, providing it has "oiliness," stability and purity, will give perfect lubrication and permit the development of the maximum power, speed and gasoline mileage of the car.

Zerolene fills all these requirements perfectly.

The Ideal Oil

All bearing clearances decrease under the heat of operation.

Analysis of Zerolene shows that the differences in its body at the various engine temperatures, from cold to operating temperature, follow in close relation the decrease in bearing clearances.

For this reason Zerolene oils have at all operating temperatures exactly the required body to splash and flow freely into the fast-moving, small-clearance bearings to provide an adequate film of lubricant.

Because of this and its "oiliness," stability and purity, Zerolene gives perfect lubrication under all conditions of engine operation, and permits the development of the maximum power, speed and gasoline mileage of the car.

Board of Lubrication Engineers
STANDARD OIL COMPANY
(California)

more power & speed ~
less friction and wear ~
thru Correct Lubrication

The Catacombs of Cypress Lawn

Comparable with the luxurious tombs of ancient Egyptian kings, yet within the means of people of moderate circumstances.

A stone edifice, highly artistic in appearance, containing a magnificent chapel. Eleven Tomb Rooms, 425 Crypts.

Cypress Lawn Cemetery
Association

Phone Douglas 4772

995 Market St.

BOOKS AND ART
PAUL ELDER'S

OLD TIVOLI DAYS RETURN.

Somehow those old Tivoli days, with their gay informality, and the merriment that had a personal element in it as it was launched from the footlights straight to the delighted receptivities of San Francisco's jolliest citizens, have left a well of sentiment. They belong to "the city that was," some declare, stoutly asserting that the old atmosphere is forever gone.

But it was revived at the Rivoli on Monday night. People came in shoals that had given up the theatre-going habit. The solid citizens were there who always loved laughter and whose faces bore the creases of chronic jollity.

Some of them organized and bought the first half-dozen rows of the theatre. And what a shout they raised when kind-eyed Paul Steindorff appeared in the orchestra pit, and what a yell when Ferris Hartman, beaming with the celebrated smile wholly untarnished by time, skipped in.

The old-timers rose in their seats, shouted "Teddy, Teddy, good old Teddy!" waved handkerchiefs and programmes, and let themselves go with a joyous whoop.

And "Teddy"—the old familiar name Ferris Hartman was known by—turned, metaphorically speaking, fifty different kinds of handspring. There was no professional pretense in his joy. It was pure happiness. For he and some hundreds in the audience were almost persuaded that time had rolled back and the past had come again.

And then they settled down to business, and we speedily found that no advantage had been taken of the audience's melting mood. For the performance they gave was just as good as we are wont to see when musical comedy is given in the higher-priced theatres.

In the first place they had secured a group of principals with good voices, pretty Lillian Glaser, with her face of youthful innocence enshrined in a flood of golden curls, having a pure, sweet, lyric soprano, that comes as effortless and crystalline as water from a spring. John Van has a robust tenor of considerable ring and amplitude, the young man being fortunately endowed with such athletic proportions as to top almost by a head the tall, slender soprano.

Nona Campbell has a pleasing appearance, a good address, and a mezzo of good tone and volume, and Robert Carlson intoned Odalisk's melodious aria in a voice that recalled Eugene Cowles' once popular basso.

Rafael Brunetto has a baritone that proved to be invaluable in the concerted numbers, and Hazel Van Haltren and Lavinia Winn twittered lightly but sweetly, the latter young lady possessing a pair of thrilling continuations that, fortunately, the masculine habiliments of the apprentice required to be a steady ornament on the landscape.

Ferris Hartman made a joke about his singing, and then made husky noises in the old familiar way. But mark you, he never slights a syllable. I remember how simply he was wont to get his tongue around the Gilbertian lines; always a test of the fully trained comedian. And Ferris Hartman's chronic way of taking the day's work joyously stands by him. He was as light on his feet as a boy, and never missed a single occasion to start the ball of laughter anew.

George Kunkel played a second comedian acceptably, and Paul Hartman, the youthful scion of his popular sire, was a giddily-skirted Egyptian cop.

Edna Malone is gifted as a dancer with lightness, grace, and dramatic expression, and the prettily costumed chorus gave a composite effect of youth, beauty, symmetry, and girlish enjoyment. It goes without saying that with Paul Steindorff at the helm the musical part of the entertainment was done in first-rate style. And so the pretty voices of the pretty chorus united to give pleasure by their business-like efficiency from a musical point of view.

As to the opera, it was composed by Victor Herbert in his youth, when that gifted master of melodies was bubbling with spontaneity. Every melody and the occasional numbers showing Herbert's gift for dramatic expression were the expression of a youth as yet untouched by the exactions of wearing fame.

Harry B. Smith, famous, too, in his line, matched these gay melodies with gayer nonsense; for, as shown in "Starlight, Star Bright," Herbert could put so gentle a witchery in his seductive strains, that, on Monday night, when the familiar song was sung, the audience took turns in laughing at the lively patter and abandoning itself to a bath of sentiment at each recurrence of the "Starlight" measures—so much so, in fact, that the comedian was finally obliged to hint, in an improvised jingle, that every good thing must come to an end some time.

But the enjoyment of the audience in the opera wasn't all of a reminiscent nature, for the change that has come over musical comedy in the last five years, since its makers have discovered that its devotees want a story and a plot, has swung it around in line with just such works as "The Wizard of the Nile"; so that this quarter of a century piece seemed purely modern, more especially as the jokes were many of them made over and brought down to the present.

Well, it was a great night, and there are going to be many like it, in respect to regular enjoyment of comic opera, for the tastes of the younger generation will be well ministered to. All over the house, the other night, we heard the carefree laughter of youth rising above the jolly boom of middle-aged mirth. For the many must be reached to make a success in this world of competition; and for some reason there seems to be unprecedented activity in the theatrical business of San Francisco at present.

The Hartman-Steindorff combination meet the inevitable competition with popular prices; and, if I mistake not, another new theatrical enterprise will be obliged to do the same; measurably, at least. For there are always the movies in active competition.

THE PLAZA OPENS.

On Wednesday evening of last week the newly renovated Plaza, the playhouse of the San Francisco Stage Guild, opened its doors to the public.

The Plaza opens under the happiest auspices, as it possesses an advisory board and has a long list of guarantors, both composed of men and women prominent in the business, social, or intellectual life of San Francisco.

The plan of the Guild, to give plays of real merit that have also achieved something of a popular success, has greatly interested the theatre-going public of San Francisco, and the Plaza was sold out on the opening night, to an audience that showered the players with flowers and applause.

The selection of "Miss Lulu Bett" for the first vehicle proved a most happy one, as it is an eminently actable play, and full, not only of the richest essence of genuine human nature, but of humor as well; sometimes, it is true, of a sardonic nature. I had read the play, and had not realized with what full and beautiful measure the humor of it would carry over the footlights; which is an indication of how much a stage representation develops its possibilities.

The principal impression a reading of the play leaves upon the mind is the simple, humble beauty of Lulu's character, and the gradual evolution of drama in a home and among people which are the very essence of the commonplace. Zona Gale has that keen perception of the true and the genuine which enables her to make her characters utterly true to life. But life always having its blended elements of pathos and humor, this playwright, who understands so well how to get at the soul of her characters by the unconscious yet inevitable truthfulness of their characteristic expression, has evolved a play the dramatic action of which develops with that seeming casualness which stamps the drama of life itself.

The action of "Miss Lulu Bett" centres around the family affairs of the Deacons, Deacon père being a brother-in-law of Lulu, the household drudge. In this group the author has placed the sort of people that we see every day going to the corner grocery, or, if we live in a country town, watering the front garden. And with that keen perception that Zona Gale has for fundamental realities she shows us these people thinking their commonplace thoughts, going through the commonplace actions of their commonplace lives, and holding our attention riveted because she does not spoil the illusion by a single intrusion of purely theatrical effect. She fascinates us by the genuineness of her collected observations of life: no banalities, no sentimentalities, except as they are given as the expression of a character. Thus, Dwight Deacon, the brother-in-law, is a man who is the human expression of the most banal portion of the Sunday edition. With the utmost self-complacency, and a thorough conviction that he is an original and a wit, he tapes out an unending string of platitudes. In this conviction Ina, his admiring wife, fully shares. The two children, being of a younger generation, have the usual strain of youthful irreverence, and the selfishness, egotism, and rebellion against legitimate authority which is frankly revealed by candid and unchastened childhood.

Ninian Deacon, the brother of Dwight, having knocked about the world, has gained some of the knowledge of life and character of which Dwight, the self-appointed god of the hearthstone, is totally devoid.

Grandma Bett is a genially truthful picture of the old lady with a decaying brain that has a habit of suddenly functioning with its old-time shrewdness. Grandma has the old lady habit of forgetting what she has been told, or suspecting what has been carefully concealed from her, and accusing her little world of being in a conspiracy to keep her in the dark. Grandma Bett greatly endears herself to the audience by her detestation of Dwight, her grim endurance of his children, and her solicitous affection for Lulu.

The two youthful suitors are the sort of thing that hangs around and gets under your feet in small-town families where there are girls, Bobby Larkin being just honest adolescence, and Neal Cornish the humble, patient, literal, inarticulate suitor who longs for the flower, but lacks the courage to put forth his hand and gather it.

Lulu is the only rarity, the fundamental humility of her nature preventing her from realizing that she is the only adult in that family who can give and win affection. Lulu supplies an instance of how a modest, unflashing gem can be denied and disprized by a prig and a cad. She gives, generally, the impression of joylessness, but that little pale, flickering flame of fun and repartee during her and Ninian's preliminaries to regard were an indication of what Lulu might flower out into in a Dwightless existence.

No doubt there were people in the audience who, in greater or less degree, were daily taking it out of their Lulu Betts, and who looked on shallowly sympathetic and illusively indignant over Lulu's thwarted life and baffled aspirations. For there are always Lulu Betts in the world, and always the egotists who impose on their instinctive longing to win affection by taking care of those they love.

Such people as Lulu are loved, even if they are tyrannized over, by every one around them except confirmed egotists, who, like Dwight, love only themselves.

Besides the lifelikeness of character and action in her play, Zona Gale adds to the vraisemblance by a natural and simple development of the theme so that each character has a share, without having a mechanical turn, in the evolution of the story. Lulu Bett is not by any means kept in the stage centre, Ninian, Dwight, Grandma Bett, and Manona, the enfant terrible, competing with her for that prominence, while Neal Cornish, Bobby, and fifteen-year-old Di and her calf-love affair become contributory to Lulu's humble drama of life.

The Guild has assembled a very good company, its full resources and best-known players not having been drawn on for the present programme. But every rôle in the cast was done excellently, Mary Morris having already inspired full confidence by her work as leading lady in the Maitland company. Those of us who had seen her in "The Rutherford," and who recognized a resemblance in the circumstances and some also in the characters of the two women protagonists of the two plays, looked confidently to see the intelligent and sympathetic impersonation Miss Morris gave. She rescued Lulu from an effect of monotony by the subdued inner fire that flashed when she finally faced and bore down her tormentor, but the toneless, dull voice of chronic dejection was pitched too low, on the first night; a fault which was probably corrected on subsequent nights.

Lloyd Carrigan's representation of Dwight's fatuous self love and the cruelty of his petty tyranny merits high praise. It was perfectly rendered, both this actor and Irving Dillon acting out their rôles with that submergence of their real selves which made them at one with the drama.

But, indeed, that was a characteristic of the cast in general, occasional spontaneous tributes being won by such simple effects as the depiction of a twelve-year-old's habitually artful evasion of the nightly command to go to bed, and her prolongation of each precious minute until the sentence of banishment was finally enforced.

The rôle of twelve-year-old Monona was admirably played by Eleanor Hesthall, who was neither gauche nor phonographic, but simply natural.

Emelie Melville has a juicy part in the rôle of Grandma Bett. And here we must again pause to admire the author's complete emancipation from stereotype. How many fireside old ladies have we seen in the drama, saintly, white-haired, patient, and sweet-tempered; and boresome. Grandma Bett is no saint. She has a tongue and a temper, and she exercises them both freely. And how cleverly the author has invested her with the little foibles of age, its fretfulness, its occasional pathos, and its tendency to tantrums.

And how we did enjoy Grandma Bett in a tantrum; more especially as it blew off its steam on Dwight, the prime causer. Emelie Melville did not make the mistake of overdoing it, and gave, also, Grandma's occasional minor note when the weariness and the loneliness of old age momentarily overcame her with an effect of pathos that, possibly, in conjunction with the skill of the author's delineation, will have brought to many a perception never before felt of what old age means.

But primarily Grandma Bett meant comedy; genuine comedy, awakening the kind of amusement in which the intellectual perceptions may share.

The rôle of Di was cleverly represented by Irene McSwain, who graphically portrayed both the simpering self-consciousness of young girlhood indulging in its first bath of sentimentality, and the guileless artfulness of youthful deceit trying to gain its own ends.

Harold Minger and Warren Duff played the two rustic swains, giving to them that air of rural honesty and that awkward bluntness characteristic of the unpolished male with a simple sincerity that caused the two imperfections to be unstagily natural.

The performance as a whole gives the effect of having been stage-managed with care, skill, and intelligence. Whether it is the boredom of Monona, the native vigor of Grandma's scorn for Dwight, the airiness with which Di tries her errand camouflage, or the jaunty sophistication of Ninian, we feel ourselves at all times in the atmosphere of genuine drama; created by a dramatist of acute perceptions, trained under intelligent direction, and expressed with sympathetic comprehension.

It should be added that the Plaza has been renovated and decorated with light, cheerful, and harmonious colors, and that the settings were in complete conformity with the exactions of the play.

JOSEPHINE HART PHELPS.

The New Disease.

Much interest is felt in social circles over the forthcoming appearance of Mrs. Henry Lund, Jr., as a professional diseuse, Mrs. Lund having made a signal success last winter by her recital in New York in the drawing-room of Mrs. Henry Waters Taft, when the large audience of New York's élite there assembled set the seal of approval on her work.

Mrs. Lund's San Francisco programme includes impersonations of Gila Varesi in "Enter Madame," of Ethel Barrymore in "Déclassée," of Ruth Draper, now the most prominent diseuse on the American stage, in some of her characteristic work.

Following her appearance here Mrs. Lund is slated to give several recitals at different points in Southern California. The recital in San Francisco will take place on Monday evening, October 9th, in the ballroom of the Fairmont, on which occasion Mrs. Lund will be assisted by Elsie Cook Hughes, the London pianist, and by Deniah Hanifin, baritone.

Mrs. Lund's list of patronesses is as follows: Mrs. William H. Crocker, Mrs. George Boyd, Miss Christine Donohoe, Mrs. Mark Gerstle, Mrs. Marcus Koshland, Mrs. George Kelham, Miss Sara Kaufman, Mrs. George H. Mendel, Jr., Mrs. William H. Taylor, Mrs. M. C. Sloss.

The Place with an "atmosphere"

ELSEWHERE you may enjoy dishes prepared with almost equal care and skill. Service approaching the same standard may be met with.

It is something, indescribable but distinctly felt, that explains the leadership generally accorded to the

33 POWELL ST., NEAR MARKET
130 POST ST., NEAR GRANT
511 FOURTEENTH STREET, OAKLAND

ESMOND'S

"THE CAKE SHOP"

253 Grant Ave.

We offer a large variety of pies, cakes and pastries—all of the highest quality and flavor.

"ECCLES CAKES" Our Specialty

FOYER AND BOX-OFFICE.

Some Healy Offerings.

With a desire to reduce the quantity and increase the quality of concerts given in San Francisco, Manager Frank W. Healy has made but a few bookings for the coming music season, but all are of artists of stellar magnitude.

First on the Healy list are concerts to be given by Geraldine Farrar. Miss Farrar with a concert company including a capable accompanist, tenor, and 'cellist, will be heard at the new Shubert-Curran Theatre on Geary Street near Mason on Sunday afternoon, October 8th. She will also be heard under Mr. Healy's direction at the Municipal Auditorium on Thursday night, October 5th.

Sergei Rachmaninoff, whose appearances are events of great importance, has been secured by Mr. Healy, and on Sunday afternoon, February 4th, at the Morosco Theatre, formerly the Century, he will be heard in a recital of music for the pianoforte.

Charles Hackett, the American tenor, who is at present the leading lyric tenor at the Monte Carlo Opera, will follow the Farrar engagement.

Titta Ruffo, the baritone, will be heard here in January. Ruffo is taking a two months' leave of absence from the Metropolitan so that he can fill engagements in the important cities of the United States.

Rosa Ponselle, the leading dramatic soprano of the Metropolitan Opera House, will come here at the close of the Metropolitan season.

Mr. Healy has been offered the American tour of the famous Russian Balalaika-Orchestra, which under the direction of Dr. Eugen Swerkoff is at present completing a tour of Germany, Austria, Holland, and England. With the Balalaika Orchestra is a full complement of vocal soloists and a group of Russian folk dancers.

Reviving 'The First Born.'

It is many years since San Franciscans have seen Francis Powers' drama of Chinatown, "The First Born," but the memory of it is so strongly implanted in the hearts of drama lovers that the Rainey-Travers company at the Players Theatre has received numerous requests for its revival. Consequently it has been scheduled for a week's production, commencing next Monday evening, October 9th.

When originally produced in San Francisco at the old Alcazar, "The First Born" ran for eighteen weeks to capacity business. It was the first play to capture the spirit of Chinatown as it was twenty years ago. It gave rise to a score of imitative plays, none of which succeeded in intriguing the public interest like the original.

A large cast of principals and many extras have been engaged for the present revival. William S. Rainey will play Chang Wang, the grief-stricken father; Dorothy Wetmore, Loey Sing; and Lorimer Johnston, the well-known character actor, the Doctor. Others in the cast are Ada Beveridge, Frederick McNulty, Callen R. Tjader, Arthur Pierson, John Walter, Barrie Hopkins, Louis Wood White, Horace Heslby, Joseph C. Sturgis, Peggy Shearer, Mrs. Harry Perry, and many others.

Preceding "The First Born," John Jex' delightful farce-comedy, "Violet Souls," will be given with a cast including Hilda Clough Deniville, Reginald Travers, William S. Rainey, Lorimer Johnston, Dorothy Woodward.

The Orpheum Next Week.

Harry Watson, Jr., is one of the clever comedians, and presents some funny bits of burlesque, including his "Battling Kid Dugan" and the great telephone scene.

Songs with melodious airs, pretty girls each of whom is a soloist, singers and dancers, and his own inimitable personality mark the appearance of Anatol Friedland's new revue as one of the events of the season.

Karyl Norman, "The Creole Fashion Plate," has created such a sensation in San Francisco that the management has decided to hold over this artist for a third week.

Elizabeth Kennedy and Milton Berle display dramatic talent rare in youngsters of their age. They offer a little satire entitled "Broadway Bound," in which they show genuine ability.

Portraying rural types as the "Arkansas Travelers," the Weaver Brothers present a novel musical act full of fun and melody.

A chic little miss and a clever eccentric comedian are Babcock and Dolly, and they place their skit "On the Boulevard."

Vincent O'Donnell, "The Miniature McCormack," is one of Gus Edwards' protégés. Vincent has grown since his last visit here, but still has the same excellent voice.

Corinne, a vivacious miss, presents a remarkable dance production, beautifully staged and costumed, with Dick Himber.

Everyone benefits by the Activities of this Company

EVERYONE residing in "Superior" California has benefited either directly or indirectly by the activities of this Company.

When over 8000 people are given employment—when over a million dollars a month is put into circulation—the butcher, baker and every home maker feels the prosperity created by such a payroll.

But the enterprise of the P G and E has benefited this section in other far reaching ways. Take for example, the Pit River development work:

The great amount of power ultimately to be generated in this one district will be equivalent to the work of five million laborers a day. This in itself will insure the industrial and agricultural growth for years to come.

And think of this: For every one horsepower in power plant development, on the average of 12 acres of unproductive land worth $300 may have four horsepower in motors for irrigation and general use applied to them. Such land then usually produces $1000 in new crops each year and becomes worth approximately $2400.

To industry it means that every time 25 horsepower is harnessed in the mountains, an average of a factory and a half is started involving a capital investment of almost $150,000, providing work for about 34 more people who can produce over $200,000 in new commodities.

AT THE PRESENT TIME this Company has developed power in excess of the immediate demand. While the work of developing power is progressing every effort must be directed to creating more uses for power, in order that the best interests of the community will be served.

PACIFIC GAS AND ELECTRIC COMPANY

P · G · and E ·
"PACIFIC SERVICE"

P-05110-11 In.

PLAYERS THEATRE

Bush St., near Gough Telephone West 3321

Commencing Monday Eve., Oct. 9th

"THE FIRST BORN"

Francis Powers' Stirring Drama of Chinatown Preceded by

"VIOLET SOULS"

A Delightful Comedy by John Jex
Evenings at 8:30, $1 & $1.50; Mats. Tuesday and Saturday at 2:30, 50c & $1.

MATINEES 25 and 50c

DAILY

EVENINGS 25c to $1.25

Except Sats., Suns. and Holidays

ALWAYS A GREAT SHOW

SMOKING PERMITTED IN DRESS

CIRCLE AND LOGES

RIVOLI OPERA HOUSE

THIS WEEK AND NEXT

Matinee Wednesday and Saturday

Triumphant
Return of Real Melody and Clean
Comedy

FERRIS HARTMAN
AND
PAUL STEINDORFF

Present the Comic Opera

"The Wizard of the Nile"

Best Seats One Dollar
In preparation—Katinka

FARRAR

Beautiful, Fascinating, Soprano

IN CONCERT

TO-MORROW (SUNDAY)

at 2:30

CURRAN THEATRE

Tickets at Theatre

From Calaveras to Crystal Springs

"The conduit from Irvington to Crystal Springs will be paid for out of Hetch Hetchy bond funds, and the total cost will be approximately $5,000,000. The Spring Valley Water Company is to pay interest on this cost at the rate of 5 per cent. per annum, so that the construction of this section of the aqueduct will not impose any burden upon the taxpayers of San Francisco."

This quotation is from an address made by City Engineer O'Shaughnessy to the Commonwealth Club on the water supply problem of San Francisco.

The conduit he spoke of is the Bay Division of the Hetch Hetchy Aqueduct, the construction of which is now under way.

When completed it will be used by Spring Valley to bring Calaveras water from Irvington to Crystal Springs Reservoir, the water company paying the city for this use.

Spring Valley is at present increasing the height of Calaveras Dam, and will provide facilities for carrying Calaveras water as far as Irvington, where it will enter the Hetch Hetchy line.

The city and the water company, in other words, are coöperating to solve the immediate problem of more water for San Francisco.

When the city and the company complete their respective parts of the programme, there will be direct connection between Calaveras Reservoir and Crystal Springs Reservoir. Our supply will be increased by 24 million gallons daily.

This addition of 24 million gallons daily will not exhaust the possibilities of the big Alameda County reservoir.

But that much more water, added to the present supply, will give a daily supply of 66 million gallons, thus meeting the city's urgent needs.

SPRING VALLEY
WATER COMPANY

VANITY FAIR.

In divorcing her "Lily Love," Juanita Miller, Joaquin's daughter, will have the sympathy of all that have been over that road before her. It was a case in which separation was inevitable. Juan, aforesaid Lily Love, suffered a keen disappointment. He found he was wedded to work, and he did not love it. A Mormon prophet once got a revelation to the effect that the Lord did not wish him to work, but Juan did not appear to need a revelation; he knew it intuitively. It just made him weary, and there seemed to be no compensating benefits. "There were things about the Heights for him to do," said Juanita, "such as putting post-cards in envelopes and mending the fence and things, and he wouldn't do them. Had he worked, or been of any help, I would have loved him, but when he was very much separated from me by giving me no love and no help and no escort and no support and consideration, why, simply, my love ceased." Pathetic, that, on both sides. Of course, Juanita was exacting. Putting post-cards into envelopes was enough. She should not have expected fence-mending, which tends to bring a Lily Love into contact with harsh boards and posts with the bark on, and nails and such materialistic things, enough to knock the spots off any Lily and the love out of any Lily Love. It was too heavy a burden to lay on the aching back of any bridegroom. She could have expected nothing but uncontrollable irritability. But Juan should not, for all that have knocked her down. "It may have been well to dissemble your love, but why did you kick me down the stairs?" says an old bit of verse. Ah, why? Some persons go too far. The energy required for such demonstrations of cave-man affection would build part of a fence. The violence was misdirected. Concentrated on the twisting of a post-hole auger it would do some good in the world, although it might raise blisters on the hand of the Lily. Women should investigate these things before marriage. If a man is just going to be a sort of matrimonial I. W. W., the divorce bill might as well be presented with the marriage certificate. Poor Juanita! Her orange blossoms must have grown on a lemon tree.

Positively a new fashion in matrimonial trouble is set us by the Tiernan case in South Bend, Indiana; although it recalls the story of the Irishwoman whose divorce complaint against her husband was that she suspected he was not the father of her last child. Mrs. John P. Tiernan is positive her husband is not the father of her last child, and says so, and when Harry Poulin, on the witness stand, denied being its father she shouted right out in court that he was a liar. One strange aspect of the case is that South Bend sentiment, as represented in the courtroom audience, is badly bent and sympathizes with Mrs. Tiernan in the matter. It hisses Poulin's denials and applauds Mrs. Tiernan's affirmations, and will not be cheated of the most toothsome scandal it has savored in years. Notwithstanding that, Professor Tiernan sat in the courtroom, puzzled beyond the scope of professorial understanding by a series of situations he never encountered in any text-book he has thus far investigated. Under the laws of mere chance and probability, to say nothing of the laws of physiology and the customs of polyandry, Professor Tiernan might consider that he had an even break; but the crowd and Mrs. Tiernan will not have it so. That were too prosaic. Dates and the calendar do not seem to help much in the contest between the indubitable mother and the illicit but modest father. His denials of paternity are regarded as cowardly and lacking in sporting spirit. To the South Benders he seems devoid of any romantic impulses of gallantry, any proper masculine pride of paternal prowess. He has even tried an alibi, with dates. It is too much. The business is worse than any proceeding in a medieval Court of Love against the gallant that has kissed and told. Here is one that not only won't tell, but denies, and stubbornly seeks to ruin the best barber-shop story South Bend has rolled over its multitudinous tongues for a generation. We have no doubt the whole Studebaker works is stewing about it. Why should a man resent the tribute to his powers involved in being called a liar under such circumstances? We commend the case to Dan Totheroh, our rising young playsmith. Here is something wilder than "Wild Birds," less probable than the Thirteenth Labor of Hercules. South Bend must have a publicity expert.

Humanity's appetite for forbidden fruit was one of the first things it noticed about itself when it came down out of the trees and began to regard itself as human. This appetite it dramatized in the old three-act version of the Garden of Eden, where there was plenty of fruit, and humanity in the perversity of its heart got tired of all of it except the sort it should have avoided—with what effect on the population of the globe has not even yet been determined. And now we have "dry" navies patrolling our waters, and cellar sniffers going about our flat buildings trying to restrict people to those fruits whose juices have not been extracted, or those juices that have not yet fermented. At home it works, in a way, to the enrichment of the peddler of "happy water" or worse. But abroad the American is likely to take a long, hard fling at what he is denied at home, and so the publicans of Deauville this summer have had a harvest. And the inclination toward the illicit has gone far beyond the various kinds of juice. It extends to the gaming table, where participation appears to be more general and stakes higher than ever before. And Americans are said to be doing more drinking and gambling there than the people of any other nationality. It is said the Americans only sleep between 8 o'clock in the morning and 2 in the afternoon, when the Casino is closed. The balance of the time they are leaning over the tables watching the spinning of the wheels or the progress of the little toy horses that run in slots. At 2 o'clock in the morning the scene in the Casino shows staid business men from Kokomo, Keokuk, or Los Angeles, men that vote their support and contribute their money to every worthy cause that guarantees to make other people moral and high-minded, shoving chips across green-topped tables and then figuring their gains and losses. Anybody that would crank a motion-picture camera on them at such a time and then develop a number of reels could sell the celluloid on the first showing—to some of the persons therein depicted, who would probably not exhibit it in their home towns. Lawyers, doctors, and solid business men with pews in the leading churches at home, would appear tilting long tumblers or thin-stemmed glasses—just boys away from school and home and mother and the preacher.

The curious thing about it, observable to the sophisticated, is that the majority of the players in the Casino are not the wayward sons of clergymen, nor youth of any type, nor seasoned sports accustomed to Delmonico's and Canfield's, but staid persons who look as though they went to bed at 9 o'clock in Des Moines or Cedar Rapids, like the people of the town in Oklahoma who objected to curfew because it woke them up. Of course, all sorts are represented. A recent 2-o'clock-in-the-morning inspection showed at one table a former American ambassador, a leading theatrical producer, a great New England lawyer, two Broadway stars, and the head of a big steel firm. But also the thirty tables devoted to baccarat and chemin-de-fer were surrounded largely by Americans that had to be told by the attendants and changers what to do in order to enjoy this rather technical form of vice. Many did not know when they had won, left their money up, and with beginners' luck won again. They were not persons that played at home, that was evident, and for most of them gambling appeared to be hard work. But they were willing to do it, and stayed late, stayed until the Casino closed at 8 o'clock in the morning. It was the novelty that got them, evidently. Gambling is no novelty to a continental. He can find chemin-de-fer running wide open whenever he wants to look for it, with just as little trouble as in this country a negro barber finds his way to a crap game. But the respectable Americans seemed starving for it, and did not care for sleep. What the European takes as a casual diversion they make a serious business, like the farm hand who complained: "It's Saturday night, and I've got to shave and put on a clean shirt and go to town and get drunk, and gosh how I hate it!" Although the Americans are not such plungers as the Europeans, in the aggregate they lose more because of greater numbers; and the bartenders tell the same tale—they are spending more for alcoholic encouragement. If the Americans were to leave in a body, Deauville would feel like a war profiteer threatened by a long peace.

Here's Gabriele D'Annunzio going to be a monk. He'll make a great monk. He could tell any monk in the monastery a story that would make him

Break from his cell
With a hell of yell

And elope with the Mother Superior.

Trims for Fall Hats.

A thick whipcord chenille, in all colors and mounted on a coarse net in a close all-over row-on-row effect like corduroy, is used in a variety of ways to trim falls hats for women, according to the bulletin of the Retail Millinery Association of America. Two prominent uses of this new material, the bulletin says, are in the form of either single-ply appliques in conventional sprawling traceries on duvetyne or Lyons velvet shapes or thickly stitched together for an entire facing.

"Bows of duvetyne or velvet, stiffened by the row-on-row stitching lines of this new cord, are seen," it continues, "and entire brims or edge cords are not neglected by the designers in using it. Draped turbans in duvetyne, velvet, metal, or panne combinations so trimmed are a thriving local item, as well as Paisley print draped combinations.

"Pasted birds of hackle and coque, with long lacquered beaks, are used in making a certain line of window display hats with panne tops and royal blue Lyons facings. Standard staple shapes are chosen to flaunt these vagaries, including left-side rolls, short-back pokes, and cloche and cushion brims."

BALFOUR, GUTHRIE & CO.

SAN FRANCISCO AND LOS ANGELES,
PORTLAND, SEATTLE, TACOMA,
AND VANCOUVER.

MERCHANTS

EXPORTERS AND IMPORTERS
MARINE AND FIRE INSURANCE
AVERAGE ADJUSTERS

Agents of

HARRISON DIRECT LINE OF STEAMERS
TO AND FROM EUROPEAN PORTS
and
COMMONWEALTH GOVERNMENT LINE

Redwood Export Company

California Redwood
Lumber and Ties

Cargoes and Parcels
"To off shore markets only"

260 CALIFORNIA STREET
SAN FRANCISCO, CALIF.

Phone Sutter 2163

UNION LUMBER CO.

CROCKER BUILDING

SAN FRANCISCO, CALIFORNIA

MANUFACTURERS and WHOLESALERS

— OF —

REDWOOD LUMBER
RAILROAD TIES
TELEGRAPH POLES
SHINGLES

— AND —

SPLIT REDWOOD PRODUCTS

E. C. EVANS & SONS, Inc.

(Established 1881)

STEAMSHIP AGENTS

SHIP AND INSURANCE BROKERS

260 California Street, San Francisco

Phone
Douglas 8040

Cable Address
"DEWGRIP"

GENERAL PETROLEUM CORPORATION

Offices at

SAN FRANCISCO

LOS ANGELES

Alaska Commercial Bldg.

Higgins Bldg.

HAMMOND
LUMBER COMPANY
260 CALIFORNIA ST.
REDWOOD, DOUGLAS FIR
AND PILING

THE CHARLES NELSON CO.

MANUFACTURER AND WHOLESALER

of

REDWOOD, DOUGLAS FIR,
SPRUCE, HEMLOCK,
SUGAR & WHITE PINE,
CEDAR SHINGLES & POLES.

230 California St.

San Francisco

Geo. E. Billings Roy C. Ward Geo. B. Dinsmore
J. C. Muessdorffer Jas. W. Dean

Geo. E. BILLINGS CO.

ALL FORMS OF INSURANCE
EFFECTED

312 California St., San Francisco, Cal.
Phone—Douglas 6400

BONESTELL & CO. PAPER

The paper used in printing the Argonaut is furnished by us
CALIFORNIA'S LEADING PAPER HOUSE
118 to 124 First Street, corner Minna,
San Francisco

"Travel Without Trouble"

COOK'S TRAVEL SERVICE

World wide—Complete—Efficient

Inclusive Tours for Individual Travel
arranged, to start any day by
any route.

Explanatory circular on request

THOS. COOK & SON
(Est. 1841)

Agents for the best lines for travel by
Land, Water or Air

128 SUTTER STREET

(COOK'S BUILDING) Phone Kearny 3512

Press Clippings

Are money-makers for Contractors, Supply
Houses, Business Men and
Corporations

ALLEN'S PRESS CLIPPING BUREAU
Phone Douglas 5119 121 Second Street

Argonaut subscribers may have the paper
sent regularly to their out-of-town address during the vacation season promptly on request.

STORYETTES.

Grave and Gay, Epigrammatic and Otherwise.

A storyette that dates to the eighteenth century is as follows: Dr. Johnson once met the village postman trudging along the dusty road on a hot summer afternoon. The postman observed that he had still a mile to walk just to deliver one newspaper. "My goodness!" exclaimed the sympathetic doctor, "I'd never go all that distance for such a trifle. Why don't you send it by post?"

Former Postmaster-General Hays, as every one knows, is an advocate of the air mail. "Of course, it gets criticized," he said, "and criticism is a good thing, but it can be run into the ground. I am reminded of the vaudeville producer who muttered as he read the press notices of his programme, 'These critics are thorough, all right. They don't leave a turn unstoned.'"

With reference to the millennium, Samuel Gompers recently said: "It is still a long way off, of course, but the workman is not the downtrodden slave he once was." He quoted the case of the tennis pro who was giving a new club member some pointers. "Hold your racket loosely, sir," he said. "Oh! more loosely! You hold it as stiff as if you were a hod-carrier." "But I am a hod-carrier," said the new member mildly.

The Southern Californian may think himself an adept making seductive pictures of his end of the state, but he can still learn from the Honolulu, out in the north Pacific. Down there they say a drummer from San Francisco sojourned a month, and when they took him to the homeward-bound steamer and put leis around his neck and sang "Aloha Oi" to him a few times, he cried like a baby and said he had forgotten his wife's first name.

The late Mrs. George Gould hated any desecration of the Sabbath. Motoring one summer Sunday in Lakewood, she encountered a family whose fortune had been made in asbestos. The rich asbestos makers were picnicking, fathers and sons over whisky and poker, mother and the girls with cigarettes and bridge. Mrs. Gould drew up to speak to her acquaintances. "Well," she said pleasantly, "I didn't know you Smiths had such faith in your asbestos."

Bishop Weller of Fond du Lac is responsible for the following: After a long life of storm and strife the wife of an Englishman died. After a while the Englishman, whose name was Henry, sought to get into communication with the spirit of the departed spouse. He went to the mystic precincts of a clairvoyant who put him in touch with the spirit of Harriet, his wife. After a few preliminary questions the husband said: "Are you 'appy, 'Arriet?" "Yes, 'Enry." "Are you 'appier than you were with me, 'Arriet?" "Yes, 'Enry." "Where are you, 'Arriet?" "In 'ell, 'Enry."

Pius XI is said to have a pretty wit. When the new Pope was Archbishop of Milan he motored one morning from Milan to Como to a lunch party at a great lakeside villa there. Another guest was a Milanese nobleman, who said to the archbishop: "Reverend father, if only you were St. Peter!" The archbishop inquired why his noble friend desired this metamorphosis. "Because, reverend father," explained the duke, "you would then hold the keys of heaven and could let me in." "My son," said the future Pope, "would it not be better for you if I held the keys of the other place? Then I could let you out."

Chauncey Depew tells the following anecdote in his recent book of memoirs: "When I was at Yale the faculty included several professors of remarkable force and originality. The professor of Greek, Mr. Hadley, father of the distinguished ex-president of the university, had a caustic wit and his sayings were the current talk of the campus. He maintained discipline—which was quite lax in those days—by the exercise of this ability. One day, when the boys had driven a calf into the recitation room, Professor Hadley quietly remarked: 'You will take out that animal. We will get along with our usual number today.'"

T. R. St. Johnston tells a story of a former Chief Justice, Sir Fielding Clarke, who during a tour of the mountain districts of Fiji arrived very hungry at a large village and found food scarce because of a big wedding in the town. He went for a stroll alone. After an interval he returned, beaming all over, and said, "What a cheery, hospitable house I have found down there!" pointing to a large, well-lit house facing them at the end of the town. "I was strolling past and they asked me in, and pressed upon me some excellent boiled fowl and roasted bread-fruit, followed up by a bowl of first-class yangona, after which there was some very good singing." One of the party who knew the language turned to a man standing by and asked what house that was at the end of the village. "Oh, that, sir, is the jail," came the astounding reply.

An incident in connection with the visit of Lord Rosebery, the former British premier, to Oxford some years ago to unveil Lord Salisbury's bust is told by the Rt. Rev. Sir David Hunter Blair in his "New Medley of Memories." He says: "I had repeated to his Oxford hostess a story told me by the principal of a Scottish university, of how Lord Rosebery, engaged to speak at a great Liberal meeting in a northern city, found himself previously dining with a fanatically teetotal provost, who provided for his guests no other liquid refreshment than orangeade in large glass jugs. As this depressing beverage circulated, the Liberal leader's spirits fell almost to zero; and it was by the advice of my friend the principal that, between the dinner and the meeting, he drove ventre à terre to an hotel, and quaffed a pint of dry champagne before mounting the platform and making a speech of fiery eloquence, which the good provost attributed entirely to the orangeade. The lady, unknown to me, passed on this delectable story to one of the Union Committee, who took it very seriously; the result being that when Lord Rosebery reached the committee-room, just before the inauguration ceremony, a grave young man whispered to him confidentially: 'There are tea and coffee here; but I have got your pint of champagne behind that screen; will you come and have it now?' 'Well, do you know?' said the great man, with his usual tact, 'I think for once in a way I will have a cup of coffee.'"

THE MERRY MUSE.

A Case for the Courts.

Fate carelessly drew us together
And our names were put up on the spot,
So we had to get on with it whether
We took to the notion or not.
But I heard not a hint of the scoffer;
On occasion, in fact, I would catch
The remark that we'd probably offer
An excellent match.

Till today, it is true, we've afforded
Strong proof of the promise we gave;
If our object was candidly sordid,
As a pair we knew how to behave.
Yet while I regard you as splendid,
Though your welfare's close to my heart,
Our engagement, dear lady, is ended,
And now me must part.

But what if our partnership 's over!
Just think of the trophies we boast
As you scamper tomorrow to Dover,
And I to the Devonshire coast.
Not ours the least need to repine; all
Was done that we bargained to do
When we pulled off that handicap final
At 6-4, 6-2. —Punch.

Ter-r-r-rible!

They met on the bridge at midnight;
They will never meet again—
For one was an eastbound heifer,
The other a westbound train.
—Ray Law, Stanford '23.

An English lover of music was envying the Italian barber his musical heritage and his greater enjoyment of opera. "I suppose you Italians," he said, "can understand your singer perfectly?" The barber looked puzzled. "You can if you understand the words," he said.

When Kipling Liked Us

In 1889 Rudyard Kipling made his first visit to the United States, and in "American Notes" gives his impression of the Americans of thirty years ago. "My heart has gone out to them beyond all other people," he wrote, "and for the life of me I can not tell why. Their government's provisional; their law's the notion of the moment; their railways are made of hairpins and match sticks, and most of their good luck lives in their woods and mines and rivers and not in their brains; but for all that, they be the biggest, finest, and best people on the surface of the globe! Just you wait a hundred years and see how they'll behave when they've had the screw put on them and have forgotten a few of the patriarchal teachings of the late Mister George Washington. At present there is too much balcony and too little Romeo in the life plays of their fellow-citizens. Later on, when the proportion is adjusted and the American sees the possibilities of his land, he will produce things that will make the effete East stare. He will also be a complex and highly composite administrator. There is nothing known to man that he will not be, and his country will sway the world with one foot as a man tilts a seesaw plank!"

The London Morning Post says that an engine-driver who is a keen naturalist asserts that the crow frequents railways more than any other bird. He haunts embankments and cuttings, but is particularly partial to the "four-foot" because of the grease and oil that are always to be found on the line. An express train will frequently run against and kill various other kinds of bird, but it rarely hits a crow.

The MOTOR OIL FREE FROM DESTRUCTIVE "SULPHO" COMPOUNDS

Produced Under the New HEXCON Process

ADDING A NEW CHAPTER TO THE BOOK OF ACHIEVEMENT

How We Overcame the cause of motor oils breaking down rapidly under engine heat

DESTRUCTIVE "Sulpho" compounds are the cause of motor oils breaking down rapidly under engine heat. An enormous amount of money is annually lost through the presence of these unnecessary properties in oils.

CYCOL will save engine owners this tremendous amount of money lost through wasted oil, wasted fuel, preventable repairs, because it is free from destructive "sulpho" compounds. These have been removed by the new Hexcon Process used exclusively by us.

When your oil contains destructive "sulpho" compounds it breaks down rapidly under engine heat. Its lubricating value becomes quickly impaired. The oil film is broken and serious damage may result.

Have your crank case thoroughly flushed—not with kerosene. Use the correct grade of Cycol, as shown on the Cycol Recommendation Chart. Use Associated Gasoline. Then notice the improved performance of your motor.

ASSOCIATED OIL COMPANY
SAN FRANCISCO

CYCOL

MOTOR OIL

FREE FROM DESTRUCTIVE "SULPHO" COMPOUNDS

PERSONAL.

Social Notes.

The engagement of Miss Kathryn Cook, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. John Cook of Berkeley, was announced at one of the largest parties of last week, given by Mrs. Edwin Ferguson at the Palace Hotel. Miss Cook is the fiancée of Mr. Arthur Robert Bradford of Fresno. The guests to whom the announcement was made included Mrs. Carl Martin, Mr. John Cook, Mrs. Peter Cook, Mrs. E. B. McNear, Mrs. Peter Cook, Jr., Mrs. Hall H. Huff, Mrs. Walter Graves, and Mrs. Andrew Haas.

The marriage ceremony at which Miss Elizabeth Schmiedell, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Edward G. Schmiedell, became the bride of Mr. James Moffitt, son of Dr. and Mrs. Herbert Moffitt, was performed on Saturday, at 4 o'clock, at the little Episcopal Church at Ross. The bride was given in marriage by her father. Miss Doris Schmiedell attended her sister as maid of honor. Mrs. William Hendrickson, Jr., Mrs. Wakefield Baker, Miss Mary Julia Crocker, Miss Margaret Scheld, Miss Aileen McIntosh, and Miss Alice Moffitt were the bride's attendants. Mr. Howard Spreckels was best man for Mr. Moffitt, while Mr. Cyril McNear, Mr. Richard MacLaren, Mr. William Magee, Jr., Mr. George Montgomery, Mr. Geoffrey Montgomery, and Mr. Edward Schmiedell, Jr., were the ushers. After the ceremony Mr. and Mrs. Moffitt greeted their friends on the lawn at the entrance to the house. The wedding supper was served indoors. Mrs. Moffitt, the daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Edward Schmiedell, is the granddaughter of Mr. and Mrs. Edward McCutcheon and the niece of Mr. George Howard of San Mateo. Mr. Moffitt is the nephew of Mrs. Daniel C. Jackling, Mrs. Herbert Allen, Mrs. Rudolph Spreckels, Miss Mary Jolliffe, Miss Harriet Jolliffe, and Miss Frances Jolliffe, and of Mr. James Moffitt of Piedmont. On their return from their wedding tour Mr. and Mrs. Moffitt will make their home in San Francisco.

In the gardens of the home of Mr. and Mrs. Carroll George Cambron, on Saturday evening, Miss Carroll Cambron, their only daughter, was married to Mr. Stanley Morrison, son of Mr. and Mrs. Frank Pierce Morrison of Redlands. Miss Margaret Monroe and Mr. William Morrison were the attendants for Miss Cambron and Mr. Morrison, followed by Miss Elizabeth Wright and Miss Lisa Stillman, Mr. Blair Shuman, and Mr. Barreda Sherman. After the ceremony the guests were received indoors, Mr. and Mrs. Morrison leaving on a motor trip. Upon their return they will make their home on Russian Hill.

Another wedding which took place on Saturday afternoon was that of Miss Elva Ghirardelli, daughter of Mrs. Louis Ghirardelli, and Mr. John Welby Dinsmore, son of Mr. and Mrs. William Dinsmore of Piedmont. The ceremony was read by Rev. Kloss at the Ghirardelli home. Mrs. Harry Hush Magee (Miss Juanita Ghirardelli) attended her sister, and Mr. Thomas Dinsmore, brother of the bridegroom, was best man. Following the wedding supper, Mr. and Mrs. Dinsmore left on a motor tour. On their return they will make their home in Piedmont.

Miss Mary Emma Flood entertained at her country home, "Linden Towers," at Menlo Park, at luncheon on Thursday afternoon in honor of Mrs. Victor Cooley (Miss Helen Pierce). Mrs. Marshall Madison, Mrs. Lawrence Fox, Jr., Mrs. Dearborn Clark, Mrs. Alfred de Ropp, Jr., Mrs. Nicholas Kittle Boyd, Mrs. Kenneth McIntosh, Mrs. Wakefield Baker, Mrs. Robert Coleman, Miss Mary Julia Crocker, Miss Aileen McIntosh, Miss Geraldine King, and Miss Jean Boyd were Miss Flood's other guests.

Mrs. Peter Cook and Mrs. Erskine B. McNear gave a luncheon and bridge party to several close friends at the Cook home at Rio Vista, complimenting visiting friends and a group of engaged girls. The guests of honor were Mrs. William Stephens, Mrs. Robert Harrison, Mrs. Robert Dollar, and Mrs. Cachot Davis. The engaged girls complimented were Miss Katherine Anderson, Miss Pauline Meyers, and Miss Kathryn Cook.

Complimenting Miss Mary Lou Heilborn of Sacramento, Mrs. Curtis Wright entertained a group of intimate friends of the honor guest at luncheon at her Claremont home. Mrs. William Ede, Miss Margaret Scheld, Miss Merodine Keeler, Miss Laura Curry, Mrs. Henry Heilborn, Mrs. Willard Miller were among the guests.

Miss Evelyn McGaw was the honor guest at a luncheon on Friday given by Miss Helen Head at her Greenwich Street home. Mrs. Bradley Wallace, Mrs. Philip Duncan Frissell, Miss Alyse Allen, Miss Cornelia Gwynn, Miss Jeanette Sessions, Miss Julia Tuggles, Miss Mollie McBryde, and Miss Carol Andrew were Miss Head's guests.

Mrs. Leigh Sypher gave a luncheon on Wednesday at her San Mateo home in compliment to Mrs. Charles Lyman and her sister, Mrs. Charlotte Clark of Paris, who is visiting in San Francisco. Asked to meet Mrs. Lyman and Mrs. Clark were Mrs. George H. Howard, Mrs. John Sutton, Mrs. Rennie Pierre Schwerin, Mrs. Max Rothschild, Mrs. Charles Farquharson, Mrs. William Weir, and Mrs. Mark Gerstle.

At an informal bridge party, Miss Isabelle de Viosca and Miss Laura de Viosca, who have returned from abroad recently, entertained as their guests Miss Hélène de Latour, Miss Margaret Lee, Miss Virginia Loop, Miss Margaret Buckbee, Miss Frances Lent, Miss Jean Howard, Miss Doris Fagan, and Miss Helen Slater.

In compliment to Mrs. Frederick Sharon, a luncheon was given by Mrs. George Kelham at her Sea Cliff home on Tuesday. Asked to meet Mrs. Sharon were Mrs. Atholl McBean, Mrs. George Boyd, Mrs. Grant Selfridge, Mrs. Frank Anderson, Mrs. Seward McNear, and Mrs. Jerome Politzer.

Mrs. Carol D. Buck, who is visiting in California for a short time, was complimented at a luncheon which Mrs. Gaillard Stoney gave at the Town and Gown Club. Mrs. John Murtagh, Mrs. Marcus Koshland, Mrs. James Bull, Mrs. Prentiss Cobb Hale, and Miss Ethel Shorb were asked to meet Mrs. Buck.

The Grasshopper Hawk.

In this prairie country they have some kind of a hawk the name of which I do not know, but locally termed the "grasshopper hawk," says Captain Charles Askins, describing, in Arms and the Man, a ride through Oklahoma. He is a blue gray fellow with white markings, a trifle larger than a pigeon hawk. This chap seems to live entirely upon grasshoppers and other winged insects. He comes in the spring after the "bugs" are on the wing and disappears with the first frost, being evidently no more able to exist without his grasshoppers than a snipe is without worms. So far as is known he never kills a bird or any description of small animal, nothing but grasshoppers. All farmers have the most kindly feeling for him, and in turn he seems to have no fear of man, but will sit in a tree not twenty feet distant and turn a friendly eye on the passing horseman.

Moreover, he has developed some queer habits of his own, and therein lies the substance of this story. As the rider passes through the grass or stubble, swarms of grasshoppers arise before the feet of the horse. The bird evidently knows this will happen, so he sails just above steed and rider, watching until some big 'hopper takes to the air, and then he pounces on it. Now here another queer thing took place. Maybe I am mistaken about this, but I watched the bird pretty closely. Martins, whippoorwills, kingbirds, and the fly catchers generally seize their prey with their bills. Not so the grasshopper hawk from what I could see of the process. He flew above his 'hopper and caught it with one foot. Then, as he flew along, his foot went up and his head went down, all very quickly, and that was the last of the grasshopper. So far as I could observe, this bird never alights to eat the insect, but invariably swallows it while on the wing. Sparrow hawks sometimes catch insects also, but alight to eat them, and so far as I know seize the grasshopper while he is at rest. The grasshopper hawk is by far the most common member of the hawk tribe in this plains country, but I never remember seeing one farther east than Oklahoma.

Barrymore in "Hamlet."

In confirmation of a report printed in the New York Times, announcement has been made by Arthur Hopkins that John Barrymore will return to the stage this season in "Hamlet." After "Hamlet," Mr. Barrymore will be seen for a limited time in "Richard III" and "Redemption," both of which he has acted here before.

Mr. Barrymore suffered a breakdown while acting in "Richard III" in the spring of 1920, and his only stage appearance since then was made at the Empire Theatre a year later in "Clair de Lune." In the interim, however, he has been seen in a number of motion pictures.

Mr. Barrymore's appearance as Hamlet is scheduled for November. The scenery for the production will be designed by Robert Edmond Jones, and it is reported that Mr. Jones will again have recourse to the much-discussed method introduced by him in "Macbeth" last season.

With John Barrymore's return made certain, all three of the Barrymores will be seen on the New York stage this season. Ethel Barrymore will begin a season at the Longacre Theatre on September 26th and Lionel Barrymore will be seen in "The Fountain," a new O'Neill play.

Pie Versus Beer.

The language of the Eighteenth Amendment relates to beverage use, not to gluttonous abuse, says the Rev. John Cole McKim in the North American Review. Doubtless two or three quarts of beer at a sitting might have a harmful effect. So might twenty pies. But neither would be a normal dietetic use. It would not surprise me to learn that there are, in the archives of the Anti-Saloon League, any number of statistics tending to show that the effects of keg parties are immeasurably more deleterious than those of pie-eating contests. I could not accept the conclusions, however formidable the data, except in so far as they might tend to prove (what needs no proving) that, of the two, the keg parties have been the more frequent and the more frequented. That is because intelligent people who know the difference prefer beer to pie.

The ST. FRANCIS
One of the world's great hotels
Facing Union Square
SAN FRANCISCO CALIFORNIA

WHERE SERVICE AND COMFORTS ARE PLANNED FOR GUESTS WHO APPRECIATE THE BEST

Thos. J. Coleman
Manager

El Encanto Hotel and Bungalows

SANTA BARBARA, CALIFORNIA.

LOCATED on the Riviera 500 feet above sea level, overlooking the city, ocean and distant islands. Street-cars within a block. Fifteen minutes to the beautiful beach, or to La Cumbre's unsurpassed Golf links. Horseback Riding over glorious mountain trails. Tennis Courts and Putting Course in hotel grounds. Purest milk, cream and butter from El Encanto Dairy. Fresh vegetables from our own gardens. Highest standard cuisine.

RATES MODERATE
Liberal discount for long stay

DEL MONTE

The Largest Resort Hotel Plant in the World Where "Thinking People" can find Recreation in Hotel del Monte's Comfort, Service and Outdoor Life. "Here every sportsman can find his chosen recreation."

TWO CHAMPIONSHIP GOLF COURSES
CARL S. STANLEY, Manager
DEL MONTE : : CALIFORNIA

San Ysidro Ranch

Furnished bungalows of various sizes; situated on the foothills among the orange groves, overlooking the sea. Central dining-room, electric lights, hot and cold water. Good tennis court. Six miles from Santa Barbara, two miles from ocean. Booklet. Address MANAGER

San Ysidro Ranch, Santa Barbara

HOTEL RAFAEL

A Charming Place

Nestling amid the rural beauties of famous Marin County, HOTEL RAFAEL is endeared to thousands. Special accommodations for week-end parties. Rates, $1.50 and up; 200 outside rooms.

POPULAR DINNER DANCE
Saturday—8 to 12

SERVICE

To Sacramento

Observation Cars leave 7:20 A.M., 9:00 A.M., 5:10 P.M.

Dinner Service on Meteor leaving 5:10 P.M. through to Chico.

We Carry Baggage

SACRAMENTO SHORT LINE

Mila Lund Recital

Impersonations of famous actresses, assisted by Elsie Cook Hughes, London pianist, and Deniah Hanifan, baritone. Fairmont Hotel, Monday evening, October 9th, 8:30 o'clock. Tickets, $1.50; box seats, $2, including tax. For sale at Fairmont Hotel and Sherman, Clay & Co.'s.

JOSEPH'S

American Beauty Roses

This beautiful rose will be found this season exclusively in our establishment.

Phone Sutter 423 233 Grant Ave.
FLORISTS

Reduced Fare Autumn Excursions!

SOMETHING NEW FOR CALIFORNIA TRAVELERS

Tickets on sale October 4th to November 30th, 1922

From all stations in California to all points to which summer excursion tickets were sold (except where resorts have been closed for the season).

The fares will be slightly higher than those for summer excursions, but otherwise practically the same conditions will prevail.

Season tickets with stopover privileges are on sale daily with limit December 31st, and fifteen-day tickets will be sold for use Fridays and Saturdays.

California's valley, foothills and beach resorts are delightful during Indian Summer. Trout fishing, golf, tennis and horseback riding can be enjoyed by all.

Our Agents will gladly give you full and detailed information

Southern Pacific Lines

Ferry Station

50 Post Street

Or phone Sutter 4000

Third St. Station

STRINGER STORAGE COMPANY

Sutter near Fillmore
and
Steiner near Sutter

Conducting a Storage
Business Founded
in 1880

Storage--Shipping

Expert Packing, Protection
and Dispatch

A fully informed representative, anxious
to give you any desired information,
will respond to your phone call.

Phone West 999

PERSONAL.

Movements and Whereabouts.

Mr. and Mrs. Charles McCormick and Mr. and Mrs. Roger Lapham plan leaving for the East early in November for a trip of a month or so.

Mr. and Mrs. Charles Templeton Crocker leave early in October for New York.

Mrs. Edgar Preston, Jr., with Miss Frances Ames and Miss Josephine Drown, arrive in New York from France this week. They return to San Francisco about the middle of the month.

Mrs. Harry Scott and Mrs. Preston Drown are also in New York.

Miss Cynthia Boyd is leaving during the week for Maryland, where she will be at St. Timothy's School.

Mr. and Mrs. Henry Howard Shields leave during the month for Los Angeles to spend the winter there.

Miss Sophia Brownell returned East on Saturday to resume her studies at Vassar.

Mr. and Mrs. Frederick McNear sailed for France during the week.

Mrs. Eugene Lent is in the East at the home of her daughter, Mrs. Herman Leonard Underhill.

Miss Frances Lent is the guest of her sister, Mrs. Paul Ganan.

Mr. and Mrs. Daniel C. Jackling have gone to New York for a trip of several weeks.

Mr. and Mrs. Henry Foster Dutton have recently gone East, to be in New York for some time.

Mr. Jean de St. Cyr and Mr. Robert Burroughs of New York left on Saturday for New York en route to Europe, where they will spend the winter with Mrs. de St. Cyr.

Mr. and Mrs. George Gordon Moore left for New York the first of the week, to be away until the latter part of December.

Mr. and Mrs. Arthur Hill Vincent sailed for Europe on the Mauritania during the week. They plan to be away for the winter.

Mrs. William Summers is visiting her mother, Mrs. Thomas Dibblee, at the San Julian ranch.

Mrs. Dibblee will remain on the ranch until after Thanksgiving.

Mr. and Mrs. Robert Hays Smith will leave for New York the latter part of October.

Mr. and Mrs. Arthur W. Hooper, who have spent the summer at their Woodside home, have opened their home on Broadway for the winter.

Mr. and Mrs. Edward Eyre and their sons will return to San Francisco about the middle of the month and take possession of the home they purchased recently.

Mr. and Mrs. Charles C. Moore are in the Yosemite for a short visit.

Mrs. George Ely (Miss Jessica Wilbur) and Dr. Ely are traveling in the East at present, on their wedding tour.

Mr. and Mrs. Warren Spieker are at present in New York. On their return to California they will open their home in San Francisco.

Miss Flora Doyle and Miss Helen Marye left on Saturday for the East. Miss Marye will continue her studies at Miss Spence's school.

Miss Isabelle Wheaton left on Thursday to return to the Mt. Vernon School at Washington.

Mr. and Mrs. Mountford S. Wilson are returning the early part of the week to their Burlingame home, after a stay of several weeks in Santa Barbara.

Mrs. Arthur Redington left on Saturday for the Atlantic coast, going East to choose a school for her daughters.

Mr. and Mrs. Chester Weaver, who have been in the East for some time, will return to California this month, and will sail for the Orient on November 10th for a trip of several months.

Mr. and Mrs. John Drum will return from New York the first of the week and reopen their Burlingame home for the winter.

Mr. and Mrs. Uda Waldrop expect to return to San Francisco from the East the first part of October.

Mr. Cyril McNear returned from China on Thursday to attend the wedding of Miss Schmiedell to Mr. Moffitt.

Mrs. James Cunningham and her daughter, Miss Elizabeth Cunningham, have sold their Woodside home and will spend the winter at their San Francisco apartment.

Mr. and Mrs. Georges de Latour have bought the Henderson home on Scott Street, and will spend the winter there.

Lieutenant-Colonel Charles Wellington Furlong arrived in San Francisco on Tuesday and is stopping at the St. Francis Hotel.

Mrs. George Barr Baker returned to her Eastern home on Tuesday, after spending the summer at Burlingame.

Mr. and Mrs. John Knox (Miss Laura Lindsay Miller) have recently returned from their wedding tour and are occupying their new home.

Mrs. Whitney Sperry will leave for Europe from Los Angeles via the Panama Canal this week.

Mrs. Paul Verdier remained in Paris to pass the winter there. Mr. Verdier recently returned from an extended visit abroad.

Colonel and Mrs. Carol D. Buck leave during the week for Chicago, where Colonel Buck is to be stationed for the coming two years.

Mr. and Mrs. Reed Funsten are at their San Francisco home again, after spending the summer at Los Altos.

Mr. and Mrs. J. C. Berendsen and their daughter, Miss Anita Berendsen, arrived in New York from Europe this week. They return to California after a short visit with Eastern friends.

Mrs. William Tubbs has leased her home on Broadway for three years to Mrs. Squire Verrick Mooney.

Among the visitors during the past week to San Francisco, after the convention of the Episcopal Church in Portland, were Right Rev. Dr. McInnes and the Right Rev. Dr. Gailor, the president of the national council.

Mrs. Dearborn Clark plans to leave for the East in a short time.

Mr. and Mrs. Andrew Talbot are in Normandy. They plan to leave soon for England to spend the winter there.

Among those recently registered at the St. Francis are Mr. Charles Rafeld, Portland; Mr. Joseph Berger, Mr. E. C. Braun, Seattle; Mr. Edwin H. Flagg, Mr. J. C. Brooks, Los Angeles; Dr. B. Robbins, Hanford; Dr. Arthur D. Hirschfelder, Minneapolis; Mr. Sam Rosenberg, Los Angeles; Mr. James Brown, New York; Mr. T. M. Morris, Bakersfield; Mr. W. D. McAdams, Chicago; Mr. M. Wyman, New York; Mr. Ben C. Holt, Spokane; Mr. A. L. Wright, Portland; Mr. G. A. Brastanburg, Fullerton.

At the Paul Elder Gallery.

Dr. James L. Gordon, pastor of the First Congregational Church, will lecture in the Paul Elder Gallery Saturday afternoon, October 14th, at 2:30 o'clock. His subject will be "Couléism," a discussion of the celebrated doctrine of "Self Mastery Through Conscious Autosuggestion" of Dr. Emile Coué, which is one of the topics occupying the public mind today.

Sukumar Chatterji, editor of Chhatra Saha-dar, will lecture in the same gallery Tuesday afternoon, October 10th, on "Knowledge, Arts, and Sciences of the Hindus." These lectures are given under the direction of Paul Elder.

Mr. and Mrs. Frederick Hope Beaver are being congratulated upon the birth of a son, to be named Frederick for his father. Before her marriage last fall Mrs. Beaver was Miss Anne Dibblee, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Albert J. Dibblee.

The weight of a piece of hickory is the best indication of its strength. It is said that 100,000,000 board feet a year are consumed in the making of tool handles, including golf tools.

There are 113 newspapers and fourteen magazines owned and directed by negroes in this country.

CURRENT VERSE.

Waking Dreams.

This morning, as I woke in bed,
The Little Ouse was in my head—
The Little Ouse that flows so brown
Beside the wharf at Thetford town,
And under the gray arch where yet
The seal of ancient peace is set.
Oh, what should make that quiet stream
Wind through my happy waking dream?

Yesterday, as I woke in bed,
The Atlantic pounded through my head,
Lashed by the furious Sou'west
That gives to sea and ships no rest;
While, like a derelict, on high
The half-moon drifted through the sky.
Oh, what should make that moon's pale gleam
Eerily haunt my waking dream?

The day before, I woke in bed,
And children flitted through my head.
Oh, there was Jack, with open smile,
And Anne, her face wreathed in guile;
And Derrick, of the sober eyes,
Gazed at the world with mute surprise;
While schoolboy Tom, cheered by his team,
Shot a goal through my waking dream.

Tomorrow, as I wake in bed,
Who knows what may be in my head?
What joy? What peace? What grief? What fear?

Where shall I be—afar or near?
Oh, strange adventure! . . . Hasten, Sleep!
Bear me across the unknown deep;
But bid some holy influence beam
Upon my spirit's waking dream!

—Gilbert Thomas in the Observer.

Summer Tryst

When the long day from quiet dawn
Has come to quietness again,
And eve, advancing through the trees,
Stretches long fingers o'er the lane,
Then from the farm, across the field
Of shut-eye daisies quick I go,
And through the churchyard where old yews
Guard the poor dead who lie below.

I know who's waiting down the road,
Thinking, "She's late," and "She'll not come."
I'll see him first, where I walk hid
Behind the yew trees in the gloom.
Oh! how the thrush among the graves
Cries "Joy!" and "Joy!" and "Gay!" and
"Gay!"

My heart thrills to his tiny heart.
Ah, shall I hurry, or delay?

Alas! poor dead, who lie so still,
So hid, so deaf to that shrill call,
And never hear my footsteps pass,
However quickened; nor the fall
Of ripe yew-berries on the stones
Which lie so heavy on their bed. . . .
Ah! low beneath the thrush's note
A whistle sounds. . . . Poor dead! Poor dead!
—Ivanhoe in the Spectator.

Lamb.

The old bellwether looked at the lamb
as a gentleman looks when he mutters "Damn." . . .

"If you jump and frisk,
you little fool,
you'll only end
by losing your wool."

When I was a lamb
I always would behave as like a sheep
as I could."

"Did you!" the lamb
replied with a leap.
"I always thought
You were born a sheep."

The park-keeper said
to the boy on the fence:
"Let's have less of your impudence."

Off with you, now,
and do as you're bade,
or you'll end in prison.—

When I was a lad." . . .
—Humbert Wolfe in the Chapbook.

Black Magic.

(To a boy looking at a photographic exhibit—
"Mammals in the Wild State.")

Go back to the office, boy, or back to school—
Black magic lurks in stumbling elk that go
New-antered where the rocks are soft with snow,
In a beaver's nose that grooves a birch-ringed pool;

Mad antelope go streaming past you here;
Great grizzlies hunch their bulk up scaly pines;
Beneath those sheep the cañon water shines
Mile-down in shale, and perilously near!

Fly then from red-tails bunched by twilight streams,
And all lithe creatures of another earth,
Lest they should steal you back to second birth,
And in some country of astounding dreams,

Among their crags and underneath their sky
Make you like them—fierce, beautiful, and shy!
—Frank Ernest Hill in the New Republic.

The eye of a woman is said to be better than that of a man.

A Noble Bohemian.

Among the paupers at the Hôpital, Adalbert Biart de Ghérardine, the king of the Bohemian quarter of Paris, drew his last breath a few days ago, says the Living Age. After his death the body was taken to the cemetery of Père-Lachaise, where only families whose history dates back at least to the time of the First Empire are entombed. Beside the bones of his famous ancestors, soldiers and sailors who died in the service of their country, now rest those of this last representative of a noble line. And in a short time he will be unknown; people will wonder how he lived up to the standards of his predecessors.

His life was singular, for though he may have been a failure, he remained true to his traditions and was a distinguished man. His fine, handsome figure was a familiar sight to habitués of the Latin Quarter, the Luxembourg, and the Boulevard Saint-Michel. Although he had no known abode, his wardrobe was extraordinarily varied. The Grecian garb of Raymond Duncan is conventional compared with the unexpected and incongruous garments of Ghérardine. Sometimes he would appear in a sixteenth-century costume with sleeves of silk; he would often wear an officer's khaki hat; he might appear in short trousers with his legs encased in armor; or, in a Swiss mountain-climbing outfit, he would seem prepared to scale the Matterhorn. But Art could make his appearance no more striking than Nature already had, and the combination was amazing.

His story is tragic. Having studied at the Sorbonne, he edited, at different times, La Plume and the Revue de Paris; but it is probable that his "Thirty Years of Bohemia" was written by a friend who put Ghérardine's name to it. He was beloved by every one, during his later years as much as in his youth. His failure was caused by his grief over the death of his daughter, after which he ceased to devote much effort to his work, and finally became a drifting Bohemian vagabond. It is seldom that aristocracy decays so picturesquely.

Tobacco grown in 1919 was regarded as one of the finest crops in recent years.

In the Heart

of the City of Oakland
and close to beautiful
Lake Merritt—one of America's most satisfying hotels.

HOTEL OAKLAND

OAKLAND · CALIFORNIA

Management
W. C. JURGENS

MILLS COLLEGE SCHOOL OF MUSIC EXTENSION OPPORTUNITIES

New equipment in instruments and studio space makes possible a limited number of extension students in the study of Piano, Organ, Voice, Stringed Instruments and Theory.

For information call
Elmhurst 10, or write to

LUTHER MARCHANT
School of Music, Mills College

THE SANTA BARBARA GIRLS' SCHOOL

Resident and Day Pupils. Eleven acres. Country Life and Sports. Sleeping-porches. Open-air school rooms. Riding. Swimming all the year round. Basis of work, clear thinking.

MARIAN L. CHAMBERLAIN, A. M., Principal
P. O. Box 548, SANTA BARBARA, CAL.

The Katharine Branson School, Inc. ROSS, MARIN COUNTY, CALIFORNIA

A COUNTRY SCHOOL FOR GIRLS

DAY AND RESIDENT COLLEGE PREPARATORY

Heads: Katharine Fleming Branson, A. B., Bryn Mawr
Laura Elizabeth Branson, A. B., Bryn Mawr

Graduate Cosmetic Specialist

Peggy Jane Beauty Shop
(ESTHER M. FISHER)
Wrinkle Eradicating
Studio 203 545 Sutter Street
Garfield 576

THE ALLEGED HUMORISTS.

"What cigarettes do you smoke?" "My husband's."—Christiania Karikaturen.

She—My aunt goes to every dance that I do. He—Ah, a dansant.—Colorado Dodo.

Harry—Did you feel the earthquake last night? Carrie—No, I was shimmying.—Washington Dirge.

Waiter (to irate customer)—We aim to please. Customer—Then I'd advise a little target practice.—Washington and Lee Mink.

"I hear that Eth Souers has the reputation of being the biggest liar in Indyanner." "Yep. He even has to have his neighbors call his hawks."—Judge.

Aged Scotswoman (who has been knocked down by a cyclist)—Can ye no ring yer bell? Youthful Cyclist—Aye, but canna ride a bicycle.—Til-Bits.

Professor—Aren't you Mr. Smith? Stude—No, sir, I'm Mr. Smith's twin brother. Professor—Ah, I see; what name, please?—Notre Dame Juggler.

"What! Jim a second-story man? Why, I've always believed in him." "But he's probably always stuck to his first one with you, dear."—Annapolis Log.

"She is the sort of woman," remarked a lady, "who gives you her favorite recipe and purposely leaves out the most important ingredient."—Boston Transcript.

The Tramp (at the back door)—Lady, will you please give me a glass of water, I'm so terribly hungry that I don't really know where to spend the night.—Paris Le Rire.

Willie—I looked through the keyhole last night when May's fellow was calling on her. Father—And what did you find out? Willie—The electric lamp.—Michigan Gargoyle.

Co-ed—Why didn't you find out who he was when the professor called the roll? Another Co-ed—I did try to, but he answered for four different names.—Missouri Showme.

Jessie—I can't imagine how you get money out of your husband. Bessie—Oh, I simply say I'm going back to mother, and he immediately hands me the fare.—London Answers.

"Fifty years ago girls married before they were twenty; nowadays they're thirty before they think of it." "We get wiser every day. In another fifty years we won't marry at all."—Sydney Bulletin.

Friend of the Local Champion—It must be heavenly, meeting all these people and being introduced as the new champion. The Local Champion—I don't meet people, silly. People meet me.—Punch.

"Won't you come and make a four at bridge, sir." "I am exceedingly sorry, old man, but I don't play bridge." "You don't play bridge? Then what on earth did you join a golf club for?"—Judge.

Father—Are you sure he loves you? That it isn't your money? Daughter—He swore he worshipped me since he first saw me. Father—Where was that? Daughter—At the beach last summer? Father—Were you in a bathing suit. Daughter—Why, yes. Father—He's after your money.—Carnegie Puppet.

"And so," read Bess from her book, "they were married and lived happily ever after." "They did!" exclaimed Mary, eagerly. "Oh, Bess, does it say what kind of a car he bought?"—Richmond Times-Dispatch.

Local M. P.—Well, Mr. MacGregor, I hope you liked the story. I finished up my speech with? Mr. MacGregor—Ay, yon's a bonnie story. Dod, man, I mind the first time I heard it I near kicket the bottom oot ma cradle.—Punch.

"Look here!" exclaimed the stranger, as he stumbled into his twentieth puddle. "I thought you said you knew where all the bad places were on this road?" "Well," replied the native, who had volunteered to guide him through the dark, "we're a-finding them, ain't we?"—Pearson's Weekly (London).

Mrs. Vere Gonne (to her solicitor)—I can not imagine how the unfortunate affair has leaked out. I have certainly never said a word about it in the presence of my servants. Solicitor (dryly)—Possibly not, madam; but have you ever said a word about it in the presence of a keyhole?—Pearson's Weekly (London).

Customer—What do you mean by selling me that stuff you called hair restorer and telling me it would restore my head to its original condition? Chemist—Didn't you like it? Customer—No, I didn't! If I had kept on much longer I should have been entirely bald. Original condition, indeed! Chemist—Most people are born bald, or nearly so, sir. That is the original condition.—London Answers.

The Hindu Sticks to His Caste.

Hinduism embraces almost every form of belief, says Harold Cox in Asia Magazine. I remember years ago having a conversation with a charming old Brahman, who explained to me, then newly arrived in India, that Hinduism was a question, not of creed, but of conduct. To quote his words, which impressed themselves on my mind: "You can believe in one God or three Gods or in thirty-three thousand Gods; you can believe that there is no God, or you can believe that God is in everything, and with all these different beliefs you can be a good Hindu, provided you follow the rules of your caste."

That one word "caste" is the essence of Hinduism. The Hindus, who enormously outnumber all the rest of the population of India, are divided up into a multitude of castes, religiously separated from one another. Into whatever caste a man is born, in that caste he remains until he dies. At the head of the whole system is the priestly caste of Brahmans. But the Brahmans themselves are divided into a number of sub-castes, all keeping their respective rank, which is determined, not by wealth, but by birth. One of my best pupils in India was a very high-caste Brahman boy. So high was his caste that he could not find any one in the neighborhood sufficiently sacred to be permitted to cook his food. He had to import an uncle, who lived with him in a hut in the college compound and prepared meals while the boy was attending classes in mathematics and English literature. Similar barriers run right through Hinduism. The lowest castes are in fact known as the "Untouchables" because merely to touch them pollutes a Hindu of a higher caste. I have myself seen an Indian servant, when asked by his English mistress to fetch a shawl for the baby, toss the shawl to the baby's nurse instead of handing it to her, because she, being of a lower caste, would have polluted him if she had touched the shawl before he had parted with it. In parts of southern India, where the caste system is even more rigid than in the north, the Untouchables are forbidden to walk on certain roads, lest higher castes should be polluted merely by seeing them. Thus Hinduism is essentially and rigidly aristocratic or theocratic in organization.

A Persian Refinement.

We spoke of the Russian occupation two years before, says Clara Cary Edwards in the Yale Review, for our city lies within that part of Persia overrun by the Czar's army during the war. "I had much annoyance from the Russians," said our friend the local baron, "but they were not very clever. While I was governor, it happened that a Russian soldier quarreled with a Persian gendarme and the Persian shot the Russian. The Russian consul demanded that I deliver the gendarme to him for judgment and punishment, but I received a telegram from Teheran to the effect that I should not give him up. So I said to the consul that it would be well to hold a joint inquiry into the affair at the place where it had occurred—the slaughter-house. We drove out there with our suites: the Russian took his secretaries and his clerks, and a Russian colonel came too, in a fine new uniform, with his spurs shining. Within the slaughter-house were nothing but wooden benches for us to sit on. We discussed and examined witnesses, while the Russians held their white handkerchiefs to their noses. Vallah! I, too, was

Argonaut Readers, Attention!

It is safe to say there is scarcely one of our readers who has not some valuable paper at home or in an office safe, where it is liable to destruction in case of fire.

In case of death, the estate is guarded as it should be if your papers are kept in a safe deposit box. One can be had for $4 a year at the Crocker Vaults.

Crocker Safe Deposit Vaults

Crocker Building

Post and Market Sts.

dead of the smell! Every day we went to the slaughter-house, every day we found new witnesses to examine, every day we discussed the affair. The consul suggested that we meet elsewhere, but I told him that I was anxious to help him in every way possible, and that we could not understand the case unless we examined it in its own surroundings. It was not long before the consul sent word to me that he was ill and could not go on with the inquiry for a time. We never took it up again." He accepted a cigarette from the Sahib and paused to light it. "The Russians are not bad men, if one has a little subtlety."

Freudian View of Dickens.

Had Dickens lived in the twentieth century, the Freudians, taking one shrewd, amused, infuriatingly perspicacious look at him, would have analyzed him on the spot, says Alexander Woolcott in the North American Review. They would have noted his clumsy efforts at playwriting, his adoration of Macready, his wistful loiterings at the stage-door, of which the faint, unmistakable aroma was ever the breath of his nostrils, and his disarming readiness to laugh and cry at the most ordinary of performances in any theatre. They would have noted his pantomimic gyrations when in the throes of composition. They would have known that the young novelist who walked the night-mantled streets of Paris in an agony of sympathy for the dying Paul Dombey was a side-tracked actor. They would have noted his own incongruous capacity for self-pity, his grotesque sensitiveness to the most piddling of criticism, his comically transparent excuses for appearing in amateur dramatics, his gallant and undeniably Thespian appearance and his flamboyant raiment, rings and all, which distressed his sedate friends, but satisfied something within him. They would have noted all these things and published in some obscure journal an article written to demonstrate that Mr. Dickens was suffering from an exhibition complex. This would have maddened him. He would have dictated sixteen furious letters demanding retraction, growing the redder in the face as he paced the floor because he would have known that it was all quite true. That half-smothered desire gnawed at him through all the years of his growth until at last it found an outlet which brought him peace.

For fifty years seven lights have burned day and night in front of a statue of the blessed virgin in one of the Catholic churches in Chicago. These lights commemorate the escape of the edifice from destruction in the great fire of 1871.

A new thing in vehicles, the one-passenger runabout, has become a frequent sight in English towns, and particularly in London, where traffic conditions make its size convenient.

FOR A

CLEAR COMPLEXION

and a

HEALTHY COLOR

eat

FLEISCHMANN'S YEAST

Three Cakes a Day

KING
COALHigh in Heat Units
Low in AshFOR SALE BY ALL DEALERS
IN CALIFORNIA

KING COAL CO.

Main Office
EXCHANGE BLOCK
San Francisco

Wholesale Only

SPERRY
Drifted Snow
Flour is always the same, always uniform. Its unbroken popularity has been built around a keystone idea—
uniformitySPERRY FLOUR CO.
U. S. A.

The Argonaut.

VOL. LXXXI. No. 2377.

SAN FRANCISCO, OCTOBER 14, 1922.

Price Ten Cents

PUBLISHER'S NOTICE: The Argonaut (title trade-marked) is published every week by the Argonaut Publishing Company. Subscriptions, $5.00 per year; six months, $2.55; three months, $1.50, payable in advance—postage prepaid. Subscriptions to all foreign countries within the Postal Union, $6.00 per year. Sample copies free. Single copies, 10 cents. News Dealers and Agents in the interior supplied by the San Francisco News Company, 747 Howard Street, San Francisco. Subscribers wishing their addresses changed should give their old as well as new addresses. The American News Company, New York, are agents for the Eastern trade. The Argonaut may be ordered from any News Dealer or Postmaster in the United States or Europe. Special advertising rates to publishers. Address all communications to The Argonaut, 207 Powell Street, San Francisco. Make all checks, drafts, postal orders, etc., payable to "The Argonaut Publishing Company."

Entered at the San Francisco Postoffice as second-class matter. The Argonaut can be obtained in London at the International News Co., Breams Building, Chancery Lane; American Newspaper and Advertising Agency, Trafalgar Square, Northumberland Avenue; and at Daws Steamship Agency, 17 Green Street, Leicester Square, and can be ordered from any of the news-stands of W. H. Smith & Son. In Paris, at 37 Avenue de l'Opéra. In New York, at Brentano's, Fifth Avenue and Twenty-Fourth Street. In Chicago, Western News Company. In Washington, at Adams' News Agency, Ninth and G Streets.

The Argonaut is on sale at the Ferry Station, San Francisco, by Foster & Orear; on the ferryboats of the Key Route system by the news agents, and by the Van Noy-Interstate Company on Southern Pacific boats and trains.

Telephone, Kearny 5895. Publication office, 207 Powell Street. WM. J. MILLIKEN, Business Manager.

FORTY-SIXTH YEAR

ALFRED HOLMAN - - - - - EDITOR

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

|   |         |
|---|---------|
| EDITORIAL: The Latest Prohibition Order—Vacancies in High Places—The "Unmerger" Case—Voting Intelligence—Enemies of Society—The New York Governorship—Editorial Notes ..... | 241-243 |
| LETTERS TO THE EDITOR .....   | 243     |
| CONSTANTINOPLE: Impact of the Turk in the Fifteenth Century Drives Its Scholars and Scholarship Abroad .....  | 243-244 |
| OLD FAVORITES .....   | 244     |
| INDIVIDUALITIES: Notes About Prominent People All Over the World .....  | 244     |
| MORE CONVERTED CANNIBALS: Frederick O'Brien Invites to Another Rocking-Chair Voyage in Southern Seas .....  | 245     |
| BANKING AND INVESTMENT NEWS .....   | 246-247 |
| BOOKS ON THE TABLE: Notes of Books and Authors .....  | 248     |
| REVIEWS AND NOTICES: New Books Received .....   | 249     |
| DRAMA: "The First Born"; The Farrar Concert; The Lund Recital; The Plaza Lecture. By Josephine Hart Phelps .....  | 250     |
| FOYER AND BOX-OFFICE .....  | 251     |
| VANITY FAIR: Tottering Thrones—Tin Kings, Here and There—Tyrant Man Weakening .....   | 252     |
| STORYETTES: Grave and Gay, Epigrammatic and Otherwise .....   | 253     |
| THE MERRY MUSE .....  | 253     |
| PERSONAL: Social Notes—Movements and Whereabouts .....  | 254-255 |
| CURRENT VERSE .....   | 255     |
| THE ALLEGED HUMORISTS: Paragraphs Ground Out the Dismal Wits of the Day .....   | 256     |

The Latest Prohibition Order.

The policy of the United States Shipping Board permitting sale and consumption of liquors on the ships under its administration has been based upon expediences connected with competition. Where passengers may have choice between ships upon which liquors may be bought and consumed, and those under a strict rule of prohibition, the former are likely to get the bulk of the business. Thus the purpose for which the Shipping Board vessels are maintained and operated, namely, that of creating a world-going merchant marine, must to a great extent be thwarted if our ships may not provide that for which there is on the part of ocean travelers an insistent demand. These were the considerations upon which the policy of the Shipping Board was established despite the fact that prohibition is the rule in the United States. The inconsistency of this practice is obvious and the order of President Harding closing the bars on Shipping Board boats, however it may affect their operation, was sound in morals and it was necessary under the law. But when there is denied to foreign ships having liquors on board, even though under seal, the privilege of entering American ports the order goes further, we believe, than the limits either of expediency or interest. It will surely be regarded by foreign countries as a denial of legitimate rights and is certain to be protested, possibly in ways that may tend to our disadvantage. We have an undoubted right to pursue any domestic policy we may see fit, but it is going far to seek to impose that policy upon foreign nations with whom we maintain reciprocal trade relations.

Vacancies in High Places.

The most important business before the President of the United States at this moment is the selection of twoscore or more properly qualified men to sit in the high places of the government. The President is reticent on the subject, but there is reason to believe that his reserve is not due to embarrassment because of any lack of available timber. His difficulty lies in making choice from many possibilities and so making it as to work out a harmonious mosaic in which the factors of fitness, geography, political affiliations and representative character shall blend. Here are some of the posts to be filled: Seven members of the fact-finding Coal Commission, one Assistant Secretary of War, one Assistant Secretary of the Treasury, one Assistant Secretary of Labor, one Governor-General of the Philippines, one Presiding Judge of the Court of Customs Appeal, twenty-one Federal Judges, one governor of the Federal Reserve Board, one member of the Federal Reserve Board, one and possibly two members of the Tariff Commission.

It is a formidable list. Formidable in the sense that certain embarrassments are connected with making appointments on the eve of a congressional election. When the executive has a batch like this on his hands, inevitably the offices have an unnatural relationship one to another. The jobs must be considered as a mass. Thus if it becomes inexpedient to appoint a particular man to the Federal judiciary it may be that he can be worked off on the Coal Commission, and so on through the list. There are many things to be considered and it takes time to prepare the slate.

One of the factors that must be kept in mind are the "lame ducks," who are always more or less on the hands of a President. Already, as a result of the recent primaries, there are two lame ducks who are qualified for appointive positions, namely, Senator McCumber of North Dakota and Senator New of Indiana. Both stand well with the President. Both are men of ability. Both have been mentioned for selective appointment, McCumber for the Federal Reserve Board and New for Governor-General of the Philippines, although it is doubtful if New would take a position so far from home at a time when he is planning to make important changes in the political map of Indiana. There is greater likelihood of his eventually becoming Postmaster-General, and letting Dr. Work, the incumbent, go back to Colorado with the Administration's benediction for duty well done. Then the crop of lame ducks may be increased considerably as a result of the November election. Probably the Republicans at Washington are more scared than they need be, but many of them fear that they are going to land in the lame-duck class and are not anxious that all the offices be filled before the fact is certain. This contributes to delay.

In the matter of the selection of seven gentlemen to constitute the coal fact-finding commission, however, lame-duckism does not figure. A short time ago the Administration was very eager for immediate authority to appoint the commission, and it has not escaped notice that since authority was granted there has been no haste in the matter. The reason is not entirely a mystery. Congress slipped into the law creating the commission a clause requiring that body, among other things, to inquire into the possible nationalization of coal mines. This, of course, was a sop to government-ownership advocates. But the provision is there and it might do a great deal of harm if some of the members of the commission were to develop radical tendencies.

Therefore the President and his immediate advisers are going over the tentative lists in hand with the purpose of eliminating from consideration anybody who may have the taint of government ownership predilections. No chances are to be taken, not even of a minority report.

The selection of a Governor-General for the Philippines is not immediately pressing because General Wood will hold that post for nearly two months longer. December 1st is the date on which he is to take up his duties as provost of the University of Pennsylvania, and a deputy governor could carry on for a short time. But the matter is coming along and has to be given consideration in connection with the other appointments. The army is boosting General Bandholtz for the job. Bandholtz made a fine record as chief of the Philippine constabulary. At present he is in command of what is known as the military district of Washington, taking in the army posts immediately adjacent to the national capital.

The three near-Cabinet jobs must be filled soon. Assistant Secretary of War Colonel J. Mayhew Wainwright has been nominated for Congress in a New York district and wants to get out at the earliest possible moment. The post of Assistant Secretary of the Treasury, in charge of the collection of the revenue, has been vacant since Elmer Dover was informed that he had resigned and that his resignation had been accepted. There is difficulty in getting a suitable man for this position. There is no vacancy as yet in the post, of Assistant Secretary of Labor, but it is a probability that E. J. Henning of San Diego, who now holds the position, will be named as district judge for the Southern District of California. This assistant secretaryship is admirably suited for a congressional lame duck, and for this reason the post is not likely to be filled until after appraisalment has been made of the wreckage on hand after the November election.

No vacancies have bothered the President so much as the two that are impending in the Federal Reserve Board. Farm bloc politics complicate the situation. The President has to appoint a governor of the board in place of W. P. G. Harding, whose term expired some weeks ago, and he has also to appoint the additional member prescribed under the farm bloc legislation of last year, which provided for a new member and also that the business of farming should have a representative on the board. Governor Harding is a Democrat, but he is pretty generally supported by bankers throughout the country on the basis of the fine record he has made. His chief opponent is that arch-demagogue, Senator Tom Heflin, also of Alabama, who has been clamoring against Governor Harding and the board since early last winter. Heflin, who is a member of the farm bloc, has brought Senator Capper and various other bloc senators to his support. The agitation has apparently caused President Harding to forego his original intention of reappointing Governor Harding because the farm bloc senators, particularly Capper, have stirred up a row throughout the Mississippi Valley.

Heflin and the farm blocers have a simple but highly demagogic explanation of the ills of the agriculturists. They maintain that Governor Harding and other members of the Federal Reserve Board are the tools of Wall Street; that Wall Street for its own profit decreed a policy of deflation which the board under Governor Harding carried out; that this policy of deflation was made to bear in a particularly heavy fashion upon the farmer, and that that is what caused farm prices to crash. This theory, of which Heflin is the chief proponent, is not supported by the chronological record. Farm prices began to decline before deflation set in. Moreover, the Federal Reserve system has given the farmer a greater degree of financial support than he has ever had previously in periods of financial stringency. The record also shows that there has been some free-hand lying, particularly by Southerners, in explaining that their inability to get loans from their local banks was due to the policy of the Federal Reserve Board. There is no serious question about the facts. But it is true just the same that farmers of the South and Middle West have been made to believe that Federal Reserve Board deflation was especially directed against them and that it is responsible for the plight in which they find themselves.

Further to complicate the situation, the American Farm Board Federation, the major interest behind the congressional farm bloc, is demanding, not only that Governor Harding shall not be reappointed, but that its own president, J. R. Howard of Iowa, shall be given a place on the board. This has set the Grange and the National Board of Farm Organizations, rival farmer bodies, to froth at the mouth. They oppose Governor Harding, but they are insistent that the American Farm Bureau Federation shall not dictate the nomination of a member of the board. What they want is an actual dirt farmer.

Meanwhile, certain wild-eyed candidates, looking to the November election—radical demagogues like Brookhart in Iowa and Frazier in North Dakota—are telling the voters that both railroad rates and deflation are responsible for low farm prices. Politicians of this school demand repeal of the Esch-Cummins Transportation Act on the ground that it contains a guaranty provision. They have convinced many farmers of the country that this law guarantees to the railroads a return of 5½ per cent. on their value, leaving the implication that the government out of its treasury makes up any deficit. The truth is that the Esch-Cummins law does nothing of the sort. The government did guarantee earnings during the period of government administration of the railroads and for a space of time thereafter, but since September 1, 1921, there has been no Federal guaranty. The railroads are absolutely on their own. The so-called guaranty provision merely declares that a certain percentage is a fair return. If it is exceeded, the railroads under the law are compelled to reduce rates. Deliberate misrepresentation by politicians who are farming the farmer persists, however, and it is surprising to find that many farmers—and others—still believe that there is in the law a government guaranty to the railroads.

The "Unmerger" Case.

There is natural and general disappointment that the Supreme Court of the United States has denied the appeal of the Southern Pacific Railroad for a rehearing in the "unmerger" case. But while the decision stands as the final judgment of the court, the case is not lost, since there remains resort to the Interstate Commerce Commission, which has authority under the Esch-Cummins Act to group the railroads of the country in accordance with practical conditions and practical judgment. This resort will be made by the shippers of California and the hope is that the commission may be impressed by considerations that lie outside the lines of inquiry pursued by the Supreme Court. Surely the interest and the wish of the region served by the system now known as the Southern Pacific, made up of links bearing the names of Southern Pacific and Central Pacific, must have weight with a body whose determinations are subject to facts as distinct from legal theories and judicial precedents.

In its last analysis this matter is a contention between the Southern Pacific and the Union Pacific over lines of railroad owned by the former and essential to its completeness and efficiency as a working system. The Union Pacific, now possessing terminals at Portland and Los Angeles, wants a third connection on Pacific tide-water at San Francisco. It seeks to get it by taking over from the Southern Pacific its lines between San Francisco and Ogden. To this end—in its inspiring motive only a little short of piracy—the decree of the Supreme Court is a direct aid, not so intended, to be sure, but having that effect.

We shall not venture to take issue with the Supreme Court concerning a point of technical law, but in the interest of this community, and of fair play in general, we protest that the decree imposes a hardship for which there is no justification in practical conditions. The Central Pacific lines are essentially part of the Southern Pacific system. They were created with that purpose and to that end. To tear from the Southern Pacific lines it has constructed under the name of the Central Pacific would be, first, to cripple it, and second, to impose upon it a vast bill of expense without in the least degree benefiting anybody. Further, it would impose upon the country which the Southern Pacific serves a tremendous hardship for which there is no rhyme or reason. There is no demand for it in the country served by the Southern Pacific system in its existing form; on the contrary there is universal protest against it. No voice has been raised in support of this proposal whose inspiration may not be traced to the wish of the Union Pacific to extend its line to California, and thus in connection with its Portland and Los Angeles branches to gain a still firmer grip upon the traffic of the Pacific region.

Voting Intelligence.

As a result of the testing of the intelligence of some 1,700,000 officers and enlisted men drafted into the American army for the world war, it appears that:

Half our adults have no more intellectual acumen than the average pupil in the eighth grade. [About fourteen years of age.] Probably a quarter have less than the average pupil of the seventh grade. [A year below.] The least intelligent 15 or 20 per cent. of our population would probably be incapable of mastering, after any amount of instruction, the more difficult portions of the typical eighth-grade text in arithmetic, of making any progress in algebra, of getting much sense out of a moderately difficult prose selection, or of understanding the underlying principles of the tariff, taxation, bond transactions, or banking. On questions of larger social and national policy they vote blindly or as directed by political bosses. They are democracy's ballast, not always useless, but always a potential liability.

This quotation is from an article in the current World's Work by Dr. Lewis Madison Terman, one of the foremost authorities of this country on the testing of intelligence by methods developed from those of Binet and Simon in France. The tests applied in the army showed some very disquieting things about our electorate. If the draft was representative (but happily it was not quite that, on account of the exemptions of many of the members of the learned professions), it indicated in the most reliable group tested an average mental age of 13.4 years. Yet, considering what classes have the bad habit of neglecting to vote, the average soldier is probably the average voter. These tests are not for the determination of knowledge, but of mental ability, which is another matter.

Manhood suffrage is based on the theory that men are born equal and remain so. The truth is that they are born very unequal, and remain so. The dullards do not become brilliant, the highly intelligent children remain highly intelligent. Equal education does not equalize the differences; it accentuates them. Yet all over the United States men (and women) can vote when they become twenty-one years of age, no matter how deficient their mentality may be, unless they have the misfortune to get into asylums or penitentiaries. Under the direct primary system they vote on the qualifications of aspirants for party nominations whom they do not know, to be candidates for offices whose requirements they can neither imagine nor understand. They vote directly for United States senators, who will have to deal with the most complicated puzzles of foreign policy. That is what is the matter with Congress, and the reason why it is gradually filling with rabble-rousers instead of men of judgment and devotion. Competent observers say its level of intelligence has never been so low. The child-minded voter can understand the rabble-rouser—the rabble-rouser sees to it that he or she can, by guarding himself against any utterance above the comprehension of a child of 13.4 years. Of course, the rabble-rouser does not consciously guide himself by the limitations of this grade of human prune, but he feels those limitations as a practiced automobile driver feels the power of his engine, and he is careful to feed it nothing it can not absorb into its system and turn into votes.

When a candidate for United States senator pulls out the tremolo stop in his vocal organ, aims a thick finger in the general direction of Heaven, and intones "De-e-vine, ce-e-lestial A-a-beraha-a-m Linkun" as part of an argument for a protective tariff on lemons, he is employing wise and successful tactics.

In California we have got into the bad habit of amending our Constitution by popular vote. This November the electorate, average intelligence of a child 13.4 years old, will have to accept or reject some twenty-two proposals to change the fundamental law, which has already been so radically altered and mutilated that it is no longer fundamental. These proposals range in scope from the highly complex water and power amendment, involving, not only technical engineering problems, but questions of basic political philosophy, to one preventing the use of shingles on frame buildings in incorporated cities. All persons are sentimental, although not all are fairly intelligent. In fact, the lower the intelligence the greater and sillier the sentimentality. And thoughtless idealists as well as job-hunting demagogues are going about the state appealing to passion, and emotion, and sentiment, all much the same thing, instead of to reason and a knowledge of facts, to get the public to vote their way.

Our only salvation from utter chaos is that the unintelligent do not form a distinct class energized with what the socialists admire as "class consciousness," and so do not vote together. It has not heretofore been possible to unite them and keep them united. If it were, the demolition of the social order would result, and after a Russian agony of centuries society would have to attain some stability through feudalism, slowly and painfully restore a measure of its liberties through revolution and the martyrdom of its best spiritual elements, and thus painfully return to its present position. Perhaps that will happen anyway; perhaps it is happening now, with a hundred thousand hungry orators to accelerate it and no one to raise a voice against it for fear of offending the voting mass. If we are on that limb of the spiral, it is largely because of our making matters the subject of popular voting with which the general body of the public is incompetent to deal, and with which the more intelligent part of the public does not wish to be compelled to deal, but would much prefer to leave to the decisions of representative experts. We have no immediate cure for the disease; but it is much to have such an instrumentality as mental measurement to assist us in recognizing it.

Enemies of Society.

It is not an idle theory when the law recognizes crime as an offense, not against an individual, but against society. And that is particularly true of crimes committed for the purpose of winning strikes. Every time a strike is won (though strikes are seldom won) by the aid of crime, society suffers in its right to the services of business lawfully and securely conducted. That is a real right and a valuable one.

The right to strike is not the right to commit crime. It is the business of working men to get all they can for their work, but that does not mean to get all they can by foul means after they have got all they can by fair; to get all they can lawfully, and then a little more lawlessly. For what they can get lawfully, the public will have to pay, and should be willing to pay, but for what they get unlawfully, the public also must pay, and is robbed when it does it. That robbery, public opinion should have the sense to resent, and the resolution to make the courts protect society from—which the courts could do.

A crime committed to assist a strike is a worse crime against the public than one committed by a single highway robber or burglar. If it is a murder it is a far worse murder than one for revenge or robbery. If employers, for fear of strike violence, concede more to labor than they would if they only had a walk-out and a shut-down to fear, then the public has been robbed, in the form of an addition to the cost of living, to the extent of the difference. An individual thief intends to rob one person, or a few persons. A criminal that commits a crime in the hope of helping to win a strike intends to make society pay more for the commodity or service affected than it ought to pay. Although strikes seldom win, so seldom in fact that the socialists deride the labor unions for depending on their form of organization to ameliorate the lot of labor, there is no doubt that many a concession is made to workmen, not in justice nor in recognition of the shrinking value of money, nor in meeting the varying proportion between the demand and the supply of labor, all which might take the form of legitimate price increase, but through fear of strike violence. Such concessions are to that extent robbery of the consumer, who in the end pays all the bills that are paid, as well as all those that are beaten—and all the damages of every sort. And we are all consumers, including the strikers themselves. Yet so lacking is the public in plain business imagination that it winks at the courts that wink at the violence of strikers. The public and the courts seem to consider that the desire to win a strike supplies a motive that palliates the offense; whereas it aggravates it. The blow is struck against the whole community, instead of a few immediate victims. And it has its more or less intimidating effect, whether the particular strike for which it is committed is won or lost.

A man intends the natural results of his acts, whether he can pre-vision those results or not. We have had a great deal of strike violence lately, the intention of which was to make the already overburdened public pay more for commodities and services than it normally ought to pay. There was the "war" in West Virginia, and the hideous massacre, worse than Turkish, in Illinois. Those were armed attacks on the public. Our own little taxicab war broke out with renewed violence at Powell and O'Farrell Streets last week.

In the railroad strike, the government in support of its petition for a restraining order against the striking shopmen has presented evidence of eighteen murders, forty-four cases of assault where the victims were sent to hospitals, seventeen cases of derailing trains or engines, numerous cases of dynamiting bridges and bunk-houses and of the burning of bridges, roundhouses, and other railroad property for the replacement of which the public will foot the bill; and at present properly foot it, because it does not insist on protection. This is war on us all. Lagging prosecutions and lenient punishments encourage it.

Crime is voluntary. It does not have to be done. And that is especially true of crime committed to assist in strikes. It is deliberate, intentional assault on society. It has less excuse than other crime, and a wider destructive effect, and it ought to be punished more severely because of its motive; not less so. There may be mitigating circumstances about an ordinary private crime. There are none about strike violence. Society has paltered with it as long as it can afford to.

The New York Governorship.

Governor Nathan L. Miller, who has just been nominated by the Republicans of New York for a second term in the executive chair, is a lawyer, fifty-four years of age, and is conceded by the non-partisan element of the New York press to be the best executive the state has had in many a year. The effect of Miller's administration and of his open leadership of the party has resulted in the elimination of factional interests; he has a united party behind him. Immediately following his nomination by the Republicans, Miller was tendered nomination at the hands of the Prohibition party, an organization which in the gubernatorial election of two years ago cast upwards of fourteen thousand votes. Replying, Governor Miller said that he was not a prohibitionist and that he could not, therefore, accept the nomination at the hands of a party with whose cardinal principle and whose main aims he was not in sympathy. At the same time he declared himself opposed to the saloon and to the iniquities associated with it.

It is universally conceded that the Republicans have nominated the best ticket, from the standpoint of competence, to fill the offices for which the candidates are named, within memory. Instead of giving the minor places to local politicians and sections search was made under Governor Miller's leadership for the very best men. The consequence is that should this ticket be elected New York will have, not only an excellent, but a thoroughly harmonious administration of all its executive offices during the next two years.

The Democratic nominee for the governorship is the idol of his party, ex-Governor Alfred Smith, who preceded Miller in the executive office. Smith is supported by Tammany Hall, also by William R. Hearst, who was a competitor for the nomination. Smith stands upon a platform made up largely of the usual platitudes, but highly significant for its declaration against the Volstead Act to the extent that it prohibits the sale of wines and beers. Smith will make a "wet" campaign and it will surely bring him many thousands of voters in November, regardless of the superior quality of the Republican state ticket. There are, we are told, those high up in the Republican organization who feel that the campaign now on is relatively a duplication of the John Purroy Mitchel campaign of some years ago. By that they mean that while the Republicans have the best ticket and the best newspaper support, the other side has the votes. What there may be in this suggestion time only will tell. But one thing is certain, namely, the New York campaign is going to be a mighty interesting one.

It is a significant fact that in New York—and elsewhere this fall—relatively small appeal has been made to the "labor vote." It would seem to be understood at last that the labor vote is a bugaboo to which vastly too much attention has been accorded in recent years. The truth is that there is no such quantity as the labor vote, since the laboring element, like other elements of our citizenship, is divided in its political allegiance and not disposed to accept dictation at the hands of leaders who assume power to place it here or there at their pleasure.

Editorial Notes.

The town of St. Pierre on one of the Miquelon Islands, 180 miles off Nova Scotia, has risen from barren obscurity to large importance as a depot of the bootlegging interest. The New York Herald reports that in the past nine months St. Pierre has shipped 500,000 cases of whisky to America. The illicit traders, it is said, are able to buy whisky at St. Pierre at approximately twenty-one dollars per case, and there is a handsome margin between this price and what can be got in the ready market of Boston, New York, and other coast cities.

There is on in New York an agitation to prevent the migration from that city of many artists who find themselves hampered by the advance in rentals. As a measure of relief it has been suggested that there is a vast deal of roof space which might be turned to account in the construction of studios to be rented to artists at low rates.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR.

Canada and Reciprocity.

VANCOUVER, B. C., October 4, 1922.

TO THE EDITOR—Sir: I see so much to admire and commend in the Argonaut that it is with extreme reluctance that I venture to take exception to your remarks re "Canada and Our Tariff" in your issue for September 30th. Those curt, unsympathetic sentences are not, or so it seems to me, much like your usual writing on international relations. In the first place Canada is not in any sort of panic, mild or otherwise, concerning the new United States tariff. We have the means of defending ourselves, if necessary, against an unjust tariff. The reciprocity that was offered us under the Taft régime, I venture to say, would be rejected tomorrow if offered again. The Canadian people have not changed so far as I can see. The same people are clamoring for it now that wanted it before. It is true that there is a "grit" government in power at the present time, but that government has received no mandate from the Canadian people to ask for reciprocity. If that had been one of the planks in the recent election I am convinced that it would have been turned down. It is far from the fact to say as you do that, "blinded by prejudice and vanity, obsessed with the pride of imperial connection, they missed their chance. . . . All would be more prosperous if the line that separates them from the United States were wiped out." My comment on that is that it is neither "prejudice or vanity" that restrains the Canadian people from asking for closer customs relations, but a natural regard for national safety. I am one of the Canadians, and there are many thousands in this country, who feel that it would be much better, nationally, for Canada if our countries were separated by seven thousand miles of the Pacific Ocean.

Yours truly, R. W. DOUGLAS.

How a Berkeley Citizen Feels About the Stadium Site.

The following letter has been received by the authorities of the City of Berkeley:

SAN FRANCISCO, October 3, 1922.

Mayor and Council of the City of Berkeley,
Berkeley, California—

GENTLEMEN: I recently purchased Lot C, Block 8, University Terrace, Berkeley, which lot, as you know, is situated on Panoramic Way. It is my intention to build a residence on this lot as soon as possible, but unless I can be assured that the new stadium will not be built in Strawberry Cañon, or, if built, that the City of Berkeley will take appropriate measures to regulate traffic to and from the stadium so as to eliminate congestion in the vicinity thereof, I shall not build.

Last Saturday a minor football game was played at the present field, and although the attendance was relatively small, yet automobiles were parked nearly the entire length of Bancroft Way, and upon intersecting side streets for a considerable distance south. It is not difficult to imagine what conditions will be when more important games are played and the attendance is larger, nor what intolerable congestion will exist if the stadium is built in Strawberry Cañon and automobiles are permitted to park on the narrow hillside streets in the vicinity. In case of fire or other catastrophe, police and fire automobiles and ambulances would be absolutely precluded from reaching the scene of the disaster.

Even if it be conceded that the City of Berkeley can not prohibit the building of the stadium in Strawberry Cañon, there would seem to be no reason why an ordinance should not be passed forbidding the parking of automobiles within a certain designated area adjacent to the stadium, particularly upon the narrow hillside streets, during designated hours in days when the stadium is in use.

I therefore earnestly urge the adoption of such an ordinance at the earliest possible date, so that the University of California may have concrete evidence of the widespread opposition to the location of the stadium in Strawberry Cañon.

Respectfully yours, H. M. SAWYER.

The Definite and Indefinite Articles.

If I am elected in November I shall submit to the legislature in January, 1923, a budget that will call for an actual decrease of from $12,000,000 to $15,000,000 below the last biennial budget of $91,000,000. I will do this without crippling a single humanitarian function and without deducting a single dollar from the state's educational funds.—Friend William Richardson.

If I am elected to this great office, I go in there absolutely unshackled.—Thomas Lee Woolwine and Andrew Gump.

The Temple of Apollo at Delphi was burned in 548 B. C.

CONSTANTINOPLE.

Impact of the Turk in the Fifteenth Century Drives Its Scholars and Scholarship Abroad.

II.

In last week's Argonaut I wrote of the origin and rise of Constantinople, bringing the story down to the times which in Western Europe were the Dark Ages. This week I shall consider certain outstanding circumstances under which the capital of the Eastern Empire assisted the intellectual revival of the Western world, sending back seeds from its transplanted culture. In a future issue I shall consider some of the relations of Constantinople to modern life. The information contained in these articles can not be regarded as a "scoop." But it is derived from scattered sources which the reader may not find readily accessible.

Through the late fall and early winter of 1096 successive waves of a barbarian army from the woods of France and Germany and the swamps of Flanders, dressed in pot-scraper shirts of mail and mounted on starving cart-horses, appeared before the walls of Constantinople and demanded entrance and quarters. Few of these men could write their names, and most of them were innocent of any intentional contact with water since they were born. The emperor of what was left of the classic world looked on them with disdain, but he feared them; and requested them, in effect, please to be on their way. They made threats, demanding entertainment for man and beast. That seemed cheaper than conflict, so, being a discreet man, he supplied fodder, and the army went into cantonments for the winter; raiding hen roosts, stealing shoats, holding up travelers, and raising the deuce with the farmers' wives and daughters. Once it attacked the walls. In the spring the emperor persuaded the barbarians to shift camp to the other side of the Bosphorus, promising to set them over and even to join their expedition. But with Eastern finesse he withdrew his vessels after the ferriage, and soon had the satisfaction of knowing that the last of his recent guests was winding over the heights of Scutari in the general direction of Antioch. He could look dry-eyed upon the vanishing rear guard of the First Crusade. This is a skeletonized account of some very complex transactions, but it will serve.

When the Christian warriors reached Jerusalem they demonstrated their peculiar brand of ethics by wading their horses in Moslem blood and burning the Jews alive in their synagogues. In a practical sense, morality is relative, and in judging the Turk it may be rational to consider whether he has ever exceeded in ferocity the example set him by the Soldiers of the Cross.

For long, Constantinople was on the main line of the Crusades, which had to be repeated because the Crusaders could not hold their gains, and which the Eastern emperors regarded with justifiable suspicion. They have even been accused of treasonably arranging to have some of these expeditions slaughtered. One swindled the strangers with debased coin. But if any future Nicetas or Gibbon should describe the destruction of Smyrna by the Kemalists he would have a hard time making it appear more bloody, more ruthless, more wanton and cruel than the sack of Constantinople by the Venetians and the so-called Christian knights of the fourth of these fanatical excursions. They ravaged the rich and beautiful city, the world's headquarters of art and learning, burned a large part of it, violated its women, drove into starving exile as many of its inhabitants as fled from San Francisco during the fire of 1906. Nor can the incompetent Turk be accused of any worse administration than that of the Latin emperors who drunkenly dozed on the throne of the Eastern Caesars for more than fifty years thereafter, and whose misrule probably contributed as much to the weakness and ultimate ruin of the empire as any good half of the Turkish armies could have achieved. There are persons in this country who think we should have some more Crusades. They seem to lack any valid notion of those we did have.

Before the First Crusade the Emperors of the East had begun to appeal to Western Christendom for help against the military migration of the Turks. But there was some difference of opinion between the Eastern Christians and the Western Christians as to whether the Holy Ghost proceeded from the Father and the Son or the Father by way of the Son, and as nobody seemed able to come at any statistics that would settle it, and as each side clung to its theory with that stubbornness which has always proved its possessor unfit for good society, no help could be obtained, except in the form of more Crusades. The time came when even those doubtful blessings petered out.

In such gradual developments as the Renaissance and the Revival of Learning it is not possible to select an individual event that will serve as a date for the whole. It is hardly practicable to set definite limits. We know the dates of some battles, of the discovery of America, of the adoption of the Constitution of the United States, when Fort Sumter was fired on; could probably find out when the first Ford left the factory—but the dark ages were a long time coming to an end, and some say they are not ended yet, and so, for lack of a date it can be said to have begun, it is difficult to assign causes for that great release of mental energy which went on during the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries. The Crusades helped. But in times of little learning and scanty records even the dates of the great inventions are lost or debatable—gun-powder, the compass, paper and printing. However, one event stands above the rest, and it is connected with the tragedy of Constantinople.

To this great movement the city on the Bosphorus had contributed much in the way of classic learning and the disturbance of dogmatic authority. Her libraries and churches and palaces contained rich collections, a true deposit of literary treasure. The time approached when almost the whole balance was to be withdrawn, and the Turk was its quite unintentional cause.

That wonderful Italian family of wool merchants and bankers and princes, the Medici, which gave a queen to France and a Pope to the Western world, whose shield bears the mysterious six balls, said to represent pills and to relate to a time when some member of the family practiced medicine (the theory of this writer is that they represented samples of wool), was in 1438 in the full tide of its early vigor. It took pride in encouraging art and learning, and everything else that could promise the advancement or add to the glory of Florence. It has been said that the head of the family at that time, Cosimo, would often import in the same ship a cargo of Indian spices and Greek books. Under such encouragement artists whose names shine among the brightest lights of history were at work all over the city: Ghiberti, Brunelleschi, Donatello, Fra Angelico, Fra Lippo Lippi, to name a few. Cosimo had a foreign policy that sounds pathetically familiar. He saw the people weighed down with the taxes caused by incessantly recurring wars, and he wanted to bring about universal peace. Our own ideas on the subject can hardly be called new, nor can we find much assurance of security in what has happened since. In furtherance of this little endeavor, Cosimo was bent on making foreign nations recognize Florence as the leading city of Italy, and the Medici as the motive power of Florence. It was a fine idea. That hope of peace is always with us.

Under the Turkish menace the emperors of the East had made some effort to heal the schism between the churches and unite with the Western nations. The theologians had framed a formula for the procession of the Holy Ghost that made a good fusion platform, and relations had taken the aspect expressed on the seal of the great State of Missouri: "United We Stand, Divided—," etc. But whenever things looked safe, the Eastern church would show a bad disposition to secede. In 1438, however, things looked worse than usual on the Bosphorus, and the Emperor John Paleologus with the Patriarch of Constantinople and a large retinue of theologians and bishops made a trip to the Italian city of Ferrara, to solicit help from a council of the Latin church then in session there. This was Cosimo's chance. He went to Ferrara and kidnapped the council, persuading the Pope to transfer it to Florence. Like Robert Newton Lynch, Cosimo was a good manager of the chamber of commerce.

The council that met at Florence in 1439 was one of the most important conferences of that age. There was the Emperor of the East, the Pope of Rome, the Patriarch of Constantinople, great prelates of both organizations, and thus many of the most learned men of the world. The council brought to Florence, not only scholars and rare manuscripts, but the gorgeous costumes and headdresses of the Orient, which you can see reproduced in some of the Gozzoli frescoes in the old Medici palace, and which formed one of the stronger inspirations of painting.

One great scholar was persuaded by Cosimo to settle permanently. Many of the rare manuscripts found their way into Cosimo's library, ultimately to be multiplied by scribes, and after that by printing, which latter art, however, the Medici would not encourage. The unrolling of history and of the literature of the past had begun in earnest. Greek learning and the "humanities," the most liberalizing influence (now being sadly neglected in our universities under the elective system and the country club atmosphere and the demand for courses in millinery and scenario writing), were finding a new and honorable position. Fresh and freshening contacts, inspiring friendships, were being formed, which were to have tremendous results. The city was crowded with these wonderful strangers, its life filled with grand processions and sumptuous functions. Florence was enjoying the social and intellectual stimulus of an international exposition. Out of it grew Cosimo's celebrated Platonic Academy, and an endless propaganda of education. And it never could happen again.

The assistance of Western Christendom was mainly conversational. The emperor and the patriarch and the learned bishops returned to Constantinople with much sympathy and little help. The Crusades, which had made the going hard for the Mohammedans and so had given the empire some breathing spell, were dead and could not be revived. After about two centuries of trying to whip the Turk so he would stay whipped, Europe had had enough of that speculation. And fourteen years after the pleasant conversations at Florence the fort-wrecking cannon of Mohammed II battered down a section of the wall of Constantinople and the last of the Roman emperors died under the waves of the Mongolian inundation. The Roman Empire was down at last. The Turk had acquired for the capital of Mohammedanism one of the three most important cities in the world, one whose value in history, secular history at least, is exceeded only by that of Athens and of Rome. If we feel the conviction of Poe's verse, "Ah, Psyche, from the regions which are holy land," then Constantinople is a city sacred to two civilizations. And that is a bad position.

Gibbon tells us the loot was worth four million ducats; but as he neglects to give the rate of exchange for ducats we can only assume that there was a good deal of portable property the Crusaders did not get, and perhaps a little that had been accumulated since their day. The same authority tells us that 110,000 manuscripts disappeared, and the bilious-looking soldiers of the Crescent hawked about the streets the complete hand-written works of Aristotle and Homer at ten volumes for a ducat.

In the flight from the city many of the more important of the fugitives bethought them of the hospitality of Florence, where they had been so sumptuously entertained a few years before, and the magnificence of the Medici, who would undoubtedly pay well for Greek books and any portable works of art. In such or some such way the impact of the Turk drove a good part of the remaining store of classic learning over Western Europe when Western Europe was well prepared to receive it and build it into the fabric of modern culture. Even as she fell, Constantinople handed on the torch. And if it at times it seems to burn fitfully and emit more smoke than light, that is not her fault.

MORTON TODD.

OLD FAVORITES.

Autumn.

I saw old Autumn in the misty morn
Stand shadowless like Silence, listening
To silence, for no lonely bird would sing
Into his hollow ear from woods forlorn,
Nor lowly hedge nor solitary thorn;—
Shaking his languid locks all dewy bright
With tangled gossamer that fell by night,
Pearling his coronet of golden corn.

Where are the songs of Summer?—With the sun,
Oping the dusky eyelids of the south,
Till shade and silence waken up as one,
And Morning sings with a warm odorous mouth.
Where are the merry birds?—Away, away,
On panting wings through the inclement skies,
Lest owls should prey
Undazzled at noonday,
And tear with horny beak their lustrous eyes.

Where are the blooms of Summer?—In the west,
Blushing their last to the last sunny hours,
When the mild Eve by sudden Night is prest
Like tearful Proserpine, snatch'd from her flow'rs
To a most gloomy breast.

Where is the pride of Summer,—the green prime,—
The many, many leaves all twinkling?—Three
On the moss'd elm; three on the naked lime
Trembling;—and one upon the old oak-tree!
Where is the Dryad's immortality?—
Gone into mournful cypress and dark yew,
Or wearing the long gloomy Winter through
In the smooth holly's green eternity.

The squirrel gloats on his accomplish'd hoard,
The ants have brimm'd their garner with ripe grain,
And honey bees have stored

The sweets of Summer in their luscious cells;
The swallows all have wing'd across the main;
But here the Autumn melancholy dwells,
And sighs her tearful spells

Amongst the sunless shadows of the plain.
Alone, alone,

Upon a mossy stone,
She sits and reckons up the dead and gone
With the last leaves for a love-rosary,
Whilst all the wither'd world looks drearily,
Like a dim picture of the drowned past
In the hush'd mind's mysterious far away,
Doubtful what ghostly thing will steal the last
Into that distance, gray upon the gray.

—Thomas Hood.

To Autumn.

Season of mists and mellow fruitfulness!
Close bosom-friend of the maturing sun;
Conspiring with him how to load and bless
With fruit the vines that round the thatch-eaves run;
To bend with apples the moss'd cottage-trees,
And fill all fruit with ripeness to the core;
To swell the gourd, and plump the hazel shells
With a sweet kernel; to set budding more,
And still more, later flowers for the bees,
Until they think warm days will never cease.
For Summer has o'er-brimm'd their clammy cells.

Who hath not seen thee oft amid thy store?
Sometimes whoever seeks abroad may find
Thee sitting careless on a granary floor,
Thy hair soft-lifted by the winnowing wind;
Or on a half-reap'd furrow sound asleep,
Drows'd with the fume of poppies, while thy hook
Sparest the next swath and all its twined flowers;
And sometimes like a gleaner thou dost keep Steady thy laden head across a brook;
Or by a cider-press, with patient look,
Thou watchest the last oozings hours by hours.

Where are the songs of Spring? Ay, where are they?
Think not of them, thou hast thy music too,—
While barred clouds bloom the soft-dying day,
And touch the stubble-plains with rosy hue;
Then in a wailful choir the small gnats mourn
Among the river sallows, borne aloft
Or sinking as the light wind lives or dies;
And full-grown lambs loud bleat from hilly bourn;
Hedge-crickets sing; and now with treble soft
The redbreast whistles from a garden-croft;
And gathering swallows twitter in the skies.

—John Keats.

INDIVIDUALITIES.

Mlle. Mathilde François, of the little French village of Montreuil, has been chosen as a model for all her sex in an annual ceremony which was performed for the first time in A. D. 525.

Mme. Gorki, wife of the great Russian author, has been appointed a commissary by the Soviet government and entrusted with the work of disposing abroad of all the art treasures collected by it.

A portrait of Mme. Clara Clemens Gabrilowitch, the only surviving child of Samuel Clemens, has been painted by the New York artist, Julius Rolshoven, which is said to foreshadow a revival of Gainsborough, as Burne-Jones made the Italian masters a nineteenth-century fad. Mme. Gabrilowitch is a frequent writer on musical themes and possesses a well-trained contralto voice.

Sergei Rachmaninoff, conductor, virtuoso, and composer, was born in Novgorod, Russia, in 1873. At the age of nine he entered the Petrograd Conservatory and toured Russia as a pianist in 1892. In 1899 he made his first appearances in London in the three-fold capacity of composer, symphony conductor, and pianist, which he since has repeated many times in many parts of the world.

Dr. Charles F. Thwing, president emeritus of Western Reserve University, Cleveland, was chosen last month as president of the United Chapters of Phi Beta Kappa. Dr. Thwing, who is widely known in the educational world, has recently retired from the presidency of the university at Cleveland after more than thirty years of service. His latest book, now in press, is the result of a visit to Australia and New Zealand.

Judge John Barton Payne, former Secretary of the Interior, is at present in Paris, where he has the duty of presiding over the associated leagues of the Red Cross established anywhere in the world. The conference, which is called in Paris for the present week of October, will convene practically all of the national units of the late war. Possessing a large fortune and being entirely without domestic ties, Judge Payne seems an ideal choice for successor to the late Henry P. Davison, who in 1919 was elected chairman of the governing board of the World League of Red Cross Societies. There is a growing belief, however, that the Red Cross, founded by a woman, and established in this country by Clara Barton, should have a woman director. Mrs. Oliver H. P. Belmont has committed the woman's national party to seek to place the Red Cross directorship in the hands of a woman.

Sophia Hanem, wife of Zaghul Pasha, who has taken her exiled husband's place as leader of the Independent Nationalist movement in Egypt, is the power back of the Zaghulist party today. Men as well as women throughout Egypt look upon her home, popularly called the "House of the Nation," as their mecca. Hundreds of people call upon her daily and she has brushed aside the conventions of centuries to receive and help them. She, a high-born Moslem, receives men and women of all classes with unveiled head, and breaks tradition still further by talking to them. She pours out hope and enthusiasm with a dynamic eloquence that is said often to reduce her audience to tears. Lady Sophia was married in 1896 at the age of twenty to Saad Pasha, and is many years his junior.

Dr. Augusto Cochrane de Alencar, the Brazilian Ambassador to this country, who has been celebrating the centenary of his country's independence of Portuguese rule, is the great-grandson of the Admiral Lord Thomas Cochrane, tenth Earl of Dundonald, who performed such heroic deeds as commander of the Brazilian navy that he is considered one of the founders of the nation. Lord Thomas was falsely accused of having circulated the report of the death of Napoleon I for speculative purposes. He resigned all his honors and went into exile—to the South American countries that had always engaged his sympathies. He commanded the Chilean navy before taking over the naval end of the Brazilian struggle. Later, cleared of the charge, Lord Cochrane returned to England and entered Parliament. The Brazilian Ambassador is descended from a daughter of the doughty admiral who married a Brazilian in the early days of the war for liberation.

The foremost business woman in the British Empire, Lady Rhondra, who holds that "women should be able to get everything eventually," and who means to fight for her seat in the Lords' until she gets it, is anything but the strident militant of familiar British suffragette tradition. Her competence is unobtrusive and her personality feminine. She dresses simply, though without any masculine affectation, and is said to have a genuine English complexion with waves of color that come and go in youthful fashion. Lady Rhondra is half Scotch, half Welsh, a heritage possibly accounting for her business and political acumen. Altogether she has three offices, one where she controls the huge mining interests of her millionaire father, the late Lord Rhondra, a second where she sits on the board of directors of Time and Tide, a weekly paper that has been a great success during its two years of existence, and a third the office of the Six Point Group, one of the most active of the women's political bodies in England.

MORE CONVERTED CANNIBALS.

Frederick O'Brien Invites to Another Rocking-Chair Voyage in Southern Seas.

The best way to deal with this South Sea, or atoll, fever is to keep right on until we get it out of the blood. That, apparently, is what Frederick O'Brien thought, and inasmuch as keeping right on was lucrative to him, who shall say he was not right? His third book, "Atolls of the Sun," is a fit continuation of his "White Shadows," and the other one, "Mystic Isles of the South Seas," if that is the title, grading fewer ounces to the ton of interesting material, as might be expected where the ore dump is worked over, but showing better command of the method of extraction. For he has drawn strength from success, and there are phases of the making of this book that show more mastery than its predecessors. And it contains some material on subjects of endless interest—another discussion of the mystery of Easter Island, accompanied by an effort to associate its weird sculptors with the architects of Stonehenge; and a version, from a descendant of the mutineers of the Bounty, of the sombre tragedy and strange social evolution that took place on lonely Pitcairn.

There seems to be less mere reporting, more philosophy, in this O'Brien book than in the others, although it runs as easily from topic to topic and presents life as vividly. Does it present it with exact truth? Old skippers may point out, as old skippers are always doing, that some of the scenes lack photographic accuracy. Yet that may mean merely that old skippers and working authors rarely see things alike. And it would not be astonishing if they did not, for no two people ever do see the same things alike, any more than a creed ever means the same thing to any two devotees that mumble it. An artist putting on canvas the rose and golden hues of a sunset was interrupted by a rustic who wanted to know: "Mister, how long do you have to do that before you git so you kin take photographs?" These South Sea scenes of O'Brien's may lack the sharpness of photography, but we greatly mistake a lot of things if they are not more imbued with the spirit of man, and come nearer to having a third dimension. He dares to say:

Life is not real. It is an illusion, a screen upon which each one writes the reactions upon himself of his sensory knowledge. The individual is the moving camera, and what he calls life is his projection of the panorama about him—not more actual than the figures and storms upon the cinema screen. In this book I have put the film that passed through my mind in wild places, and among natural people.

It is useless to look to find in the South Seas what I have found. It is there, glowing and true, and yet, as each beholder conjures a different vision of the human spectacle about him, each can see the islands of romance only by the lens life has fitted upon his soul.

Quite good stuff, that.

With O'Brien's book one can voyage in a rocking-chair over a considerable part of the southern ocean, and from its comfortable deck review many things that might on personal contact prove far from elegant. Cannibals, for example, exert in books a wonderful charm, one that does not weaken even by comparison with pirates. To a real rover, all the island peoples seem engaging, and a Melville or a Stevenson can make home-keeping people feel that they indeed have homely wits. And there may be some basis in reality for the admiration travelers often express for the simple savages of the beaches and the coconut groves. O'Brien makes comparison with the personal habits of civilized whites, and not altogether to the credit of the latter. He cites, for example, from the "Lois de la Galanterie," written for the guidance of beaux and dandies in 1648, the injunction that "every day one should take pains to wash one's hands, and one should wash one's face almost as often." To a Tahitian, by contrast, cleanliness was part of daily life. "His brooks were his club, where often he sat or lay in the laughing water, his head crowned with flowers, dreaming of a life of serene idleness." Our author says, moreover:

Environment, purling rivulets under embowering trees, the most enchanting climate between pole and pole, a simple diet but little clothing, made the Tahitian and Marquesan the handsomest and cleanest races in the world. Clothes and cold are an iron barrier to cleanliness, except where wealth affords comfort and privacy. Michelangelo wore a pair of socks many years without removing them. Our grandfathers counted a habit of frequent bathing a sign of weakness. In old New England many baths were thought conducive to immorality, by some line of logic akin to that of my austere aunt, who warned me that oysters led to dancing.

This rocking-chair journey takes us to the Paumotus, among a people more akin to the Maoris than some of the other Polynesians are. The outstanding figure among them was old Mapuhi, the gigantic, a leader among his people, and a trader, too, whose will was about all the law needed in his part of the world. He was a Mormon, for the Mormon missionaries had established their faith quite firmly in the Paumotus, and we get this thoroughly human view of them and their field:

"The Lord has been mighty good to us," said De Kalb, who was in his twenties. "We've got this island hog-tied. If it weren't for the Josephites and some of those Catholic priests, we'd have every last one. Those Josephites are sorest, because they are deserters from Mormonism. Why are they? Why, their so-called prophet was Joseph. I forget his other name. Oh, no, he was not our martyr, Joseph Smith. They split off from the real church. They don't amount to a hill of beans, but when the Mormons left these islands because the French were hostile, these Josephites sneaked in and got quite a hold by lying about us, before we got on to their game and came back here. They're out for the stuff. The real name of our church here is, Te Etaretia a Jesu Metia e te fela mo'a i te Mau Muhana Hobeia Nei."

"Gosh, I'd like to get my hair cut and reached," said Elder Overton. "It was fine, when I left Papete. I just have to let it go," and he stirred his golden shock with the air of a man who has abandoned comfort for an ideal.

"Do the Paumotuans cling to their heathen customs?" I asked.

Overton looked at the floor, but De Kalb, the older, spoke up.

"They will circumcise," he said hesitatingly. We try to stop it, but they say it is right; that it makes them a separate people. They often wait until thirteen years of age before prompted to perform the rite. The kids don't appreciate it."

"And tithes? Your church members give a tenth of their incomes?"

And again De Kalb replied:

"They should," he said. "These Takaroans are just beginning to see the beauty of that divine law. It is hard to make them exact. Perhaps they give a twentieth. It's coconuts, you know, and it is hard to keep account."

That must be a comfortable way to pay one's share of the church mortgage—with coconuts, where they grow.

We have been offered of late many mirrors between covers. Most of these have given reflections of other people, and so have been quite enjoyable. But here is a reflection of ourselves, from the polished calabash surface of Mapuhi's mind; Mapuhi, who, though a good Mormon, had been to San Francisco and in spite of the missionaries would persist in hanging pages of the Police Gazette on the walls of his house:

"I had seven nights," said Mapuhi, "in your great house, and seven days in your streets. The people were like the fish in the lagoon of Pukaupuka, where no man seeks them, and where they crowd each other until they kill. I went in a room from the ground to where I slept, a room that moved on a cord; and I rode in other rooms that moved about the roads on iron bands in which people sat who never said a word to one another, and who never spoke to me. As I walked in the roads they were dark as in the coconut-groves, for your houses make caves of the roads, as under the barrier-reef."

"But," Mapuhi, I said, "we are happy in our way."

"You do not laugh much," returned the chief. "Only I heard the laughter from the houses in which you sold rum. I am a good Mormon. I do not now drink your mad waters, but in your city only the mad waters made men happy. I was a gentle myself many years and did not know the truth. I, too, drank the mad waters."

Mapuhi's eyes sought the picture of Brigham Young which was on the wall, but mine went to the figures of the prize-fighters, Jeffries and Johnson. Mapuhi intercepted my glance and immediately became alert.

"Was it possible that I had ever seen Teferite or Tihonitone?"

This question was put to Elder Overton, who hesitated to interpret. The subject was a scandal throughout the Paumotus. I read that in the preacher's face, but, comprehending the import of the words, I said that I knew Teferite; that he lived very near me, and that I saw him often in his store. Once or twice I had bought goods of him. He was getting very fat since Tihonitone had whipped him, and most of his time he hunted fish and wild animals. Tihonitone, the neega, as the Paumotuans call Afro-Americans, I had seen more than once, I said.

"That neega knocked down the white Teferite and took the hundreds of thousands of francs given the winner," said Mapuhi, with spirit. "They are both great men, but the neega is the greatest. Next to the chiefs of the Mormon church, they are the greatest Americans."

"Have you ever heard of Roosevelt, Teddy Roosevelt?" I demanded.

He did not know the man. An acquaintance in Tahiti sent him now and then the pink paper which contained the pictures of fighting men, of fighting dogs, and of women whose bosoms and legs were bare. America must now be full of these fights, and of beautiful women almost naked, he said.

Since Bismarck discovered "the imponderables" as among the prime movers in history, there has been more appreciation of them; and while Jim Jeffries and Jack Johnson could hardly be regarded as imponderable, it certainly did not at the time seem important which one whipped the other. In the old Paumotuan's estimate, however, is evidence that even that apparently contemptible event, as well as the defeat of Russia by the Japanese, may have had its effect on the imaginations of dark-faced men, not only in Harlem and the Southern States, but among Hindus in India and newly-converted Mohammedans in Africa—so closely is the world now knit together, and so techy and irritable have its inhabitants become.

There seems in this book a more conscious effort than in its predecessors at colorful description. Here is some pretty work, done, of course, with very good material:

I took the titea mata he handed me, the four-sided wooden box with a pane of ordinary glass fixed in it, about fifteen inches square, and notched for the neck of the observer. Putting the glass below the surface and gazing through it, I was in fairyland.

The floor of the lagoon was the superbest garden ever seen by the eye of man. A thousand forms of life, fixed and moving, firm and waving, coral and shells, fish of all the colors of the rainbow, of beauteous, of weird, and of majestic shape and size, decorated and animated this strange reserve man had invaded for food and profit. The giant furbelowed clams, largest of all mollusks, white, or tinged with red and saffron or brown-yellow, a coruscating glare of blue, violet, and yellow from above, reposed like a bed of dream tulips upon the shining parterre.

The coral was of an infinitude of shape: emerald one moment and sapphire the next, shot with colors from the sun and the living and growing things beneath. Springing from the sea-floor were cabbages and roses, cauliflower and lilies, ivory fans and scarlet vases, delicate fluted columns, bushes of pale yellow coral, bouquets of red and green coral, shells of pink and purple, masses of weeds, brown and black sponges. It was a magic maze of submarine sculpture, fret-work, and flowers, and through all the interstices of the coral weaved in and out the brilliant-colored and often miraculously-molded fish and crustaceans. There were great masses of dark or sulphur-hued coral into which at any alarm these creatures darted and from which they peeped when danger seemed past. Snakes, blue, gold, or green bars on a velvet black-brown, glided in and out of the recesses, or coiled themselves about branches.

For mysterious irrationality and lack of evidence of beneficial result, the subject of tabus among the Polynesians is almost fit to rank with that of caste among the Hindus. In fact there are points of resemblance that might suggest to the mind of a highly imaginative ethnologist some remote affinity of origin. There are some 2100 to 2500 different Hindu castes, and it is said no white man ever lived who understood the limits of them all; but it would seem to be impossible to guess how many Polynesian tabus there are, because they may be arbitrarily imposed by the priests, in response to no one knows what private or selfish impulse. And no reasons have to be assigned. It is worse than a tariff bill of three thousand schedules. This picture, however, from O'Brien's gallery not only gives us light upon the universality of the feminist movement with its general points of resemblance, but may serve as the basis of a guess at one cause of tabus, at least:

The most resented exclusion against women in the Marquesas, and one of the last to be broken, was from canoes. Lying Bill, as the first seaman who sailed their ships here, had met shoals of women swimming out miles to the vessel as it made for port. In his youth they did not dare enter a canoe in Hiva-Oa. They tied their pareus on their heads and swam out, clambered aboard the ships miles from land with the pareus still dry.

"They'd jump up on the bulwarks," said Lying Bill, "an' make their twilight before touchin' the deck. The men would come out in canoes an' find the women had all the bloomin' plunder."

The sorcerer and I passed the ceremonial pipe, and his words were slow, as becoming age and a severe outlook on life.

"There were wilful women who would destroy the tapu against entering canoes?" I asked, to urge his speech.

"E, it was so!" he said.

"Me innui? What happened?" I queried further.

"A long time this went on. My grandfather told me of a woman who talked against that tapu when he was a boy."

"And she—?"

"She enraged the gods. She corrupted even men. A council was held of the wise old men, and the words went forth from it. She was made to keep within her house, and a tapu against her made it forbidden to listen to her wildness. In each period another woman arose to do the same, and more were corrupted. Some women stole canoes and were drowned. The sharks even hated them for their wickedness. We pointed out what fate had befallen them, but other women returned boasting. We slew some of these. But still it went on."

"Did the gods speak out plainly and severely?"

The taua looked at me quizzically. Foreigners mock holy things of nature. The bishop here had kicked the graven image of the deity of the coconut-tree.

"Ea! Po, the god of night, who rules the hereafter, spoke. The priest, the high priest, received the message. You know that grove by the Dark Cave. He heard the voice from the black recesses. Tapu haa, it said. A double tapu against any woman even lifting a paddle, or putting one toe, or her heel, or her shadow within a canoe. All the women were not wicked. Many believed their place was in the huao, the home. These refused to join the brazen hussies, the deserters of the popoi pit. But the dance was dull, and there was strife. The huono, the artists, the women who rejoice men when they are merry, the women with three or more husbands, they all seemed to have the madness. They gained some of the younger men to their side, and they built that long house by those breadfruit-trees. They held their palaver there, and they refused to lie under their own faa, their roofs of pandanus. They would not dance by the light of the blazing candlenuts the mad hura-hura, nor let those braver of the sea share their mats on the baepae of the valley. Many husbands fought one another when their wife did not return. The tribe grew apart.

"The gods grew weary. Messages but few came from them. Priests' wives even ceased to cook the breadfruit on the hot stones, and went to live in that accursed haa ite."

"We esteem such a long house, and call it a club," I interposed in subconscious defense of my own habits.

"Oti! Maybe. Your island forgot wisdom early. You even cook your fish. We will make the fire now."

It was determined to refer the tabu to a plebiscite, the old kahuna believing he had a safe majority of conservatives. Two troughs were set to receive the candlenut ballots, the Paumotuan equivalents of the Athenian shards and oyster shells:

"At that moment," said the old priest, "a canoe which had been cunningly making its way to the shore, as if by a pre-arranged signal, suddenly took the breakers and came careening upon the sand. Out of it stemmed Taiapi, a woman of that red-headed tribe of Tahuata, arranged her kilt of tapu, and advanced. She was like an apparition, but fatal to my count. She was a moi kanahau, beautiful and strong, and the first woman who had ever come except as a prisoner from that fierce island. But she was stronger in her desires than any man. She was unbelieving and unafraid of sacred things. A hundred men sprang forward to greet Taiapi. American, she was the red jasmine, as the fire of the oven, odorless and lovely, but hot to the touch and scorching to know. That woman laughed at the men, and, as if word had been sent her, took her place among the women. She seized a candlenut and threw it exactly into the unholy hoana."

"O men of Omoa," she cried, 'so you fear that women may paddle faster and better than you! Hoametau hae! You are cowards. Look, I have come a night and a day alone, and no shark god has injured me and I am not weary.'

"There followed a shower of candlenuts into the demon trough, as the stones from the slings in battle. We were beaten, as youth ever defeats age when new gods are powerful. Our day and the power of all tapus waned and ended soon. Once in the canoes those women made us release the tapu against their eating bananas and, later, pig. In a thousand years no Marquesan woman had tasted a banana or eaten pig. They were for the men and there were good reasons known to the gods. But let woman leave ever so little way the narrow path of obedience and of doing without things that are evil for her, and she knows no limits. She is without the koekoe, the spirit that is in man. The race has fallen on sorrow."

The reviewer's guess in regard to this particular tabu is that the men had to have something to sell to the women in return for their favors, so they kept them out of the canoes in order to sell them fish.

ATOLLS OF THE SUN. By Frederick O'Brien. New York: The Century Company; $5.

BANKING AND INVESTMENT NEWS.

San Francisco bank clearings for the week ending October 7, 1922, were $160,600,000; for corresponding week of last year, $132,900,000; an increase of $27,700,000.

The bond market during the last thirty days has been affected somewhat by the customary cessation of activity during the late summer and the influence of the vacation season. Transactions in bonds on the New York Stock Exchange from August 16th to September 15th were $312,000,000 compared with $305,000,000 funding mortgage 5 per cent. bonds, due January 1, 1947, offered at about 5.72 per cent.; $6,000,000 St. Louis-San Francisco Railway Company equipment trust 5 per cent. bonds, offered on a 5 to 5 1/4 per cent. basis; $21,000,000 Kansas City Power and Light Company first mortgage thirty-year 5 per cent. gold bonds, yielding 5.47 per cent.; $50,000,000 Swift & Co. ten-year 5 per cent. sinking fund notes, offered at 97 to yield 5.40 per cent.; $10,000,000 Eastern Cuba Sugar Corporation—a subsidiary of the Cuba Cane Sugar Corporation—fifteen-year 7 1/2 per cent. mortgage sinking fund gold bonds, offered at par, and $25,000,000 Sinclair Pipe Line Company twenty-year sinking fund 5 per cent. gold bonds offered to yield 5.40 per cent. The results of these offerings indicated that demand is still sufficient to absorb new offerings in considerable amount with more interest in new than in old issues.

The market for high-grade bonds has developed a considerable degree of dullness recently, but there is no tendency toward a reaction accompanying this. Liberty Bonds in particular have been giving a good account of themselves, the 3 1/2s touch a new high on moderate buying. Prices for other gilt-edged issues hold steady around the high levels, says Forbes Magazine.

Speculative bonds, especially in the railroad group, have not lost their attractiveness for investors willing to accept a small risk in return for a high yield, and with a few isolated exceptions have advanced in a slow market. The St. Louis-San Francisco adjustment 6s and income 6s are the leaders in this upward movement, the reason being that these two bonds are traded in "flat" and on October 1st sell ex-interest, three points in the former and six points in the latter case. Buying is based on the theory that the losses for deduction of interest will be recovered quickly.

All Chicago & Alton bonds relapsed sharply on announcement of a receivership on August 31st and have not recovered to any extent. It is probable that bondholders will be well protected in any reorganization that is proposed and eventually those who have bought above the present market may be able to get out even. Railroad organizations, however, are usually long-drawn-out affairs, sometimes covering a period of several years, and meanwhile opportunities are available in other quarters where the losses incurred in the Chicago & Alton issues might be recovered by switching.

So far as the outlook for the bond market as a whole is concerned, there is nothing of a disturbing nature apparent. Although the present is a season of heavy credit demands the gain in discounts and note circulation has not been sufficient to cause more than a few points loss in the Federal Reserve ratio of reserves to liabilities and no upturn in interest rates has occurred. Until money costs a higher rate than now prevailing, first-grade bonds will hold steady and speculative bonds will continue to reflect improvement in their issuing companies and gain in the margin of safety by working higher.

The Missouri, Kansas & Texas bonds offer attractive possibilities among the speculative rails. There are four new bond issues under the reorganization plan, all of these being sold at this time on a "when issued" basis. The prior lien "A" 5s, 1962, at 88 yield 5.77 per cent.; the "B" 4s, 1962, at 74 yield 5.64 per cent.; the "C" 6s, 1932, at 98 yield 6.27 per cent.; and the cumulative adjustment 5s, 1967, at 65 yield 7.82 per cent. The three series of prior lien bonds are earning their interest requirements about two and three-quarter times and after deduction of this balance available for interest on the adjustment 5s is equivalent to about three times the requirement. The latter bond is the more speculative in that interest is paid only when earned and default is no ground for bankruptcy proceedings.

After the experience of war-time control of the transportation system of the country it became evident that strong, competitive railroads were in the public interest and should be fostered. Appropriate legislation—known as the Transportation Act of 1920—was placed upon the statute books by Congress to permit this condition be brought about.

"Whenever the commission (the Interstate Commerce Commission) is of the opinion upon application of any carrier . . . that the acquisition by one of such carriers of the control of any other such carrier . . . will be in the public interest, the commission shall have the authority by order to approve and authorize such acquisition" is the unequivocal language of the act. It continues: "The carriers affected by any order under the foregoing provisions . . . are hereby relieved from the operation of the 'anti-trust laws' . . . and of all other restraints or prohibition by law, state or Federal, in so far as may be necessary to enable them to do anything authorized or required by any order made under and pursuant to the foregoing provisions of this section."

The recent court order, based on the anti-trust laws and directing the Southern Pacific Company to divest itself of its Central Pacific lines, if affirmed, must be obeyed, of course. That is not debatable. But after the order is obeyed, the Interstate Commerce Commission holds jurisdiction under the Transportation Act of 1920 to authorize consolidation of railroads where that is in the public interest, irrespective of anti-trust laws. Certainly there is no impropriety on the part of any one seeking the application of new law to the Southern Pacific-Central Pacific case, so that the present unified system may be retained in the interest of economy and for the betterment of service of the traveling and shipping public.

The Equitable Eastern Banking Corporation declared a regular dividend of 2 per cent. on September 29th, payable October 2, 1922. The dividend rate is on the basis of 8 per cent. per annum.

Carstens & Earles, Inc., investment bankers, have recently removed from the Insurance Exchange Building to larger and more conveniently arranged quarters on the ground floor of the California Commercial Union Building.

An offering of $2,000,000 Southern California Gas Company first and refunding mortgage 5 1/2 per cent., Series "B" of 1952, gold bonds, price 98 1/2 and accrued interest, yielding about 5.60 per cent., is being made by Blyth, Witter & Co. The first and refunding mortgage bonds are secured by a direct mortgage on all the property of the Southern California Gas Company now owned or hereafter acquired, subject only to the first mortgage bonds due in 1950. The first and refunding mortgage contains a provision that so long as any first mortgage bonds remain in the hands of the trustee uncanceled, first and refunding mortgage bonds may be issued only to the amount of first mortgage bonds deposited with the trustee of the first and refunding mortgage, except that, in order to permit the company to take advantage of a favorable mar-

To Yield 7.22%

Willow Vista
Land & Cattle Company
First Mortgage 7%
Sinking Fund Gold Bonds

Send for circular

ket, bonds may be sold and their proceeds deposited with the trustee. These proceeds thereafter become payable to the company upon deposit of first mortgage bonds with the trustee. The result will be that the first and refunding mortgage will eventually have more than a 54 per cent. interest in the first mortgage. First and refunding mortgage bonds may be issued only in an amount equal at par to 75 per cent. of the cost of additions, extensions, betterments, etc., and then only when for twelve consecutive months out of

NEW ISSUE
to Yield 6 1/4%
Tax Exempt
The obligation of an established agricultural community

FREEMAN SMITH & CAMP CO.

SECOND FLOOR
FIRST NATIONAL BANK BLDG.
Douglas 2121

for the preceding period, says Commerce Monthly.

The market has been characterized by strength of all classes of good investment issues, partly as a result of the relatively small volume of new offerings and partly because of the continued presence in the market of funds not as yet needed for manufacturing and merchandising operations. With the development of business activity, temporary holdings must at some time come back on the market.

Subscriptions to the $200,000,000 issue of "Instructive and Informative"

—San Francisco Journal

"The Review"

CONTENTS:
(October Issue)

The Turk's Come-Back

The Mexico Mix

Italy and The Little Entente

Copy mailed on request by

STRASSBURGER & COMPANY
133 Montgomery Street • San Francisco
Telephone Douglas 2220

3 1/4 per cent. U. S. Certificates of Indebtedness offered on September 11th and due September 15, 1923, totaled $570,000,000.

There have been no important offerings of foreign bonds and until toward the close of the period few important domestic issues. Among the larger sales were: $7,000,000 United States Rubber Company first and re-

McDONNELL & Co.

STOCK EXCHANGE MEMBERS

And Other Leading Exchanges

633 Market St., at New Montgomery
SAN FRANCISCO
TELEPHONE SUTTER 7676
N. Y. Office, 120 Broadway
Los Angeles, 634 So. Spring St.

PRIVATE WIRES

Sixty-five Sutter Street

BONDS

Ask to be placed on our mailing list for monthly circular and for data regarding various bond issues.

STEPHENS & COMPANY
SAN FRANCISCO OAKLAND
Los Angeles San Diego

CARSTENS & EARLES, INCORPORATED

GOVERNMENT, MUNICIPAL AND CORPORATION BONDS

ESTABLISHED 1891

Ground Floor
California Commercial Union Building
San Francisco
Telephone Douglas 6050

SEATTLE LOS ANGELES SPOKANE SAN FRANCISCO

INVESTMENT SECURITIES

Government, Municipal and Corporation Bonds in denominations of $100, $500, and $1000 for the investment of Banks, Trust Funds, and Individual Investors. Inquiries Invited.

HUNTER, DULIN & Co.
THE SECOND FLOOR—
256 MONTGOMERY ST.

Los Angeles Pasadena San Francisco Oakland San Diego

the preceding fifteen months' earnings from gas operations shall have equaled at least one and three-quarters times the annual interest charges on all bonds outstanding, including those for which certification is requested.

The 500 Eastern investment bankers who traveled to the Pacific Coast in three special Southern Pacific trains to attend the annual convention of the Investment Bankers' Association of America at Del Monte, October 9th to 12th, were met at Truckee by a welcoming committee of prominent business men of which E. O. McCormick, vice-president of the Southern Pacific Company, was chairman.

Elaborate plans were made for the entertainment of the visitors. Special committees

Private Wires
Coast to Coast

E. F. Hutton & Co.
MEMBERS
NEW YORK STOCK EXCHANGE
HUTTON BUILDING
Montgomery and Bush Sts.
HOTEL ST. FRANCIS
DEL MONTE HOTEL

The Oldest Bond House in California

Member of San Francisco
Stock and Bond Exchange

E · H · ROLLINS · & · SONS
300 Montgomery Street, San Francisco
Telephone Kearny 3807

made every effort to acquaint the Eastern bankers with the wonderful scenic, industrial, and agricultural resources and advantages of the West.

$275,000 Excelsior Union High School District 5 per cent. bonds were sold October 23 to a syndicate composed of Hunter, Dulin & Co., E. H. Rollins & Sons, the William R. Staats Company, and the First Securities Corporation. Other bidders were California Company, Security Trust and Savings Bank, Mer-

Bank, Mercantile Trust Company, California Company, Citizens' National Bank, M. H. Lewis & Co., Cyrus Peirce & Co., Bank of Italy, Harris Trust and Savings Bank and Bond & Goodwin & Tucker. The premium paid was $1,797.25.

With everything favoring them, operators for the decline have made a poor showing in their recent attacks. The bear is a poor bluffer, unconsciously doing usually more good than harm, improving the property he aims at destroying. We have to thank him that markets are, speaking generally, well set for a new upward swing.

The outstanding fact is that the conditions that underlie our industrial prosperity are as sound as any one could wish. Substantial business is ahead of us and Wall Street may be trusted to do a little anticipating, says Strassburger & Co.'s Review.

The recent flaring up of oil is not to be regarded as a flash in the pan—more is coming. A steady upward movement in rails, too, from now onward, may be looked for. It is not easy to be pessimistic as to the metals, in view of demand; iron furnaces and steel mills are feverishly increasing the rate of their production in an attempt to satisfy the insistent calls of, among others, railroads and automobile companies. Commodities are in good shape, though hesitancy has been witnessed, owing to conflicting reports. Large purchases of wheat for Europe have not succeeded in giving any appreciable stimulus to prices—spring crop prospects, it may be said, have improved. Estimates of the corn crop have been considerably reduced, and it is a matter for serious consideration that we are getting little more than 60 per cent. of the crop we should from the area under cultivation. Cotton crop prospects are worse, and condition reports have ceased to have much influence, the crop having been made.

Bonds have felt the effect of the many recent depressing conditions, but if comparisons with similar conditions and periods go for anything, the market is at the beginning of a steady climb upwards. Steady, not spectacular. The rises so far experienced were in large measure ahead of their due date (historically regarded).

There have been increases in rates for both call and time money—due to seasonal demands for credits which are being easily met by the banks.

F. J. Lisman, a specialist in railroad bonds, in writing of the future of the railroads in the principal difficulty facing the roads at present is the labor problem. He says the bulk of railroad employees are willing, even anxious, to give their best efforts for good wages. Furthermore, railroad employers and employees meeting in good faith around a table could always adjust their differences—if a third party with selfish interests did not interfere.

Mr. Lisman points out that the national unions are the disturbing third party. With annual dues in excess of $25,000,000 flowing into their treasury, it is not to their interest to encourage the worker to keep the industrial peace. If he were ever allowed to become really satisfied with his job, he would no longer feel the need for a national union.

Mr. Lisman would eliminate the national unions entirely, and substitute for them local unions who would know and deal with the employers directly, rather than through officers whose only interest is to promote conflict. Legislation to stop the abuse of unionism would not mean the reduction of wages, but it certainly would mean that more work, and more loyal work, would be given, enabling the railroads to cut down the cost of production and operation in general, and at the same time reduce the costs of distribution and living. It is only when the railroads are given a loyal and full day's work for a full day's pay that they will be able to run more economically, and thus help bring prosperity back to the country. Mr. Lisman proposes four simple remedies for the situation:

Repeal all classes of the present laws which exempt labor from the conspiracy laws.

Compel the publication of all accounts of the labor unions.

Have the Department of Labor supervise all votes at labor union elections; these votes to be secret.

Permit no strike to be declared until the issue on which the men are to strike is clearly defined and until a majority of the members of the union have voted in favor of a strike.

If such legislation were passed, it would serve pretty effectively to take away the overweening power of the national unions.

Mr. L. K. Vickery, Pacific Coast manager of Bennett's Travel Bureau, Inc., has appointed Mr. Royal R. Lord to the position of assistant manager of the European tours department. Mr. Lord, who for many years was connected with the Southern Pacific Company here, has lately returned from Europe, he having visited in a comprehensive manner the chief cities of the Continent and Great Britain. Mr. Lord reports that large and handsome buildings are being erected in most of the principal cities of Germany, and that this country particularly appears to be making a big bid for American tourist travel for 1923.

Electric power is cheaper and more plentiful in California than anywhere else in the world. This fact can be credited to the policy of hydro-electric development by private enterprise under the control of the state railroad commission.

As the growth of California proceeds the state will need more power for its industries and its farms. Private enterprise is willing to take the risks of pioneering and to put private power in whatever counties are necessary.

As the state grows it will also need more

LOGAN & BRYAN

STOCK, BOND, COTTON, COFFEE,
SUGAR AND GRAIN BROKERS

DIRECT PRIVATE WIRES

Pacific to Atlantic—U. S. and Canada

MEMBERS:

NEW YORK STOCK EXCHANGE
BOSTON STOCK EXCHANGE
CHICAGO STOCK EXCHANGE
NEW YORK COTTON EXCHANGE
NEW YORK COFFEE EXCHANGE
NEW YORK PRODUCE EXCHANGE
NEW ORLEANS COTTON EXCHANGE
PITTSBURGH STOCK EXCHANGE
CHICAGO BOARD OF TRADE
MINNEAPOLIS CHAMBER OF COMMERCE
WINNIPEG GRAIN EXCHANGE
ST. LOUIS MERCHANTS EXCHANGE
SALT LAKE CITY STOCK EXCHANGE
LOS ANGELES STOCK EXCHANGE
PHILADELPHIA BOURSE
MONTREAL BOARD OF TRADE

SAN FRANCISCO BRANCH OFFICES AT 401 Montgomery Street

and

Merchants Exchange Bldg.

Telephone Garfield 3000

R. C. JENKINS, C. S. LAWRENCE,
San Francisco Managers

schools, more highways, more public buildings, and more facilities for the general public convenience. The state, and the state alone, must provide these things; private enterprise can not and will not do it.

In the face of these facts advocates of the so-called Water and Power Act propose to bond the state for $500,000,000—six times the present indebtedness of California and twice the bonded indebtedness of the State of New

Exchange Your Liberty Bonds

Present conditions make it advisable, in many instances, to exchange Liberty Bonds for securities offering higher yield or with longer maturity.

Confer with a representative of our Bond Department. He will analyze your needs and will recommend exchanges to your profit.

Call, write or
telephone Sutter 6900

ANGLO-CALIFORNIA TRUST COMPANY

Commercial / Savings / Trust / Bond Departments

"The City Wide Bank"
Market & Sansome Streets
San Francisco

MARKET-MCALLISTER
AND JONES STREETS
101 MARKET

MISSION AND 16TH
FILLMORE AND GEARY
THIRD AND 20TH

York with four times the assessed value of California—to put California into the power business.

California's credit is not inexhaustible. It ought to be preserved for the legitimate needs of the state, not visionary schemes that are not only unnecessary, but exceedingly dangerous to the future of the state.

A vote against Amendment No. 19 at the

A Service for Investors of Moderate Means

To the new investor whose operations are naturally moderate, Sutro & Company offers an accumulated experience of over 64 years. It is one of our functions to give conservative and constructive investment and trading counsel to all who seek it.

It is our earnest endeavor to give every facility and extend every courtesy to persons of limited experience in investing and trading, and to assist them in securing safe and profitable opportunities for investment.

We offer a service that will satisfy by its completeness as well as by the representative list of offerings we have to present. Call Sutter 3434.

SUTRO & CO.

ESTABLISHED 1858

410 MONTGOMERY STREET

Members of the San Francisco Stock and Bond Exchange
Direct Wires to All Eastern Centers and Canada

Send for copy of our Investor's Manual.

Sound Investments

WM. R. STAATS CO.
has for 35 years safeguarded the interests of California investors by recommending bonds which afford the highest yield consistent with first-class security.

WM. R. STAATS CO.

Established 1887

Alexander Bldg., Montgomery St., cor. of Bush
SAN FRANCISCO

Telephone Kearny 301

LOS ANGELES SAN DIEGO PASADENA

election next November is a vote to keep the state's borrowing power for the benefit of the present generation and the generations to come.

The exposure of the villainies of the proposed water and power constitutional "amendment" has thus far been confined mainly to its demerits as a power proposition.

Doubtless from that angle there is more than enough to bury the measure, but it must not be forgotten that it is also a deadly blow to every irrigation district. Nominally the rights of new and old districts are in a measure protected. Practically every district is under the thumb of the five appointed politicians.

Practically no new district can be formed and get water without the consent of the five politicians. No established district can get additional water.

After years and years of effort we have evolved a most satisfactory method of developing irrigation based on the local autonomy of irrigation districts. Under no circumstances should a political super-power be allowed to interfere with these districts in the slightest degree.

Every irrigator should consult his lawyer, for the evils of this act are so cunningly concealed by language that the plain man can not trust himself to detect them. But they are all there.—Industrial News Bureau.

BOOKS ON THE TABLE.

The past few weeks have been remarkable for an outburst of Celtic literature—not a revival of old Gaelic stuff, but a quite spontaneous ebullition of new. It would seem that Irish writers the world over are anxious to remind us of the power and beauty of their race in the present shadow of their eclipse. Lord Dunsany has thus stepped to the front with his first novel, "Don Rodriguez," and Donn Byrne, who wrote the charming Celto-Oriental fantasy, "Messer Marco Polo," a year or two ago. And after all there is one revival of ancient Irish literature in "Battles and Enchantments," by Norreys Jephson O'Connor. Celtic stuff cut to every taste. And the one that will probably suit the most, since it takes an Irishman or an aesthete to savor fully Dunsany and Donn Byrne, is the Scotch novel, "The Judge," by Rebecca West, the infant phenomena of writers and herself a Scotchwoman.

Rebecca West is not yet thirty, and considered in the light of that salient fact "The Judge" (Doran; $2.50) is an extraordinary book. If it were anonymous, it would still be a novel that borders on greatness, but as the work of a young woman it connotes genius. We are accustomed to pat Jane Austen on the back retrospectively for having stuck to the small matters whereof she knew. Miss West has departed arrogantly from the Austen school and handles men and emotions with largesse. Even the latter she could not be acquainted with at first hand, for they are those of her middle-aged heroine. Regarded from any angle, "The Judge" is a sombre and, yes, a somewhat terrific book. It is determinedly sincere. When Miss West loses some of the high valor and heartlessness of extreme youth her sincerity will be a refreshing draught: at present it is rather medicinal in flavor. We are beating time in this fashion because there is something unpleasant to be said about "The Judge" that must—to match Miss West's sincerity—be said. It is divided into books and because of its unusual merit and interest we read it to the really bitter end. If by good fortune we had reviewed it at the end of the Book One—what would have been Volume One in the good old fashion of our grandfather's double-deckers—we would have raved and hailed its creator as one of the rarest geniuses of the age. She may be and undoubtedly is if she can sustain the tone of that marvelous first volume straight through a novel. As it is, its length would suffice for the modern pattern and its romance is complete, but Miss West commits the folly of every one who writes to prove a theme. A novel should be a comment on life or a reflection of it, not a sermon, and the famous Book One of "The Judge" is a comment and a reflection and an exquisite piece of work. We said, "At last a woman has written a novel as objectively as a man might." We really doubt if it has ever been done before. But it is almost as if Miss West had looked at her masterpiece, decided it wasn't feminine enough, and added the subjective morbidity which she labeled "Book Two." It is a thousand pities for it has no more relation to the first half than has an opus by Wagner to a delicate Chopin sonata. But with easy clairvoyance we read the cause of Miss West's downfall. She had started out to prove that "every mother is a judge who sentences the children for the sins of the father." She is a critic: but with critics it is a case of "physician cure thyself." She did not perceive that the story of Ellen, its pathos and gaiety and its marvelous quality as marked in a painting by Ver Meer of a gay austerity, was better than proving the thesis, which in itself is an epigram and therefore self-sufficient.

Donn Byrne's "The Wind Bloweth" (The Century Company; $2) lives up to one's expectations of the creator of "Messer Marco Polo." That is sufficient to any who read the former book, which is one of the most perfect things of its kind. But there are, of course, unfortunates who have not read that dreamy medieval illusion that is like an Oriental silk brocade, but that is also like a mirage at sea. There are writers who are credited with imagination; Donn Byrne has it. His airy and inexhaustible fancy could give large handicaps to most of them and easily come out victorious. He has been compared to that other Celtic romancer, James Stephens. The latter has more humor. In fact, for an Irishman—even an Ulster Scot—Donn Byrne is almost humorless. He belongs rather to that rare class with whom beauty, whether of deed or thought or mien, is a passion, and humor is not always lovely. But it is hard to describe or define him. To say he is humorless is unfair, since once one is on his enchanted terrain you lose the commonplace standards and only know so far as criticism dares rear its factitious head that this is genuine art—the real thing.

But if Donn Byrne has devoted himself to an æsthetic appreciation of life, Dunsany, the whilom æsthete, has turned humorist. For more than in any of his previous tales or plays, his maiden attempt at a novel, "Don Rodriguez," reveals his Celtic bump of humor. A picaresque novel one expected of him, brave adventures and braver phrases. But this revelation of the absurd and the rollicking in the eighteenth Baron Dunsany, where formerly his greatest relaxation was a recognition of the grotesque, is a joyous discovery to those of us who have admired him for his poetic fancy or his perfect technic. "Don Rodriguez," who is a sort of saner and younger Don Quixote, though, we judge, a contemporary, is the sort of picaresque yarn one loves to read aloud to a congenial friend on a winter's night. Its proper accompaniment would be wine and tobacco, and it is pleasant to think that in the noble lord's own country his book can be properly honored. In that respect, and in several others, "Don Rodriguez" is a good companion volume to Donn Byrne's "The Wind Bloweth." For some reason that the anthropologists and archaeologists may one day clear up the Celt has a great sympathy with the Latin and the Oriental. Mr. Byrne is as much at home in medieval China as in present-day Antrim. Lord Dunsany, though he has often shown his familiarity with strange lands, seems to have come home in mediæval Spain. There must be a reason. R. G.

Notes of Books and Authors

The new collected edition of Mr. Galsworthy's work is christened the "Manaton," after the name of the author's country home in Devon.

Mr. Asquith's war memories will deal more with the history of Armageddon, as he knows it, than with himself. Thanks to his war premiership, he can put in their right places many things that have been said in the many war memoirs.

Miss Amy Lowell, who is an ardent Keats' worshipper and collector, has written the poet's life and will shortly publish it. Miss Lowell knows every word Keats has written and almost everything about him. Her "finds" include new letters and portraits, all which will appear in the life.

Sir Ernest Shackleton's story of his Antarctic Expedition in the years 1914 to 1917 is being specially abridged for schools by Mr. Charles Turley, whom Sir James Barrie has called the "Trollope of boyhood." Mr. Turley has taken out all the technical detail, thus leaving a breathless narrative of Shackleton's exploits which have made his name a household word.

The very human story of reconstruction in France told by Warwick Deeping in his forthcoming Macmillan novel, "The House of Adventure," is a stirring romance of the rebuilding of the French village of Beacourt, of how an English soldier helped Mme. Latour repair her ruined inn, and of the love, the hatred, the revenge and the final satisfaction that rewarded him.

Two travel books of the "Eastern Shore" are soon to be published by the J. B. Lippincott Company. "Seeing the Eastern States with John T. Faris" is the description of a journey from Maine to Delaware replete with scenic interest, story, and legend. Its ninety illustrations even exceed the quota of "Delaware and the Eastern Shore," by Edward Noble Valandigham.

Apropos of Mr. Lloyd George's political breakfast parties the Morning Post quotes a passage from Lord Beaconsfield's "Sybil," in which two Tory ladies are discussing a man friend: "Men who breakfast out are generally Liberals. Have you not observed that? I wonder why." 'It shows a restless, revolutionary mind,' said Lady Firebrace, 'that can settle to nothing, but must be running after gossip the moment they are awake.'

John Masefield, who is said to give more time to his books than any other English author, is to bring out a new poem, "The Dream," and a new play this fall, as well as an illustrated Christmas edition of his epic of the race-course, "Right Royal." Mr. Cecil Alden, the leading English sports artist, is illustrating the latter and Miss Judith Masefield, the poet's daughter, herself a distinguished artist, is illustrating "The Dream." But all this, of course, is in England. Will the Macmillan Company bring out current American editions?

On September 8th, Doubleday, Page & Co. added to their Lambkin Library Series five famous books that have grown increasingly popular with time: "Lorna Doone," "Two Years Before the Mast," "Alice in Wonderland," "A Tale of Two Cities," and "The Three Musketeers." This attractive collection, bound in imported English leather, made to sell at 90 cents a volume, now consists of twenty-one volumes and it is the intention of the publishers to add from time to time other famous books that have won a place in every well-ordered library.

"The Van Eycks and Their Followers," by Sir Martin Conway, just published by E. P.

Dutton & Co., is not a handbook of scattered information on the art of this group, but a connected account of the artists of the Low Countries down to Bruegel, interpreting their works in terms of contemporary social movements. The origin of the art of the Van Eycks is traced in the French schools of the fourteenth century, particularly among the painters of miniatures. The book has about one hundred illustrations.

Strangers don't always succeed with Mr. Rudyard Kipling when they ask him for his autograph or a line of original verse, says John o' London's Weekly. To his friends, however, he can be very handsome that way, as Dr. Brander Matthews, the American scholar, recently found. He had a copy of "Many Inventions" bound by Mr. Cobden-Sanderson, who rarely binds contemporary books. He sent it to Mr. Kipling, asking if he would mind autographing it, and he got it back with three original bits of verse on the fly-leaves. One of them was:

See my literary pants!
I am bound in crushed levants.
Brander Matthews did it, and a
Very handsome thing of Brander.

Miss Jennie Matzke of Depe is the champion bee-keeper in Wisconsin.

Redwood Export Company

California Redwood
Lumber and Ties

Cargoes and Parcels
"To off shore markets only"

260 CALIFORNIA STREET
SAN FRANCISCO, CALIF.

Phone Sutter 2163

UNION LUMBER CO.

CROCKER BUILDING
SAN FRANCISCO, CALIFORNIA

MANUFACTURERS AND WHOLESALEERS

— OF —

REDWOOD LUMBER
RAILROAD TIES
TELEGRAPH POLES
SHINGLES

— AND —

SPLIT REDWOOD PRODUCTS

All Books that are reviewed in the
Argonaut can be obtained at

Robertson's

222 STOCKTON ST.
Union Square San Francisco

THE HOLMES BOOK CO.

707 Market St. 152 Kearny St. 22 Third St.
Largest variety of new and second-hand books
in the city. A visit to our stores will convince you of the truth of this assertion. We buy libraries or single books for cash. See us before selling. Phone—Douglas 3283.
SAN FRANCISCO, CAL.

IF YOU ARE A REAL
BOOK-LOVER

Spend a pleasant hour in the real "Old Book
Shop" at 2 TILLMAN PLACE, OFF
GRANT AVENUE—below Sutter.

Rare Old Books Bought, Sold and Hunted For by GEORGE HARGENS (formerly of the White House)

Dr. White House

The Valley of Content

By BLANCHE UPRIGHT

A San Francisco author's first novel
—the dramatic version to be produced in New York this season, by
Marjorie Rambeau. $1.90

Book Dept., Main Floor.

Raphael Neill & Co. Inc.

Bonds
for InvestmentMUNICIPALS
IRRIGATION DISTRICTS
CORPORATIONS

Specialists in Safety

Anglo London Paris Company

One Sansome Street San Francisco
Phone Kearny 5600

The FRENCH AMERICAN BANK

OF SAN FRANCISCO

108 SUTTER STREET

Commercial Checking Savings
RESOURCES OVER - - $16,000,000

A General Banking
Business Transacted.
COMMERCIAL AND PERSONAL CHECKING
ACCOUNTS SOLICITED.

Savings Accounts receive interest at the rate of 4 per cent. per annum.
SAFE DEPOSIT BOXES
$3.50

OFFICERS
Leon Bocqueraz, President
J. M. Dupas, Vice-President
J. A. Bergerot, .....
W. F. Duffy, .....
Vice-President
A. Bousquet, ..... Secretary
J. T. Irilary, Asst. Cashier
Chas. L. Ebner, Jr., .....
Asst. Cashier

Member Federal Reserve System and
Associated Savings Banks of San Francisco
The San Francisco Savings and Loan Society

(THE SAN FRANCISCO BANK)

SAVINGS COMMERCIAL

526 California St., San Francisco, Cal.

MISSION BRANCH..... Mission and 21st Streets
PARK-PRESIDIO DISTRICT BRANCH..... Clement and 7th Ave.
HAIGHT STREET BRANCH..... Haight and Belvedere Streets
June 30th, 1922

Assets.....$76,170,177.18
Deposits.....72,470,177.18
Capital Actually Paid Up.....1,000,000.00
Reserve and Contingent Funds.....2,700,000.00
Employees' Pension Fund.....385,984.61

A dividend to depositors of FOUR AND ONE-QUARTER (4 1/4) per cent. per annum was declared for the six months ending June 30th, 1922.

REVIEWS AND NOTICES.

The Unity of Homer.

The University of California is to be congratulated on having so distinguished an American classical scholar as Professor Scott to inaugurate the Sather Classical Lectures. It is peculiarly fitting that the subject of the first series of lectures should be Homer, the fountainhead of all Western literature and literary tradition. No writer has suffered so much from the aberrations of scholarship and criticism, or has so often been the subject of the fantastic and nonsensical theories that are wont to issue from learned but unpoetic brains of ambitious philologists.

From the time of Wolf to the present the destructive critics have reveled in theories based on difference in language in the Iliad and Odyssey, on contradictions real or imaginary, and on supposedly spurious lines or books in the two poems. There is not a line in either poem that has not been declared spurious by some critic or other. Professor Scott in the first five of his lectures deals with these questions with remarkable common sense and keenness of literary appreciation. "The Iliad and the Odyssey," he says, "were never anonymous; they were never quoted as the work of some unknown poet, and they were never assigned to any other poet than to Homer. The theory that the Iliad and the Odyssey are the anonymous creation of a long era, traditional poems produced by many bards in many ages, makes an appreciation of Greek civilization and Greek literature impossible."

In the remaining lectures Professor Scott points out various signs of the unity of authorship that are revealed to us by character portrayal, the individualization of gods and heroes, and various peculiarities seen in every book of both the Iliad and the Odyssey that can be explained only by the common-sense view that if Homer did not write these poems some one else did who had the same name. "Everything fits into the theory of a single Homer: the civilization, the language, the gods, the outlines, the marks of genius; and all these are supported by the unanimous verdict of the best poets, and the greatest critics of twenty-five hundred years."

"The evidence for the unity of the Iliad and the Odyssey is so strong that we should be compelled to postulate a single Homer even if ancient Greece had believed in many; but antiquity was united in the belief of one divine Homer, and only one."

Such is the conclusion of the author of this interesting series of lectures—lectures which every lover of Homer should read and reread.

THE UNITY OF HOMER. By John A. Scott. Sather Classical Lectures. Volume I. Berkeley, California: University of California Press; $3.25.

Three Horses from the Publishers.

Bill Hart has "edited" the story of his pinto pony, "Paint," in an attractive horse biography called "Told Under a White Oak Tree," which horse lovers and movie fans alike will enjoy. If there are any yet remaining who do not know the risks taken and the dangers braved in Wild West pictures, Paint's story will enlighten them. It requires an intrepid horse as well as a daredevil rider. Eight spirited portraits of the pinto by James Montgomery Flagg add to the charm of Paint's memoirs.

A story that gives a vivid picture of horse life in the great Northwest is "Beyond Rope and Fence," by David Grew. This story of the buckskin mare, Queen Dora, is more than an animal adventure story. It is an interpretation of animal life that is not sentimental, but sympathetic. Mr. Grew not only understands the horse mind and personality, but has successfully set down his knowledge here, and has done so in a fascinating story that has the dramatic value of a novel.

A third horse book, "The Trail of the Spanish Horse," is by the writer of Indian tales, James Willard Schultz, himself a Black-foot Indian by adoption, whose thrilling yarns are the result of first-hand experience on the old frontier. Less an animal story than the two just described, "The Trail of the Spanish Horse" is a red-blooded adventure tale in which Is-Spai-U, the Indian pony, prominently figures.

TOLD UNDER A WHITE OAK TREE. By Bill Hart's Pinto Pony. Boston: Houghton Mifflin Company; $1.

BEYOND ROPE AND FENCE. By David Grew. New York: Boni & Liveright; $2.

THE TRAIL OF THE SPANISH HORSE. By James Willard Schultz. Boston: Houghton Mifflin Company; $1.75.

The Social Trend.

"After having drunk so deeply of the sweet cup of individual liberty," says Professor Ross, once of Stanford, now of the University of Wisconsin, "the American will not endure the irksome collar of obedience unless he can feel, as does the public schoolteacher or the college professor, that he bows, not to the will of his immediate superior, but to the requirements inherent in all organization." What an enviable lot our educators must have! But this pronouncement, along with another to the effect that "teachers combat, not other teachers, but ignorance," is about all Professor Ross out of his great experience has to contribute in his chapters on educators and education. In his essay on experts he is equally suave and optimistic about these gentlemen. He leaps on the capitalists' necks instead and wallops lawyers and warriors, favors prohibition as a social measure, and pleads for a legal dismissal wage. As for free speech, he is almost British in his belief in it, and his faith in the good sense of democracy. "The tactics for controlling subversive ideas," says he, "is not the application of the gag, but the redress of real grievances."

Professor Ross is not terribly afraid of the divorce evil in America. "The fact is that, if anything, it contributes to make marriages popular." Does he really know that, or just guess it? There is much a priori in Professor Ross' mental method. And if our birth rate is lower than in the days of our grandmothers, our death rate is lower still. "Save our ingenuity in devising contrivances for blotting out human life," says he truly, "nothing in our time is so sensational as our success in vanquishing certain diseases." But we can do little more than suggest the interest of this book. Professor Ross is always interesting. There are those that do not think him always sound.

THE SOCIAL TREND. By Edward Alsworth Ross. New York: The Century Company; $1.75.

New Books Received.

THE WIND BLOWETH. By Donne Byrne. New York: The Century Company; $2.

A novel by the author of "Messer Marco Polo."

TWO SHALL BE BORN. By Marie Conway Oelmer. New York: The Century Company; $1.90.

The love story of a New York traffic policeman.

MIHRIMA. By Cale Young Rice. New York: The Century Company; $1.50.

A poetic drama and other poems.

THE DEVELOPMENT OF FEDERAL RESERVE POLICY.

By Harold L. Reed. Boston: Houghton Mifflin Company; $3.50.

ATOLLS OF THE SUN. By Frederick O'Brien. New York: The Century Company; $5.

A third volume by the author of "White Shadows in the South Seas."

KID KARTOONS. By Gene Carr. New York: The Century Company; $1.75.

One hundred illustrations.

BILL THE BACHELOR. By Denis Mackail. Boston: Houghton Mifflin Company; $2.

A novel.

JUST NERVES. By Austen Fox Riggs. Boston: Houghton Mifflin Company; 90 cents.

The result of a nerve-expert's practice.

THE LETTERS OF HORACE HOWARD FURNESS. Boston: Houghton Mifflin Company; $8.

THE ADVENTURES OF DIGGLEDY DAN. By Edwin P. Norwood. Boston: Little, Brown & Co.; $1.75.

Juvenile.

CAROLINE AT COLLEGE. By Lela Horn Richards. Boston: Little, Brown & Co.; $1.75.

Juvenile.

THE INTERNATIONAL DEVELOPMENT OF CHINA. By Sun Yat-Sen. New York: G. P. Putnam's Sons; $4.50.

With sixteen maps in the text and a folding map in pocket.

THE IMPORTANCE OF BIRD LIFE. By G. Inness Hartley. New York: The Century Company; $2.

A popular account of its economic significance and conservation.

SHOUTS AND MURMURS. By Alexander Woolcott. New York: The Century Company; $2.

"Echoes of a Thousand and One First Nights."

THE PROBLEM OF CHINA. By Bertrand Russell. New York: The Century Company; $2.

"The effects upon the Far East of contact between Chinese and Western civilization."

EDUCATION IN A DEMOCRACY. By Dallas Lore Sharp. Boston: Houghton Mifflin Company; $1.25.

A restatement of our educational ideals.

THE THREEFOLD COMMONWEALTH. By Dr. Rudolph Steiner. New York: The Macmillan Company; $2.

A new solution of social problems. Authorized translation by E. Bowen-Wedgwood.

TALES OF THE JAZZ AGE. By F. Scott Fitzgerald. New York: Charles Scribner's Sons; $1.75.

Short stories by the author of "The Beautiful and the Damned."

THE BLACK PHANTOM. By Leo E. Miller. New York: Charles Scribner's Sons; $1.60.

A story of the South American jungle.

LIGE MOUNTS. By Frank B. Linderman. New York: Charles Scribner's Sons; $2.

An adventure story for boys.

BROKEN BARRIERS. By Meredith Nicholson. New York: Charles Scribner's Sons; $2.

A story concerned with the vital problems of the day.

SOME DISTINGUISHED AMERICANS. By Harvey O'Higgins. New York: Harper & Brothers; $2.

Actual biographies written as fiction.

NIGHTS AND DAYS ON THE GYPSY TRAIL. By Irving Brown. New York: Harper & Brothers; $3.

An account of life among the gypsies.

CALIFORNIA: THE AMERICAN PERIOD. By Robert G. Cleland. New York: The Macmillan Company; $4.

A hundred and twenty-five years of California history by the author of "California: The Spanish Period."

THE MOTH DECIDES. By Edward Allen Jewell. New York: Alfred A. Knopf.

A novel of the younger generation and a North Michigan summer resort.

FROZEN JUSTICE. By Ejnar Mikkelsen. New York: Alfred A. Knopf; $1.75.

Translated from the Danish by A. G. Jayne.

MORE MEMOIRS AND SOME TRAVELS. By G. B. Burgin. New York: E. P. Dutton & Co.; $5.

By the author of "Memoirs of a Clubman."

THE PRIVATE PAPERS OF HENRY RYECROFT. By George Gissing. New York: E. P. Dutton & Co.; $2.50.

A reprint of Gissing's quasi autobiography.

SIX YEARS OF BOLIVIA. By A. V. L. Guise. New York: E. P. Dutton & Co.; $7.

The adventures of a mining engineer.

MOONLIGHT SCHOOLS. By Cora Wilson Stewart. New York: E. P. Dutton & Co.; $2.

A history of the movement for the emancipation of illiterate adults.

BLACK PAWL. By Ben Ames Williams. New York: E. P. Dutton & Co.; $2.

The story of a tramp trading schooner.

CHARLIE AND HIS KITTEN TOSY. By Violet Maxwell and Helen Hill. New York: The Macmillan Company; $1.25.

Juvenile.

RITA COVENTRY. By Julian Street. Garden City: Doubleday, Page & Co.; $1.75.

A novel of musical New York.

GARGOYLES. By Ben Hecht. New York: Boni & Liveright; $2.

"A devastating novel."

DOUBTING CATTLE. By Eleanor Chipp. New York: Boni & Liveright; $2.

A novel.

TRAMPING ON LIFE. By Harry Kemp. New York: Boni & Liveright; $3.

An autobiographical narrative.

PRELIMINARY MATHEMATICS. By Professor F. E. Austin. Hanover, New Hampshire: Privately printed; $1.20.

Mathematical principles.

Rust and corrosion of metal is responsible for an annual world wastage of £500,000,000.

IT'S THE WATER.

Prepared with Glacier Water from Shasta Springs

AT ALL DEALERS

SHASTA WATER COMPANY

Even the Bible has not been kept immune from Germany's wave of rising prices. The most modest editions, such as sold for 15 to 20 marks at the close of 1921, now cost 60 to 70. The price of the binding alone is now double the cost of the printed section. The Bible continues, however, the cheapest standard work on the German market. Church collections are made from time to time to keep it within reach of the poorer people by insuring that it sells only for the cost of production.

Kissing pet dogs is regarded as a possible source of pyorrhea, a dental disease; also of tape worm.

BALFOUR, GUTHRIE &amp; CO.

SAN FRANCISCO AND LOS ANGELES, PORTLAND, SEATTLE, TACOMA, AND VANCOUVER.

MERCHANTS

EXPORTERS AND IMPORTERS

MARINE AND FIRE INSURANCE

AVERAGE ADJUSTERS

Agents of

HARRISON DIRECT LINE OF STEAMERS

TO AND FROM EUROPEAN PORTS

and

COMMONWEALTH GOVERNMENT LINE

BOOKS
AT
PAUL ELDER'S
239 POST ST. SAN FRANCISCO

NEWBEGIN'S BOOKSTORE

358 POST STREET SAN FRANCISCO
Opposite Union Square

A Shop known for its courteous service, and a pleasant place to browse.

Information on books, authors and editions gladly given. Books bought and sold. Buyer will call. Telephone Douglas 2810

The Wright Magazine

("Not for self, but for others")

Only $1.00 a Year.

Besides a serial and short stories it contains departments for literary and music, women and children, farm and garden, a people's forum, manuscript markets, radio notes and other interesting features.

THE WRIGHT MAGAZINE

P. O. Box 894 Little Rock, Ark.

Argonaut subscribers may have the paper sent regularly to their out-of-town address during the vacation season promptly on request.

The Catacombs of Cypress Lawn

Comparable with the luxurious tombs of ancient Egyptian kings, yet within the means of people of moderate circumstances.

A stone edifice, highly artistic in appearance, containing a magnificent chapel. Eleven Tomb Rooms, 425 Crypts.

Cypress Lawn Cemetery Association

Phone Douglas 4772 995 Market St.

STATEMENT of the ownership, management, circulation, etc., required by the Act of Congress of August 24, 1912, of the Argonaut, published weekly at San Francisco, Cal., for October 1, 1922.

State of California, City and County of San Francisco—ss.

Before me, a Notary Public in and for the state and county aforesaid, personally appeared Wm. J. Milliken, who, having been duly sworn according to law, deposes and says that he is the business manager of the Argonaut and that the following is, to the best of his knowledge and belief, a true statement of the ownership, management (and if a daily paper, the circulation), etc., of the aforesaid publication for the date shown in the above caption, required by the Act of August 24, 1912, embodied in Section 443, Postal Laws and Regulations, printed on the reverse of this form, to wit:

1. That the names and addresses of the publisher, editor, managing editor, and business manager are:

Publisher ..... Alfred Holman

Editor, Alfred Holman..... San Francisco, Cal.

Managing Editor, Morton Todd..... San Francisco, Cal.

Business Manager, Wm. J. Milliken..... San Francisco, Cal.

2. That the owners are: The Argonaut Publishing Company, Alfred Holman, sole owner.

3. That the known bondholders, mortgagees, and other security holders owning or holding 1 per cent, or more of total amount of bonds, mortgages, or other securities are: (If there are none, so state.) None.

Wm. J. MILLIKEN.

(Signature of Business Manager.)

Sworn to and subscribed before me this 1st day of October, 1922.

(Seal) JOHN MCCALLAN.

Notary Public in and for the City and County of San Francisco, State of California.

(My commission expires April 12, 1925.)

"THE FIRST BORN."

After many years to see "The First Born" again is to realize how essentially dramatic is this short but intense play of Oriental love and revenge.

Time has not changed its drama to melodrama, nor have the alterations in the Americanized Chinese lessened the appeal of a play so strong that its potentialities for an operatic libretto have been recognized and used.

On Monday night, while we sat sniffing the Oriental odors of Chinatown, listening to the twang of the Chinese instruments, and watching the Chinese coolies, with characteristic Chinese tread, scuffling along, flat-footed, to read the announcements of their tongues, we felt the imminence of sinister drama in the air. The Chinese, with Oriental secrecy, muttered brief communications to each other with the long, chanting intonation that we now hear only in Chinatown. So Chinese did these verbal exchanges sound that it was startling when the Orientalized players broke into good plain English.

And yet that, too, is natural, for one of the anomalies of our melting-pot Chinese is the plain, everyday English they speak, as learned in business intercourse and in our Oriental school. For some reason they speak it with a rich, meaty, four-flush Middle West accent, seeming to turn away instinctively from our clipped and elided California r.

Francis Powers, however, gives a touch more than a touch indeed, of poetry to the discourse of his characters, and there is a wistful eloquence to the sad reminiscences of Loey Sing, the slave-girl, as she expresses her longing to return to her kinsfolk in far-off Shantung.

In youthfully mirthful rôles there is apt to be a certain dolorousness in Dorothy Wetmore's accents, but this plaintiveness, together with the pleasing distinctness with which the young actress utters her lines, and the suggestion of youthful femininity in her little rounded features and contours, caused her to fit very pleasingly in her rôle.

From the wistful aspect of Loey Sing, Chan Wang, as played by William S. Rainey, transplants us in one bound into the atmosphere of wrath. The calm of Chan Wang, after his outburst of vengeful grief, becomes deadly, and quietly with Oriental impassivity the murder of the man who has wronged him is accomplished.

And we Westerners look on consentingly, our sympathies for the time being having become Orientalized in this strange, bizarre play in which, from the place of secrecy, drama flashes out like the thrust of a knife.

It required a cast of seventeen to present the comparatively short play, and the illusion throughout was well and consistently maintained.

Ada Beveridge, as we saw in "Nju," and again in "The First Born," has the power of suggesting much in a silent dramatic pose, the actress having made two wordless but effective appearances as the false wife but heart-hungry mother.

Lorimer Johnston was duly dignified and impressive as the learned scholar, and Beatrix Perry, Frederick McNulty, and one or two others did well in the novel Chinese atmosphere, which was so excellently contrived.

"Violet Souls" is a youthfully cynical playlet which shows how vain and pretty American wives of Wall Street kings scorn the hand that makes of them diamantée goddesses.

Very pretty and graceful, and suggestive of a gold spoon dipping ambrosia out of a silver bowl did Hilda Denivelle look in the rôle of the die-away beauty who so ill endured the presence of her lavish but unpoetic spouse;

this latter prosaic individual being appropriately impersonated by Lorimer Johnston.

Reginald Travers was clever in the broad travesty of his strokes in the depiction of the Hungarian musician who had discovered what a good thing was the violet-souled wife of the money magnate, and Dorothy Woodward, who has appreciably developed as an actress, played a dainty little French maid with well-conceived Gallic intonations in her French-maid English.

Mr. Rainey, point device, cynical, a cigarette in his fingers, is the sardonic interpreter looking on and making wittily satiric comments.

"Violet Souls" is merely a comedy trifle, a vessel for cynicism, but it has the go to it that causes it to project smartly and amusingly over the footlights. A point in the play is to dress the pretty languisher and her bedroom bower all in shades of violet, and the Players have accomplished the appropriate effect, in the midst of which Hilda Denivelle is like a tall, swaying fleur de lis.

THE FARRAR CONCERT.

As I entered the Curran Theatre last Sunday afternoon I immediately remarked a hastily improvised blue background on the stage which struck a harsh note of incongruity with the opulent gold splendor of the theatre. For the Curran is now the most beautiful theatre in San Francisco.

"Evidently Geraldine Farrar is going to wear blue," says I to myself, says I. And, evidently to comply with a request for a harmonious background, the scene painter had squirted various shades of blue, green, gray, and intermediate shades on a canvas drop, which made the rest of the beautiful interior tacitly utter the fashionable expletive, "Damn!"

Perhaps Geraldine Farrar uttered it, too, when she saw it; for the diva did wear blue, a beautiful, gleaming brocade, composed of the many blended shades converging to the dominant color that the scene painter had vainly aimed at.

The effect of the drop was cheap, and, anyway, Miss Farrar, instead of having the blue background, had one of clustered humanity; for the stage was half full of people who could not be accommodated in the auditorium.

The result was a cheap effect, and there should be nothing cheap about Geraldine Farrar, a finished product of nineteenth and twentieth-century art.

Before we get down to the pretty talk about the music we might might as well have a cozy chat about other things concerning Geraldine.

Well! Her beautiful robe, whereon "like a shoaling sea, the lovely blue played into green," was set off with one of those fashionable trains. It gleamed with a silvery sheen, and there was a cascade of silver over her back, of which she gave us a fine view occasionaly, when she was showing pretty courtesies to her audience on the stage.

Her throat and neck jewels, while beautifully in tone with her costume, were too large, which gave them the appearance of being stage jewels. Diamonds gleamed in her ears, and on her completely bared arms. Her hair was dressed very high, at what is generally a trying angle, except to a beautiful woman, and fanned out in a loose puff at the crest. I wonder at her daring. But, while the full glow of her once famous beauty is partly missing, she is handsome enough to triumph over such a coiffeur.

I was surprised to see her so small a woman. That, by the way, is another reason why she could carry that leaning tower of hair. The presence of so many on the stage, resulting, perhaps, in pushing the singer a little forward, placed her a little in advance of the radiance of the overhead lights, and only while she passed to and fro in her exits and entrances could we see the extreme beauty of the blue robe; which was a pity.

It was very interesting to many who had only viewed the singer from the magnificent distances of the Exposition Auditorium to see her "close up"; to remark her beauty, the mobility of her attractive countenance, and to respond to her charm.

For she has much charm. Not possessing the spectacular voice of the greater singers, to come to a state accustomed to things on a monumental scale might be a disappointing experience. But Miss Farrar steadily won her audience, not only by her vocalism, but by a very winning personality.

Not a single aria appeared on her programme, which was made up of lieder entirely; her part, at least. She gave three groups, two of English and one of French; and she proved herself past mistress in the delicate and intimate art of this form.

Her voice, so sweet and clear in the lower range, in its upper range is disappointing, and when I noted that, even with palpable effort, it did not pour forth clear, strong, and free, I said to myself,

Fled are the roses dead are the roses,
The glow and the glory are gone.

But while the full, resplendent roses are gone, beautiful little flowers of vocalism remain; blossoms of an appealing, even touching beauty; the lovely, wistful little richly colored blooms of haunting autumnal charm.

For the singer controls her voice with such persuasive art that its faults of cloudiness and lack of firmness even in the upper notes of the middle register were adroitly minimized. One felt, though, that while she steadily grew in the favor of the audience as the concert progressed, the pleasure she afforded us was partly personal, and we wanted more.

So I said to myself; and then, at the last, the Geraldine Farrar of the operatic stage suddenly came back.

She entered, her form partly covered with a fringed and embroidered Spanish shawl. Over her smiling, mobile face fell the mask of drama. She had become Carmen; a mocking, challenging, provocative siren, reckless, seductively confident of her charm.

Her voice changed, and gained the rich, Italian color of drama. She had pleased us, charmed us, won us, before, but now she thrilled us to the marrow.

I have seen Calvé as Carmen, but in just the time that it took this inspired artist of the operatic stage to sing the Habanera, she was more truly Carmen to me than any other Carmen I have ever seen. She gave us a few rare moments. For that we shall always, I hope, be grateful, and to many of us those moments constitute one of the unforgettable memories.

Miss Farrar's supporting artists gave much pleasure by the superior quality of their offerings. Carefully though Claude Gotthelf subordinates his piano accompaniments, the listener keenly feels the beauty of tone and sympathetic charm of his playing.

Joseph Malkin gave several violoncello solos which revealed the technique and style of the true artist.

Henry Weldon's numbers, sung in a slightly rigid, but full and ringing basso, gave much pleasure, particularly his final offering, "The Two Grenadiers," which displayed the best qualities of his voice.

No succeeding concert has been announced for Miss Farrar, who immediately started for Portland after she had fulfilled her San Francisco date.

THE LUND RECITAL.

At present impersonations and character sketches, long ranking among the high lights of vaudeville programmes, have risen considerably in standing, owing to the fine artistry of Ruth Draper, whose recitals have had very great vogue in New York. Mrs. Mila Lund's Monday evening recital at the Fairmont was in the same field, the lady, indeed, giving selections after Ruth Draper herself.

This is Mrs. Lund's first essay as a pro-

Discriminating
Diners

IMRESSED with and appreciating to the full the solicitous attention that anticipates their every wish, maintain unswerving fidelity to the

—Fountain Fancies
—Candies that Compel

33 POWELL ST. NEAR MARKET SAN FRANCISCO
130 POST ST. NEAR GRANT
511 FOURTEENTH STREET, OAKLAND

A large majority of Cadillac owners never change to any other car after they have bought the first Cadillac

The outstanding and impressive thing about
Cadillac ownership is its permanence and loyalty

DON LEE

Van Ness and O'Farrell

ESMOND'S

"THE CAKE SHOP"

253 Grant Ave.

We offer a large variety of pies, cakes and pastries
—all of the highest quality and flavor.

"ECCLES CAKES" Our Specialty

Aline Barrett Greenwood

announces

Opening of 1922-1923 Season
Current Reviews

Colonial Ball Room, St. Francis Hotel
Thursday, Oct. 12, 11 A. M.

$1 Single Admission

$6 Season Course of 8 Reviews

Reservations, 851 California Street

Kearny 3866

Andrew Bogart
Teacher of Singing

Mr. Bogart studied in Europe with the teachers of Sembrick, Scalchi, Bispham, etc.

Lamperti—Vannucini pupil

Monday and Thursday

8 A. M. to 1 P. M.

807 Kohler & Chase Building
Address 8 Jordan Avenue

Voices tried free of charge by appointment

JUDGE McLAUGHLIN OPPOSED TO THE WRIGHT ACT

OFFICIAL ARGUMENT
AGAINST THE WRIGHT ACT
(PROPOSITION No. 2 ON THE NOVEMBER BALLOT)
By CHARLES E. McLAUGHLIN, of Sacramento.

Wisdom dictates that California electors reject this new departure and unusual law. If this "Wright Act" becomes the law of California, we must either recruit and compensate more peace officers or detach from an already inadequate staff more "purity squads" to seek illicit loves, liquors and stills whilst unprotected homes and business places are looted and burglars, robbers and murderers revel in an extra "wave" of crime. We should do neither. California should not unnecessarily assume national burdens. She has quite enough of her own. Our people are not responsible for the situation.

If this act imposed upon California the enforcement of ALL national penal laws entailing tremendous expense, it would be overwhelmingly defeated. Yet this would be more logical than the selection of ONE such law for enforcement at the expense of California Taxpayers. California should refuse to assume either burden. Our government rests on the principle that functions of State and Nation are distinct. Disregard of this principle is hazardous. Teetotalers, even prohibitionists, opposed the eighteenth amendment as radical departure from our system of government which vested in each State EXCLUSIVE POWER to regulate the conduct of its citizens. Admonished by study and experience that infringement of this power must cause friction and strife, they held integrity of government higher than prohibition or any pretext for such a dangerous precedent.

Zealotry now proposes a further revolutionary change in the surrender by California of the power to make and change its laws in the "adoption" by reference of the national "Volstead Act" and, worse still, all future amendments of and substitutes for that law. "Adoption" is a new, strange, careless method of making laws and when applied to future Congressional productions is as foolish as the adoption of unborn children who may suit and may not. Our State constitution forbids the "adoption" of laws by reference to title, and it is elementary that future Congressional acts cannot amend, repeal or supersede the Volstead Act should it become State law. Prudence should not sanction nor courts approve this novel method of enacting and perpetuating law. If, however, this "adoption" proceeding should carry, fanatical persistency may boast a "glorious victory" and a reversal by California electors of their rejection in 1914, 1916, 1918 and 1920 of "prohibition" laws as promotive of "temperance." The consequences may then be left to chance and courts. Opposition is characterized as hostility to law enforcement. But abuse is never argument and multiplication of laws, officers, expense, accompanied by divided responsibility does not aid law enforcement. Pretense that the nation alone cannot enforce the "Volstead Act" is hypocritical reflection on national integrity and power. Resort to revolutionary change and State intervention has been unnecessary to the enforcement of more important national penal laws than this and mere reform of personal habits and appetites does not justify it.

This tendency to intermingle, confuse and change functions of Nation and State, tinker with and disregard constitutions and resort to unusual methods should be halted ere it results in governmental chaos.

VOTE "NO" ON PROPOSITION No. 2 ON THE NOVEMBER BALLOT

2

PROHIBITION ENFORCEMENT ACT. Submitted to electors by referendum. Declares unlawful all acts and omissions prohibited by the 18th Amendment to the Federal Constitution and by the Volstead Act, adopting the penalties therein prescribed; vests state courts with jurisdiction and imposes upon prosecuting officers, grand juries, magistrates and peace officers the duty to enforce said laws; permits local enforcement of ordinances prohibiting the manufacture, sale, transportation or possession of intoxicating liquors; this act to conform, automatically, to changes in said Federal laws.

Yes

No

Mark X Here

X

VOTE "YES" ON PROPOSITION No. 31 Which the Board of Supervisors is submitting to the voters of the City of San Francisco

31

SHALL CONGRESS BE MEMORIALIZED to so amend the law as to permit the manufacture and use of light wines and beer for beverage purposes?

Yes

No

Mark X Here

X

CALIFORNIA GRAPE PROTECTIVE ASSOCIATION

professional, her work hitherto having been principally given before fashionable private audiences, except for several encouraging experiences before large public assemblages in New York.

Mrs. Lund's qualifications, added to an attractive appearance, an ability to carry costume smartly, and a frank and pleasing address, are good vocal quality and volume, a decided skill in emotional expression, and some as yet imperfectly developed but promising ability in conveying differentiation of varying individualities.

Her impersonations of Elsie Ferguson, Frances Starr, and Mrs. Fisk have probably lost something through distance, a more frequent survey of the stage celebrities impersonated than is possible on this Coast being, probably, necessary to lend vividness to the resemblances. But the observation is there, the emotional expression, and, as more particularly noticeable in her delineations of Yvette Guilbert and Gilda Varesi, the ability partially to submerge the impersonator's own attractive individuality.

There were several humorous sketches, which were greatly enjoyed, Mrs. Lund scoring in her depiction of the chattering inanities of the society bud, and in the success with which she revealed the essential differences of character between the vain and self-absorbed eating-house siren and the head waitress who bravely and capably put aside her own sorrow to minister to the injured.

As yet Mrs. Lund's work in its entirety has not acquired the polish gained by attrition with audiences. But there are manifest evidences, notably in the "Enter Madame" number and in the humorous sketches, that it only requires the steady work that professional experience brings to banish the comparatively insignificant evidences showing a lack of prolonged professional experience.

If there were such a thing as super-refined vaudeville Mrs. Lund's talents would find valued expression in that line, as audiences delight in witnessing the taxing but interesting protean shape taken by the experienced impersonator.

Probably, however, Mrs. Lund's special abilities will recommend themselves to fashionable hostesses who wish to engage some form of unique entertainment to please their guests.

Mrs. Lund drew such an audience, one of considerably more than respectable size, to her recital Monday evening, winning many demonstrations of discriminating approval. She was assisted in her recital by Deniah Hanifin, a young baritone, and by Mrs. Elsie Cook Hughes, a London pianist, whose piano selections showed the poise, beauty of tone, and skill of an artist.

JOSEPHINE HART PHELPS.

FOYER AND BOX-OFFICE.

"Three Wise Fools."

Theatre patrons will be pleased with the announcement that Tom Wise in "Three Wise Fools" is scheduled for a two weeks' engagement at the Columbia Theatre starting Monday night. This comedy is one of John Golden's greatest successes and is second only to "Lightnin'" as a record-breaker. In California, season before last, the play made one of the hits of the year, and Mr. Golden in sending it back has given it a cast said to be even better than the original. Mr. Wise plays the stellar rôle of the crotchety financier, and it is a part which fits him to perfection. He has the distinction of having appeared in fifty plays on Broadway, and he is equally well known and well liked on the Coast.

"Three Wise Fools," which is by Austin Strong, a Californian, is a comedy of surprises, wit, and humor, but on a substantial theme, dextrously woven around three strong characters. It is human and sympathetic and has been written with rare skill. Three bachelors, one a business man of the querulous, successful type, a doctor who is an eminent psychologist, and a judge, keep solemn state in their somewhat gloomy home. The doctor diagnosed the trio as among "the unburred dead."

The bachelors years before loved and lost the same girl. Now there comes to them a beautiful eighteen-year-old daughter of their old sweetheart with a request from the dying mother that they care for her. The girl not only brings sunshine, love, and happiness into the household, but trouble also follows her coming, through an escaped convict who seeks the life of the judge. In fact sentiment is finely woven with mystery and the story at all times hold the interest.

The Orpheum Circuit Celebration.

Preparations for the Orpheum's Third of a Century Celebration, for the week starting Sunday, October 22d, are fast taking shape. A number of eminent speakers will take part. There is particular interest locally, because the Orpheum is a local institution, and the "Circuit" which now covers a large part of this country and Canada, had its beginning in the first house, started in San Francisco by Morris Meyerfeld and Martin Beck.

Mayor Rolph, upon the occasion of the anniversary, has issued a proclamation reading: "During the week beginning October 22d the Orpheum Circuit of Theatrebrate its third of a century anniversary every city in which an Orpheum Theatre is established. San Francisco will be particularly interested in this significant theatrical event because the great enterprise of the circuit had its beginning in San Francisco with the opening of the Orpheum's doors in 1889. Our own Orpheum is therefore the parent theatre of the circuit, and the destiny and success of one of the world's largest theatrical institutions have been largely shaped by the policies established here when the founders of the Orpheum determined to give the public the best in vaudeville. I am sure the people of San Francisco have the kindest sentiment of friendship for the Orpheum, and I therefore, as mayor, congratulate the Orpheum upon its third of a century anniversary, and wish it more and more success as the years go on."

"Katinka" at the Rivoli

What is said to be the first production in stock of Rudolph Friml's comic opera, "Katinka," will be made by Ferris Hartman and Paul Steindorff at the Rivoli Opera House starting Monday evening. Theatre-goers will recall the production of "Katinka" made by Arthur Hammerstein at the Cort Theatre several years ago and the haunting melodies, "Allah's Holiday" and "Rackety Coo," which became dancing hits at that time.

Friml is famous as a composer by reason of his feeling for melody. He is the author of Emma Trentini's "Fire Fly" and "High Jinks."

Otto Hauerbach, author of "Mary" and a score of modern musical comedies, is the author of the book, which offers excellent opportunities for comedy and plenty of possibilities for scenic effects. In the sense that it offers chances for every one from the drummer in the orchestra to the scene painter the piece is suited to bring out the strength of a stock organization.

The Orpheum Next Week.

Will Cressy and Blanche Dayne are coming, and there is no more famous pair in vaudeville. Will Cressy is not only an actor, but as author as well.

Bill Bailey and his wicked banjo, and Lynn Cowan and his fiery piano playing, with Estelle ("Come on Red") Davis, are in the bill.

Few dancers have attained the fame of Ivan Bankoff, from the Metropolitan Opera Company.

Harry Watson will appear with a strong line of comical pantomime.

Bevan and Flint have concocted a turn made up of "nut" comedy. They call it "A Slight Interruption."

Dorothea Sadlier brings a satirical playlet written by William C. De Mille, entitled "1999." She has excellent support.

Simpson and Dean, using the informal atmosphere of a chop suey parlor, have something new in the comedy and song line.

Bessye Clifford is an artist with the fortunate possession of an exceptional figure. Her "Art Impressions" are extraordinary.

RIVOLI OPERA HOUSE

Market at Seventh. Phone Market 373

Matinees Wednesday and Saturday

FERRIS HARTMAN
AND
PAUL STEINDORFF
Present the Comic Opera
"The Wizard of the Nile"
Best Seats $1; also 75, 50 and 25c.

Starting Monday, October 16th—"KATINKA"

SAN FRANCISCO

THE BEST IN VAUDEVILLE

Orpheum

Orpheum Circuit

MATINEES 25 and 50c
DAILY
EVENINGS 25c To $1.25
Except Sats., Suns. and Holidays
ALWAYS A GREAT SHOW
SMOKING PERMITTED IN DRESS CIRCLE AND LOGES

CURRAN THEATRE Geary Street Near Mason
Leading Theatre. Phone Prospect 9300

Matinees Wednesday and Saturday

Second Big Week Starts Tomorrow
First Big Eastern Musical Show of the Year

"Take It From Me"

"IT'S SOME SHOW"
Prices—Nights, 50c to $2.50; Sat. mat., 50c to $2; Wed. mat., 50c to $1.50.

VANITY FAIR.

Being sister-in-law to a king is not the snap it used to be. The earthquake of thrones is too persistent, the foundations of royalty have become too rotten. Here's Constantine jarred off his royal perch by the Turkish upheaval and the consequent ebullition of a hundred thousand or so potential restaurant-keepers suddenly deprived of the prospect of getting any restaurants; and reduced, just as suddenly, to the condition of a mere prince all dressed up with nowhere in particular to go. From being a king he becomes, like taking a rabbit out of a hat, Prince Flukesbourn; which suggests the thought that when the widow of the late tin king, William Leeds, married the brother of another tin king, she may have made a fluke herself. It may be recalled that the promotion of tin-plate manufacture in the United States through the protection of the McKinley tariff enabled the late William Leeds, by frugality and industry, to acquire a grub stake of $30,000,000, putting himself into the class with the barbed-wire king, the garlic king, the potato king, the asparagus king, the boot and shoe king, the chewing-gum king, and all the other exemplars of American royalty. It was good business—for Mr. Leeds, and also for Mrs. Leeds. If memory serves us, she once paid, on returning from abroad, some $30,000 duty on a string of pearls that had pleased her fancy. It must have been a lovely thought to every other widow in the country who bought a new dishpan or a new wash-boiler, that she had thereby contributed some small fraction of a pearl to this beautiful strand; like buying a brick in the Y. M. C. A. Building, or the B'nai B'rith building, or the Y. M. I.; a thought only to be exceeded in its satisfying loveliness by the later one that when she bought a new tin dipper she was assisting the tin king's widow to go abroad with the whole $30,000,000 and become sister to another king, with prospects of actually sitting on a throne and getting into the Statesman's Yearbook—indeed a sweetly solemn thought, uplifting to the heart of every woman who presided over a wash-boiler in this broad and beautiful country, or chased the family flannels up and down the corrugations of a washboard Monday morning. And after the Allies had kicked Constantine off his throne the purchase of a tin sink strainer might be regarded as a slight contribution to helping him crawl back, for it was said that the social recognition of the former wife of the dead tin king by the living tin king was a slight acknowledgment of financial aid, out of the American $30,000,000. Many of these purchases must, of course, be regarded as ex post facto and retroactive in effect, having been made after a severance of interest between the money and the tin. But the anticipation of them is what made the money, and they are too intimately related to make any difference now. And here it is, all upset by those ferocious polygamists; another Turkish atrocity if ever there was one.

"Don't spear me," cried Artemus Ward sixty years ago or so to the woman who was holding forth to him on Woman's Spear or Sphere. Now man feels the fatal lance more than grazing the skin, ready to plunge into his midst, says the New York Times. For man, Tyrant Man, has seen his best days. Inwardly he trembles. The reading of such an article as Mrs. O. H. P. Belmont, president of the Woman's Party, writes for the Ladies' Home Journal, "Women as Dictators," is almost enough to externalize that nervousness. She finds sex discrimination in the church, in business, in labor, in the professions, and in politics. It must be stopped!

"Men must cease to dictate everywhere; in the judiciary, in the Senate, and even in the White House. I do not urge now that a woman be made President of the United States. It does not seem to me to make much difference if a woman is President or not, but if the right woman came forward—some one better fitted to head the government than any available man—I should say: 'Make her President regardless of sex.' I certainly think we have in this country, even now, women more fit to fill the presidency of the United States than the last few men who have filled it. But that is all a question of the future. At the moment it is unimportant. The important thing is to break down the barriers which prevent women from utilizing, for the good of the human race, all their energies, capabilities, and talent."

What is to become of Man, the dictator and monopolist—that was—if Mrs. Belmont can organize a union of women? inquires the Times, apprehensively. That is her stern purpose. It will be admitted by politicians in their frank private moments and is visible to clear-sighted women that, so far as politics is concerned, the cheese is for the men while to the women is graciously left the rind. This state of things will change. Women will ask more for themselves; will attain greater power; may come to sit in the secret conciliabulum that run parties and determine policies and candidates. If Mrs. Belmont has her relentless way the Woman's Party "will be strong enough to impose any measure it may choose"; and what will become of man, poor thing, in that evil day, "not far off"? Of course, the feeble and futile race of civilized men is already dictated to, bossed, led by the nose by the superior sex; but that subjection the poor trousered creature doesn't realize. He deserves no better than to find everywhere a sea of tempestuous petticoats shutting him out of place and power. His only hope to be saved from the designs of Mrs. Belmont is the curious and for him most fortunate peculiarity of the Woman's Party, which, like the Ancient and Honorable Artillery Company of Boston, consists entirely of officers. It is all leaders and no led. Such is the salvation of the sometime Tyrant Man from straight petticoatism.

Moderate in Moderation.

When a man comes to ninety-six years he is supposed to be getting on, says the New York Herald. The life insurance companies have a pleasant way of calling upon customers who have reached that age and laying the full amount of their straight life policies in their hands.

Now Dr. James R. W. Ward, who is ninety-six, has contributed his experience to the lore of longevity. He told the reporters about it when he went into the Federal court here the other day to renounce his British citizenship and embrace ours. The doctor, take it from the observant reporter, is "ruddy, dapper, and straight-backed." Likewise lively as a grig and merry as a cricket.

Moderation does it, of course. Dr. Ward eats but two meals daily. He limits himself to sixty cigarettes a day. Some foolish men at his age might burn five an hour in the waking hours, a total of eighty for the day; but the doctor knows when to stop. He abstains utterly from worry. He goes lightly on coffee. He takes it strong, to be sure, but rarely more than eight cups a day.

Dr. Ward confesses that he drank beer in his youth, but he put this vice aside at the age of ninety-four, when the Eighteenth Amendment appraised him of his fault. No more beer for him—until the genuine article comes back.

No wonder this new citizen of the republic is able to walk from Jersey City to Montclair and back whenever he feels like it. He has learned the rare philosophy of not overdoing.

PIT POWER PLANT No. 1 with capacity of 93,000 horsepower, just completed at a cost of $6,500,000.

How this Company is meeting the Demand for Power

MR. WISE, the rancher, keeps no more horses than he needs. He knows that too many horses are an expense. So, he keeps enough teams to do his work, with an extra horse or two for emergencies.

The Pacific Gas and Electric Company is keeping in step with the demand for power in much the same common sense manner.

To develop power too greatly in excess of the demand would be like keeping too many idle horses in the stable.

On the other hand, this Company is vested with a great responsibility. It must not only supply existing demands for power, but also develop a sufficient surplus to care for emergencies. At the same time, power development must be kept far enough in advance of present requirements to encourage the upbuilding of this section in other directions.

Owing to the completion of the Pit Power Plant No. 1, with its 93,000 horsepower capacity, and because of other contributing factors, the P G and E is today equipped to serve "Superior" California with much more power than is being used at the present time.

The Company will continue to develop the Pit River Project to the end that 600,000 horsepower will eventually be generated in that one district alone. But in the meanwhile more people, more manufacturing, more developments of all kinds must be attracted to make practical use of power.

PACIFIC GAS AND ELECTRIC COMPANY

P • G • and E •
"PACIFIC SERVICE"

STORYETTES.

Grave and Gay, Epigrammatic and Otherwise.

"Dr. Fourthly," said an old lady, "I do like the days when you preach the sermon. I can always get a seat."

"Malachi," asked Mr. Casey, "can your wife cook as well as your mother did?" "She can not," replied Malachi, "but, me friend, I niver minton it, for she can throw considerable better."

"Bretheren," said the preacher, "let us pray for a five-dollar collection." They prayed. The plates were passed and the contributions counted. "Oh, Lord," said the preacher, "we thank Thee for two dollars and forty-eight cents."

Colored Aunt Sally was making biscuits when little Robbie said: "I can spell what you're rolling out on the board. That's d-o, do." "But," said his mother, "that doesn't spell dough." "Chile," said Aunt Sally, "dey's two kin's o' do: do' what you shuts an' do' what you eats."

A child asked what polygamy was. "It means having more than one wife," said her mother. "And what is polyandry?" "That means having more than one husband." "Then what is marriage?" asked the child. "That," said the mother, "is monotomy."

An American who took an English house for the summer had a schedule of the tips his servants expected printed for the guidance of his guests. He had taken a dislike to the butler who came with the house, and the list, after enumerating the fees for the cook, the housemaids, the chauffeur, and so on, finished with: "The guy with the black whiskers you will meet in the front hall—not a cent."

Down in Florida a colored man went to the clerk's office to get a marriage license. He told the clerk that his bride to be was a divorced woman. The clerk refused to issue the license until the woman should show her divorce papers, knowing that among the colored people divorces are occasionally established outside of courts. The man called again with his lady, who could not show any papers, but who indignantly said, "Cose I'se 'voked! Why I'se had fo' chillen since I lef' my husban'."

Along the border in Texas the killing of a Mexican is not regarded by some of the "Texicans" as an occurrence of much importance—rather treated like the killing of a deer or coyote. Not long ago a former resident of San Angelo met an old townsman in Fort Worth and the friend said, "Hello, Jim, what is the news down in the old town?" To which Jim replied, "Well, there ain't much new except Jack Miller killed a Mexican the other day, and they say he weighed two hundred pounds."

Apropos of the ignorance, illiteracy, and general lack of culture of our newly rich, Attorney Frank Macgowan tells the story of the touring profiteer in Scotland. The parvenu in question was being shown through a collection of Scotch relics of which the proudest were the kilts of John Knox. The tourist, abjured to admire the remains of the great Presbyterian, said: "And who the hell was John Knox?" "Mon, mon!" said the guide, shocked to his very marrow. "Hae ye no' read your Bible?"

A young man in a small Indiana town recently informed the president of the local bank that he wished to start a savings account for his little son. The banker, seeing the self-conscious smile on his fellow-townsmen's face, guessed that it was a new baby and offered his congratulations. The patron smilingly acknowledged them. Several days after the account had been opened the young man again interviewed the president. "I'd like," he said, "to change the name on that account I opened for Arthur a couple of weeks ago. Make it Dorothy."

An actor of some renown, both for his talent and his numerous matrimonial adventures, looked up his physician one day and demanded a thorough physical examination. "I want to know that I am fit for a good many years, doc. You know I am to be married again soon for the fifth time." "H-m-m," muttered the diagnostician as he put the stethoscope to the actor's heart, "of course this lady is the only girl in the world for you, and this is positively your last matrimonial adventure?" he demanded sarcastically. "Oh, I say! doctor," cried the Thespian, "I'm not as bad off as all that, am I?"

A lawyer thus illustrates the language of his craft: "If a man were to give another an orange, he would simply say: 'Have an orange.' But when the transaction is entrusted to a lawyer to be put in writing he adopts this form: 'I hereby give and convey to you, all and singular, my estate and interests, right, title, claim and advantages of and in said orange, together with all its rind, juice, pulp and pips, and all rights and advantages therein, with full power to bite, cut, suck and otherwise eat the same or give the same away with or without the rind, skin, juice, pulp or pips, anything hereinbefore or hereinafter or in any other deed or deeds, instruments or instruments of whatever nature or kind whatsoever to the contrary in any wise notwithstanding." And then another lawyer comes along and takes it away from you."

Our police are deep. In the days of oatomotors an Oakland patrolman was writing a report on his unaided discovery of a dead horse in Magnolia Street near Eighth. He had the mathematical rather than the literary cast of mind, and although he could make an 8 he needed help to spell Magnolia. Through devilishness, or a similar inability, the desk sergeant refused assistance. "You're big and ugly enough to spell it yourself," said he. Several members of the force who had urgent business sitting around the squad room refused also, and the worried brother started for the door. "Here! Come back here and finish that report," said the desk sergeant. "Where in hell you goin', anyhow?" "I'm goin' back there," said the victim of modern education, "an' git some citizens to help me drag that damn horse around into Eight Street."

The late Dennis Spencer was sitting at his desk one day when a Chinaman entered. "You Mees Spenceh?" he asked. "Yes, John, what can I do for you?" "You lawyuh?" "Yes."

"Now—a-a-a-h, Mees Spenceh, spozzin' one China boy killum noddah one, how much you cost gittee him off?" It was in the days of the low cost of living, so Spencer said: "Oh, about five hundred dollars for defending a person wrongfully accused of murder." "Fi' hunnet dollah! Chee Chli!" said the astounded Oriental, and went out sadly shaking his head over the white man's avarice. Spencer forgot him until about two months later, when the Chinaman entered and plunking down $500 on the desk said casually: "All light. I killum."

Polynesia is probably the only place in the world where the marriage feast takes place without the presence of the bridegroom. For some unexplained reason the young man is "sent into the bush" when the bride becomes a member of his family, and he invariably remains there during the subsequent festivities. It is only when the guests have departed and the girl is left alone that messengers are dispatched for him.

Glasgow University, founded in 1450, is the oldest in Scotland, except St. Andrew's.

THE MERRY MUSE.

To a Flapper.

Oh, Flapper of flat heels and shameless knees, Prepared for sports whose names you hardly know, Breathing of daisy fields, and skies that glow With honest blue; I watch your muffer blow Jauntily out, as on a mountain breeze, And wonder, just a little, at the dream That underlies your age-old, city life: Your laugh drowns out the city traffic's strife— Perhaps—I wouldn't want you—for a wife— I must admit you awe me. Yet, you seem To challenge me to tell the bitter truth: I like the brutal frankness of your gaze; I like your swinging walk, and fearless ways; I like the eagerness that crowns your days; I love—your youth! —Theda Kenyon in Judge.

It is said that the only tourist who ever recognized the arms on a famous tomb in the cathedral of Aarhus, in Jutland, as those of Hamlet's family is the present King of Siam.

"No motorist should ever touch drink," says a London police doctor. "Alcohol invariably slows the mental response."

ORNAMENTAL FRUIT TREES
VINES AND FIELD GROWN ROSES

Open Daily and Sunday to visitors and purchasers
GEO. C. ROEDING, Pres.

California Nursery Company
(Founded in 1865 by John Rock)
NILES, CALIFORNIA

How We Overcame
the cause of motor oils
breaking down rapidly under engine heat

DESTRUCTIVE "Sulpho" compounds are the cause of motor oils breaking down rapidly under engine heat. An enormous amount of money is annually lost through the presence of these unnecessary properties in oils.

Cycol will save engine owners this tremendous amount of money lost through wasted oil, wasted fuel, preventable repairs, because it is free from destructive "sulpho" compounds. These have been removed by the new Hexeon Process used exclusively by us.

When your oil contains destructive "sulpho" compounds it breaks down rapidly under engine heat. Its lubricating value becomes quickly impaired. The oil film is broken and serious damage may result.

Have your crank case thoroughly flushed—not with kerosene. Use the correct grade of Cycol as shown on the Cycol Recommendation Chart. Use Associated Gasoline. Then notice the improved performance of your motor.

ASSOCIATED OIL COMPANY
SAN FRANCISCO

CYCOL
MOTOR OIL
FREE FROM DESTRUCTIVE "SULPHO" COMPOUNDS

PERSONAL.

Social Notes.

The marriage of Miss Evelyn McGaw, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. John McGaw, and Lieutenant-Commander Ellsworth Van Patten, U. S. N., was solemnized Saturday afternoon, October 7th, at the home of the bride's parents on Green Street. Several hundred guests attended the wedding service, which was read by Rev. Caleb Dutton. Mrs. Bradley Wallace and Miss Constance McGaw were matron of honor and maid of honor for the bride. Miss Helen Head, Miss Helen Deamer, Miss Frances Lent, Miss Alta Nolan, Miss Virginia Chadbourne, and Miss Alysse Allen were the bridesmaids. Mr. Baldwin McGaw acted as best man for Lieutenant Van Patten, brother of the bride. A reception following the wedding was concluded by a wedding supper for immediate relatives and the bridal party.

Miss Gladys Sullivan and Mr. Richard Doyle were married at St. Bridget's Church on Van Ness Avenue on Wednesday morning at 9 o'clock. Rev. Father John Cottle, Rev. Father Walsh, and three assisting priests read the nuptial high mass. Mr. Francis J. Sullivan gave the bride away, and Mrs. Frederick Murphy acted as her sister's maid of honor. Mr. Alfred Doyle was best man for his brother. Mr. and Mrs. Doyle left immediately after the ceremony on their wedding tour, the first part of which they will spend in California. Later in October they will go to Europe for a trip of some months, making Mr. Noel Sullivan's apartment in Paris their headquarters. Mrs. Doyle is the niece of Miss Mary Louise Phelan and Mr. James D. Phelan, a sister of Mrs. Frederick Murphy, and of Rev. Mother Agnes, who was Miss Ada Sullivan before she took the veil as a Carmelite nun some years ago.

The marriage of Miss Mary Roberts Tooker and Mr. Henry Heylmar was solemnized on Wednesday afternoon, October 4th, at the California Street home of the bride. Dean Wilmer Gresham read the service in the presence of a few intimate friends. Dr. Frederick Tooker gave his sister in marriage. Mr. Heylmar makes his home in New York, where he practices law. Mr. and Mrs. Heylmar will spend October in California, going East early in November to make their home in New York.

The young women of the auxiliary of the Infant Shelter have had splendid success far in advance of the benefit bridge-tea which they will give November 10th at the Fairmont Hotel. More than three hundred tables have been taken for the event, many women entertaining parties. Mrs. William Hoelscher, Mrs. Harold Snodgrass, Mrs. Reed Funsten, Miss Viola Buck, and Miss Barbara Benjamin will be among the afternoon's hostesses. Mrs. Edward Marion Walsh of Piedmont entertained on Thursday afternoon, October 5th, at tea in honor of her daughter-in-law, Mrs. Donald Walsh, who was Miss Hope Somerset before her recent marriage. Mrs. Walsh was assisted in receiving by her daughters, Mrs. John Louis Lobse, Mrs. Jack Okell, and Mrs. Maurice Walsh.

Miss Mary Martin, before her departure for the East last Wednesday, with Mrs. Dearborn Clark and Miss Mary Julia Crocker entertained at a dinner-dance at the Hotel St. Francis on Tuesday evening. Miss Eleanor Spreckels, Miss Josephine Grant, Miss Edna Taylor, Miss Edith Grant, Miss Lawton Filer, Mr. Russell Wilson, Mr. Gordon Johnson, Mr. Alfred Hendrickson, Mr. Richard Schwerin, Mr. Edward Maltby, and Mr. William Magee, Jr., were entertained at the informal dinner and dance.

Mr. and Mrs. Douglas Wilson Dodge entertained at tea at their home on Broadway Sunday afternoon. During the afternoon a hundred or more guests called. Mrs. Dorothy Moffatt Crosby, who is visiting Mr. and Mrs. Dodge from her home in the East, was the complimented guest. Major and Mrs. U. S. Grant, Jr., Mr. and Mrs. Edward de Laveaga, Mr. and Mrs. Lorenzo Avenali, Mr. and Mrs. Alfred Ghirardelli, Mr. and Mrs. William Kent, Jr., Mr. and Mrs. Lawrence Fox, Jr., Miss Jennie Blair, Miss Mary Emma Flood were among Mr. and Mrs. Dodge's guests.

General and Mrs. Oscar Fitzalan Long entertained Mr. and Mrs. Oscar Sutro, Mr. and Mrs. Salem Camillo Pohlman, Mrs. William de Fremery, Dr. Joseph Hamilton, and Mr. and Mrs. Clinton Walker at dinner on Saturday evening in honor of Mr. and Mrs. Gardiner Soper, who are visitors from the East.

Mrs. Mabel McKinley Baer, niece of America's martyred President McKinley, has entered politics. Mrs. Baer was named by New York independents their candidate for the state assembly. Mrs. Baer, a former opera singer, lives at Mount Vernon, Westchester County, New York.

CURRENT VERSE.

A Woman Driving.

With form erect and keen contour
She passed against the sea.
And, dipping into the chime's obscure,
Was seen no more by me. . . .

Some said her silent wheels would roll
Ruthless on softest loam.
And even that her steed's footfall
Sank not upon the foam.

Where drives she now? It may be where
No mortal horses are.
But in a chariot of the air
Towards some radiant star.

—Thomas Hardy in "Late Lyrics and Earlier."

Fable.

Where the white lane meets with the green,
The year's first butterflies are seen;
Here settling upon leaf or stone,
They spread their colors in the sun.

This is the chosen trysting-place
Of butterflies' whole painted race:
Hither the gentle, favoring wind
Of spring shall bring to each his kind.

See, ever full of hope and love,
The basker leap to her above
At the first bursting of her shadow—
Over the hedge, across the meadow!

But ah, how fortune mocks delight!
The tortoise-shell pursues the white,
The yellow brimstone tracks the shade,
Zigzag, the splendid peacock made.

Swiftly the fair day droops and dies
Above unmated butterflies:
Again, again, and yet again,
Comes the wrong lover down the lane.

Though still deceived they still return
To wait, to hope, perchance to mourn—
Alas, poor fools, how must they rue
Who but a flickering shade pursue!

Happier we and wiser far
Than these misguided insects are,
For whom both life and love are lost
At the first touch of evening frost.

—Sylvia Lynd in The Nation and the Athenaeum.

Shakespeare.

When by the far-away sea your fiery disk appeared
From behind the unseen, O Poet, O Sun, England's horizon felt you near her breast,
and took you to her own.

She kissed your forehead, caught you in the arms of her forest branches, hid you behind her mist-mantle and watched you in the green-sward where fairies love to play among meadow flowers.

A few early birds sang your hymn of praise while the rest of the woodland choir were asleep.
Then, at the silent beckoning of the Eternal, you rose higher and higher till you reached the mid-sky, making all quarters of heaven your town.

Therefore at this moment, after the end of centuries, the palm groves by the Indian Sea raise their tremulous branches to the sky, murmuring your praise.
—Rabindranath Tagore in the Looker-On.

Highwayman's Hollow.

Where the cliff hangs hollow, where the gloom falls chill,
Where you hear a Something follow—follow—
follow, up the hill,
Where the horses sweat and lather when the dusk
begins to gather,
It is there that I will meet you, and will greet you,
You, Sir Traveler!

When the leaves lie rotting, when the nights fall blind,
Still you hear a Someone trotting—trotting—
trotting, down the wind,
Still you listen all aghast for my ghostly "Stand!
Deliver!"

Yes, although my bones have whitened, you are frightened,
Yet, Sir Traveler!

'T was a Traveler who slew me where the black firs frown,
'T was his smallsword through me, through me,
and the blood dripped down,
In this place where horses lather when the dusk
begins to gather,
So, 't is here I trot behind you, to remind you,
You, Sir Traveler!

—G. V. Yonge in Westminster Gazette.

E. C. EVANS &amp; SONS, Inc.

(Established 1881)

STEAMSHIP AGENTS

SHIP AND INSURANCE BROKERS

260 California Street, San Francisco

Phone

Douglas 8040

Cable Address

"DEWGRIP"

GENERAL PETROLEUM CORPORATION

Offices at

SAN FRANCISCO

Alaska Commercial Bldg.

LOS ANGELES

Higgins Bldg.

HAMMOND LUMBER COMPANY

260 CALIFORNIA ST.

REDWOOD, DOUGLAS FIR

AND

PILING

The Loring Club.

The programme as announced by the Loring Club for the first concert of its forty-sixth season on the evening of Tuesday, October 17th, at Scottish Rite Auditorium, will open with Horatio Parker's setting of Arthur Dettmer's ode, "Spirit of Beauty," and also will include such works as Mendelssohn's "Thou Comest Here to the Land"; Billette's "At Sunset," in which the tenor solo will be sung by W. H. Wilterdink; a solo with chorus from Arthur Sullivan's opera, "Ivanhoe," the soloist in this being L. H. McCoy; William G. Hammond's "Lochinvar"; John Prindle Scott's "Romeo in Georgia"; the folk-song, "My Love's an Arbutus," with solo by Erwin Holton, and some a capella choruses, among which is Arthur Foote's "Farewell to Summer," dedicated to the Loring Club. A group of songs will be sung by George Krull.

In the accompaniments the club will have the assistance of eight strings and Benjamin S. Moore, pianist, the concert being directed by Wallace A. Sabin.

At the St. Francis.

Scores of luncheon parties from the peninsula gathered in the Garden and Fable Room of the Hotel St. Francis last Monday. Mrs. Robert Hays Smith, Mrs. Ross Ambler Curran, and Mrs. Walter Martin formed one group. Consul and Mrs. George Romanovsky had a small group with them. Mr. and Mrs. Charles Templeton Crocker and Miss Marion Zeile were one of the distinctive parties in the Fable Room. At another table were Mrs. George Newhall, Mrs. Gerald L. Rathbone, and Mrs. Mountford S. Wilson. Mrs. Herbert Fleishacker had a small coterie of friends with her.

Mrs. Ezra T. Stimson's guests included Mrs. Edgar Van Bergen, Mrs. Bartlett Thane, Mrs. Oliver Dibble, Mrs. William Eddy, and Mrs. Frederic Palmer.

Mr. and Mrs. Sydney A. Cloman had a few friends with them for luncheon in the Garden.

Mrs. R. P. Schwerin took luncheon with Mrs. Ritchie Dunn.

The New Jersey Women's Republican Club is establishing schools of oratory in every county of the state to train more than 400 women who are to take part in the political campaign this fall.

The flapper is at last to be the subject of scientific study. For that purpose Colonel George Fabyan, reputed multimillionaire, will install a $100,000 laboratory on his Fox River estate near Geneva, Illinois.

El Encanto Hotel and Bungalows

SANTA BARBARA, CALIFORNIA.

LOCATED on the Riviera 500 feet above sea level, overlooking the city, ocean and distant islands. Street-cars within a block. Fifteen minutes to the beautiful beach, or to La Cumbre's unsurpassed Golf links. Horseback Riding over glorious mountain trails. Tennis Courts and Putting Course in hotel grounds. Purest milk, cream and butter from El Encanto Dairy. Fresh vegetables from our own gardens. Highest standard cuisine.

RATES MODERATE
Liberal discount for long stay

DEL MONTE

The Largest Resort Hotel Plant in the World Where "Thinking People" can find Recreation in Hotel del Monte's Comfort, Service and Outdoor Life. "Here every sportsman can find his chosen recreation."

TWO CHAMPIONSHIP GOLF COURSES
CARL S. STANLEY, Manager
DEL MONTE : : CALIFORNIA

San Ysidro Ranch

Furnished bungalows of various sizes; situated on the foothills among the orange groves, overlooking the sea. Central dining-room, electric lights, hot and cold water. Good tennis court. Six miles from Santa Barbara, two miles from ocean. Booklet. Address MANAGER

San Ysidro Ranch, Santa Barbara

HOTEL RAFAEL

Marin Sunshine

—warm, pure and invigorating! Nowhere else in the West do we have such fine, healthful weather. And HOTEL RAFAEL has 200 outside rooms to make your stay comfortable and restful. Rates, $1.50 and up.

POPULAR DINNER DANCE
Saturday 8 to 12

SERVICE
To Sacramento

Observation Cars leave 7:20 A.M.,
9:00 A.M., 4:40 P.M.

Diner Service on Meteor leaving
4:40 P.M. through to Chico.

We Carry Baggage

SACRAMENTO SHORT LINE

JOSEPH'S
American Beauty Roses

This beautiful rose will be found this season exclusively in our establishment.
Phone Sutter 423 233 Grant Ave.
FLORISTS

Autumn
Excursions

to

Southern California

During October and November Southern Pacific will sell daily at San Francisco, Oakland, Alameda and Berkeley Round-trip Excursion tickets to Los Angeles, Long Beach or Wilmington, as follows:

$30.00 RETURN LIMIT
FOUR MONTHS

$22.50 RETURN LIMIT
ONE MONTH

Stopovers allowed at all points.

These tickets will be good on any of our 7 Daily trains either way, or on the "Daylight Limited" leaving Third-Street Station, San Francisco, Fridays and Saturdays at 7:45 A.M.

Southern Pacific Lines

Ferry Station

50 Post Street

Or phone Sutter 4000

Third St. Station

PERSONAL.

Movements and Whereabouts.

Mr. and Mrs. Frank B. King are at Pebble Beach for a few weeks.

Mrs. Leslie Miller Moore has sold her Menlo Park home, and will make her home in San Mateo for an indefinite time.

Mrs. Truxton Reale has left for Washington, D. C., where she will pass the winter.

Mr. Noel Sullivan has taken an apartment in Paris for the winter.

Mr. Robert Howard, son of Mr. and Mrs. John

Galen Howard, has returned from Europe, where he has spent the past two years studying art. He has with him a number of interesting canvases.

Mr. Henry Howard came from Europe with his brother, but stopped in New York, where he expects to be for a month or so.

Mrs. Ernest Thompson Seton sailed during the week for the Orient, where she expects to spend several months.

Mrs. Horace D. Pillsbury and her daughter, Miss Peggy Pillsbury, are in San Francisco again. They have been abroad since May.

Mr. and Mrs. Alfred de Ropp, Jr., are occupying an apartment on Pacific Avenue. Mr. and Mrs. de Ropp spent the summer at Santa Barbara.

Mrs. Charles Templeton Crocker will leave this week for New York to be away until early winter. Mr. Charles Crocker will join Mrs. Crocker in New York in a few weeks.

Mr. and Mrs. Charles McCormick plan to go East on October 16th, returning in time for Thanksgiving to their San Francisco home.

Miss Mary Martin and Miss Mary Julia Crocker left last Wednesday for New York, to be away for several weeks.

Baron and Baroness Alfred de Ropp plan sailing for Honolulu on November 4th for a trip of a few months.

Mrs. Walter Scott Franklin with her little daughter has decided to remain at her recently completed home near Goleta until the first of November.

Mr. and Mrs. Mountford Wilson have returned to their Burlingame home, after a stay at Miramar at Santa Barbara.

Mr. and Mrs. Francis H. Davis spent the weekend with Miss Ida Bourn at the Bourn home at St. Helena. Mr. and Mrs. Davis will make their home at the Fairmont Hotel this winter.

Mrs. Homer S. King and her daughters, Miss Hazel King and Miss Genevieve King, are at their Broadway home for the winter.

Mrs. Norris Davis of Santa Barbara is a house guest at the home of Mrs. Homer King.

Mrs. Charles Ackerman and Mr. and Mrs. Irving Ackerman have closed their Burlingame home. They have taken apartments in San Francisco for the winter.

Mrs. Lewis Gerstle and her daughter, Mrs. Sophie Lilienthal, have taken Mrs. Bertha Lilienthal's home on California and Gough Streets for the next few months.

Mr. and Mrs. Léon Roos and their little son returned from a four months' trip to Europe on Friday.

Mr. and Mrs. Bernard Lowe returned on Thursday, after a summer spent abroad.

Mrs. Frank Suffer of Pasadena is making a short visit in San Francisco.

Mr. and Mrs. Stanley Morrison are in the extreme northern part of California on their wedding tour.

Mrs. E. Swift Train has been a visit to her parents. Mr. and Mrs. George McNear, at their Mt. Diablo country home and in town. During the week Mrs. Train returned to her home in Southern California.

Mr. Carl R. Gray arrived recently in San Francisco, and is stopping at the Palace Hotel.

Mrs. Lindley Johnson, daughter of Colonel and Mrs. E. B. Robertson, is in San Francisco on a visit to her parents at their Divisadero Street home.

Mr. and Mrs. Julien Hart have taken a house at Atherton, where they expect to spend the winter.

Mrs. G. Albert Lansburgh is in New York on a six months' visit.

Mr. and Mrs. A. Roos are occupying their apartment at the Fairmont Hotel.

Mr. and Mrs. James Moffitt (Miss Elizabeth Schmiedell) sailed on Tuesday for Honolulu on their wedding tour.

Mr. and Mrs. William Hoelscher are in Sonoma County for a few weeks' outing.

Mrs. William Sproule and her daughter, Miss Marie Louise Baldwin, with a house guest, Miss Adrienne Sharp, returned to San Francisco last Wednesday, after several weeks spent in New York.

Mr. and Mrs. Jerome Politzer took possession of a new apartment on Thursday, which they expect to occupy for the winter.

Mr. and Mrs. Robert Oxnard, who spent the summer at their Feather River country home, leave during October for Europe, where they will spend the winter.

Miss Jennie Blair expects to leave in a few weeks for Europe, where she will be for a year or more. Miss Blair will make Paris her headquarters.

Colonel and Mrs. Sydney Cloman will leave early in November for Europe to spend the winter in Italy and the south of France.

Lady Popham Young arrived in San Francisco on Saturday for a short stay, during which she is the house guest of Mrs. R. T. Harding.

Mr. and Mrs. William Ellery are leaving this week for New York, to be gone until the holidays.

Mr. and Mrs. George T. Maryl will return to their home in Washington, D. C., the end of the month.

Miss Marie Duenas has gone to San Salvador to be away several months.

Parrott returned on Thursday of last week to their Parrott returned on Thursday of last week to their San Mateo home from Miramar.

Mr. and Mrs. Edward Hume of Piedmont and their little daughter, Miss Harriett Hume left for New York last Saturday, to sail from there on October 14th on the Olympic.

Mr. and Mrs. James Flood will move from Menlo Park to their San Francisco home the latter part of this month.

Mr. and Mrs. Charles G. Norris have taken an apartment at Stanford Court for the winter.

Mr. and Mrs. Alfred Fry, who have been in Canada and in New York, have returned to their home in town.

Mr. and Mrs. Peter F. Dunne and Miss Majorie Dunne and Miss Marian Dunne are home from abroad.

Miss Elvira Mejia and her sister, Miss Ynez Mejia, are on their way home from Europe, where Miss Ynez Mejia has spent the past two years in a convent school. Miss Elvira Mejia spent the summer traveling in Europe, returning to France to accompany her sister home.

Mr. and Mrs. John F. Brooke and Miss Cecile Brooke have passed the summer at Atherton, and recently taken the Houser home on Broadway for the winter.

Mr. and Mrs. Richard Doyle (Miss Gladys Sullivan) are on a motor trip in Southern California, planning to go to Europe for several months later in October.

Dr. and Mrs. George Lyman have returned from Woodside, where they spent the summer.

Mr. and Mrs. Samuel Buckbee left recently for New York, to be away until the middle of November.

Mr. William S. Tevis is at the University of California Hospital, following an operation. He is rapidly improving and will return soon to his Burlingame home.

Mr. and Mrs. John Hays Hammond, Miss Betty Hammond, and their daughter, Miss Natalie Hammond, who have been at their Washington, D. C., home and at Atlantic resorts over the summer, have decided to return to Santa Barbara for the winter.

Commander and Mrs. Glennie Tarbox have returned to their home at Franklin and Sacramento Streets, after a summer spent at Santa Barbara.

Mrs. William Alden Magee and her daughter, Miss Elizabeth Magee, left recently for an Eastern trip of two months, to be the guests of friends.

Mr. and Mrs. Thomas Eastland will arrive in California from New York in a week or so.

Recent arrivals at the St. Francis are Mr. and Mrs. W. J. Lawler, Chicago; Mr. J. L. Hyatt, Omaha; Mr. Frank L. Scott, Los Angeles; Mr. George W. Calder, Grand Rapids; Mr. E. A. Bailey, Mr. John R. Pratt, Boston; Mr. Alfred Stahl, San Diego; Mr. F. A. Leakey, Peking, China; Mr. M. S. Lyons, Salem, North Carolina; Mr. F. C. Brannan, Los Angeles; Mr. John Roza, Sacramento; Lieutenant-Commander E. H. Van Patten, U. S. N.; Mr. Clifford A. Russell, Sacramento; Mr. A. W. Dommer, New York.

Annual Appeal of Doctors' Daughters.

The Society of the Doctor's Daughters, which plays so important a part in the sphere of intimate charity in San Francisco, makes its annual appeal to the generosity of San Francisco and has named as "Donation Days" October 25th, 26th and 27th. On these days representatives of the society will be at the White House and City of Paris to receive contributions for carrying on their work in the coming year. The Society of the Doctor's Daughters in a unique organization. It came into existence thirty-seven years ago at a time when Dr. Robert Mackenzie was pastor of the First Presbyterian Church, taking its name from its inspirer. Through all these years it has maintained an active and beneficial life, doing quietly and delicately a great and important work. Checks may be sent, payable to the Doctor's Daughters, in care of Mrs. F. C. McCreery, 2020 Pacific Avenue.

The membership of the Society of Doctor's Daughters is as follows: Mrs. E. M. Allison, Miss Edith Allyne, Mrs. A. S. Baldwin, Mrs. James A. Black, Mrs. R. J. Bentley, Mrs. John Deahl, Mrs. C. Griffin, Miss Boole, Miss May Colburn, Mrs. Charles J. Deering, Mrs. J. M. Dickey, Miss Elsa Everding, Mrs. W. K. Guthrie, Mrs. Edward F. Haas, Mrs. Alexander Hamilton, Mrs. Gustave Knecht, Mrs. John D. McKee, Miss Marie Margo, Mrs. James A. Mackenzie, Mrs. E. O. McCormick, Mrs. Daniel T. Murphy, Mrs. C. M. Richter, Mrs. William Sesnon, Mrs. Arthur Sharp, Mrs. Katherine Sperry, Mrs. Frank I. Turner, Mrs. W. B. Weir, Mrs. Ryland B. Wallace, Mrs. I. M. Hibbard, Mrs. George de Latour, Mrs. Campbell McGregor, Mrs. A. B. C. Dohrmann, Mrs. Maxwell Houser, Mrs. Leonard Chenery, Mrs. F. W. Dohrmann, Mrs. George S. Forderer, Mrs. Robert C. Bolton, Miss Alice Owen, Miss Jennie McMillan, Mrs. Stewart Rawlings, Mrs. Ernest Stent, Mrs. Henry F. Dutton, Mrs. Arthur Foote, Miss Persis Coleman, Mrs. George C. Holberton, Mrs. Leland S. Lathrop, Mrs. Spencer Buckbee, Mrs. Harold Wright, Mrs. James Reid, Mrs. F. L. Scott.

At the Paul Elder Gallery

Mary J. Coulter, formerly curator of prints at the Art Institute of Chicago, will give an illustrated lecture on "Etching and Etchers" in the Paul Elder Gallery, Saturday afternoon, October 21st, at 2:30 o'clock, in which the development of the art will be traced for almost 500 years. The various methods employed in the making of prints will be described and a history of the great etchers and their best-known work will be sketched.

The stereopticon slides to be shown were acquired from the various museums of Europe and America.

Other interesting events scheduled for the Paul Elder Gallery during the coming week are "An Hour with Kathleen Norris," author of the season's most unusual novel, "Certain People of Importance," and a lecture on "Medical Science and Psychology of the Hindus."

by Sukumar Chatterji, editor of Chodor. The latter is dated for Tuesday noon, October 17th, at 2:30 o'clock. Kathleen Norris will speak on Thursday afternoon, October 19th, at 2:30 o'clock.

These events are under the direction of Paul Elder.

In some countries frogs are used as barometers. The species employed for this purpose is the green tree frog. They are placed in tall glass bottles with little wooden ladders, to the top of which they always climb in fine weather, descending at the approach of bad.

To Add 24 Million Gallons Daily to the Water Supply of San Francisco

Calaveras Reservoir in the Alameda County system of the Spring Valley Water Company is being increased in storage capacity, and

A new aqueduct is being constructed to carry Calaveras water to Crystal Springs, the largest reservoir in the San Mateo County system of Spring Valley Water Company.

Spring Valley builds the new aqueduct as far as Irvington, and

The City and County of San Francisco builds it from Irvington to Crystal Springs.

This Irvington-to-Crystal-Springs section of the new aqueduct will be the Bay Division of the Hetch Hetchy conduit, and will eventually carry Hetch Hetchy water to Crystal Springs.

Besides financing its own part of this project, Spring Valley pays the interest on the Hetch Hetchy bonds sold to build this Irvington-to-Crystal-Springs line, relieving all other San Francisco taxpayers of this burden, and will also pay the City for the use of the line.

Work is in progress at both ends of the new aqueduct.

While Spring Valley is raising Calaveras Dam, the City is driving the Pulgas Tunnel to Crystal Springs.

Through this program of co-operation the daily water supply of San Francisco will be increased from 42 to 66 million gallons, and our growing city will have an abundance of water for years to come.

Graphic portrayal of all this work is the feature of the Spring Valley exhibit at the California Industries Exposition at the Civic Auditorium.

SPRING VALLEY WATER COMPANY

THE SANTA BARBARA GIRLS' SCHOOL

Resident and Day Pupils. Eleven acres. Country Life and Sports. Sleeping-porches. Open-air school rooms. Riding. Swimming all the year round. Basis of work, clear thinking.

MARIAN L. CHAMBERLAIN, A. M., Principal
P. O. Box 548, SANTA BARBARA, CAL.

The Katharine Branson School, Inc.

ROSS, MARIN COUNTY, CALIFORNIA

A COUNTRY SCHOOL FOR GIRLS

DAY AND RESIDENT COLLEGE PREPARATORY

Heads: Katharine Fleming Branson, A. B., Bryn Mawr
Laura Elizabeth Branson, A. B., Bryn Mawr

STRINGER STORAGE COMPANY

Sutter near Fillmore
and
Steiner near Sutter

Conducting a Storage
Business Founded
in 1880

Storage--Shipping

Expert Packing, Protection
and Dispatch

A fully informed representative, anxious to give you any desired information, will respond to your phone call.

Phone West 999

"Travel Without Trouble"

COOK'S TRAVEL SERVICE

World wide—Complete—Efficient

Inclusive Tours for Individual Travel
arranged, to start any day by
any route.

Explanatory circular on request

THOS. COOK & SON
(Est. 1841)

Agents for the best lines for travel by
Land, Water or Air

128 SUTTER STREET
(COOK'S BUILDING) Phone Kearny 3512

Press Clippings

Are money-makers for Contractors, Supply
Houses, Business Men and
Corporations

ALLEN'S PRESS CLIPPING BUREAU
Phone Douglas 5119 121 Second Street

MOST BEAUTIFUL

Rota-Gravure Section in the world

Published Each
Sunday

by the

San Francisco Chronicle

ONLY

$5.20

a

Year

Including Every Sunday Feature
of the CHRONICLE

Graduate Cosmetic Specialist

Peggy Jane
Beauty Shop

(ESTHER M. FISHER)

Wrinkle Eradicating

Studio 203 545 Sutter Street
Garfield 576

THE ALLEGED HUMORISTS.

"Bah! Golf is an old man's game!" "I can't afford it either."—Nashville Tennessean.

"Is Jackson a self-made man?" "Oh, no! He was married several years before he became prosperous."—London Answers.

"Know the best way to keep a secret?" "Yes. Hire an umpire to shout it through a megaphone."—Nashville Tennessean.

"You're a pessimist, Shep, and think the world rotten." "Oh, no; I know it is. And, being an optimist, I don't give a hang."—Judge.

Current Events Teacher—Who married Princess Mary? Owner of the Quickest Hand—Oh, I know that one. Doug!—American Legion Weekly.

Thomas—Good men are mighty scarce. Henry—Yes. And bad ones are apt to make themselves so when they are wanted.—London Answers.

Hotel Guest (to waiter)—Do you call that a large portion? Waiter—Yes, sir; you have no idea how small a large portion can be at present.—Munich Simplicissimus.

"That was an awfully good speech Mrs. Blakeley made." "Still, my dear, a woman who so obviously makes her own hats could never convince me of anything."—Life.

Father—I don't know what is the matter with that child. He won't stay in the same place any length of time. Mother—He probably got it from his nurses.—Paris Le Journal Amusant.

Harriet—Why do you put your head under the pillow when it storms? Junior—I am afraid of lightning. Harriet—But if it can't see your head it might spank you.—Youngstown Telegram.

"Now is the time to get your life insured, young man. The longer you delay it, the higher your premiums will be." "I know that, but the longer I wait, the fewer premiums I will have to pay."—Judge.

Studious Lodger (to seaside landlady)—I think the anemones on the beach are wonderful. Landlady—I haven't seen those yet, sir, but "The Calico Comics" at the Pavilion, I'm told, are extra good.—Punch.

Lady of the House—The milk you left this morning was sour, Mr. Jones. Aggrieved Dairyman—There you are, mum! If there's any complaint the poor milkman soon hears of it; but you never tell 'im when the milk ain't sour, do yer?—Punch.

Tad Lewis says the mosquitoes are terrible up in the St. Joe vicinity this summer. They have formed a trust with the lightning bugs and work in pairs. The lightning bug lights up the place and the mosquito makes the excavation.—Kansas Exchange quoted by the Boston Transcript.

Dilapidated Dodge—Pardon me, sir, but have you seen a policeman round here? Polite Pedestrian—No. I am sorry. Dilapidated Dodge—Thank you. Now, will you kindly hand over your watch and purse?—Edinburgh Scotsman.

Mr. Worldly-Wealth—A great big, able-bodied man like you ought to be ashamed to ask a stranger for money. Grabbing Alf—I know I ought; but, mister, I'm too kind-hearted to tap you on the head and take it from you.—Pearson's Weekly (London).

"I can strongly recommend this ham," said the shopkeeper. "You'll find it mild and well cured." "I dare say you know best," said the young wife, "but I think I'd almost rather have a perfectly healthy one that hadn't needed curing."—Pearson's Weekly (London).

The Kindly Employer (to youthful employee who has but yesterday reported a near relative at death's door)—How's your grandmother, Johnny? Office Boy (gloomily, staring from the office window at rain-washed pavements)—Aw, she's comin' along all right, Mr. Blivens!—Life.

Conservation in Russia.

No picture of the Bolshevik policy towards the land would be complete without a word about the forests, says Emma Ponafidine in the Yale Review. They are not the least pitiful part of dying Russia today. Formerly the majority of the forests belonged to the state and church, about one-third to private individuals, and a smaller amount to the peasant communes. In the general rush for liberty and land, the forests were the chief objective of the peasants, and for a time they profited to the full by the general chaos. The woodland was not divided among them, but they were allowed to cut as much wood as they could. Accordingly, they let their own timber stand and threw themselves wantonly upon those magnificent forests that were the pride and wealth of Russia. Fine mast-pines were cut down for firewood, large trees felled, and the small part that happened to be needed taken while the rest was left to rot. To a lover of woods, a more pitiful sight can not be imagined—in our part of the country there is hardly a spot in the old forests ten yards square where there is not a stump, generally cut very high above the root, while the ground is littered with branches, which make it almost impossible for the grazing herds to pass. The dry bush left strewn about has fed universal fires, and during the last years few days in the autumn have been clear of smoke from them. In many cases the peasants themselves set fire to the woods, as was the case on our estate, and they would not let the state farm manager extinguish the flames. Their idea was that they could then plow this land and raise two or three crops on it without the expense of fertilizer, afterward abandoning it and letting it lie a black, unsightly ruin, where for scores of years no trees will grow.

A Miraculous Stone.

The marriage of Lady Lockhart and Admiral Sir John de Robeck recalls traditions which, if true, should assure the couple of future happiness, says the New York Tribune. Centuries ago, it is related, a Lockhart in the time of the Crusaders went to the Holy Land and captured a powerful emir. The emir's wife hastened to bring a ransom to liberate the prisoner. In Lockhart's camp she lost a certain precious stone which the victor found and set in a medal.

On returning to Scotland Lockhart discovered that the jewel possessed the power of preserving its proprietor from disease and inclining him to happiness, so the tradition goes.

In Newcastle, under the reign of Charles I, the inhabitants, terrified by pestilence, borrowed the magical medal under a guaranty of 6000 pounds. The plague disappeared immediately, and those who had borrowed the jewel were anxious to own it. The Lockharts rejected their offer, and thus the miraculous stone is in the hands of the wife of Admiral de Robeck.

Walter Scott is said to have utilized this tale in writing his novel, "The Talisman."

Sharks Should Be Careful.

On board a little trim-built vessel preparing, in a London dock for an expedition to tropical seas, a reader of Answers recently saw a huge hook which, he says he was told, was intended to play havoc among the shark tribe.

But these monsters of the deep often meet their death through more novel means than that of a big iron hook.

A greater contrast in the method of killing, indeed, could not be imagined, for the slaughterer of the great savage shark is none other than a little soft fish, known as the didodon.

This harmless-looking, flabby creature has the power of blowing itself out until it becomes almost perfectly round, and when the shark swallows it, the didodon eats through the stomach and sides of the monster and kills it.

Didodons have often been found floating inside sharks when the latter have been killed.

Not only can the didodon inflict a severe bite, but it can squirt out water to a considerable distance.

Another interesting fact connected with this little shark-killer is that when handled it gives off from its skin a beautiful carmine-red matter, which stains ivory and paper in a way that lasts for years.

It is clear that deadly as that big iron hook would be for Master Shark, the little didodon is more deadly still; a terror, in fact, for its size.

Popular speech reveals our sectionalism, not only in matters of pronunciation, idioms, and so on, but also in the mental attitude that underlies the expressions, says Frederick Jackson Turner in the Yale Review. When we hear that "no man in the wrong can stand up against the fellow that's in the right and keeps on a comin'," we know that we aren't in New England in spite of the moral flavor, and we suspect that we may be in Texas. When told that "high-class swine are unknown and impossible among a low-class people," that the hog of a certain state "in his sphere typifies the good, the true, and the beautiful . . . like the state that lends him as a solace to humanity," or that still another state produces the "most perfect cow that ever was by sea or land," we have little difficulty in getting our sectional bearings. It is not necessary to examine the Agricultural Atlas, for we recognize a Middle Western spiritual as well as material attitude. When we read, "We don't have to pray for rain out here, we open the irrigation ditch and stop worrying about Providence; we don't have to ask for health, we got it when we bought our railroad ticket," it is not alone the reference to the irrigation ditch that carries our thought to the exila-

If you had $50,000 or $5000 worth of deeds, stocks, bonds, etc., and your business future depended on your ability to lay hands on them tomorrow morning at 9 o'clock, would you dare trust such precious documents to your office safe?

We think not. Fire tonight might leave you helpless, for no office safe can withstand a hot fire.

BUT—a safe deposit box in the vaults of the Crocker Bank is proof against any fire. These vaults went through the great San Francisco fire without even scorching a single sheet of paper. For $4 a year you can secure a box there—and you're SAFE.

Crocker Safe Deposit Vaults

Crocker Building

Post and Market Sts.

rating high altitudes of the Far West, the land of optimism, determination, and exaggeration. One doesn't weigh words, or cultivate restraint and the niceties when nature is big and rough and lavish.

A tablet is to be placed in one of the wards of a London hospital in honor of the Congo chief, Mandobi, who volunteered, when sleeping sickness appeared among his tribe, to go to England and to submit to all the experiments necessary to determine the cause of this malady and to discover a remedy. For several months he permitted himself to be bled daily in order to supply material for the microscopists. At length the germ of the sleeping sickness was discovered; but almost simultaneously the volunteer subject of these researches paid for that discovery with his life.

Japanese soldiers are said to have increased two inches in height since meat has been added to their diet.

FOR A
CLEAR COMPLEXION
and a HEALTHY COLOR
eat
FLEISCHMANN'S YEAST

Three Cakes a Day

ENGLISH
CASEMENTS
and Windows
for banks, offices,
hospitals, etc

for artistic residences and
other substantial buildings

Made in varied designs
to meet all conditions

CRITTALL
Steel Casements

Coast Representatives

J. E. DWAN, Los Angeles

F. T. CROWE & CO., Tacoma and Seattle

WATERHOUSE-WILCOX CO., San Francisco

J. McCRAKEN, Portland

Crittall Casement Window Co., Detroit, Manufacturers

KING COAL

High in Heat Units
Low in Ash

FOR SALE BY ALL DEALERS
IN CALIFORNIA

KING COAL CO.

Main Office
EXCHANGE BLOCK
San Francisco

Wholesale Only

THE CHARLES NELSON CO.

MANUFACTURER AND WHOLESALE

of

REDWOOD, DOUGLAS FIR,
SPRUCE, HEMLOCK,
SUGAR & WHITE PINE.

CEDAR SHINGLES & POLES.

230 California St.

San Francisco

Geo. E. Billings Roy C. Ward Geo. B. Dinsmore
J. C. Muessdorffer Jas. W. Dean

GEO. E. BILLINGS CO.

ALL FORMS OF INSURANCE
EFFECTED

312 California St., San Francisco, Cal.
Phone—Douglas 6400

BONESTELL & CO. PAPER

The paper used in printing the Argonaut is
furnished by us
CALIFORNIA'S LEADING PAPER HOUSE
118 to 124 First Street, corner Minna,
San Francisco

The Argonaut.

VOL. LXXXI. No. 2378.

SAN FRANCISCO, OCTOBER 21, 1922.

Price Ten Cents

PUBLISHER'S NOTICE: The Argonaut (title trade-marked) is published every week by the Argonaut Publishing Company. Subscriptions, $5.00 per year; six months, $2.55; three months, $1.50, payable in advance—postage prepaid. Subscriptions to all foreign countries within the Postal Union, $6.00 per year. Sample copies free. Single copies, 10 cents. News Dealers and Agents in the interior supplied by the San Francisco News Company, 747 Howard Street, San Francisco. Subscribers wishing their addresses changed should give their old as well as new addresses. The American News Company, New York, are agents for the Eastern trade. The Argonaut may be ordered from any News Dealer or Postmaster in the United States or Europe. Special advertising rates to publishers. Address all communications to The Argonaut, 207 Powell Street, San Francisco. Make all checks, drafts, postal orders, etc., payable to "The Argonaut Publishing Company."

Entered at the San Francisco Postoffice as second-class matter. The Argonaut can be obtained in London at the International News Co., Breems Building, Chancery Lane; American Newspaper and Advertising Agency, Trafalgar Square, Northumberland Avenue; and at Daws Steamship Agency, 17 Green Street, Leicester Square, and can be ordered from any of the news-stands of W. H. Smith & Son. In Paris, at 37 Avenue de l'Opéra. In New York, at Brentano's, Fifth Avenue and Twenty-Fourth Street. In Chicago, Western News Company. In Washington, at Adams' News Agency, Ninth and G Streets.

The Argonaut is on sale at the Ferry Station, San Francisco, by Foster & Orear; on the ferryboats of the Key Route system by the news agents, and by the Van Noy-Interstate Company on Southern Pacific boats and trains.

Telephone, Kearny 5895. Publication office, 207 Powell Street. W. M. J. MILLIKEN, Business Manager.

Forty-Sixth Year

ALFRED HOLMAN - - - - - EDITOR

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

|   |         |
|---|---------|
| EDITORIAL: For All the State—A Socialistic Ideal—Glad They're Back—Business in Government—Gaining on Ghosts—Tribulations of the Dove..... | 257-259 |
| LETTERS TO THE EDITOR.....  | 259     |
| SAN FRANCISCO AND THE FLEET: Great Pacific Base Is a Naval Necessity and This Bay Is the Place for It .....                               | 259-260 |
| INDIVIDUALITIES: Notes About Prominent People All Over the World.....   | 260     |
| OLD FAVORITES .....   | 260     |
| THE INFANT R. L. S.: Scotch Logic and Presbyterian Piety Crop Out Early in the Child Mind of Stevenson .....                              | 261     |
| BANKING AND INVESTMENT NEWS.....  | 262-263 |
| BOOKS ON THE TABLE: Notes of Books and Authors....  | 264     |
| REVIEWS AND NOTICES: New Books Received.....  | 265     |
| DRAMA: Milne at the Plaza; "Three Wise Fools"; Musical Comedy; At the Orpheum. By Josephine Hart Phelps .....                             | 266     |
| VANITY FAIR: Female Cravings—Male Responsiveness—Results .....  | 268     |
| STORYETTES: Grave and Gay, Epigrammatic and Otherwise .....   | 269     |
| THE MERRY MUSE.....   | 269     |
| FOYER AND BOX-OFFICE.....   | 270     |
| PERSONAL: Social Notes—Movements and Whereabouts....  | 270-271 |
| CURRENT VERSE .....   | 271     |
| THE ALLEGED HUMORISTS: Paragraphs Ground Out by the Dismal Wits of the Day.....   | 272     |

For All the State.

The current live-stock show will have been of benefit to San Francisco and all California if it has revived interest in the proposed exposition building. We have now three annual events that call for better housing in a permanent structure: the live-stock show, the industrial exposition, and the automobile show. The Exposition Auditorium is unsuited for the industrial exposition and the stock show, and while it does quite well for the motor-car exhibition, that, too, will probably grow beyond its accommodation soon. And there is another reason why the Auditorium should not be used for such purposes longer than necessary, and this is that it was not built for them, and every time you divert something from its designed purpose you do so at a sacrifice of efficiency. For example, an important convention, for which the Auditorium was built and for which it should have been used, had to be refused accommodation during early October, because the industrial exposition was in possession. We want the conventions and we want the industrial exposition, and we want the motor-car show and the stock show, and we are not a fully equipped city if we can not accommodate them all in suitable housing without crowding or conflict. As to holding a stock show in inflammable tents, the inconvenience and risks of such an arrangement merely prove how strongly the show itself gravitates to San Francisco and needs to have this city for its setting. Animal husbandry is one of our most important fields of development. There are said to be 7,000,000 head of stock in California, which is important, but insufficient. There should be more, and they should be better every year in breed and in ability to serve our needs. To supply safe and accessible housing for stock exhibitions would be one of the best ways and perhaps the best way in which San Francisco could help the state. And San Francisco can never be greater than the state, can never be so useful and valuable as when it is serving the state. Stock shows do an immense amount of good, not merely in the opportunities they give for buying stock, but for educating cattlemen in better types of animal. Tremendous gains have been made, in recent years, in the weight, beef quality, and milk capacity of cattle, and in improving the breeds of swine and sheep; and they have been made largely because stock shows have enabled breeders to get together and trade information. They are a peculiar breed themselves, in that they are eager to help one another in the development of valuable droves and flocks and herds. And such developed values are never confined to the men that do the developing; we all share in the improvement and in the added wealth produced. The supervisors are disposed to assist the erection of a suitable exposition building, accessible by rail and water. The local business community could do no better service to the people of California than to back the project with its credit and if necessary with its cash. There is little or no risk involved. If the enterprise is not mismanaged it should pay. A symphony concert is a beautiful thing and adds to the sweetness of life for those that enjoy it. But the finest symphony the human ear can take in is the lowing of a dairy herd. That means bone and sinew and red blood and health and vigor for the human race.

A Socialistic Ideal.

There have been imperfections and rough spots in the relations between the private hydro-electric interests of California and the public. That is inseparable from all human affairs. But they have been as nothing compared to what the commonwealth would suffer from the erection in this state of such an unchecked tyranny as that contemplated in the Water and Power Amendment. Five men are to be given the power to ruin any industry in this state, or any community in the state. Without regard to general needs or interests, or market demands, they could decree where the next development should occur. They could fatten with such a development any wildcat land speculation their political favorites wished to promote, and do it at the expense of the body of the people, who would have no protection or redress. Hungry politicians with land-boomer affiliations will no doubt welcome it as a chance to make a million. The water and power board could ruin any political favorite's competitor for him and he would have no come-back. It could seize any unit or part of a unit of any hydro-electric establishment now in operation on five days' notice and operate it to suit its own purposes, whatever they might be, without having to declare those purposes in a definite way and without being limited in an effective manner to any publicly beneficial policy.

This amendment is the project of an idealistic reformer who has run out of other reforms to promote, and a local banker whose typical German heredity expresses itself in an inability to understand the American principle of individualism. It is state socialism, the Marxian kind on which the present arrangements of Russia have been based—public ownership of the instruments of production. It is destructive of liberty, it invites vicious political abuses, and it can not even work industrially, which is supposed to be its object. The public, as such, has not the ability to operate the instruments of production, and has never yet been able to evolve political machinery that could be trusted to do it.

The principal supporters of the visionary reformer and the German-descended banker are certain members of the organization known as the California League of Municipalities, a sort of club of city job-holders interested in jobs. This is the biggest job they ever had before them. The mere distribution of $500,000,000 of the taxpayers' money would give politicians such a command of California's industrial life as no modern government has had, outside of Russia. That they would exercise that command impartially, effectively, and in a manner beneficial to the state as a whole, is a vision and a dream that could only dazzle very ignorant or very optimistic persons. And nobody will know, when he votes on this amendment, whether the board that is to have this vast machine-building power will be appointed by Friend William Richardson or Thomas Lee Woolwine. It would be the fattest plum a governor of any state ever had to offer.

The tyranny of such a machine, once established, would have no stopping place. It would propagate and multiply itself, as tyranny always has, for its own protection. Once embarked on such a policy of socialism, the state would swallow every private function and reduce the individual to a mere taker of orders from state inspectors and directors and various kinds of policeman. In public affairs we have tendencies to deal with, and this tendency is wrong; it is toward the Russian pit.

Advocacy of the proposed amendment is based on false pretense, and carefully fostered misconception of what conservation means. Water running to the sea is not being conserved; its energy is being wasted. It is conserved only when it is used, when it is going through the turbines of a generating plant, turning up energy in the transmissible form of electric current.

Nowhere in the world have the arts of generating and transmitting electricity been carried to such a stage of development as in California. That is owing to the initiative of a few bold men who hoped to profit by it, and some of whom did profit, but of whom three at least are poor men today for their pains—a risk inseparable from the individualism that has made America great. They were willing to risk it, and that willingness to risk it is the basis of our national power and of about all the equipment of civilization. Men that know nothing of business and suppose it consists merely of collecting dividends or interest, who are without the most rudimentary notions of how dividends and interest have to be produced, are being deluded into a frame of mind to believe that they were somehow being robbed when capitalists were converting the waste energy of the California streams into electricity, for sale to them—who never could have bought it, otherwise. Yet there is hardly a person in California who was not thereby benefited. It is owing to such enterprise that you can press a button and flood your house or your chamber with the most beautiful and convenient light mankind ever enjoyed, although artificial light has been one of his main concerns since he first lived in caves; or start a pump or a circular saw, or a die press. And you did not have to do any of the inventing, the organizing, the discovery and surveying of watersheds and dam sites, the designing of the plant, the planning and building of the power-houses, the marketing of the product, the securing of everybody concerned against accidents and loss. You did not have to raise the money to buy the materials needed, and to feed the labor while it was at work on the physical execution of those plans. You attended to your daily business; and the power companies through great organizations of experts and scientists were preparing light for you, and power for any factory you might wish to start. And if you did not wish to start a factory they were ing ready to deliver power to some one who would, and who was thereby put in a better position to serve you with the necessities of a comfortable existence; to operate, among other things, electric railways for your convenience and the service of your business.

Nobody was robbed thereby. The water was not stolen from the people. Neither was its energy. As electricity, that water never had any energy until it was developed by the power companies and their experts. In effect those organizations were public agents, and they are today controlled for the public by the state railroad commission. "The people," as ordinarily conceived, never would have done this thing for themselves. They never did. Neither the mass of them, nor their elected representatives, would have had the initiative and ability to carry out such vast and technical projects. Such things are not for politicians nor even for trustees of other people's money. They are for experts in engineering, in finance, in executive management, working under the direction of men whose financial lives are at stake. Progress is made through specialization, not through the scattering and superficial operations of jacks-of-all-trades. And progress in hydro-electric development in California has engaged some of the finest executive talent this nation has ever produced. It has engaged more than that. It has engaged, what may seem fanciful to many but is absolutely real, the idealistic devotion to great achievement of men at least as capable of such devotion as some of those that purpose now to deprive them of their share in the control of the business their brains and character created.

Objection is made to the rate at which power is sold. It is preposterous, and it did not occur to the public until this attack began. It is dragged in now as an appeal to prejudice. Power that is generated for half a cent per kilowatt-hour has still to be transmitted. In California, under private development, transmission efficiency has been multiplied 200 times in twenty years; but there is still great leakage, and expense of upkeep. Farmers today are getting electrical energy below cost. For a political board to sell it cheaper would involve deficits that would have to be concealed in the mazes of a vast accounting system and taken out of the already mortgaged farms and homes in the form of higher direct taxes. That has happened at Los Angeles—$6,000,000 worth for the power bureau and $15,000,000 for the water bureau.

The amendment is anti-American, socialistic humbug. But don't leave it to your neighbors to defeat it.

Glad They're Back.

San Francisco theatre-goers have been treated recently to two "come-backs" that should engage their interest as citizens, two stage events that recall and reassert the spirit of the former city when that spirit of joy in life was the envy of discriminating visitors from every other part of America—we refer to the revival of "The First Born" at the Players Theatre, and the return of Ferris Hartman and Paul Steindorff to this side of the Bay after having developed a light opera troupe in Oakland competent to sustain the best of the old Tivoli tradition.

It may have been coincidence, but we like to feel that it involved some relationship of cause and effect, that a more friendly and considerate attitude toward the Chinese in San Francisco dates from about the time of the production of "The First Born" at the old Alcazar. Here was a most human interpretation of the life of San Francisco's Chinatown—not the bestial interpretation of the guides, and the commercialized dens of vice for the horriification of tourists eager to be horrified at a dollar a horror, but one so deeply sympathetic and fraternal that every auditor felt common brotherhood with the characters on the stage, and poignant realization of their tragedy. Powers' dramatic construction was sound, and his lines were excellent, and from his exotic elements he made such a play as Broadway rarely sees and would hardly understand if it did. He had imitators—unsuccessful ones. A short story writer of power, who had in that literary form most successfully depicted the life of the Chinese quarter, could not give it the holding grip of drama. Powers had the watchmaker skill to fit the parts of Chinese life together and make them go, and we were moved and grateful—and that is dramatic success. "The First Born" could have been written nowhere but in San Francisco, by no one but a San Franciscan, and he had to understand the transplanted China that is part of this city; and what, moreover, the process of trans-planting did to its ancient culture. That he worked so well with his theme is cause for local pride. "The First Born" is a San Francisco possession. The Players would do well to repeat it at intervals.

As to Hartman and Steindorff, little need be said except that they are here and every San Franciscan should be glad. They should have been here for the past fifteen years. They belong here. Nothing was ever more a part of this city's life than the institution they have brought back to us. That, too, grew in San Francisco and fitly represented its Continental delight with living for living's own sake. No sour, repressive atmosphere could have brought forth just this form of entertainment, and the operas the Rivoli is presenting are almost peculiar to Europe and this city. The Argonaut is delighted with the welcome Hartman and Steindorff received, and feels confident they will have the support of San Francisco, as they had in the city's cheerful past.

Business In Government.

Eighteen months of the Harding administration have had some good business results. The national debt has been reduced from $24,045,000,000 to $22,812,000,000, a creditable performance. If it be urged that the war is over and the debt ought to have begun to shrink, it may be urged in rebuttal that this is just what it has done, and, moreover, it has done so concurrently with a reduction of war taxes to the tune of $800,000,000 through repeal of the nuisance imposts. That was not only a reduction of taxes, it was also a reduction in the general botheration of living and of doing business, and thus worth even more than the money saved. Financial health was effectively promoted by the organization of the budget bureau, through which it is possible to predict and to accomplish a striking reduction of governmental expenditures: from $5,538,000,000 for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1921, to an outgo not exceeding $3,770,000,000 for the fiscal year that will end June 30, 1923. For the latter year the appropriations have all been made, and it can be told with reasonable certainty what the costs are going to be—unless some way is found to beat the system and swell the bills.

A funding commission has been established to handle the foreign debt, of which the British owe 45 per cent.—and that part of it is good. They are making ready to begin payments, and have no thought of begging off, which they know would hurt them worse than it would hurt anybody else. Liberty bonds have gone to par, appreciating 14 per cent. since March 4, 1921. Truly, in the words of J. P. Morgan, it does not pay to sell the United States short. These things appear in a recent statement of Secretary of Commerce Hoover. They are the result of constant hammering by the press and by commercial and political organizations for a contraction of government spending. It has worked well thus far and it may work farther.

So much for business in the government. As to the government in business, the story is slightly different. The postoffice, so frequently cited by the socialists in support of collectivism, has gone in the hole $60,000,000 for the year. That is for the first year of the Harding administration. And so far from its being exceptional, it is an improvement over the year preceding to the extent of about $97,000,000. The deficits were largely chargeable to retroactive increases in the pay of employees, but nevertheless they were made, and the added salaries do not account for such large totals. The Post-office Department was only saved from a tremendous deficit during the war by charging more for postage. That is one way to do it, and the other is to cut down running expenses; but the fact is that running expenses remain, and support the contentions of the opponents of the proposed Water and Power Amendment to the California Constitution, that when the government is in business the public will pay, either in the form of added rates or more taxes.

Tribulations of the Dove.

Persons that suppose international affairs can be resolved by a simple compliance with fourteen points or some other formula, and who have been insisting that the Japanese quit Siberia right away, may have an early opportunity to observe some of the effects of their policy; and not with much joy of it, unless they take delight in trouble on a large scale. The Japanese are quitting Siberia, and Tokio says the last of their troops will be out by the end of this month. Already the dogs of war are snarling over what is to be left behind, and the outlook for a continuance even of the present comparative quiet is not much brighter than it is in Ireland or Mexico.

Among the flotsam of war cast upon the eastern coast of Asia is a pile of munitions at Vladivostok which has cost more than $25,000,000, may have cost nearer to $100,000,000, and is worth to certain martial gentlemen in that part of the world whatever expenditure of blood may be necessary to the taking of it, because the one that gets it will be enabled therewith to blast himself out a neat little empire, or perhaps conquer a great one. It is an irony of fate and politics that these potencies of slaughter were purchased with the money of the least belligerent people on the planet; for the United States loaned Kerensky about $187,000,000 out of the proceeds of Liberty Bond sales, and never saw the color of a red cent of it back. Kerensky bought war material with part of it; and that seems to be the only vestige of the loan now remaining upon the earth. We do not seem to want it; at least have gone away and have filed no lien on it. And the Japanese have been protecting it with their Siberian troops, but do not appear to have been greatly applauded for their efforts, and when they depart it will go to the general that can beat the others to it.

The situation offers a choice and a chance to white Russians, pink Russians, red Russians, and Chinamen. The government of Vladivostok is white Russian, or conservative—some say even Czarist—but the pallor of its complexion would indicate the feebleness of its constitution. The president is a deserving gentleman named Merkulov, and he calls his government the Priamur Republic. It is anti-Bolshevistic and willing to fight for it, and has an army under General Diedrichs, one of Kolchak's old officers. He is accused of Japanese, Chinese, and imperialistic leanings, and of undue familiarity with the aims of the tuchun Chang Tso Lin, dictator of Manchuria, who was recently defeated by Wu Pei Fu in a celebrated battle north of Peking, in which the victorious strategy consisted of discharging firecrackers in oil cans simulating, and successfully simulating, the rattle of machine guns. Chang is willing to admit that it worked once, but says they couldn't do it again, and has lately been getting his tail up his back. If he can combine with Diedrichs and get at the munitions dump at Vladivostok, bought with American money, he will not have to use firecrackers.

Out to the west of Vladivostok is the Chita, or Far Eastern, Republic, another sprout from the roots of the late Russian Empire. The Chita Republic looks like the original gerrymander almost strangled to death by a constriction of its middle. It is pink, as might be expected under such circumstances, with a strong inclination to grow darker and darker until it has become as red as Moscow, which has been aiding and abetting it in its encroachments on the Priamur Republic and the munitions dump. Diedrichs has been fighting it off, and is said to have had the assistance of the Japanese, but as they have withdrawn their troops he has been crowded farther and farther back. The Japanese had held a line about 125 miles westward from Vladivostok, but their retirement has left that territory to the troops of the pink republic with the narrow waist, and the white Russians have been fleeing before their advance, because Diedrichs has not been strong enough to hold them. As he retires he waves come-on signals to Chang, but thus far Chang has been busy with a little enterprise of his own—no less than a new revolution, staged at Foo Chow, on the coast between Shanghai and Canton. His combination includes some of the pro-Japanese party in China, with remnants of the crowd that supported the defunct government of Sun Yat Sen in the south. Chang's idea seems to be that Diedrichs should be able to stand off the pinks and the reds until the yellows can clean up on their new revolution, and then, or at least so Moscow and Chita interpret it, Diedrichs and his whites can pick up the munitions dump and join Chang with it in Manchuria, just as the Japanese depart. And—Moscow and Chita profess to believe that if this junction of whites, yellows, and war supplies, under Japanese connivance, can be accomplished, the next move will be to tear away Eastern Siberia from the reds and the pinks and annex it to Manchuria. After that, Chang's long arm would reach southward and his hand might close over Peking itself. The Japanese say such a thing can not be, for the reds are too strong for the whites and yellows. But having received such pointed hints to get out of Siberia, they are getting out, washing their hands of the entire mess, and leaving the whites and yellows and pinks and reds to fight it out among them.

This, according to the Argonaut's advices, is about the situation in Eastern Asia, where self-determination has been having a hard time, and is like to have a harder, and the dove of peace is becoming a discouraged bird. Something of importance is quite likely to arise in that region in the near future, and it should be of especial interest to the people on this Coast.

General Diedrichs, with his Priamur army, has accomplished a retreat to the Russo-Chinese frontier. The red representative at Peking has served notice on the harried Peking government that it will be held responsible by the Moscow powers if any of the munitions fall into the hands of General Chang; something probably beyond the ability of Peking to avert, especially as Chang already has some part of these desirable supplies. At Foo Chow, the governor and the Peking officials have fled, leaving the town in possession of the southern revolutionists. Although the navy holds the river, nobody knows just what side it is on. American, British, and Japanese marines are guarding foreign interests. The stage appears to be set.

Gaining on Ghosts.

Verily, progress is. If we can hold our gains humanity may some day grow rational. Events help more than once they did, because of better interpretations. This unusual optimism is encouraged to grow and flower by the case of the Antigonish ghost girl.

It may be recalled that some months ago in Nova Scotia there was a ghost, or perhaps a flock of them, or herd—whatever a ghost congregation is. A little girl said so. She said she had seen it or them often, and her testimony was definite, circumstantial, and exact. "Psychologists" and various breeds of occultist and devil dodger went to Antigonish, and received from the child the most conclusive evidences of the visits of a supernatural or spiritual visitant, or visitants, as the case may be. Of course, all evidence is conclusive that supports our theories, and this was first chop. Among the whole cult of the supernatural and mysterious and mystical there was a bobbing of heads and wigwagging of fingers over the new confirmation of the beautiful and comforting faith in spooks. The whole tribe of Sir-Oliver-Lodge-Sir-William-Crooks-Sir-Arthur-Conan-Doyle converts and devotees gushed with emotion about the "discoveries." It was said that scientists on the spot were puzzled, but it was not said how they were known to be scientists—they simply were. Perhaps they admitted it. News dispatches ran full on the "demonstrations" and "manifestations." There was a haunted house or two—very bad for real estate. If memory serves us aright there was some sort of trance business connected with the manifestations, in which the little girl spoke Hebrew, a dead language second only to Egyptian as a vehicle of belief—if second; and so far as known she had never attended a Hebrew Sunday-school, even on Saturday. It was a mystery, and hence it proved a great deal. Exactly what? Why, whatever you wished to have proved.

And now the blow has fallen. The girl was insane, and has been committed to an asylum. So the demonstrations and materializations are over, the Hebrew has turned into gibberish, the ghosts have stopped coming and so have the psychologists and scientists—gone to seek fresh evidence of the supernatural from other forms of insanity. But a mystery remains; and that is, why they should have put the poor little girl into an asylum and left those that believed her outside.

She was not dangerous; they were. Such credulity is more perilous in tendency than crime. Exorcism and witch-burning grow from it, or would grow from it, were it not for such secular influences as modern science and the public press; for be it remembered that the same press that reported the ghosts reported, with impartial appetite for a good story, the explanation of the matter. That is a great service, provided some of the credulous can remember what it was they were "believing in" last month. The worst phase of the situation is that there will always remain a residue of the unexplained, on which to base more queer beliefs. Deprived of the testimony of the insane girl of Nova Scotia, the believers can fall back, for example, on the rock thrower of Chico, who did not speak Hebrew, nor manifest any other symptoms of demoniacal possession, and who, as far as we are informed, has not yet been reduced to captivity, and so still proves anything.

The insane girl in the asylum will at least be kindly treated, whether she can be cured or not. But in Germany in the Middle Ages a hundred thousand equally harmless victims of insanity and of the credulity that believed the insanity were burned at the stake. Many times that number throughout Europe were tortured by theological devil-drivers. The sane were accused of "possession" by the "possessed" under torture, and then driven insane by the efforts to evict the satanic tenant. It was not only the church of the Middle Ages that harbored this beautiful faith. Luther had it, and John Wesley, and the Mathers, Cotton and Woolen; all great leaders of the people. We had our own witch-burnings at Salem, based on testimony resembling that of the Antigonish witness. That unfortunate child, had she lived and testified two centuries ago, might have caused the death by fire of any innocent old woman in her village. We have great societies to suppress war, but very few persons have tried directly to suppress credulity. It must diminish through methods indirect. It is thought to affect only the credulous. That is an error. It is also thought that such queer beliefs as witchcraft and spooks are something the world got over long ago. That, too, is an error, for the writer has heard a presumably intelligent preacher proclaim to a presumably intelligent congregation his living faith that spirits and devils abound. Yet, as Dr. Munyon says, there is hope. A lunatic here and there will continue to have believers, but most of us are healthily interested in the baseball score and Chick Evans, and how the tariff is going to affect the cost of living. That is a great gain, and a foundation for some slight measure of optimism—but not too much.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR.

Danger in Union Square Garage.

SAN FRANCISCO, October 12, 1922.
TO THE EDITOR—Sir: Proposed Charter Amendment 45 (to be placed on the ballot for the forthcoming election) is to permit the utilization of the sub-surface of public parks for garage purposes. It should be defeated. It is no part of the business of a municipality to provide individual citizens with place or room wherein to transact their private business affairs. The city can not engage in the garage business; the act would be ultra vires.

There will be danger that the city will lose title to some of its parks if the proposed ordinance is adopted and utilized. In particular there is danger, in such event, that it will lose Union Square. And, in reality, Union Square constitutes the whole of the meat of the cocoanut.

Union Square was conveyed to the city by Colonel John W. Geary by deed of gift in 1850, for park purposes exclusively, with proviso that if it should be used for other purposes, the grantor and his heirs might reënter and repossess the same for condition broken. Some time in the late '60s and early '70s the park was partly occupied by the Mechanics Fair building, and again, for a short time after the conflagration of 1906 by a temporary structure of the St. Francis Hotel Company, for hotel purposes. In neither case was any question of user contrary to the terms of the grant raised. Neither use, however, was expected or intended to be permanent. The grantee and his heirs would have entire right to waive the condition under such circumstances. But the user proposed (the sub-park garage) would be in perpetuity, would be for a private and not for a municipal purpose and directly contrary to the terms and spirit of the grant. Wherefore, it may be confidently expected, if the proposed ordinance carries and Union Square is attempted to be used as contemplated by the proposal, that there will be an action brought for reëntry for condition broken. (In such event, if such an action is not brought—and it ought to be—then I will believe, as would the preacher, that my knowledge of my brethren of the bar is vanity and vexation of spirit.)

Really there is no reason, save the cupidity of men, why there should be so many autos parked around Union Square; there are plenty of garages nearby on Post and Sutter Streets. Apart from the reasons hitherto urged, and purely on the grounds of "safety first," the proposed ordinance should be defeated. Nobody would propose constructing a powder magazine under the square: yet an auto sub-surface garage would be likely to prove more dangerous. The square is necessarily a congested spot; on every side the streets are double-tracked and street-cars run both ways all day, some of them all night. It is a hotel region; nearby are large dry goods stores. In the midst of the shopping district the sidewalks are traversed all day by pedestrians—sometimes thronged. What with the passing street-cars and autos it is risky enough and difficult enough for a pedestrian to attempt to cross the streets at the street crossings about Union Square now; what sane person would seriously propose to add to that danger a sub-surface garage, which would inevitably attract autos from all over as flies are attracted to treacle?

EDWARD A. BELCHER.

The Campus and the Stadium.

SAN FRANCISCO, October 10, 1922.
DEAR MR. HOLMAN: Your editorial entitled "The Stadium Blunder" in September 30th issue covers the situation very well; and in the issue October 7th, entitled "The University and the Argonaut," you show that the Argonaut's criticisms are constructive in purpose. President Lowell of Harvard voices the same thoughts as follows: "A step which must be taken by the university authorities is the determination of the object of the university and the spiritual meaning which its grounds and buildings seek to express." So you are in good company in your advocacy to place the Stadium (as Yale, Harvard, and Stanford have done) not on the campus.

H. H. SHERWOOD.

Seventy per cent. of all French industrial establishments employing over twenty men each were in the devastated region.

SAN FRANCISCO AND THE FLEET

Great Pacific Base Is a Naval Necessity and This Bay Is the Place for It.

If one were to ask a naval man where, in his opinion, the fleet would base on the Pacific Coast in time of war, he would unhesitatingly say in San Francisco Bay. It would be dangerous to have parts of it here and there. This is the test as to where the base should be, and since we have no base in San Francisco Bay, no time should be lost in building it. No political activity should be allowed to stop it; no local interest should be allowed to interfere with it. It is a measure clearly up to Congress and coming under that particular heading, "To Provide for the Common Defense."

Of more than passing interest to California is the recent announcement of the Navy Department that a board has been appointed for the purpose "of making an investigation of the shore establishments of the navy with a view to determining what changes, if any, should be recommended to Congress in the interest of efficiency and economy."

It will be remembered that in 1916 a commission was appointed to determine, among other things:

- (1) The necessity, desirability, and advisability of establishing an additional navy yard on the Atlantic coast south of Cape Hatteras, and on the Pacific Coast.
- (2) The necessity, desirability, and advisability of abolishing any existing navy yard or naval station.

As was to be expected at the time, the commission recommended expansions in all the existing yards. It also recommended that an additional yard be established in San Francisco Bay.

Let us analyze the situation and conditions as they appeared at the time. We see that:

- (1) The commission was composed entirely of naval officers who no doubt felt great responsibility in connection with their task, commencing as it did on the eve of our entrance in the war, which task continued throughout the first year of our participation in the conflict. Few men with lifelong training in measures connected with the responsibility for the security of the nation will err in underestimating the requirements.

- (2) The commission had in mind the great expansion as expressed in the 1916 programme, which if carried out would have placed the United States in the front rank of great naval powers.

We had no naval base on the Pacific Coast.

Conditions have materially changed since the commission made its report. We have had the Conference on the Limitation of Armament and the resultant treaty. We have abandoned the 1916 building programme. Let us stop to look at the results of the conference. We shall see that some of them are far-reaching in many respects.

We have:

- (1) Limitation of tonnage and size of capital ships.
- (2) Limitation as to size of other units.
- (3) Limitation as to number of airplane carriers.
- (4) Limitation as to size of guns.
- (5) Limitation as to disposal of combatant ships to other nations.
- (6) The agreement to maintain the fortifications in the insular possessions in the status quo.

The last is far-reaching when considered in connection with the responsibility we have assumed in regard to the Philippines. Let us read Article XIX of the treaty: "The United States, the British Empire, and Japan agree that the status quo at the time of the signing of the treaty, with regard to fortifications and naval bases, shall be maintained in their respective territories and possessions as specified hereunder."

A reading of the specifications will show that the territories and possessions to which they refer are insular, and that the agreement includes everything that Japan holds or may acquire outside of the islands of Japan proper; it includes our own Aleutian Islands and everything insular, present or future, under our flag west of the Hawaiian Islands; and it includes Hong-kong and present or future holdings of the British Empire east of 110 degrees of longitude, except the Canadian islands, Australia and its territories, and New Zealand.

To the layman, the above is a collection of diplomatic sentences, but to the naval officer it means that, since Manila and Guam were not strongly fortified at the time of the signing of the treaty, we have given up the right to make them impregnable as naval bases during the life of the treaty. The stepping-stones for the fleet that might have been used on its journey across the Pacific, were we to be called upon to protect the Philippines, may no longer be considered in the light of possible naval bases.

It may be argued that the Philippines need no protection, since the treaty was evolved to prevent wars and bring about the experiment of being good neighbors. To the future must pass the historical record as to the success of the great adventure.

It will be noted that no restrictions have been placed on the construction of submarines, destroyers, and auxiliaries, and some competition may be expected in connection with these classes. It must be realized that there will always be competition in efficiency, in excellence, and in this we must lead the way.

We can not be efficient unless our fleet is operated as a fleet. It takes no military knowledge to understand that, by scattering the component parts, the fleet has no opportunity to develop team play. The individual units may be highly developed, but there can be no fleet training. It is only when a fleet is assembled, drilled, and manœuvred as a unit that it becomes formidable.

How can a fleet be assembled and kept in close association unless it has an adequate operating base? This is manifestly impossible. A great base is, therefore, imperative. Hawaii is now, since the signing of the treaty, the most western outpost we may fortify. Guam, distant 3350 miles from Pearl Harbor, would fall in time of war long before we could reach it and make it sufficiently strong for naval purposes. We must assume also that the Philippines, weakly defended, would be taken, and the task of the United States to retake these islands would become almost insuperable.

If it is our policy to protect our insular possessions, we must not forget that our policy is no stronger than our fleet. Whatever is said in connection with national defense, or national policies, we always arrive in the end at considerations having to do with the fleet. Therefore it is sensible to see that it is a fleet.

There is no authentic case on record where the United States took to heart the lessons of war. The same mistakes have been made after every war the nation has had. If we attempt to get our neighbor interested in the matter, and tell him to read history for the facts, we shall find that he has no time for this form of exercise; and, should he find time, very likely he would get the wrong history.

It were better for us to fortify ourselves with some historical data and be prepared to tell him a few facts. We might look up Novicow's "Essay on War," and learn that from the year 1496 B. C. to 1861 A. D., a period of 3357 years, there were only 227 years of peace as compared with 3130 years of war, or one year of peace to every thirteen years of war. Or we might consult the history of the past three centuries and learn that there have been 286 wars in Europe. We may go on and learn that, from the year 1500 B. C. to 1861 A. D. more than 8000 treaties of peace meant to last forever were concluded, and that the average life of these was about two years.

These things the commission had in mind when it made the recommendation as to the establishment of a naval base in San Francisco Bay, in addition to those mentioned in connection with the naval expansion to be brought about by the 1916 programme. Indeed, the existing establishments on the Pacific Coast were totally inadequate for the navy exclusive of the expansion. It must be recognized that the Mare Island yard has limitations, and that the cost of maintaining a forty-foot channel from the sea to the yard is prodigious.

The new board, as well as the commission above mentioned, will view the entire Pacific Coast line from Cape Flattery to San Diego and note that San Francisco Bay is the only body of water offering a safe and sheltered anchorage for the entire fleet, a fleet of any size; that San Francisco Bay is practically 300 miles nearer to Hawaii, our now westernmost outpost—125 miles nearer than the mouth of the Columbia River—and 300 miles nearer than Puget Sound Navy Yard. It is the logical place of places for the establishment of the navy's Pacific base; it is the strategic location.

Seldom has the navy had such opportunity to go on record before the whole country to prove its case. The fleet is in the Pacific; to be a fleet it must have a base; there is no base at present on the Pacific Coast; the logical and strategical location is in San Francisco Bay; there is no other bay capable of taking the fleet and supplying it.

J. F. DANIELS,
Commander, U. S. N. (Ret.).

JAMESTOWN, R. I., October 12, 1922.

Recent changes in the industrial policy of the Bolsheviks have led some foreign observers who have not seen Bolshevism at work, or who have seen it only superficially, to believe that we are now witnessing the first steps toward the regeneration of Russia, says Emma Ponafidine in the Yale Review. To one who has actually lived under the Soviet régime since the beginning, not as a favored guest, but as a private citizen, it is clear that all these reforms are half-measures. Any one who has experienced Bolshevism in practice has a right to doubt, not only the capacity of the present government to carry them out, but also their sincerity in desiring to do so. The present artificial stimulation of trade and industry should not blind us to the fact that the Bolsheviks have not conceded the existence of private property rights, nor the rights of man as a citizen, as these are understood in all civilized countries. And until these fundamental bases of civilization are recognized, no real progress can be expected in the reconstruction of Russia. If the Bolsheviks should ever be forced to end the reign of terror and admit the rights of property, they would, of course, cease to be Bolsheviks.

The secret of success in life is for a man to be ready for his opportunity when it comes.—Disraeli.

INDIVIDUALITIES.

H. G. Wells' two sons are both keen and successful science students with the ambition to devote their lives to research work.

Mrs. George Sutherland, wife of the successor to Associate Justice Clark, is, though a native of Utah, a scion of the distinguished family of Lee. Her father, John Percival Lee, formerly of Leesburg, Virginia, was a second cousin of the Confederate leader, General Robert E. Lee.

Dean Inge, the "gloomy dean" as he is sometimes called in England, who played so prominent a rôle in the Gentleman with a Duster's latest revelations, is to lecture this winter in Norway at the invitation of the Anglo-Norse Society. Probably the dean will be better appreciated in the sombre north.

Sidney Dark, who is joint editor of the English literary paper, John o' London's, and who was special correspondent for the Daily Express during the Paris Peace Conference, began life as a professional singer and later became an actor. He drifted into journalism in 1899 by writing Green Room Gossip in the Daily Mail. He has published several books on the subject of the stage.

Representative Joseph Walsh recently resigned from the House to accept a Supreme Court judgeship, leaving his secretary, Miss Lily S. Darcy, without a job in Washington. But Miss Darcy has solved the situation by becoming a candidate for the Republican nomination to succeed Mr. Walsh. She is said to have a strong political following in the South Shore district and her friends are betting on her chances to return the winner.

St. John Ervine is an Ulsterman, as admirers of his Ulster plays, "John Ferguson" "Jane Clegg," and "Mixed Marriage," might guess. He fought in France as a lieutenant of the Dublin Fusiliers and was unlucky enough to lose a leg. Besides holding a distinguished position among living dramatists, he is a noted dramatic critic and a witty lecturer. Mr. Ervine is described as a sturdily built man with a high forehead, a prominent nose, and light curly hair.

Mr. Max Pemberton, who was one of Lord Northcliffe's oldest friends, has written a memoir of the deceased publisher, though the official "life" is to be done by Mr. H. W. Wilson, chief leader writer to the Daily Mail since its beginning. Mr. Wilson is the author of a long appreciative sketch of Lord Northcliffe in the new volume of the Encyclopedia Britannica. He has, in fact, been engaged on the biography for several years, and Lord Northcliffe himself provided him with a large quantity of private material.

There is nothing eccentric, bizarre, or Bohemian about Hugh Walpole, the British novelist, who is as popular in this country as he is at home. Walpole was born in Auckland, New Zealand, in 1884, where his father, who has since become the Bishop of Edinburgh, was the incumbent of St. Mary's Pro-Cathedral. Mr. Walpole is most accurately described as a perfect gentleman. He is so well-mannered that it is almost a shock, one commentator says, to find that he is also an intellectual. He dislikes being misunderstood and still more being disliked. No man understands better the gentle art of making friends.

Rudolf Besier, the English dramatist and collaborator with H. G. Wells in the dramatic version of "Kipps," is of Dutch extraction and an admittedly lazy disposition. His acknowledged recreation is "anything that takes the mind from work." He is said to have a boy's eagerness, a boy's power of enjoyment, a boy's determination to put off till tomorrow that which should be done today. Before he launched into his successful career as a playwright he worked for several years in various journalistic capacities, especially for the firm of C. Arthur Pearson, Ltd. He was at one time editor of the Royal Magazine. He has also made his mark as a translator.

Mrs. Coombs-Tennant of Cardiff, Wales, is one of the most distinguished public women of her small country. She has recently been nominated for the Forest of Dean seat in Parliament, and as her nomination on the Liberal ticket is counted almost an election, she may be counted on as the third feminine member of the House of Commons. Mrs. Coombs-Tennant comes of a powerful family of the middle shires of England and is related to the historic Tennant family. After her marriage to a Welsh business man she went to Wales, where since his death she has continued his business and political affiliations. Last year she was elected a justice of the peace in the Welsh village of Glamorgan-shire—the first of her sex to serve in this capacity. She is a member of the Welsh national council for prison reform. Her recent visit to this country was primarily for the purpose of inspecting our model prison system.

Maurice Francis Egan, veteran poet, professor, and diplomat, has been described as belonging to that rare class of person that can do really big things and still always have time for the little things of life. A really mellow personality, he is not modern, in his absence of complexes. Dr. Egan is a Philadelphian, a fact that is often lost sight of because he is so much a citizen of the world. Young Egan was intended for the law, but his journalistic success while in college bent his steps in that direction and for two decades he was novelist, editor, poet, and professor till in 1896 he was called to succeed Charles Warren Stoddard in the chair of English literature in the Catholic University of Washington. His residence in Washington threw him into government circles, and in 1907 President Roosevelt appointed him United States Minister to Denmark. The appointment was renewed through several administrations until ill health compelled Dr. Egan to retire in 1918. His "Ten Years Near the German Frontier" is the literary fruit of his diplomatic career, which was definitely ended by the death of his wife in 1921. Dr. Egan has retired and is devoting himself to lecturing and writing.

OLD FAVORITES.

Opportunity.

Master of human destinies am I!
Fame, love, and fortune on my footsteps wait.
Cities and fields I walk: I penetrate Deserts and fields remote, and passing by Hovel and mart and palace, soon or late,
I knock unbidden once at every gate!
If sleeping, wake; if feasting, rise before
I turn away. It is the hour of fate,
And they who follow me reach every state
Mortals desire, and conquer every foe
Save death; but those who doubt or hesitate:
Condemned to failure, penury, and woe,
Seek me in vain and uselessly implore—
I answer not, and I return no more.
—John J. Ingalls.

Ode to the West Wind.

I.

O Wild West Wind, thou breath of Autumn's being Thou from whose unseen presence the leaves dead
Are driven like ghosts from an enchanter fleeing,

Yellow and black, and pale, and hectic red,
Pestilence-stricken multitudes! O thou
Who chariotest to their dark wintry bed

The winged seeds, where they lie cold and low,
Each like a corpse within its grave, until Thine azure sister of the Spring shall blow

Her clarion o'er the dreaming earth, and fill (Driving sweet buds like flocks to feed in air)
With living hues and odours plain and hill;

Wild Spirit, which art moving everywhere;
Destroyer and preserver; hear, O hear!

II.

Thou on whose stream, 'mid the steep sky's commotion,
Loose clouds like earth's decaying leaves are shed,
Shook from the tangled boughs of heaven and ocean,

Angels of rain and lightning! there are spread
On the blue surface of thine airy surge,
Like the bright hair uplifted from the head

Of some fierce Mænad, even from the dim verge
Of the horizon to the zenith's height,
The locks of the approaching storm. Thou dirge

Of the dying year, to which this closing night
Will be the dome of a vast sepulchre,
Vaulted with all thy congregated might

Of vapours, from whose solid atmosphere
Black rain, and fire, and hail, will burst: O hear!

III.

Thou who didst waken from his summer dreams
The blue Mediterranean, where he lay,
Lull'd by the coil of his crystalline streams,

Beside a pumice isle in Baia's bay,
And saw in sleep old palaces and towers
Quivering within the wave's intenser day,

All overgrown with azure moss, and flowers
So sweet, the sense faints picturing them! Thou
For whose path the Atlantic's level powers

Cleave themselves into chasms, while far below
The sea-blooms and the oozy woods which wear
The sapless foliage of the ocean, know

Thy voice, and suddenly grow gray with fear,
And tremble and despoil themselves: O hear!

IV.

If I were a dead leaf thou mightest bear;
If I were a swift cloud to fly with thee;
A wave to pant beneath thy power, and share

The impulse of thy strength, only less free
Than thou, O uncontrollable! if even
I were as in my boyhood, and could be

The comrade of thy wanderings over heaven,
As then, when to outstrip thy skiey speed
Scarce seem'd a vision—I would ne'er have striven

As thus with thee in prayer in my sore need.
O! lift me as a wave, a leaf, a cloud!
I fall upon the thorns of life! I bleed!

A heavy weight of hours has chain'd and bow'd
One too like thee—tameless, and swift, and proud.

V.

Make me thy lyre, even as the forest is:
What if my leaves are falling like its own?
The tumult of thy mighty harmonies

Will take from both a deep autumnal tone,
Sweet though in sadness. Be thou, Spirit fierce,
My spirit! Be thou me, impetuous one!

Drive my dead thoughts over the universe,
Like wither'd leaves, to quicken a new birth;
And, by the incantation of this verse,

Scatter, as from an unextinguish'd hearth
Ashes and sparks, my words among mankind!
Be through my lips to unawaken'd earth
The trumpet of prophecy! O Wind,
If Winter comes, can Spring be far behind?
—Percy Bysshe Shelley.

THE INFANT R. L. S.

Scotch Logic and Presbyterian Piety Crop Out Early in the Child Mind of Stevenson.

Stevenson loves the world over will observe his birthday this year with even greater interest than usual because of the publication on that day of "Stevenson's Baby Book," a document which is offered the public by Mrs. Lloyd Osbourne, and which John Howell of San Francisco is publishing in de luxe form. Any one might imagine that Stevenson must have been a remarkable and a lovable youngster, and this record of his infancy kept by his mother throughout his first seven and a half years of existence corroborates the guess. From the point of view of the psychologist of genius it does more—it foreshadows Stevenson's life. Parents be warned! If your young hopeful does not give signs of greatness in infancy the chances are very much against his acquiring it in later life, as one might acquire golf or a taste for politics. An entry in the diary when "Smout," as he was called throughout his babyhood for some unexplained reason, was less than three indicates his exceptionalness. This was in 1853:

May 20th: Smout at Free Church Bridge of Allan with Cummy and very good. He got a sweetie before he went in and kept it in his hand the whole time. The servant in our lodgings thinks he should be "put in the paper" as something extraordinary.

It might be urged that many a doting nurse thinks likewise. But read "The Baby Book" and count the harbingers of Stevenson's literary facility.

A great French educator has said that as a child is trained up to his seventh year so will he be for the remainder of life. This dictum probably refers more particularly to the normal person, for it seems likely that Stevenson's genius would have bloomed in any case, with nurture or without it. But he was fortunate in having understanding parents, a scientific father and a mother with more than usual interest in child psychology, as her entries in "The Baby Book" show. Perhaps we should give some picture of Smout's infancy from the beginning, before even he could have shown signs of genius. The record of his birth is as follows:

Place of Birth: 8 Howard Place, Edinburgh.
Time of Birth: Wednesday 13th, November 1850 at 1:30 p. m.
Color of Eyes: Blue at first turning to hazel.
Color of Hair: Very fair, almost none at first.
Nurse's Name: Mrs. Sayers.
Doctor's Name: Dr. Malcolm.

We will omit the record of teething, a phenomenon that may be of paramount interest to the principals involved, but which we have always thought of as of small significance to any one else. But it is interesting to know that at the age of ten months he stood alone for the first time and began to evince a decided partiality for eggs. Still earlier events are recorded under "Early Incidents," as follows:

First Journey: To Colinton Manse at three months old.
First Crawl: June 27th backwards, 30th forwards.
First Walk: October 4th walks three steps alone. 11th fairly off.
First Word: June 10th, Bab-Bab.

We fail to see how the date was settled on for the last incident. Or does the fond mother mean it was the first time he uttered an audible sound?

An interesting entry is under "Names," for these begin to reflect the personality that was to be R. L. S. Probably no man less than a semi-royalty was ever more benamed than he. For example, the Britannica informs one that he was baptized "Robert Lewis Balfour Stevenson," but that he dropped the Lewis Balfour at about the age of eighteen and called himself "Robert Louis Stevenson." The article adds, however, that he was always known to his family and friends as "Louis." And to posterity he belongs to the rare class of persons who are recognized by their initials, so familiar are his three best-known names. Quite a complicated subject, made more so by this entry in "The Baby Book":

Surname: Stevenson.
Christian Name: Robert Louis Balfour.
Pet Names: Boulhasker, Smoutie, Baron Broadnose, Signor Sprucki, otherwise, Maister Sprook and many many others, but Smoutie stuck to him till he was about fifteen.

To make this early record complete we should add that he was vaccinated July 18, 1851, when he was eight months old.

So much for statistical facts. With them well in mind one launches into the charming entries that Mrs. Stevenson so eagerly kept, almost, one would think, with a foreknowledge of their future importance. There is an embarrassment of choices, but it is appropriate in reviewing this birthday book to begin with the note made on his first anniversary:

November 13th: Our darling boy a whole year old today. He is running about famously, calls Tom "Mama" and warms his hands at the fire, blows out lights and talks a great deal in an unknown tongue besides numerous other accomplishments of a like nature.

One of the outstanding facts of Stevenson's early history is that he was an exceptionally good boy. That, too, foreshadowed the blameless life he was to lead. Or was the latter perhaps the result of his excellent training in youth? His mother seems to have been a model parent, unceasing in her devotion to Smout. As became good Scotch Presbyterians, he was given the Bible as soon as he was out of his cradle. And again we query, did this not have a great deal to do with the purity of his literary style? But let the text speak for itself:

September: Smout begins to be fond of stories and sometimes asks to be told about "the big stick," meaning Cain and Abel, and Daniel among the "growlers" are his favorites.

That was before he had reached the two-year mark, and from then on his infancy seems to have been fairly saturated with biblical lore and religious precept. He was very fond of church. The following also refers to a date before his second birthday:

November 7th: Smout in Colinton Church with Cummy. He sat in the front Gallery as grave as a judge the whole time. When asked who preached, he said "Gatty and a man" (the precursor). When he was shown my picture with curls, which I have since given up, he said "Mama brushing her hair to make it all tidy." When he saw his shadow on the wall, he said "The shadow hands all dirty."

And, indeed, if he had not been fated by parental intention for the family profession of civil engineer, he might well have been slated for the pulpit. An entry in 1853 is as follows:

April 17th: Smout at church and behaved very well. Johnnie and Noona are quite surprised because Smout says prayers out of his head. This is because he puts in the name of everybody in the house of his own accord.

And we have already heard how the servant in the lodgings thought he should be "put in the paper" because of his unusual church behavior. But the church as a profession for Smout seems never to have entered any one's head, despite the fact that it was his "favorite occupation":

July 24th: Smout at Pilrig Church with Cummy when he came home he told us "The furthest down minister (the precursor) roared as loud as ever he could."

Smout's favourite occupation is "making a Church." He makes a pulpit with a chair and stool and reads sitting and stands up and sings by turns.

But though this strain is more marked in him than even in the children of other God-fearing houses, it was not the only remarkable feature of Stevenson's childhood. He was a great observer and a great reasoner. We think the following for a five-year-old beyond even the run of bright children's mots:

March 15th: Smout's syllogism "Mama, has a match gas?" "Why do you ask dear?" "Because Papa said flame was gas, now a match has a flame."

He even applied logic to religion, as these several entries will testify, in the years '53, '54, and '56 respectively:

April 3d—When I was telling Smout about the naughty woman pouring the ointment on Christ he said "But Mama why did God make the woman so naughty?"

March 26th: When I read "There is beyond the sky" to Lou he said "but why had God got a hell?" I said "Are we good or bad people?" Smout "I think you and Papa are good." I said "But what kind of hearts have we?" Smout "I think you have a nice one."

March 30th: Smout was distressed to hear that sheep and horses did not know about God and said "I think somebody might read the Bible to them."

January 13th: Smout heard about fearing God, he said "Why should people fear him as if he was going to kill them?"

February 24th: I said something to Smout about Christ having died to save him, he said "Did He die to save me?" "Yes." "Me? Well then, doesn't that look very much as if I was saved already?"

From which we again conclude that piety was the dominant note of the youthful Stevenson's life, though it may be that his religious mother stressed this side of her offspring's character. Reasonable he was in all his reactions. Two entries that show him in the more normal aspect of clever babyhood are from the year 1855:

January 2nd: Smout asked to have his name put on a book. I said "Mr. Smout is on it." He replied "Oh but you must put it's his book or somebody will say 'och, och, och, Mr. Smoutie has been writing his name on his Papa's books.'"

January 8th: Lou "Do the flies make honey?" Ma "No dear." Lou "Then do they make butter like butterflies?" Ma "Butterflies don't make butter." Lou "Then what is the use of them?"

And a later entry from the same year is suggestive of resourcefulness and reason:

July 7th: Smout was asked "What would you do if you were left on a desert island?" S. "I would run away." "But if there was water all round?" S. "I would come away in a ship." "But if there was no ship?" S. "I would send a letter by post." "If there was none?" S. "I would sit down and take a hearty greet" (cry).

It was also in the year 1855 that Stevenson's first poetic effort is recorded. There must have been others, but in their preoccupation that he should be an engineer his parents probably thought them not worth saving:

September 1st:

SMOUT'S POETRY
"No sun is in the sky
While night comes on
Then stars and moon come out
And then another day
The sun comes out again."

However, they eagerly noted his engineering proclivities:

February 23d: When Tom told Smout about putting lines of stones for the wheels of carts, he said "that was a very good idea and when we come to that bridge I'll show you the railway and it's just the very same thing. And I'll show you another thing that I want to know the meaning of, and that's why they put soda water bottles on the telegraph."

His scientific interests were no doubt inherited from a line of engineering forebears, but undoubtedly their manifestation was due to Stevenson's keen interest in everything about him, whether it was Bible stories, the changing seasons, the "elinphault" at the zoo, or his playmates at the seashore. One of his early scientific observations must have been in the back of his mind when he wrote the lines in "The Child's Garden of Verses" that begin "In winter I get up at night and dress by yellow candle-light," for he thus voices his early opposition to daylight saving:

April 18th: Smout cannot understand the days getting longer and says "he would rather go to bed at the 7 o'clock that used to be."

Sadly enough, it is not only the accomplishment and the renown of Stevenson's career that are foreshadowed in his youthful history. The ill health, the inherent weakness that was to conquer him in his early forties, was also with him from the beginning. He was one of those children who are nursed carefully through a precarious childhood. Evidently his first serious illness was in 1853 when he was about two and a half:

March 10th: Dear little Smout very ill with an attack of croup. He had on a mustard plaster on his chest and two leeches on his dear little foot—when he saw the blood he said "Cover it up, cover it up." The bites had to be burned with caustic. He was very patient, dear little man, but accused Cummy of hurting him.

March 17th: Better but pallid.

And again in 1854:

January 24th: Smout seems very tired, he came to me and said "Do you think I'm looking very ill?" It turns out infantile remittent fever.

And later in the same year:

December 2nd: Home from Morningside where we had been for a month on Louis' account. He said he was glad to get home as we had not a nice sideboard at Morningside. It just had a place for setting things on and then another place for setting things on and that was all.

December 8th: Lou said "You can never be good unless you pray" when asked how he knew, he said with great emphasis "Because I've tried it."

December 11th: Lou is improving, but requires to be kept very quiet. When forbidden to run about with one of his cousins, he looked thoughtful for a minute, then threw away a toy he had in his hand, and said with great indignation, "I can't be bothered with such fiddle de dee and nonsense."

And so it goes, the record of one illness after another, not the usual ailments common to all children, but just "illnesses." In 1857 there is this illuminating note:

February 6th: Lou is still so feverish that we are alarmed. Tom gets Christison to see him. He says it is nothing but bronchitis, that he should soon be better, but this house (1 Inverleith Terrace) is bad for him it is so cold from being an end house.

Like all real geniuses, Stevenson had a touch of the mystic about him. We should not have been surprised if like Joan of Arc he had had familiar voices in childhood. As it was he is said to have dreamt that "he heard the noise of pens scratching," and we have seen that he was a firm believer in the potency of prayer and much preoccupied with it. Witness again:

May 9th: Lou was naughty today, and after he went to bed he said to Cummy "I would like to be good, I think I must say my prayers more earnestly, but if I forget, will you do it for me?"

March 21st: When I told Smout about the way the Americans used their slaves, he said "I think God might send them a punishment."

But though illness and a religious mother made his infancy mystical they did not succeed in making him effeminate. His physical bravery—like his mysticism and his poetic tendencies—was with him from the beginning. He was only two at the time of the following entry, and there are many others indicative of the courage and cheer for which his name stands as much as for literary style or imagination:

January 25th: Smout at the Zoological Gardens—highly pleased and very courageous—he went close to the "Elinphault" and even in the tiger house said "My not frightened."

One of the last entries in the "baby book" rings again the ominous knell of future weakness of health. It also sketches, as do so many of these thumb notes of Stevenson's early days, one of the other and brighter phases of his life:

November 13th: Dear Lewie spends his 7th birthday in bed having taken bronchitis but he is much comforted by the companionship of his Skye terrier dog called "Coolin" which arrived safely from the West Coast.

So we can but end as we began—if you are a genius you show it early, which is not much consolation for the rest of us, unless we believe in the law of compensation and, like Browning, value the years after forty.

The "Baby Book" will contain an exact facsimile reproduction of the pages of the original book, accompanied by the printed text of the manuscript to make it more easily read. A baby picture of Stevenson inevitably serves as frontispiece and there is an introduction by Katherine Durham Osbourne, who was entrusted with the little book on Mrs. Stevenson's death and who has now offered it for publication for the first time. Both Mr. Howell, the publisher, and Mr. Nash, the printer, have done a beautiful piece of work worthy of the admiration of Stevensonians for all time.

STEVENSON'S BABY BOOK. Being the record of the sayings and doings of Robert Louis Balfour Stevenson written by his mother, Margaret Isabella Balfour Stevenson. San Francisco: John Howell, Publisher; $20. (Copyright, 1922, by John Howell.)

Wait not till you are backed by numbers. Wait not until you are sure of an echo from a crowd. The fewer the voices on the side of truth, the more distinct and strong must be your own.—W. E. Channing.

BANKING AND INVESTMENT NEWS.

San Francisco bank clearings for the week ending October 14, 1922 (five days), were $140,300,000; for the corresponding week of last year, $127,000,000; an increase of $13,300,000.

The net operating income of the Class 1 railroads of the United States totaled $52,579,799 in August, according to reports just filed by the carriers with the Interstate Commerce Commission. This represented a return, during the first eight months of this year had a net operating income of $471,183,000, compared with $306,063,600 during the corresponding period last year. This is at the annual rate of return of 4.07 per cent. on their tentative valuation, compared with 2.64 per cent. during the first eight months in 1921. Operating revenues for the eight months' period totaled $3,528,502,000, a decrease of 3.2 per cent. compared with the same months last year, while their operating expenses totaled $2,806,501,600, a decrease of 9.7 per cent. compared with the eight months last year. The railroads during that period this year failed by $223,135,500 of realizing a 6 per cent. return. During the eight months last year they lacked $388,255,500 of that return.

Complete reports show that the carriers in the Eastern district had a net operating income in August of $14,929,990, compared with $35,402,300 during the same month last year, which would be at the annual rate of return of 1.52 per cent., or $44,059,000 below a 6 per cent. return. The operating revenues for the carriers in the Eastern district totaled $227,016,000, a decrease of 4.9 per cent. under those for one year ago, while their operating expenses amounted to $196,821,900, or an increase of 4.3 per cent. over August, 1921.

The railroads in the Southern district had a net operating income in August of $4,618,000, compared with $4,422,000 during the same month last year. Their operating revenues totaled $54,321,300, or a decrease of 2.4 per cent. under the same month last year, while their operating expenses totaled $46,083,000, or 4.6 per cent. under those of August last year. The net operating income of those roads was at the annual rate of return of 2.74 per cent., or $5,477,000 below a 6 per cent. return.

Complete reports show that the carriers in the Western district had a net operating income in August of $33,031,700, compared with $50,335,000 in August last year. This was at the annual rate of return of 3.95 per cent. on their tentative valuation, which lacked, however, $17,121,300 of a 6 per cent. return. The operating revenues for those roads totaled $192,539,300, a reduction of 8.9 per cent. compared with the same month in 1921, while their operating expenses amounted to $144,245,000, a reduction of one-half of 1 per cent. under August one year ago.

Forty-nine roads in August had operating deficits. Of this number, twenty-eight were in the Eastern district, eight in the Southern, and thirteen in the Western district. In July forty-seven had operating deficits.

Tabulations as to earnings in August are based on the reports of 197 Class 1 railroads representing a total mileage of 235,096 miles.

Governor Nestos of North Dakota predicts legislation dissolving the Bank of North Dakota. North Dakota farmers have seen the state made bankrupt by Nonpartisan League leaders seeking to make money out of state-supported banks, stores, newspapers, and other enterprises.

"Our big crop this year will give a stimulus, and North Dakota will soon work back to normal." Undoubtedly a bill to abolish the Bank of North Dakota will come before the next legislature and I expect it to pass. The State Bank deposited $50,000 on the average in each of thirty-six small banks controlled by men in sympathy with the Nonpartisan League, while the 700 banks that did not subscribe to its principles were lucky if they got $5000. This kind of favoritism disgusted people with political banking. Everything is looking up in the state now that we have got back to political sanity."

Figuring that "another is born every minute," league supporters are trying to put over the $500,000,000 Water and Power Act in California.

This would make the North Dakota experiment look like a children's party from a financial standpoint.

The political distribution of state funds that would be indulged in in California under the act would make the distribution of $5000 and $50,000 deposits in North Dakota banks look like mere pin money.

Of course the North Dakota scheme was to be "self-supporting," just as the Water and Power Act is promised to be.

But the people of North Dakota are now paying the losses.

Would California fare any better?

Railroads are cutting fares to compete with motor vehicles operating on publicly maintained highways.

Indications are that under such competition train service will have to be cut. The railroads face the same problem in carrying freight.

The public will serve itself best if it saves the railroads from unprofitable operation and bankruptcy.

Steel tracks and powerful trains are the real process for handling inland traffic, and if the railroads are starved by lack of traffic, the public service will suffer.

In the situation there is this query: Should the public tax itself to maintain highways on which, for private profit, motor vehicles operate on a free right-of-way, while the railroads operate on an expensive privately built right-of-way and in addition pay heavy taxes on the valuation of such right-of-way?

The right-of-way and its maintenance is one of the heavy costs of railroad operation. It is a cost that motor vehicles competing with the rail lines escape, save for the comparatively light tax now imposed.

Overloaded trucks do more than anything else to destroy the highways, and the highways cost the taxpayer a huge sum. To save the public highways from destruction will cost another huge and constantly growing sum.

The problem is how to balance the relations between the railroads and commercial vehicles carrying traffic on the free highways, and is a very delicate and important question.—Industrial News Bureau.

Within the last two weeks six different Liberty bond issues sold below par, United Kingdom 5½ per cent. bonds dropped to the lowest levels reached since last April, and corporation investments sold off anywhere from substantial fractions to more than three points. What is the matter with the bond market that prices should give way all around in that manner? says Commerce and Finance.

Four reasons suggest themselves:

(1) The bond market was a little top-heavy as a result of the uninterrupted upward movement which had lifted the average value of representative issues twelve points above prices of a year ago. Such an extraordinary advance was bound to tempt investors who bought bonds when they were cheap to take profits, particularly as many believe that the upward movement has culminated.

(2) The European war scare has unquestionably had an unfavorable influence on bonds just as it has had on stocks and on foreign exchanges. Not that this country is likely to be forced into active participation in the Turkish affair, but rather because of the enormous financial stake we have in Europe. Before the war Europe was a creditor of the United States through an investment of upwards of $5,000,000,000 in American securities. Now the shoe is on the other foot. Europe has liquidated those securities, while we have taken on an enormous load of European debt in the form of an $11,000,000,000 war loan which is unsecured and unfunded, a commercial credit which has been estimated as high as $6,000,000,000, and an investment of about one and one-half billion dollars in European bonds, good, bad, and indifferent. It is idle for us to assume that we have no vital interest in European politics with an investment abroad of nearly $20,000,000,000.

(3) The approaching refunding operation of the Treasury Department has perhaps been the principal reason for the unsettlement of bond prices. Both because of the size of the transaction, which it is expected will involve an emission of $1,000,000,000 of bonds, and because no one excepting perhaps the Secretary of the Treasury himself knows just what the terms of the issue will be, there has been much selling of Liberty bonds. That selling was precautionary, lest the terms of the new

To Yield 7.22%

Willow Vista
Land & Cattle Company
First Mortgage 7%
Sinking Fund Gold Bonds

Send for circular

issue should prejudice the market for outstanding bonds. As Liberty bonds are the pivot around which other investments revolve, a decline in them naturally had the effect of causing values of those other bonds to react also.

Two distinct reports have been heard in Wall Street regarding the treasury's plans. One is that a $1,000,000,000 long bond bearing a 4 per cent. coupon and carrying tax-exempt features will be offered. The other is that a $500,000,000 issue of 4½ per cent. long-term partially tax-exempt bonds will be made and that the balance of about $500,000,000 required to refund the billion dollars of 4½ Victory notes called for December 15th will be financed with a short-term note issue bearing a lower rate of interest. The recent weakness of Liberties was interpreted to mean that the investment banking fraternity expects to see a 4½ per cent. bond offered. A bond bearing the higher rate and running for twenty to thirty years would hurt the market for the outstanding 4½ per cent. Liberties, which mature in a much shorter period. On

INVESTMENT SECURITIES

Government, Municipal and Corporation Bonds in denominations of $100, $500, and $1000 for the investment of Banks, Trust Funds, and Individual Investors. Inquiries Invited.

HUNTER, DULIN & Co.

THE SECOND FLOOR—
256 MONTGOMERY ST.

Los Angeles
Pasadena

San Francisco

Oakland
San Diego

the other hand a 4 per cent. bond would tend to enhance the attractiveness of the outstanding issues.

It is quite probable that Wall Street's nervousness over the forthcoming refunding operation is unwarranted. Hitherto Mr. Mellon has proved himself without a peer as a judge of the money market. He may be depended upon to make no mistake when it comes to the most important piece of financing which his administration has been called on to perform. It is certain that he would not wittingly do anything which would prejudice the market for outstanding Liberties. The writer's guess is that if Mr. Mellon comes to the conclusion that the market would not absorb a 4 per cent. bond, he will put out a short-term note and defer long-term financing until a more favorable time.

(4) Banks which were large buyers of

Private Wires
Coast to Coast

E. F. Hutton & Co.

MEMBERS
NEW YORK STOCK EXCHANGE
HUTTON BUILDING
Montgomery and Bush Sts.
HOTEL ST. FRANCIS
DEL MONTE HOTEL

NEW ISSUE

to Yield

6¼%
Tax Exempt

The obligation of an established
agricultural community

FREEMAN
SMITH
&
CAMP
CO.

SECOND FLOOR
FIRST NATIONAL BANK BLDG.
Douglas 2121

on an annual basis, of only 2.65 per cent. of their tentative valuation, the lowest since May, 1921.

In August last year their net operating income totaled $90,160,200, which was at the annual rate of return of 4.54 per cent., while in July this year it was $69,239,000, or 4.04 per cent.

The railroads failed by $66,657,800 to realize a 6 per cent. return on their tentative valuation. They also fell short $61,689,500 of a return of 5½ per cent., the figure fixed by private wires to principal financial and commercial centers.

STRASSBURGER

STOCKS · BONDS
COTTON · GRAIN
COMMODITIES

133 Montgomery Street
San Francisco

Members San Francisco Stock & Bond
Exchange & Chicago Board of Trade
— Douglas 2220 —

the Interstate Commerce Commission in its decision of a few months ago.

The railroads in August had operating revenues totaling $473,877,000, a decrease of 6.3 per cent. compared with the same month last year, while their operating expenses amounted to $387,150,000, an increase of 1.3 per cent. over the same month last year. Factors affecting this decrease in revenues and the increase in expenses were the coal miners' and railroad shopmen's strikes and the decrease of approximately 10 per cent. in freight rates made effective on July 1st.

Complete reports showed that the railroads

McDONNELL & Co.

And Other Leading Exchanges

633 Market St., at New Montgomery

SAN FRANCISCO

TELEPHONE SUTTER 7676

N. Y. Office, 120 Broadway

L. J. Angeles, 634 So. Spring St.

PRIVATE WIRES

CARSTENS &amp; EARLES, INCORPORATED

GOVERNMENT, MUNICIPAL
AND CORPORATION BONDS

ESTABLISHED 1891

Ground Floor

California Commercial Union Building

San Francisco

Telephone Douglas 6050

SEATTLE

LOS ANGELES

SPOKANE

SAN FRANCISCO

H. M. Hinchman W. B. Wentz W. L. W. Miller
Hinchman, Wentz & Miller
 General Agents
Fire Automobile
INSURANCE
Liability Plate Glass Compensation
30 Leidesdorf St. SAN FRANCISCO
 Telephone Sutter 437

Liberty bonds during the last twelve months to invest funds temporarily idle owing to business depression are converting their bonds into cash and loaning the money for commercial and industrial purposes at a considerably higher rate than they could obtain from Liberties. The transactions referred to have been made wholly without prejudice. They are good banking business.

The feature of the market for new financing last week was the sale of an issue of $75,000,000 Federal Land Bank bonds at prices to yield 4.30 to 4.15 per cent. They were snapped up in forty-five minutes, largely because they were sold slightly below the actual market for such bonds. So many subscriptions were received for them that the opening and closing of the books was a mere matter of form. Land bank bonds, while not a government security, are issued under the authority of the government, have been pronounced instrumentalities of the government by the Supreme Court and are wholly tax exempt. They are acceptable as security for and interest. Payment will be made at the Equitable Trust Company of New York. These notes are part of an issue of $3,000,000 originally offered in July, 1920.

The bond market at its present stage is sensitive to outside influences, and responded to a pessimistic interpretation of the Near East problem by a reaction. Selling has not gone far, however, nor does it appear that it will. In fact, a rally has already occurred which has wiped out the majority of the losses. This only goes to show that fundamental factors after all are the determining ones. So long as credit is easy at home and general business conditions improving, investors have no cause for alarm. If sound American bonds are not safe then nothing offers a safe investment, says Forbes Magazine.

The autumn is always a season of heavy credit requirements, but the advent of the Federal Reserve Banks has well eliminated the strain. Formerly higher money rates came regularly with the harvesting of crops, and bankers, borrowers, and investors expected this and acted accordingly. This year the demand has been subnormal because of lower prices, it is true, but nevertheless commercial needs are considerably above those of the spring and summer. The increased demand so far has resulted in no upturn in money rates and only a slight decline in the ratio of reserves to liabilities.

Just what may be expected as to the future course of rates for commercial paper is dependent upon several factors, the principal one being the progress which is made in business recovery. The Federal Reserve system and its rediscount rates do not reflect the demand for banking accommodation for two or three months after it materializes. Local banking institutions are able to take care of the early requirements. It is probable that their resources are being taxed pretty close to capacity at this time and if the demand is sustained or augmented the Federal Reserve system will soon begin to show it by an expansion in the volume of bills rediscounted and a gain in circulation. It is to be hoped that the demand does continue, and if a moderate decline in the Federal Reserve ratio is reported it should be taken to mean that business is of such a proportion to require banking aid and hence on the road to health.

There is a very wide margin of safety which can be traversed before there is any occasion to look for difficulty in obtaining all the credit necessary for legitimate needs. If business reaches the extent held out for it money rates will no doubt advance, but the advance will not be large. The banking resources are now far greater than at any time during the war, while commodity prices are substantially lower and as great a volume of business as that of 1920 could be financed by a much smaller volume of credit than required at that time.

First-grade bonds are selling as high as warranted by current credit conditions. The outlook does not indicate easier credit, but possibly a slight tightening later on and little more marketwise can be expected of these issues. There are, however, no substitutes which are available when all factors are taken into consideration. Speculative bonds are still attractive and should work higher.

E. H. Rollins & Sons and the William R. Staats Company are members of a syndicate offering $10,000,000 Southern California Edison Company general and refunding mortgage 5 per cent. gold bonds. Price 95 and interest, yielding about 5.40 per cent. These bonds are exempt from personal property tax in California.

The Southern California Edison Company owns or controls and operates properties for the generation, transmission, and distribution of electric light and power. The system includes generating plants with a present total capacity of 376,700 horsepower, of which 249,600 horsepower is hydro-electric, and operates in ten counties in Southern California, the territory served either directly or at whole sale having an area of over 55,000 square miles and a population of about 1,500,000. Among 312 cities and towns served are Los Angeles, Pasadena, Riverside, Long Beach, Santa Barbara, San Bernardino, Redlands, and Porterville.

An issue of $333,000 of Lewiston Orchards Municipal Irrigation District Nez Perce County, Idaho, serial 7 per cent. gold bonds is being offered by the Freeman, Smith & Camp Company at prices according to maturities to yield 6 1/4 per cent., income tax exempt. The bonds are dated July 1, 1922, and are due serially from May, 1933, to May, 1942. These bonds are payable from direct taxes ranking ahead of any private liens and first mortgages, including mortgages securing Federal Farm Loan bonds.

Domestic and irrigation water is served the entire district, which is in a high state of cultivation and productivity. The assessed valuation for general taxes is nearly double the entire indebtedness of the district. The value of the lands is appraised at 4.39 times the bonded debt. The lands of the district have been irrigated since 1908. The district is a community of fine homes, well-kept orchards and productive gardens, with fine streets, and a population of about 700, and immediately adjoins the city of Lewiston, with a population of about 7000.

Analogies do not afford the premises upon which sound investing should be based, but they do serve to emphasize several points of interest and value. Investors have been used to seeing high-grade railroad stocks on a 7 per cent. or 8 per cent. yield basis for so long that they are apt to forget the position which these securities occupied under pre-war conditions which seem likely to recur. To one buying New York Central, for instance, around 80, par, with a yield of but 5 per cent., suggests profit-taking. Yet in the last bull market in rails, that of 1909, New York Central sold to a level of 147, where the yield was 3.40 per cent. And this was following the depression of 1907, when the stock dipped to a low of 89, says Forbes Magazine.

If the proportions developed in the railroad market of 1909 were warranted, a much sounder foundation has been laid for a bull market of equal extent at this time. New York Central earned 6.20 per cent. on the outstanding stock in 1907, 5.08 per cent. in 1908, and 7.66 per cent. in 1909. For the first seven months of the current year it earned at the annual rate of 11.72 per cent. In point of earnings there is a much greater expectancy of an increase in the dividend rate now than in the former market. And in 1900 no consolidations of importance were pending as now.

Railroad legislation during the last several years has been highly salutary, the results of which protect the investor against misconception in connection with actual earnings through the appearance monthly of an income statement; funds can no longer be diverted from stockholders in the fashion formerly possible and practiced; nor are death-dealing rate wars permissible at this time under equalized tariffs.

Atlantic Coast Line is reporting earnings at the highest rate for many years. From not earning fixed charges in 1920, this road has recovered to a position where these are being covered more than two and one-half times over and net earnings applicable to the common are equivalent to over 16.50 per cent. Control of the Louisville & Nashville is owned, this road in turn having a half interest in the Chicago, Indianapolis & Louisville (The Monon), and jointly Atlantic Coast Line and L. & N. lease the Georgia Railroad, giving the company control over 11,784 miles of trunk lines. Annually Atlantic Coast Line receives interest and dividends on its investments aggregating close to $4,000,000, a figure within less than $1,000,000 of the combined preferred and common stock dividend requirements. Louisville & Nashville itself is earning at the rate of approximately 18 per cent. on its stock and could increase the present 7 per cent. dividend rate, more than half of the additional disbursement going directly to Atlantic Coast Line.

The Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fé owns and operates over 11,500 miles of track between Chicago and the Pacific Coast. The first stretch was opened in 1870, and between then and 1889 expansion was rapid, so rapid, in fact, that it got into financial difficulties and a reorganization was necessary. In the depression of 1893 it again suffered severely and went into bankruptcy. E. P. Ripley was placed at the head of the company's affairs in 1896 and under his guidance Atchison has worked into one of the strongest positions occupied by any American railroad. Dividends have been paid regularly on the common stock since 1901, 6 per cent. being maintained from 1910 to date. Earnings are now running at the annual rate of about 10.50 per cent. on the common against a slightly higher rate earlier in the year, unusual expenditures being made for maintenance during the summer months.

A decision on the part of Chesapeake & Ohio to issue preferred stock can be interpreted as indicating the very high order of this road's credit and earnings outlook. The amount of preferred stock to be sold at this time is not large, approximately $12,500,000, upon which the dividend requirement is less than $1,000,000 annually. Proceeds from the sale of new stock are to be used for constructive purposes and should result in additional earnings sufficient, not only to cover the dividend requirements, but also to show a balance applicable to the common stock. Averaging the months of low production of coal against the heavy movement prior to the strike, C. & O. is earning at the rate of about 14 per cent. on the common. Such a rate of income would allow of a 6 per cent. dividend and the probabilities of an increase are augmented by the provisions of the 5 per cent. convertible bond issue, which provide for conversion of $40,000,000 of bonds at 80 for the stock up to April 1, 1923. As the bonded debt is about 4 to 1, conversion is desirable from the standpoint of sound finances.

Like other roads operating in the same district, Chicago and Northwestern has not yet gotten into its normal earnings stride. For the first six months of 1922 the common earned at the annual rate of about 7 per cent., but a decided improvement took place in the latter part of this period and it is being maintained. The preferred stock is participating—after 7 per cent. has been paid on both issues, the preferred is entitled to 3 per cent. additional and after 10 per cent. has been paid on both they participate equally.

Almost 75 per cent. of the total traffic of Delaware & Hudson is made up of coal, and the decline in production of both anthracite and bituminous from April to the latter part of August seriously interfered with earnings. So far this year the road has scarcely earned fixed charges, but a great part of the loss will be made up in the autumn. Normally, D. & H. should earn about 14 per cent. on its stock.

Illinois Central is another railroad which has accomplished new financing recently by a preferred stock issue instead of bonds. Dividends on the preferred come ahead of the common, but the earning power of the new capital is more than sufficient to carry itself. Making allowance for preferred dividends, the common is earning at the rate of over 18 per

LOGAN & BRYAN

STOCK, BOND, COTTON, COFFEE,
SUGAR AND GRAIN BROKERS

DIRECT PRIVATE WIRES

Pacific to Atlantic—U. S. and Canada

MEMBERS:

NEW YORK STOCK EXCHANGE
 BOSTON STOCK EXCHANGE
 CHICAGO STOCK EXCHANGE
 NEW YORK COTTON EXCHANGE
 NEW YORK COFFEE EXCHANGE
 NEW YORK PRODUCE EXCHANGE
 NEW ORLEANS COTTON EXCHANGE
 PITTSBURGH STOCK EXCHANGE
 CHICAGO BOARD OF TRADE
 MINNEAPOLIS CHAMBER OF COMMERCE
 WINNIPEG GRAIN EXCHANGE
 ST. LOUIS MERCHANTS EXCHANGE
 SALT LAKE CITY STOCK EXCHANGE
 LOS ANGELES STOCK EXCHANGE
 PHILADELPHIA BOURSE
 MONTREAL BOARD OF TRADE

SAN FRANCISCO BRANCH OFFICES AT 401 Montgomery Street

and
Merchants Exchange Bldg.

Telephone Garfield 3000

R. C. JENKINS, C. S. LAWRENCE,
 San Francisco Managers

cent. The preferred is convertible, share for share, into common stock, and as the common pays a higher rate conversion of the entire issue is likely at an early date.

Norfolk & Western also carries about 75 per cent. coal out of its total loadings, but its was not affected materially by the recent strike, because most of its traffic originates in non-union districts. Earnings are running at the rate of over 16 per cent., which has rarely been exceeded. Dividends have been paid since 1901 at varying rates, 7 per cent. being maintained from 1918 to the present time.

The proposed Water and Power Act is really a constitutional amendment which, if adopted by the voters at the election next November, would automatically increase the bonded indebtedness of California six times. It proposes the issuance of $500,000,000 of state bonds to put the state into the electrical power business.

Why should California incur this huge debt, or any debt, to go into the power business. Are there no legitimate purposes for which the state can use its credit?

Private capital is ready to take the risks of hydro-electric development, and has done so with such good effect that now California

BONDS
$15,000,000
Cudahy Packing Company
 15-Year Sinking Fund 5 1/2% Gold Debentures
 Due October 1, 1937
George H. Burr & Co.
 KOHL BUILDING
 SAN FRANCISCO
 NEW YORK BOSTON PHILADELPHIA SCRANTON
 LOS ANGELES ATLANTA CHICAGO ST. LOUIS
 CLEVELAND DETROIT PITTSBURGH SEATTLE
 "A National Yet Personal Service"

government deposits and are legal for savings banks in thirty-six states. But they are not wholly free from objection. They are secured by mortgage on farm lands and everybody knows that value of land is not stable. Great care must be exercised in land loans lest equity become impaired by depreciation in value of the land.

George H. Burr & Co. announce that the S. S. Kresge Company will redeem on January 1, 1923, all the outstanding serial 7 per cent. gold notes, due January 1, 1923 to 1926 inclusive. Notes due January 1, 1923, will be paid at part and interest, while those due January 1, 1924 and 1926, will be paid at 102

Sound Investments

WM. R. STAATS CO.
 has for 35 years safeguarded the interests of California investors by recommending bonds which afford the highest yield consistent with first-class security.

WM. R. STAATS CO.

Established 1887

Alexander Bldg., Montgomery St., cor. of Bush

SAN FRANCISCO

Telephone Kearny 391

LOS ANGELES SAN DIEGO PASADENA

INVESTMENT SECURITIES

COMMERCIAL PAPER

AND

ACCEPTANCES

—

GOVERNMENT

MUNICIPAL

AND

CORPORATION

BONDS

BOND & GOODWIN & TUCKER

AMERICAN NATIONAL BANK BUILDING
 SAN FRANCISCO
 LOS ANGELES SEATTLE PORTLAND

loads the world in the production of cheap and plentiful power.

As our population increases we are going to need our credit for schools and highways and bridges and public buildings and for the other facilities that a state is bound to provide for its people. Private capital is not going to build schools and roads for California.

Why should we waste our credit where we do not need it?

Why should California impair its credit, to the detriment of its future legitimate needs, when it has nothing to gain?

Voters having due regard for their own welfare and that of their state will vote No on Amendment No. 19 at the election next November.

Dickens found the name Pickwick on the old Bolt-in-Tun inn. Mr. Landfear Lucas has in his possession an 1838 poster: "Bolt-in-Tun, Royal Mail and Coach Establishment, Fleet-street, London. Day and night coaches to Bath and Bristol, through Marlboro' and Devizes. White Hart Day Coach. Morning, 7. Regulator Night Coach. Evening, 6. Proprietors, Robert Gray and Moses Pickwick and Co."

The brain of the gorilla is only about one-third the weight of a good-sized human brain.

Bonds for Investment

MUNICIPALS IRRIGATION DISTRICTS CORPORATIONS

Specialists in Safety

Anglo London Paris Company

One Sansome Street San Francisco
Phone Kearny 5600

The French American Bank

OF SAN FRANCISCO

108 SUTTER STREET

Commercial—Checking—Savings

Resources Over $16,000,000

A General Banking Business Transacted

Commercial and Personal Checking
Accounts Solicited

Savings Accounts receive interest at the rate of 4 per cent. per annum

SAFE DEPOSIT BOXES $3.50

OFFICERS

Leon Buequerez.....President
T. M. Dupas.....Vice-President
J. A. Bergerot.....Vice-President
W. F. Duffy.....Vice-Pres. and Cashier
A. Bousquet.....Secretary
J. T. Irillary.....Asst. Cashier
Chas. L. Ebner, Jr.....Asst. Cashier

Member Federal Reserve System and
Associated Savings Banks of San Francisco

The San Francisco Savings and Loan Society

(THE SAN FRANCISCO BANK)

SAVINGS COMMERCIAL

526 California St., San Francisco, Cal.

MISSION BRANCH.....Mission and 21st Streets
PARK-PRESIDIO DISTRICT BRANCH.....Clement and 7th Aves.
BAIGHT STREET BRANCH.....Baight and Belvedere Streets
June 30th, 1922

Assets.....$76,170,177.18
Deposits.....72,470,177.18
Capital Actually Paid Up.....1,000,000.00
Reserv. and Contingent Funds.....2,700,000.00
Employees' Pension Fund.....385,984.61

A dividend to depositors of FOUR AND ONE-QUARTER (4 1/4) per cent. per annum was declared for the six months ending June 30th, 1922.

BOOKS ON THE TABLE.

Our present preoccupation with the omniscient and ubiquitous flapper and all the trappings of her day has evidently given Mr. Hergesheimer the idea for a book in which the post-bellum young person is only present as a filip to an earlier and, we agree with Mr. Hergesheimer, more gracious era. There are many ways of writing a novel, and the old ways are generally the best. In "The Bright Shawl," Mr. Hergesheimer has used the device of reminiscences—also, used, we think less successfully, by Miss West in the second book of "The Judge." There are no hard and fast rules for that extraordinary phenomenon, the telling of a story, but certainly a man's reminiscence of his youth is one of the most natural and in the case of "The Bright Shawl," most effective that could be employed. If Mr. Hergesheimer had related this romance of the Cuban revolt in the third person, plunging us back without introduction to the 'nineties and their very foreign problems, nine readers out of ten would have passed up the book as something of not vital interest. Instead, his yarn is spun from the peak of the present and its pattern is invested with a richness and a perspective that it would certainly have lacked otherwise. Not for anything would we mar the reader's enjoyment in that colorful picture of Cuban civilization at the time of the revolt by sketching it ever so slightly here. Suffice it to say that "The Bright Shawl" is a distinguished piece of work and a story of gripping interest—two attributes not easy to combine in one novel.

Learning is certainly becoming popular. Recently a library of classics has come to our attention which sell for the truly nominal sum of 10 cents each. How "Poor Richard," how Lincoln, would have rejoiced at such an exchange of wisdom for a few pence. The "Ten-Cent Pocket Series," as it is called, is published by the Haldeman-Julius Company of Girard, Kansas, and though we have not had the opportunity to inspect the 284 volumes that have so far been issued in this democratic series—and if its price is popular its subject matter is catholic—the "New Library of Thirty" is all that one could hope for. It ranges from Confucius to Oscar Wilde and includes philosophy, poetry, biography, natural history, drama, fiction, and archaeology. A veritable university course. And, though the rather trite classics such as "Ghosts" and De Maupassant are included—doubtless for the benefit of contemporary Poor Richards who might not get them otherwise—many of these little pamphlets will add to any one's store of information. There is, for example, William H. Hudson's "Herbert Spencer: His Life and Works." Hudson as a biographer is not familiar to every one. And then there are the indispensables, Plato, Johnson, Confucius. We recommend the "Ten-Cent Pocket Series" to all kinds and conditions of men. R. G.

Letters of Ambrose Bierce.

"Good-by—if you hear of my being stood up against a Mexican stone wall and shot to rags please know that I think that a pretty good way to depart this life. It beats old age, disease, or falling down the cellar stairs. To be a Gringo in Mexico—ah, that is euthanasia!"

Ambrose Bierce, one of the first editors of the Argonaut, wrote this paragraph in 1913, a few months before his unexplained disappearance. In his last letter, sent from a small Texas border town, he said that he intended to enter Mexico, and to pass through the country to the south; and it is probable that he lost his life there, with one of the revolutionary factions. Doubtless he did little to avoid death: a year or two before he was sailing every day in a canoe through the rough waters of the lower Potomac and writing to his friends that, after all, "nothing matters." A disappointed and sombre gayety hovered over the last years of his solitude.

The "Letters of Ambrose Bierce," to be published shortly by the Book Club of California, uncover a lonely, proud, and turbulent personality. There are some two hundred of them, written during the latter part of his life, from the early 'nineties to the year of his death; and they form a chain of the most intimate and revealing glimpses into the character of this man who was known to the public primarily as a merciless and deadly writer of satire. Addressed to close friends, many of them to George Sterling, and filled with the ebb and flow of a rich inner life, they tell the story of the period when Bierce was still a journalist in San Francisco, and of the years that followed when he was living in Washington, writing for magazines and newspapers. The man that emerges from the pages is kindly, whimsical, occasionally bitter, always sincere. He is the master writing to younger men and criticizing their work, the friend jealous of his friendship and giving it warily. The figure is not tolerant and humanistic: Bierce was too rigid in his convictions for that, too stiffly Anglo-Saxon, a sort of journalistic Lancelot storming out his hates and loves; but it is the figure of a man who lived passionately and fully, who plowed fearlessly into life, and reached a certain haughty calm, far beyond the "genteel tradition" that has made pallid so much of our American writing. One feels again and again in reading these letters that Bierce was a great man whose greatness remained cruelly locked away in some hidden corner of his soul.

The introduction to the book, written by Bertha Clark Pope, offers a valuable biographical sketch. We can only wish that we had letters of Bierce dating back to those early days in California, where he came after the civil war, having tossed up a coin to determine his destiny, or a few describing his life as a journalist in London. Mrs. Pope has written with sympathy and insight, and many of her critical estimates are just. In addition to the introduction, a chapter of reminiscences by George Sterling, for twenty years Bierce's intimate friend, contains a number of anecdotes that paint externally the man whose spirit comes to life so warmly in the letters. The book will contain about four hundred pages, and will be a masterpiece of printing from the press of John Henry Nash.

This volume is one of the most important that the Book Club of California has published. A few years ago a collection of Bierce's short stories appeared, and before that the club brought out some tales of Bret Harte, volumes of poetry by George Sterling, Edwin Markham, Clark Ashton Smith, and Ina Coolbrith, and an exhaustive bibliography of the history of California and the Pacific West compiled by Robert Ernest Cowan. In addition to California writers, the club has published Sir Richard Burton's "The Kasidah," "Nationalism," by Sir Rabindranath Tagore, and is preparing an edition of "The Song of Songs," translated by the late Morris Jastrow.

The directors of the Book Club of California are: W. R. K. Young, president; Alfred Sutro, vice-president; Albert M. Bender, chairman of the committee on programme and publication; Robert Ernest Cowan, P. A. Drew, John Howell, John Henry Nash.

Notes of Books and Authors

Joseph Conrad has a new novel, "The Rover," to be published in the spring.

A well-known Fleet-Street journalist has just finished a book on G. K. Chesterton, whose cousin he is.

A complete limited edition of the writings of H. G. Wells, in thirty volumes, will be published by Scribner's in this country and Cassell's in England.

Compton Mackenzie, whose book, "The Altar Steps," has recently appeared, is at work on another to be called "The Seven Ages of Woman," which is to appear next spring.

The newly-discovered Guy de Maupassant manuscript, about which there have been rumors, has the title "Dr. Heraclius Gloss," and it is being translated for English publication this autumn.

Lady Russell, the brilliant author of "Elizabeth and Her German Garden," is to have a new book out this fall, a novel, called "The Enchanted April." Her husband's autobiography is also to appear this autumn.

Bliss Carman's "Later Poems" (Small, Maynard & Co.) has already gone into a second printing. Another volume of poetry from this same house, "The Norsk Nightingale," is announced as its fourteenth printing.

"The Americanization of Edward Bok" has now reached its twentieth printing, Charles Scribner's Sons announce. There has been, on the average, almost one printing for every month since the book first appeared in September, 1920.

It is said that if Frank Swinnerton were not a best seller he could still earn a good living as a mimic, so marked is his gift in this line. Mr. Swinnerton is reddish fair with a little red beard that is not sufficient to provoke cries of "Beaver." He is an intimate of Arnold Bennett and H. G. Wells.

Certainly James Russell Lowell never filled his days with longer working hours than does A. Kingsley Porter, who now occupies "Elmwood," the poet's old home in Cambridge. The historic study has early and late been the scene of Mr. Porter's labors since the beginning of the summer. He is busy with a stupendous work on "Romanesque Sculpture of the Pilgrimage Routes," which the Marshall Jones Company plans to bring out in December. It will contain approximately 1300 illustrations printed on all-rag paper by the gelatine process and published in eleven portfolios, the descriptive text and index to appear as a separate volume.

The poetry and drama portion of Macmillan's fall list includes a number of outstanding names. Edwin Arlington Robinson's "Collected Poems" will appear in a new form in four pocket-size volumes. Pedraic Colum's new collection of verse, "Dramatic Legends and Other Poems," will be published at that time, and Monroe and Henderson's "New Poetry" will be published in a new edition which includes their selection of poems published during the last five years, thus bringing the anthology up to date. There will be a play by John Masefield, called "Melloney Holtspur"; or, "The Pangs of Love," as well as a new poem of Masefield's, called "The Dream"; a comedy by St. John Ervine, entitled "Mary, Mary, Quite Contrary," and a new Andreyev play, "The Waltz of the Dogs."

"The Bloom of Life" ("La Vie en Fleur"), Anatole France's latest book, will be published in an English translation by Dodd, Mead & Co. during the spring of 1923. There is no book in French, or in English, at least by Anatole France, known as "The Swallow Under the Roof" (L'Hirondelle Sous le Toit), although such a title was named in some of the press dispatches last summer when an announcement was made of the Vatican's ban on all of Anatole France's works. The French publishers of M. France have advised Dodd, Mead & Co., his American publishers, that "no such book has been written, or is being written."

"Three Asses in Bolivia" is the title of a new travel book which the Houghton Mifflin Company will soon publish. It is written by one of the "Three Asses," a young Englishman, Lionel Portman, who possesses a fresh sense of humor and a keenly observant eye. The book has appeared already in England, where the dignified London Times unbent long enough to say some nice things of it: "The most diverting volume of travel which has appeared since Mark Twain's 'Innocents Abroad' set all America and England laughing. Mr. Portman is that admirable type, the born traveler and explorer, one of the true progeny of Ulysses, and in the most unward accident finds marrow of mirth and laughter."

The Gerhart Hauptmann Festival at Breslau is over, writes a correspondent from Germany to the Manchester Guardian. It is probable that no German writer ever had such a tribute. His chief plays were sumptuously staged. Some of the first German actors and actresses took the parts. The tribute was organized by the state, partly from state funds but mainly from private subscription. The entire press has been full of adulation of the poet. Portraits of himself, his wife, and family have been in every illustrated paper. Herr Häisch, the former minister of education, having written numerous laudatory articles about him, has now published a super-laudatory book on his life and work. To some extent the festival has been a piece of republican propaganda. The heads of the German Republic have always been at pains to demonstrate that they, too, appreciate the arts, that they, unlike the old imperial régime (which patronized only the makers of pompous glorifications of Kaiserdom), understand and honor true genius. And then Germany must at all costs have a national poet, while in his attempt to look like Goethe Hauptmann is only trying to emphasize the continuity of German literary tradition.

Used Where Power and Service are Demanded

"Aristo" Motor Oils and "Union" Gasoline are the choice of those companies who have kept an accurate record of hauling costs and automobile operation.

You'll find them on sale wherever motor cars and motor trucks go.

Look for
This Sign

Union Oil Co. of California

REVIEWS AND NOTICES.

Youth and the Open Door.

Text-books of psychology are usually so technical that the layman derives little pleasure or benefit from reading them, but applied psychology is becoming as popular latterly as applied aesthetics have been for a generation. Witness the furor caused by Emile Coué. Of a less sensational nature, but equally applicable is a book by George Ross Wells, professor of psychology on the Hartford Seminary Foundation. "Youth and the Open Door," as he calls his book, is a study of the relation of habit and character to success. The subject was originally undertaken with the object of making a survey of the psychology of study, but the author realized that this limitation would lessen the usefulness of his work. The scope was accordingly broadened to make it applicable to all young people, whether they were technically students or not. "Youth and the Open Door" is the result, and it is at once sound psychology and good advice. If its precepts concerning habit-forming, memory, reason, and character were followed it is safe to say intelligent youth would be better able to capitalize its equipment than if it had never been guided by this analysis of adolescent psychology.

YOUTH AND THE OPEN DOOR. By George Ross Wells. New York: E. P. Dutton & Co.; $2.

A Needed Review.

There comes to the Argonaut a handsomely printed initial number of an American quarterly review entitled Foreign Affairs, with an editorial staff that promises a liberality in policy and a breadth of survey not always present in our general periodical literature. The editor is Archibald Cary Coolidge, Harvard lecturer at the Sorbonne, Harvard exchange professor at the University of Berlin, and author of "The United States as a World Power." The managing editor is Hamilton Fish Armstrong, and there is a good editorial advisory board. The initial number covers a wide field, from an article on "The Tacna-Arica Controversy" to a discussion of further economic consequences of the peace now raging in Europe. Among the contributors are Elihu Root, Charles W. Eliot, André Tardieu, Eduard Benes, and the anonymous political writer known as K. It is the evident intention of Foreign Affairs to inform Americans about just that, and the necessity for it is certainly upon us. It is published by the Council on Foreign Relations, Inc. The office of its business manager is at 25 West Forty-Third Street, New York. Single copies are $1.25, and the subscription price is $5 yearly.

Two Wonder Books of Chemistry.

The latest of Jean Henri Fabre's popular books of science to be translated into English is "The Wonder Book of Chemistry," which has been Englished by Florence Constable Bicknell. The great naturalist has followed the device already familiar to his readers of informal conversation between "Uncle Paul" and his two small, fact-absorbing nephews. This human interest motif, to use a much-abused term, makes this simplified scientific research of engrossing interest to children who would not otherwise be held by a discussion of chemical elements and reactions. Uncle Paul's method of teaching is the Socratic one of drawing out the wisdom already acquired by his young pupils. In addition to being an excellent primer of chemistry for both youngsters and grown-ups "The Wonder Book of Chemistry" should furnish many a tip to parents and educators.

Another simplified manual of chemistry, also adapted to beginners of all ages, is "Wonders of Chemistry"—the wonderfulness of this science seems to be more commonly predicated than that of any other—by A. Frederick Collins, author of "The Radio Amateur's Handbook." The latter is more the typical text-book than Fabre's is, and it is rather more concerned with the applied chemistry of commerce. It has the advantage of the latest research, though Fabre's book has been brought up to date by footnotes. The two together would make an excellent chemical library for the young student.

THE WONDER BOOK OF CHEMISTRY. By Jean Henri Fabre. New York: The Century Company; $2.50.

WONDERS OF CHEMISTRY. By A. Frederick Collins. New York: Thomas Y. Crowell Company; $1.60.

Poland Reborn.

"Poland Reborn" is not an impassioned book. Rather it is hopeful, prayerful (in the best sense), and first and last, "factual." It sketches Poland's tragic past, but not tragically; it says little of Paderewski and much of Pilsudski, whom the author does not greatly admire, and it describes the foundation of the present republic. A chapter is devoted to Pole and Ruthene; another to the three Lithuanians; another to Dantzig, whose importance as a port to Poland is much emphasized. Agrarian reform, relief and reconstruction, upper Silesia, the Jews, the intellectual and artistic life of Poland are other topics.

The best chapter of the book, perhaps, is the last one, "Poland and Europe." Poland, says the author, should be, at least until that far-distant day when Europe shall be the United States of Europe, an armed nation. "In making her a secure and effective bar to the political as well as the economic exploitation of Russia by Germany," says she (the author is a woman), "we should automatically complete the guarantee upon which the safety of France depends." In short, Britain and France notably must stand back of Poland, especially until such time as the Bolshevik menace is removed in Russia—until autocracy, in shape of a Czar or Lenin, has perished. By that time Russia will be smaller than she once was and anti-imperialistic, and Germany will be indisposed to lay her unmailed fists on Poland. In short, with the death of force an economic peace will succeed and Poland will trade both with her neighbors and the Allies. The solution sounds reasonable and even possible. Brilliant, artistic, art-loving Poland may now produce fewer aristocrats, but its divine average will rise and its literature reflect peace, comfort, and food rather than war, terror, and dragon's teeth.

POLAND REBORN. By Roy Devereux. New York: E. P. Dutton & Co.; $6.

New Books Received.

FAIR HARBOR. By Joseph C. Lincoln. New York: D. Appleton & Co.; $2.

By the author of "Galusha the Magnificent." MEMORIES OF A HOSTESS. Drawn chiefly from the diaries of Mrs. James T. F. DeWolfe Howe. Boston: The Atlantic Press; $4.

THE CATHEDRAL. By J. K. Huysmans. New York: E. P. Dutton & Co.; $2.50.

Translated from the French by Clara Bell. Edited with a prefatory note by C. Kegan Paul.

DUST OF DESIRE. By Margaret Peterson. New York: Robert M. McBride & Co.; $1.75.

A story set in an untamed corner of East Africa.

IT'S THE WATER.

Prepared with Glacier Water from Shasta Springs
AT ALL DEALERS
SHASTA WATER COMPANY

An extra measure of power with every gallon drawn from this pump,

Gasoline, mixed with air, makes gas, and gas makes
power.

How much power depends primarily upon how completely the gasoline vaporizes in the carburetor.

"Red Crown" vaporizes 100 per cent. Every atom mixes with many times its weight of air and combusts cleanly and powerfully, leaving a minimum of carbon residue on spark plugs, valves and cylinder heads.

That's why you get more power and mileage and a sweeter-running motor when you use "Red Crown."

Fill at the Red Crown pump
—at Standard Oil Service Stations, at garages and at other dealers.

STANDARD OIL COMPANY
(California)

JOHN HOWELL

IMPORTER BOOKS PUBLISHER

Rare Books and First Editions

Libraries Bought and Sold

28 Post Street Union Square
Sutter 3268

SAN FRANCISCO

HAVE YOU READ

SIMON
CALLED PETER

By Robert Keable

Author of "The Mother of All Living," etc.

IT IS probably the most widely talked of novel published during 1922.

$2.00 (postage extra)

E. P. DUTTON & CO., 681 5th Ave., N. Y.

The Wright Magazine

("Not for self, but for others")

Only $1.00 a Year.

Besides a serial and short stories it contains departments for literary and music, women and children, farm and garden, a people's forum, manuscript markets, radio notes and other interesting features.

THE WRIGHT MAGAZINE
P. O. Box 894 Little Rock, Ark.

The White House

The Valley of Content

By BLANCHE UPRIGHT

A San Francisco author's first novel
—the dramatic version to be produced in New York this season, by
Marjorie Rambeau. $1.90

Book Dept., Main Floor.

Raphael Well & Co. Inc.

All Books that are reviewed in the
Argonaut can be obtained at

Robertson's

222 STOCKTON ST.
Union Square San Francisco

THE HOLMES BOOK CO.

707 Market St. 152 Kearny St. 22 Third St.
Largest variety of new and second-hand books
in the city. A visit to our stores will convince you of the truth of this assertion. We buy libraries or single books for cash. See us
before selling. Phone—Douglas 3283.
SAN FRANCISCO, CAL.

IF YOU ARE A REAL
BOOK-LOVER

Spend a pleasant hour in the real "Old Book
Shop" at 2 TILLMAN PLACE, OFF
GRANT AVENUE—below Sutter.

Rare Old Books Bought, Sold and Hunted For by GEORGE HARGENS (formerly of the White House)

BOOKS
AT

PAUL ELDER'S

239 POST ST., SAN FRANCISCO

NEWBEGIN'S BOOKSTORE

358 POST STREET SAN FRANCISCO
Opposite Union Square

A Shop known for its courteous service, and a pleasant place to browse.

Information on books, authors and editions gladly given. Books bought and sold. Buyer will call. Telephone Douglas 2810

MILNE AT THE PLAZA.

They are running the most serious and ambitious of the Milne plays at the Plaza this week, "The Truth About Blayds" being, as no doubt every one knows by this time, the dramatic rehearsal of a long and wonderfully sustained literary imposture, and the way it worked out after the confession and death of the impostor.

The play is notable for its originality, in spite of the frequency with which the theme of literary imposition turns up in fiction. But the feature in this play that particularly surrounds the idea with dramatic significance is the fame attached to the illustrious name of the pretender, who was considered the foremost of Victorian poets; and also the dignity and distinction with which the old man, beginning as a young one, carried the cheat over and through the long, long years.

In the first act the old man, throned in his wheeled chair, is brought in by his attentive daughter-nurse, and to a literary light in the school of younger writers he musically reviews incidents and many meetings with the great in his long and honored life.

And this honor that was paid him has developed in the ancient poet qualities that seemed to make him personally worthy of his fame. His household reveres him, in spite of the amusing flippancy of the younger generation, who writhe under the yoke of his firmly sustained authority.

Life, with him in the household, is arranged something like a ritual. And then, toward the close of the act, we discover two interesting points in the psychology of the impostor: one, that he feels proud of the gallant and dignified bearing with which he has, for seventy years, carried his deception through; and two, that, like many of the secret sinners of earth, he longs for the luxury of confession; a confession that was really a means of selfish relief, and that should never have been made.

This first act is the best and most interesting of the three, although there is a very amusing and illuminating interplay of self-interested human nature when the revelation, following the old man's death, was made in the second act.

For it is made plain that after the first daunting perception comes to the survivors, all but the muddled daughter who can not make her belief in her father's genius, and Isobel, his devoted nurse, who has sacrificed her life to tend the flickering flame of his genius, catch eagerly at the idea of his confession having been founded on a hallucination. For not only is there the destruction of an honored name and fame involved, but there is the loss of money; for not only on the fruits of the genius of the youthful poet who was his friend has Blayds build his fame, but with them also he has won a fortune ample to support his family in solid, middle-class comfort. So here is a problem to face, and Isobel is the only one who cries, "Tell all! Give all!"

As to how the problem is met theatre-goers who take in the play may find out for themselves. They will see the strange situation excellently acted by the Plaza company, Irving Pichel giving a remarkably fine impersonation of the nonagenarian, who looked distinguished even in his decay, and whose demeanor to his little family world had something of the fine and legitimate condescension of royal personages.

Mr. Pichel's make-up alone was admirably done, even a close survey proving it impermeable. But his manner, the tones of his voice, aged, weary, yet strong in character, and the regard of one who for more than half a century had been a personage of note wherever he went, all these details proved the artistic conscience and ability of a fine actor.

Beside old Blayds was ever the figure of his ministering daughter Isobel, who was portrayed by Lois Austin with such a mingling of art and nature as made her seem the very shape and essence of that gentle blend of daughterliness and motherliness.

Harold Minger gave a very clever and amusing impersonation of the self-important son-in-law who is Oliver Blayds' secretary, and purposes to be his biographer; and Minetta Ellen was also well in the family picture as the fussy conscientious elder daughter and obedient Griselda to the secretary.

The two young persons who are the issue of this marriage strike an amusing note of irreverent modernity in the solemn spaces of the lofty Victorian room; very correctly conceived and carried out, by the way, to suggest Victorian restraint, and a cool remoteness from the warm and genial standards of our time in house decoration.

Phyllis Blake and Dan Totheroh acted the rôles of the youthful pair, the players easily suggesting the differing ideas and standards of the present independent and self-assertive generation, and the twentieth-century restlessness under restraint which Isobel, a faintly faded flower of the Victorian era, had not known. For Isobel belonged to the romantic times when young people were not so determined on "living their own lives," but with romantic devotion would sacrifice themselves for a chimera.

Most admirably is the difference of ideas indicated between these two generations, both by the author and the players. True to herself and her era, Isobel would let everything go when the revelation was made. True to themselves, the young saplings of the twentieth century would seize and hold all the earth about them that they might individually flourish and expand.

Royce, the reverential author, also belongs to Isobel's generation, and, as played by Sam Hume, the cool deliberation of his manner, as compared to the jaunty self-sufficiency of Dan Totheroh's young Conway, also indicated the difference in ideas and standards. Mr. Hume playing his rôle with an effect of dryness, in spite of a faint touch of inward satire, that somewhat removed the resurrected romance of Royce's youth from our full and gushing sympathy.

But for that matter the fault of the play is a lack of dramatic tension in the last act, the first one being the best. Even in spite of the faint mortuary flavor, due to the great age of Oliver Blayds suggesting an imminent exit to eternity, is that act the best. And for that matter the faint suggestion remains, after the exit is accomplished, for in the dead man's departure, under the shadow of the painful revelation, does not inhere the speedy resignation and recovered cheerfulness with which the survivors of a nonagenarian face life again.

This faint flavor of mournfulness is unlike the gay fantasy of the Milne we knew. However, the sense of humor survives, more particularly as indicated in the characters of the two grandchildren, but most particularly in that of the son-in-law, a fussy and fatuous personage, very cleverly played by Harold Minger, who stands for that voice of self-interest in our hearts that bids us look out for number one even if we must go through some very lively mental and ethical gymnastics in order to save our face.

There is evidence of excellent stage management, although there were moments when I questioned if the tempo were not a little too deliberate. I am not disposed, however, to press the point, for a reposeful deliberation in acting a play of serious theme is only attainable with intelligent players, and if that were a fault, they couldn't have had a better one, one of the most trying faults of the type being that over-nervous haste which deprives histrionic words and effects of the background supplied by the pause.

"THREE WISE FOOLS."

This melodramatically sentimental comedy is again going strong at the Columbia. Its strength lies in its mixture of heart and comedy interest. We know perfectly well, as we look on, that it is fairy-tale drama; the kind that heightens human virtues, softens human frailties, and is cheerfully disdainful of the probabilities. But theatre-goers love the brand.

So we look on benevolently while "the three wise fools" cuddle Sidney, the adopted waif, kiss her hand and give her pearls, knowing subconsciously that in real life they would all more than probably be the victims of senile infatuation.

The author, Austin Strong, has a very happy gift for ingratiating comedy, and Tom Wise ably backs him. The audience is kept in a delightful condition of melting-heartedness and exhilarated amusement. Nobody cries but Sidney, in the lachrymose moments, and although Mary Ricard has something of a talent for histrionic weeps and for an anguished countenance that makes an effective accompaniment, Sidney is, on the whole, just agreeably showery.

The company is well selected, Tom Wise and Burke Clarke doing the most effective work of the "three wise fools," and Sidney's nice, earnest, constant young man being most agreeably impersonated by Kenneth Thomson.

Tom Wise's comedy-dimpled countenance supplies enough changes to stock a weather bureau, and the rotund comedian amused the audience so much that indications are for a run as good as if the now familiar piece were a new attraction.

MUSICAL COMEDY.

Well patronized musical comedy of two acts proves a present light-heartedness on the part of San Franciscans. "Kafinka" at the Rivoli, composed by Friml, ranks higher musically than "Take It from Me" at the Curran, but both are alight with opportunities for mirth. Lillian Glaser and John Van are already popular vocalists, Ferris Hartman, who seems to have drunk of the fountain of youthful geyety, supplies an exhilarating quantity of fun, and the audience chuckles over the well-tangled plot complications.

They even have a plot and a love interest in "Take It from Me," which is an entertaining specimen of the laughable, well-dressed comedy foam and froth that was born in America. And Young America loves it and is still constant.

A smart, lively, active group of competent young players keeps the Curran ball merrily rolling, the chorus, which is young, pretty, and sartorially trig and gay, playing an influential rôle in the line of general attractiveness. The music matches the pace of the comedy, which never seems to let up, even the occasional sentimental intervals providing a laugh.

And the principals are all good, the women's costumes, fashionable and handsome though they are, not outshining their ability to tackle their acting job.

The dancing is particularly good, that of Robert Hart proving a mine of delight to the audience, for this specialist in double-joint effects dances as he breathes, by instinct, and his comedy is almost as good, and certainly as irrepressible, as his remarkable dancing.

AT THE ORPHEUM.

Two playlets in one bill add considerably to the interest of the average vaudeville programme, "1999" being a sufficiently amusing satire on the masterful femininity of the day to add quite a filip to the fun at the Orpheum. Dorothea Sadlier amusingly represents the alarming female who uses cave-man methods in persuading, or rather commanding, the love of the meek 1999 male who is her chosen vassal. William de Mille has consummated the fun of his satire by the simple expedient of putting into the mouth of the stay-at-home man who mends the family linen the words usually uttered by a rebellious and domesticity-ridden woman. It works, and both men and women laugh at the predicament of the young husband who complains so bitterly of woman's inhumanity to a conventionally meek and well-bred male.

The other playlet is a Cressy affair. It goes, however, as slowly as creeping molasses. The best of the comicities on this week's bill is Harry Watson, Jr., in his telephone scene. "The Young Kid Battling Dugan" is very, very funny, but the telephone scene, which contains that touch of nature which makes the whole world kin, is so uproariously

PLAYERS THEATRE

Bush St., near Gough Telephone West 3321

Week Commencing Monday, Oct. 23

Messrs. Travers and Rainey present

"ROMEO AND JULIET"

With EVELYN VAUGHAN, WILLIAM S. RAINEY, EMELIE MELVILLE, and a Distinguished Cast

Evenings at 8:30; $1 and $1.50. Mats. Tues. and Sat. at 2:30; 50c and $1.

CURRAN THEATRE

Geary Street Near Mason Phone Prospect 9300

Matinee Saturday Third Big Week Starts Tomorrow First Big Eastern Musical Show of the Year

"Take It From Me"

"IT'S SOME SHOW" Prices—Nights, 50c to $2.50; Sat. mat., 50c to $2. Next—"THE MAN WHO CAME BACK."

COLUMBIA THEATRE

Geary at Mason Phone Franklin 150

Final Week Begins Monday, Oct. 23 Matinees Wednesday and Saturday John Golden Presents a Great Star in a Great Play

TOM WISE

In Austin Strong's Comedy

"3 WISE FOOLS"

Mon., Oct. 30—"SIX-CYLINDER LOVE."

MATINEES 25 and 50c DAILY

EVENINGS 25c TO $1.25

Except Sats., Suns. and Holidays

ALWAYS A GREAT SHOW

SMOKING PERMITTED IN DRESS CIRCLE AND LOGES

amusing that it hurts. It works us up to such an explosive cackination that one's protesting sides almost crack, and the comedy just escapes precipitating us into tragedy.

These are the high lights of the programme, to which should be added the dancing act of Ivan Bankoff and Beth Cannon.

Bailey and Cowan, although their act is rather over-elaborated, furnish such an abundance of physical ebullience with their music that they win, and the rest of the programme is made up of comedy nuts, and the alleged "Art Impressions" furnished by Bessye Clifford, a symmetrical young lady upon whose shapely proportions are thrown photographed costumes whose colors are a series of riots.

JOSEPHINE HART PHELPS.

ESMOND'S

"THE CAKE SHOP"

253 Grant Ave.

We offer a large variety of pies, cakes and pastries—all of the highest quality and flavor.

"ECCLES CAKES" Our Specialty

To Add 24 Million Gallons Daily to Our Water Supply:

Calaveras Reservoir in the Alameda County system of the Spring Valley Water Company is being increased in storage capacity, and

A new aqueduct is being constructed to carry Calaveras water to Crystal Springs, the largest reservoir in the San Mateo County system of Spring Valley Water Company.

Spring Valley builds the new aqueduct as far as Irvington, and

The City and County of San Francisco builds it from Irvington to Crystal Springs.

This Irvington-to-Crystal-Springs section of the new aqueduct will be the Bay Division of the Hetch Hetchy conduit, and will eventually carry Hetch Hetchy water to Crystal Springs.

Besides financing its own part of this project, Spring Valley pays the interest on the Hetch Hetchy bonds sold to build this Irvington-to-Crystal-Springs line, relieving all other San Francisco taxpayers of this burden, and will also pay the City for the use of the line.

Work is in progress at both ends of the new aqueduct.

While Spring Valley is raising Calaveras Dam, the City is driving the Pulgas Tunnel to Crystal Springs.

Through this program of co-operation the daily water supply of San Francisco will be increased from 42 to 66 million gallons, and our growing city will have an abundance of water for years to come.

Graphic portrayal of all this work is the feature of the Spring Valley exhibit at the California Industries Exposition at the Civic Auditorium.

SPRING VALLEY WATER COMPANY

California in Pawn!

That's what the proposed additional $500,000,000 bonded debt would do

ON the ballot at the election November 7th will be a proposed initiative amendment to the State Constitution miscalled the water and power "act". This act provides: (1) For the creation of a new, appointive commission, to be named the water and power board, with authority to issue bonds of the State of California to the amount of half a billion dollars, and to invest the money virtually without restriction in water and power projects, yet unspecified, and in any incidental business. (2) That the board may hire such employees as it desires and fix their pay, without regard to the civil service. (3) That the board may also fix its own rates and, under the loose language of the act, it will be possible for the board to give preferential rates to favored communities. (4) That, in the event that the ventures in which the money is invested prove unprofitable the losses are to be made up out of taxes. Or bonds may be issued to pay expenses of operation or maintenance or interest on prior issues, thus pyramiding the state's debt. This act is an unlimited deficiency bill.

CALIFORNIA now has a bond debt exceeding that of any state except New York and Massachusetts. Should the additional 500 millions be issued the bond debt of California will amount to more than forty per cent. of the aggregate bond debt of all the states of the Union.

In 1921, California paid in national, state and local taxes in excess of a million dollars a day. Her tax bill exceeded by four million dollars the gross value of all her crops, and California is an agricultural state.

CALIFORNIA CANNOT STAND THE DRAIN.

Our prosperity cannot long stand such a drain. Taxes are a drag on every form of industry. And everybody pays taxes, if not directly, at least in his rent, his grocery bill, his light and water bills.

It is nonsense to say, as promoters of the act do, that there will be no increase in taxes because the ventures in which the money will be invested will pay for themselves. Who guarantees that these speculations will pay for themselves? The act makes ample provision for payment by tax-payers if the ventures result in losses instead of profits.

Nor is there any necessity or demand for such a speculation with the taxpayers' money. We have in California an abundance of power, cheaper than anywhere else in the country, served by private companies whose rates, financing and service are strictly regulated by public officials under the public utilities law. We now have the benefits of public ownership without its liabilities.

Adoption of the act would put all industry and every community in California under the heel of a political board with power to build up an impregnable political machine. It would impede the industrial growth of the State.

TAKE A LESSON FROM NORTH DAKOTA.

You have not forgotten that in 1917 the Non-Partisan League, a name under which the socialists masquerade, put the state of North Dakota into the wheat and flour business and into incidental banking and merchandising businesses.

Yet in three years the Non-Partisan League experiments with government in business had brought the state to a condition of economic prostration. Taxes trebled. It is a dismal story of incompetence and dishonesty. Then the people of North Dakota recalled the Non-Partisan administration; but the harm had been done.

TIME TO RING THE ALARM.

The Non-Partisan League made the same confident promises in North Dakota that promoters of the water and power act are now making in California.

In January of this year the Non-Partisan League organized a California branch and set out to win political control of California.

The official bulletin of the League published in Berkeley announces that the Water and Power Act is one of the main provisions of the League's working program.

It is time to ring the alarm. It is time for every citizen interested in the welfare of California to take notice. Do not let the Non-Partisan Leaguers and their allied visionaries do to California what was done to North Dakota. People in North Dakota did not believe such a thing could happen, until it did happen. Take warning by their experience.

Vote against amendment number 19 on your ballot and save California.

Vote NO on Number 19

MARSHALL DIGGS, President
California State Life Insurance Company
Sacramento

CHARLES W. HELSER, President
California Development Association
San Francisco

CHARLES E. VIRDEN, President
Virden Packing Company
Sacramento

VANITY FAIR.

That overworked phrase, "the eternal feminine," is hard to get away from. It seems so perfectly to express the universality of the female temperament, the female ideal, the female point of view. Our gown designers and fashion shifters would be helpless without it—might even have to do something useful. In a madly whirling world it is some comfort to think that one thing at least will never change, and that is the desire of the female heart for beauty and change itself. Here comes Mme. Tamaki Miura, Japanese nightingale, with a declaration of principles in the controversy with her husband, Dr. Masataro Miura, as to whether she should pursue her operatic career or go home and remain for the rest of her life tied to the strings of his surgical apron. She says he is always sticking around his gloomy den feeding guinea pigs and squirrels and experimenting on them to see what makes them go, and she doesn't care for that sort of life. Who would? She observes in addition:

People say to me we must feel very lonesome while living separately. Indeed, it may be we have no right to call ourselves man and wife, if they must be always arm in arm. But pursuing different professions and although outwardly leading separate lives, our hearts are bound firmly together, as we have unshakable confidence in each other. This, I think, you know as well as I do. Although externally I may appear cold-hearted toward you, I am satisfied that you recognize the duties I am fulfilling as a wife, and I take this opportunity to ask you to continue forever to be a kind husband to me, for I can not help that I am full of gay spirits which crave for beauty and splendor.

There it is: spirits that crave for beauty and splendor. You can bank on that, for America, Japan, Russia, Kurdistan, Somali Land, Mysore, New Guinea, Oroville, New York. It has almost exterminated the fur seal and the coyotes, and has started skunk and fox farms. If it ever ceases it will cause a lot of sudden unemployment, and release a lot of labor for valuable work.

And yet, what would that labor do? Why, without sex incentive and reward, it would do just as little as possible. Eliminate the women from human affairs, and those affairs would be of little worth. Suppose an Eveless

Eden. Think of poor old Adam all alone; no Eve to listen to his brag, no woman to provide a house for. He would need little and do less. Clothes? For what? Sawmill? Why should he want boards? Brick yard? Nothing to do with the bricks, especially. If society were all men and no women, clubs might come in handy, but not the sort that form a relief from the cloying delights of a good home. Emulation would die. Any craving "for beauty and splendor" would be fought off like a drug addiction, as a thing disturbing to contemplation and repose. Supposing such an unisexual society to begin with civilization's present equipment; it would discard one item after another. Symphonies would cease. Sawmills would shut down for lack of a demand for home-building materials. The steel companies would have to go out of business, for no one would wish any more business blocks or bridges, and all the other uses for steel would gradually be forgotten. We should need no more carpets in the parlor, for there would be no parlor, and no linoleum in the kitchen, for there would be no kitchen. The parlor would fill with trash and dogs until we were pushed onto the front porch, and then off that; the kitchen would fill up with its peculiar materials until entrance was impossible, and the whole structure would ultimately collapse for lack of repair. Man would find he needed less and less, and would end sitting under a banana tree in some warm clime, a witless, propertyless savage. Let's not do it. The "craving for beauty and splendor" does seem to have its uses.

"Travel Without Trouble"

COOK'S TRAVEL SERVICE

World wide—Complete—Efficient

Inclusive Tours for Individual Travel arranged, to start any day by any route.

Explanatory circular on request

THOS. COOK & SON
(Est. 1841)

Agents for the best lines for travel by Land, Water or Air

128 SUTTER STREET

(COOK'S BUILDING) Phone Kearny 3512

Press Clippings

Are money-makers for Contractors, Supply Houses, Business Men and Corporations

ALLEN'S PRESS CLIPPING BUREAU
Phone Douglas 5119 121 Second Street

THE CHARLES NELSON CO.

MANUFACTURER AND WHOLESALER

of
REDWOOD, DOUGLAS FIR,
SPRUCE, HEMLOCK,
SUGAR & WHITE PINE,
CEDAR SHINGLES & POLES.

230 California St. San Francisco

E. C. EVANS & SONS, Inc.

(Established 1881)

STEAMSHIP AGENTS

SHIP AND INSURANCE BROKERS

260 California Street, San Francisco

Phone Douglas 8040 Cable Address "DEWGRIP"

GENERAL PETROLEUM CORPORATION

Offices at

SAN FRANCISCO LOS ANGELES
Alaska Commercial Bldg. Higgins Bldg.

HAMMOND LUMBER COMPANY

260 CALIFORNIA ST.

REDWOOD, DOUGLAS FIR

AND PILING

SERVICE

To Sacramento

Observation Cars leave 7:20 A.M.,
9:00 A.M., 4:40 P.M.

Diner Service on Meteor leaving
4:40 P.M. through to Chico.

We Carry Baggage

SACRAMENTO SHORT LINE

Why uses must be found for more POWER

Where the petulant Pit River and its tributaries shove their fretful way through barren volcanic deposits, only to broaden out and indolently mope in untillable valleys, the P G and E is rapidly developing the most promising hydro-electric power district in California.

Already three plants, known as Hat Creek No. 1 and No. 2, and Pit No. 1, are being operated.

When the District's power is fully developed in conformity with well-made plans, an aggregated installed capacity of 600,000 horsepower will have been saved from Nature's wasteful hands.

Visualize 700 passenger trains of 10 cars each being operated at 45 miles an hour, and you will realize the amount of energy that will be developed in this district alone each day. Imagine a belt a mile wide, running over a pulley at the rate of a mile a minute, and some conception of the driving force procurable in this one region will be had.

The most of this potential power will be in addition to the power already being generated by the P G and E with its 28 hydro-electric and 4 steam-electric power plants.

As there is now a considerable surplus of power in "Superior" California it becomes apparent that attention must be immediately directed to developing uses for more power if the best interests of the community are to be served.

PACIFIC GAS AND ELECTRIC COMPANY

P · G · and · E ·
"PACIFIC SERVICE"

STORYETTES.

Grave and Gay, Epigrammatic and Otherwise.

The oculist was examining a patient and had requested him to read the top line of a test card, the letters of which ran H P R T V Z D F H K. When some moments elapsed, the specialist said: "Do you mean to say you can not read letters that size?" "Oh, I can see the letters all right," replied the patient, "but I can't pronounce Russian."

Dr. William Norman Guthrie, whose witty sermons are a New York institution, is frequently involved in religious argument. A skeptic recently said to him: "I've noticed, Dr. Guthrie, that agnostics often lead better lives than believers. How do you account for that?" "It's easily accounted for," Dr. Guthrie answered. "The agnostic dares not sin because if he does he has no God to go to for forgiveness."

The musical evening was in full swing. A lovely girl had just finished singing "My Little Home in Devonshire." The hostess was surprised to see a man in a distant corner of the drawing-room visibly affected. Tears stood in his eyes, and he shook his head reminiscently. "Poor Mr. Smith!" she said sympathetically. "I'm afraid that song recalled sad memories to you. Are you a Devonshire man?" "No. I'm just a musician," was the mournful reply.

An Irishwoman had a quarrel with her husband, and the old village priest heard of it. Always anxious to restore peace whenever possible, the priest called at the woman's house. He found her alone. The priest shook his head sadly as he looked at her. "Dear, dear," he said, "this is dreadful! Here are you, Mrs. Flannigan, the mother of a family, with your eye blacked, your lip torn, your cheek bruised, and your nose broken. Dreadful, dreadful!" "Ah, sure, yer rivirince," answered the woman somewhat sadly. Then she added: "But wait till ye see Flannigan!"

"Mandy, I've heerd yo' is still lettin' dat no 'count man from Dog Town hang aroun'. Is dat so?" asked a colored swain of his equally colored lady love. "Who dat been sayin' I is?" "Dassal right who bin sayin' yo' is. De p'int is, is yo'?" "I aint sayin' I is." "Well, yo aint sayin yo' aint. Ef yo' aint, yo' is." "Ef I is, I is, an' ef I aint, I aint. 'Tain't none of yo' bizness whether I aint or is!" "Yo' aint sayin' yo' aint. Dat mek it yo' is. Aint yo'?" "Ef I is, I aint gwine say I is, an' ef I aint, I aint gwine say I is or aint. Is dat plain, or aint it?"

A lady from a Southern city, visiting New York, was asked by a friend if she would help her look after a party of children from the tenement districts she was taking on a day's outing, and agreed to do so. The trip was to Bronx Park and included the zoo. The day proved a wearisome one for the Southern visitor, who was not young, and by the time they were all homeward bound on the subway train, she was pretty well exhausted. But she felt compensated for her efforts when she reflected how she had been able to help give these poor shut-in children a glimpse of clear sky and green fields. With this agreeable thought she turned to a little girl sitting beside her and asked if she had ever been to Bronx Park before. "Oh, yes!" the child answered. "I've been there lots of times. In a automobile. My brother's a chauffeur. And next Sunday I'm going to Coney Island."

There is growing up a distinct Einstein tradition concerning the great mathematician's habits and personality. The following is the latest addition to the collection: Einstein was walking bareheaded across Bavaria Square in Berlin. One of his friends hailed him: "Well, what do you think of Poincaré?" "I think he is a very talented man." "Yes, but what daring!" "The daring of genius." "But what a frenzied fury against his antagonist!" "Oh, no, not at all. You don't know him." "Well, but at least, professor, you won't deny that he is a determined enemy of Germany, and that his megalomania—" "Oh," said Einstein, "you're talking about Raymond Poincaré, the premier. I was thinking of Henri Poincaré, the mathematician."

In Ceylon the natives are fond of boiled bees. The knees are especially fine.

THE MERRY MUSE.

The First Hundred Nights.

I am a playgoer.
I see them all, good, bad, and Ziegfeld's.
I love the nature studies,
The Bat, The Cat and The Canary, Lightnin'.
I love the economic problems,
The Gold Diggers, Peggy Hopkins.
I love the mystery plays and players,
Bull Dog Drummond, Raymond Hitchcock—
Tell me, how do they get away with it?
And now I want to know,
Why do they have ten-minute waits between acts?
If the play is bad, why not hurry and get it over?
If it is good, and I am all excited,
Why keep me waiting ten minutes
To learn what happens next?
If the play is indifferent
Could it be more so by simply dropping curtain
And raising it again,
Denoting lapse of ten seconds while
Game audience is counted out?
Why are intermissions?
There is no place to go during them
Though there would be if I wanted
To mention Prohibition.
But why mention it?
Isn't it unspeakable?

—O. B. in Life.

ORNAMENTAL FRUIT TREES

VINES AND FIELD GROWN ROSES

Open Daily and Sunday to visitors and purchasers

GEO. C. ROEDING, Pres.

California Nursery Company

(Founded in 1865 by John Rock)
NILES, CALIFORNIA

BALFOUR, GUTHRIE &amp; CO.

SAN FRANCISCO AND LOS ANGELES,
PORTLAND, SEATTLE, TACOMA,
AND VANCOUVER.

MERCHANTS

EXPORTERS AND IMPORTERS

MARINE AND FIRE INSURANCE

AVERAGE ADJUSTERS

Agents of

HARRISON DIRECT LINE OF STEAMERS

TO AND FROM EUROPEAN PORTS

and

COMMONWEALTH GOVERNMENT LINE

Redwood Export Company

California Redwood
Lumber and Ties

Cargoes and Parcels

"To off shore markets only"

260 CALIFORNIA STREET
SAN FRANCISCO, CALIF.

Phone Sutter 2163

UNION LUMBER CO.

CROCKER BUILDING

SAN FRANCISCO, CALIFORNIA

MANUFACTURERS and WHOLESALERS

— OF —

REDWOOD LUMBER
RAILROAD TIES
TELEGRAPH POLES
SHINGLES

— AND —

SPLIT REDWOOD PRODUCTS

Geo. E. Billings Roy C. Ward Geo. B. Dinsmore
J. C. Muessdorffer Jas. W. Dean

GEO. E. BILLINGS CO.

ALL FORMS OF INSURANCE
EFFECTED112 California St., San Francisco, Cal.
Phone—Douglas 6400BONESTELL & CO.
PAPERThe paper used in printing the Argonaut is
furnished by us
CALIFORNIA'S LEADING PAPER HOUSE
118 to 124 First Street, corner Minna,
San Francisco

The MOTOR OIL
FREE FROM DESTRUCTIVE
"SULPHO"
COMPOUNDS

Produced Under the New HEXEON Process

ADDING A NEW CHAPTER TO THE BOOK
OF ACHIEVEMENT

How We Overcame
the cause of motor oils
breaking down rapidly under engine heat

DESTRUCTIVE "Sulpho" compounds are the cause of motor oils breaking down rapidly under engine heat. An enormous amount of money is annually lost through the presence of these unnecessary properties in oils.

CYCOL will save engine owners this tremendous amount of money lost through wasted oil, wasted fuel, preventable repairs, because it is free from destructive "sulpho" compounds. These have been removed by the new Hexeon Process used exclusively by us.

When your oil contains destructive "sulpho" compounds it breaks down rapidly under engine heat. Its lubricating value becomes quickly impaired. The oil film is broken and serious damage may result.

Have your crank case thoroughly flushed—not with kerosene. Use the correct grade of Cycol as shown on the Cycol Recommendation Chart. Use Associated Gasoline. Then notice the improved performance of your motor.

ASSOCIATED OIL COMPANY
SAN FRANCISCO

CYCOL

MOTOR OIL

FREE FROM DESTRUCTIVE "SULPHO" COMPOUNDS

PERSONAL.

Social Notes.

An engagement recently announced is that of Miss Alice Morse to Mr. Joseph Brant Banning, Jr., of Los Angeles. Miss Alice Morse is the daughter of Mrs. John Frederick Morse and the late Dr. Morse. Dr. Douglas Harold Morse and Mr. John Morse of the Department of Agriculture, both of whom died in the military service, were Miss Morse's brothers. Mr. Banning, Miss Morse's fiancé, is a graduate of Yale. He is the son of Mrs. Joseph Brent Banning and Mrs. Alice Morse. Mrs. Florence Porter Graves is Mr. Banning's sister. Mr. William Phineas Banning is his brother. Mr. Banning's grandfather, a pioneer in California, was General Phineas Banning. The wedding of Miss Morse and Mr. Banning will take place early in November.

Dr. and Mrs. Alfred Baker Spalding will give a dinner and dance on the evening of October 28th, celebrating the twentieth anniversary of their marriage. As nearly as possible the guest list will duplicate that of their wedding. Mrs. Baker was Miss Mary Polhemus. The friends who attended Mrs. Baker at her wedding are nearly all in California and will be present at the anniversary party.

Cards have been sent out by Mr. and Mrs. Harry Horsley Scott and Mrs. Willard Drown for a ball to be given November 4th at the Burlingame Country Club, which will formally open the season. Miss Frances Ames, Mrs. Scott's daughter, and Miss Josephine Drown will be presented. Both Miss Ames and Miss Drown have spent the last year in Europe traveling with their grandmother, Mrs. Edgar Preston.

Mrs. Richard T. Harding was hostess at a large bridge party at which she complimented Mrs. William Griffith Henshaw and Lady Popham-Young. Mrs. William H. Taylor, Mrs. Charles C. Moore, Mrs. Prentiss Cobb Hale, Mrs. Joseph T. Grace, Mrs. James H. Bull, Mrs. George Romanovsky, Mrs. Marcus Koshland, Mrs. James King Steele, Mrs. Charles Holbrook, Jr., Mrs. George Landenberger, and Mrs. Frederick Henshaw were among the guests asked to meet the honored guests, Mrs. William Henshaw has recently returned from Europe, and Lady Popham-Young is a visitor from her Los Angeles home.

Miss Margaret Buckbee was the honored guest on Tuesday, October 10th at a luncheon at which Miss Dolly Madison Payne entertained at her Belvedere home. Miss Adrienne Sharp, Miss Isabella Viosca, Miss Laura Viosca, Miss Doris Fagan, Miss Kathryn Masten, Miss Olympia Goldaracena, Miss Ethel Lee, Miss Louise Gerstle, Miss Jane Carrigan, Mrs. James Fagan, Jr., and Miss Helen Slater were among Miss Payne's guests.

Mrs. Bertram Flahaven gave a bridge party and tea on Tuesday afternoon, complimenting Mrs. Victor Maxwell, a bride of some weeks, and Miss Lillian Newbauer, a bride-elect. Mrs. Harold Snodgrass, Mrs. Alden Waterhouse, Miss Sally Obea, Miss Nance Obea, Miss Doris Fagan, Miss Agnes Harrison, Mrs. Christopher Trowbridge, Miss Jeannette Sessions and Miss Mary Harrison called to meet the honored guests during the afternoon.

Mr. and Mrs. Reed Funsten were hosts at dinner and bridge on Monday evening at their home. Mr. and Mrs. Lee Schlesinger, Mr. and Mrs. Lee, Miss Edith Grant, Miss Rosamonde Lee, Mrs. Harold Snodgrass, Mr. and Mrs. Victor Maxwell, Mr. and Mrs. Gordon Selfridge, and Mr. and Mrs. Garton Keyston were Mr. and Mrs. Funsten's guests.

Mr. Homer Curran entertained at a dinner party at the St. Francis Hotel Monday evening. Mr. and Mrs. Lawrence Fox, Jr., chaperoned the party, which included Miss Hélène de Latour, Miss Lawton Filer, Mr. Alfred Hendrickson, and Mr. Harry Crocker.

Mr. and Mrs. Lawrence Irving Scott complimented Miss Edna Taylor and Miss Eleanor Martin at a luncheon on Sunday afternoon, which they gave at their Burlingame home. The guests were a number of last winter's débutantes, among whom were Miss Lillian Hopkins, Miss Josephine Grant, Miss Hélène de Latour, Miss Margaret Eleanor Spreckels, Mr. Charles Martin, Mr. Barroll McNear, Mr. George Montgomery, Mr. Geoffrey Montgomery, Mr. Harry Crocker, Mr. Russell Wilson, Mr. Jerome Kuhn, and Mr. Wendell Kuhn.

A very delightful afternoon was enjoyed at the deanery of Grace Cathedral when Mrs. Gresham and the ladies of the Guild entertained the choir boys and their mothers. Several charming vocal numbers were given by the boys under the direction of Mr. Beckett, and the afternoon closed with a "treat," which all the boys enjoyed.

Austrian prospectors for petroleum near Vienna have found promising traces of both oil and gas in the wells drilled.

Fatal automobile accidents in the United States average more than thirty a day.

FOYER AND BOX-OFFICE.

At the Curran.

"Take It from Me," the musical comedy running at the Curran Theatre, is about to enter upon the third and last week of its San Francisco engagement.

"Take It from Me" is one of a series of musical comedies different from the ordinary type. The cast and chorus are above the usual Broadway standard, and possessed of youth, charm, beauty, and a happy sense of humor. There will be a matinee Saturday.

The Columbia Theatre.

"Six-Cylinder Love," a Sam H. Harris production which gave New York sixty-two weeks of smiles, heart-throbs, and laughter, comes to the Columbia Theatre Monday, October 30th. William Anthony McGuire wrote "Six-Cylinder Love," and in the opinion of numerous Eastern critics has made the closest approach to the real American story of life and the automobile.

The play depicts the tribulations of a newlywed pair who permit a suave salesman to load an expensive auto on their note-too-firm checkbook. With the acquisition of the car, a white elephant which is eating up their bank account, comes a plague of near-society leeches who fill the auto's seats with and without invitation. The newlywed husband is soon bankrupt, and the wife crushed by discontent.

Then the young husband asserts himself, throws out the leeches who have bled his home dry, and the young couple start the journey over, to a happiness such as they knew at first.

"Three Wise Fools" will be seen for a second and final week at the Columbia Theatre commencing with Monday, October 23d. The piece has repeated its hit of last season and the fourteen evenings and four matinees will hardly suffice to meet the demand for seats.

The Orpheum Next Week.

Marion Morgan is presenting "Helen of Troy." In this massive production in four scenes she has succeeded in telling a tense bit of drama as completely as if it were told by a great writer.

Glenn and Jenkins in "Working for the Railroad" give a travesty on the trials and tribulations of the railroad porter.

Belle Montrose presents impersonations of an amateur making her first bow to a real audience. The idea is made more laughable by her excellent work.

Will Cressy and Blanche Dayne have been for twenty years headliners on the Orpheum Circuit. Their latest skit, "Without a Will There's a Way," is said to be their best.

Bailey and Cowan with pretty Estelle Davis have a strong second edition of "The Little Production."

Harry Faber and Ursa McGowan are mariners navigating a sea of fun in a gale of songs. Their skit is called "The Compass."

Roxy La Rocca is one of the world's renowned virtuosi of the harp and in his hands this beautiful instrument gives colorful interpretations.

The Wilson Aubrey Trio are not only fine examples of physical development, but are superior wrestlers and athletes and garnish their performance with a spice of good comedy.

"Romeo and Juliet."

A revival of "Romeo and Juliet" is promised by Messrs. Travers and Rainey at the Players Theatre, commencing October 23d. Evelyn Vaughan plays Juliet, William S. Rainey, Romeo, and Emelie Melville the nurse. Music from Gounod's score, a corps de ballet directed by Katharine Edson, and some special settings indicate a satisfying and unusual performance.

At the Paul Elder Gallery

Dr. David P. Barrows, president of the University of California, will deliver a lecture in the Paul Elder Gallery, Saturday afternoon, October 28th, at 2:30 o'clock, on the recently published "Life and Letters of Walter H. Page." These letters have been widely commended both as literature and history, and being an authoritative report on the inner workings of American diplomacy, they will form an unusually interesting subject for discussion.

An event scheduled for Tuesday afternoon, October 24th, at 2:30 o'clock, in the Paul Elder Gallery, is a lecture on the "Breathing Systems of India," by Sukumar Chatterji.

At Del Monte.

There was much social activity at Del Monte during the Investment Bankers' Convention. Dinner-dances and teas in the Palm Grill at the Hotel Del Monte and at the Del Monte Lodge were the occasions for large gatherings. Outdoor sports such as tennis, golf, swimming, and fishing came in for much attention, and delightful sunny days added to the pleasure of the Eastern visitors who were entertained by the Californians.

Miss Mary K. Browne, who proved the sensation of the women's golf season by capturing the Del Monte championship from Miss Doreen Kavanagh, the state champion, and who later went East to play Miss Molla Mallory, the national women's champion in the East vs. West tennis matches, has returned to Del Monte, and is now at the Del Monte Lodge at Pebble Beach. Her friend, Mrs. T. H. Dudley, is with her, and the two have been quite extensively entertained by their many friends on the Monterey Peninsula.

Mrs. George Sykes is at Del Monte to make a visit of four or five days.

Among the San Francisco people now at Del Monte are Mr. and Mrs. E. J. Costigan, Mr. and Mrs. E. W. Cerf, Mr. and Mrs. H. K. Hanau, and Mrs. J. D. Harvey.

Piedmont and Oakland society folk at Del Monte are Mr. and Mrs. J. S. Blackeller of Berkeley, Mr. and Mrs. W. S. Wells of Piedmont, and Mr. and Mrs. S. S. Scott of Oakland.

In Tibet it is not unusual for a woman to marry three or four husbands.

THE HILLCREST

American and European Plan
CALIFORNIA AND JONES STS.
Phone Franklin 3240

DEL MONTE

The Largest Resort Hotel Plant in the World
Where "Thinking People" can find Recreation
in Hotel del Monte's Comfort, Service and Outdoor Life. "Here every sportsman can find his chosen recreation."

TWO CHAMPIONSHIP GOLF COURSES
CARL S. STANLEY, Manager
DEL MONTE : CALIFORNIA

San Ysidro Ranch

Furnished bungalows of various sizes;
situated on the foothills among the orange groves, overlooking the sea. Central dining-room, electric lights, hot and cold water. Good tennis court. Six miles from
Santa Barbara, two miles from ocean.
Booklet. Address MANAGER

San Ysidro Ranch, Santa Barbara

A 50-Minute Trip

brings you to the prettiest spot in the vicinity of the Bay—Marin. And at HO-TEL RAFAEL you'll find all the comforts of home at reasonable cost. Unexcelled
Table and Service.

POPULAR DINNER DANCE
Saturday 8 to 12

The
ST. FRANCIS
One of the world's great hotels
Facing Union Square
SAN FRANCISCO CALIFORNIA

WHERE SERVICE AND COMFORTS ARE PLANNED FOR GUESTS
WHO APPRECIATE
THE BEST

Thos. J. Coleman
Manager

PERSONAL.

Social Notes.

An engagement recently announced is that of Miss Alice Morse to Mr. Joseph Brant Banning, Jr., of Los Angeles. Miss Alice Morse is the daughter of Mrs. John Frederick Morse and the late Dr. Morse. Dr. Douglas Harold Morse and Mr. John Morse of the Department of Agriculture, both of whom died in the military service, were Miss Morse's brothers. Mr. Banning, Miss Morse's fiancé, is a graduate of Yale. He is the son of Mrs. Joseph Brent Banning and Mrs. Alice Morse. Mrs. Florence Porter Graves is Mr. Banning's sister. Mr. William Phineas Banning is his brother. Mr. Banning's grandfather, a pioneer in California, was General Phineas Banning. The wedding of Miss Morse and Mr. Banning will take place early in November.

Dr. and Mrs. Alfred Baker Spalding will give a dinner and dance on the evening of October 28th, celebrating the twentieth anniversary of their marriage. As nearly as possible the guest list will duplicate that of their wedding. Mrs. Baker was Miss Mary Polhemus. The friends who attended Mrs. Baker at her wedding are nearly all in California and will be present at the anniversary party.

Cards have been sent out by Mr. and Mrs. Harry Horsley Scott and Mrs. Willard Drown for a ball to be given November 4th at the Burlingame Country Club, which will formally open the season. Miss Frances Ames, Mrs. Scott's daughter, and Miss Josephine Drown will be presented. Both Miss Ames and Miss Drown have spent the last year in Europe traveling with their grandmother, Mrs. Edgar Preston.

Mrs. Richard T. Harding was hostess at a large bridge party at which she complimented Mrs. William Griffith Henshaw and Lady Popham-Young. Mrs. William H. Taylor, Mrs. Charles C. Moore, Mrs. Prentiss Cobb Hale, Mrs. Joseph T. Grace,

JOSEPH'S

American Beauty Roses

This beautiful rose will be found this season exclusively in our establishment.
Phone Sutter 423 233 Grant Ave.
FLORISTS

FURNISHED RESIDENCE WANTED

WANTED, FOR SIX MONTHS, FURNISHED RESIDENCE, LOCATED IN WESTERN ADDITION, SAN FRANCISCO; REQUIRE 4 MASTER BED-ROOMS WITH 3 BATHS; 3 MAIDS' ROOMS AND 1 BATH AND 1 ROOM AND BATH IN BASEMENT. WILL PAY GOOD RENTAL. STATE LOCATION, PARTICULARS AND RENTAL COMMUNICATIONS TREATED CONFIDENTIALLY. ADDRESS BOX H, THE ARGONAUT.

Autumn
Excursions

to

Southern California

During October and November Southern Pacific will sell daily at San Francisco, Oakland, Alameda and Berkeley Round-trip Excursion tickets to Los Angeles, Long Beach or Wilmington, as follows:

$30.00 RETURN LIMIT
FOUR MONTHS

$22.50 RETURN LIMIT
ONE MONTH

Stopovers allowed at all points.

These tickets will be good on any of our 7 Daily trains either way, or on the "Daylight Limited" leaving Third-Street Station, San Francisco, Fridays and Saturdays at 7:45 A.M.

Southern Pacific Lines

Ferry Station

50 Post Street

Or phone Sutter 4000

Third St. Station

STRINGER STORAGE COMPANY

Sutter near Fillmore
and
Steiner near Sutter

Conducting a Storage
Business Founded
in 1880

Storage---Shipping
Expert Packing, Protection
and Dispatch

A fully informed representative, anxious to give you any desired information, will respond to your phone call.

Phone West 999

PERSONAL.

Movements and Whereabouts.

Mrs. William Tubbs and Miss Emilie Tubbs have gone to Coronado for two or three weeks.
Mrs. Warren Smith and her little daughter, who have been visiting Mrs. Smith's parents, Mr. and Mrs. James Otis, have returned to their Guatemala home.
Mrs. William Henry Bliss of Montecito is in San Francisco for a short time, stopping at the Hotel St. Francis.
Mr. and Mrs. Kenneth Kingsbury returned last week from a three weeks' Eastern trip.
Miss Florence Veach sailed on Tuesday for Colombo, Ceylon, to join her brother, Mr. William Veach, with whom she will tour the Orient.

In the Heart

of the City of Oakland
and close to beautiful
Lake Merritt—one of America's most satisfying hotels.

HOTEL OAKLAND
OAKLAND-CALIFORNIA

Management
W. C. JURGENS

MOST BEAUTIFUL
Rota-Gravure
Section
in the world

Published Each
Sunday
by the

San Francisco Chronicle

ONLY
$5.20
a
Year

Including Every Sunday Feature
of the CHRONICLE

Mr. and Mrs. Winfield Scott Davis and their son, Mr. Kenneth Davis, are established in an apartment in town. They recently closed their San Rafael home.

Mr. and Mrs. Milton Esberg and Mr. Milton Esberg, Jr., plan to close their country home at Ross and come to San Francisco for the winter.

Mrs. Harry Webb returned on Saturday to her Santa Barbara home, after a two weeks' visit in town.

Mr. and Mrs. George Whitaker will leave shortly for a trip to the Orient, of three months' duration.

Mr. and Mrs. Ralph Merrill are on a motor trip in the Northwest, and plan to spend some weeks in Canada before returning to their Burlingame home.

Mr. Rennie Pierre Schwerin left October 18th for the Orient.

General and Mrs. Charles Morton leave on a motor trip on October 20th. They plan to go to Portland and from there to other points of interest in the Northwest, and to be gone two weeks or so.

General and Mrs. Chase Kennedy plan to leave soon for the East and for Europe, where they will remain indefinitely.

Miss Elena Folger is planning a trip to Central America in November with Mr. and Mrs. Daulton Mann.

Mr. and Mrs. Charles Templeton Crocker left for New York last Saturday.

Lady Popham-Young returned to her Los Angeles home Saturday, after a week's visit in town as the guest of Mrs. R. T. Harding.

Mr. and Mrs. Georges de Latour, Miss Hélène de Latour, and Mrs. Richard de Latour moved from their Rutherford ranch to the Scott Street home which they recently purchased. They will be in town for the winter.

Governor C. R. Mabie of Utah and Governor Emmett Boyle of Nevada are in San Francisco for the Victory Highway conference.

Mr. and Mrs. Kenneth Macdonald have returned to their home in Forest Hill, after spending the summer at the San Rafael home of Mrs. Macdonald's parents, Mr. and Mrs. Winfield Scott Davis.

Mr. and Mrs. Richard McCreery are expected to return to their Burlingame home, from a European trip of several months, for the Christmas holidays.

Mr. and Mrs. Edson F. Adams and their daughters, Miss Elizabeth Adams, Miss Ellita Adams, and Miss Tula Adams, are established in Paris for the winter.

Mr. and Mrs. Charles Clark have returned from Europe and are now in New York, visiting Senator Clark.

Mr. T. J. Field and his daughter, Miss Antonia Field, of Montevideo, are in San Francisco for a week or so, stopping at the Palace Hotel.

Mr. and Mrs. Alexander S. Lillev and their daughter, Miss Ethel Lillev, will close their San Rafael home November 1st, to come to town for the winter.

Mrs. Walter Scott Franklin and her little daughter returned to San Francisco the end of the week, after spending the summer at their ranch near Goleta. In the early spring Dr. and Mrs. Franklin will take possession of the community apartment which they purchased recently.

Mrs. Edgar Preston and her granddaughters, Miss Frances Ames and Miss Josephine Brown, have returned, after an absence of almost a year abroad.

Miss Renée Carhart of New York is visiting Miss Tosenhine Grant and Miss Edith Grant at their Burlingame home.

General and Mrs. John B. MacDonald and their daughter, Miss Sue Alston MacDonald, are sailing for Manila the first part of December to visit Mrs. Gordon MacPherson, General and Mrs. MacDonald's elder daughter.

Mr. and Mrs. Frederick McNear returned on Friday of last week from Europe, after a long absence.

Mr. Walter Filer returned Friday from an Eastern trip of a few weeks. Mr. Filer joined Mrs. Filer and their daughter, Miss Lawton Filer, at the family home at Burlingame.

Miss Charlotte Ziel and Miss Harriet Pomeroy have recently returned from Europe.

Mr. and Mrs. Louis Titus have closed their Burlingame home for the winter. They will spend the coming months at their Washington home.

Mr. and Mrs. Robin Hayne are building a new home in Montecito.

Miss Eudora Clover will make her home the year around at her ranch at Cloverdale. Miss Clover recently sold the family home in Washington, which she has not occupied since the death of her parents, Admiral and Mrs. Clover.

Mr. Louis A. Schwabacher left a week or so ago for a visit to Seattle.

Mrs. E. Wengenheim expects to leave shortly for an Eastern trip.

Mr. and Mrs. Edward Corbett will spend the winter with Mrs. P. C. Hale, Mrs. Corbett's mother.

Mrs. William Klink and her daughter, Miss Betty Klink, are spending a few weeks at Palo Alto, visiting Miss Carol Klink, who is studying at Stanford University.

Mr. Addison Starr Keeler has returned from a year's travel abroad and has joined his parents, Mr. and Mrs. Addison Starr Keeler, at their home on Jackson Street.

Mr. Selden Gaines Hooper left recently for Washington, D. C., to enter the Columbian Preparatory School in preparation for his entrance to the Naval Academy, to which he has received an appointment.

Mr. and Mrs. Andrew Talbot (Miss Lorna Williamson), who have been abroad since their marriage last October, have decided to return to San Francisco for the Christmas holidays, abandoning their plan of spending the entire winter in London, as they had intended.

Mr. and Mrs. E. O. McCormick sailed last Wednesday for Honolulu.

Mrs. Almer Newhall left last week with her niece, Miss Jean Bold, for the south, where they will spend a fortnight.

Mrs. Walter Willett will return to San Francisco the first of the week, after an absence of several months in Europe. Miss Barbara Willett and Miss Audrey Willett have entered school in Brussels, where they will study until the holidays.

Mr. and Mrs. Gerald Rathbone have returned to their Burlingame home, after several months' travel abroad.

Mr. and Mrs. Charles K. McIntosh and their daughter, Miss Aileen McIntosh, have moved to town from their Woodside home. They have the Keeney house on Buchanan Street for the winter.

Mr. and Mrs. Morris Meyerfeld and Mrs. Florence F. Schloss returned on Sunday from a six months' visit to Europe.

Mr. J. W. Byrne, who has spent the summer in Paris and touring on the Continent, has returned to New York, where he will remain for a couple of weeks before returning to San Francisco.

Mr. and Mrs. Robert Ferguson MacLeod have lease an apartment on Pacific near Presidio Avenue. They will close their Mill Valley bungalow next week. Mrs. MacLeod's sons, Ensign Emil Pohl, has been assigned Asiatic duty.

Recent arrivals at the St. Francis include Mr. W. J. Lawlor, Chicago; Mr. and Mrs. Aron Chesbrough, Toledo; Mr. and Mrs. F. B. Grant, Nelson, B. C.; Mrs. H. T. Jones, Seward, Nebraska; Miss Doris Babson, Mr. and Mrs. F. K. Babson, Chicago; Miss Beth Bonning, Fort Worth; Mr. R. L. Dean, Los Angeles; Mr. Jules Alexander, Susanville; Mr. E. C. Sterling, Los Angeles; Mr. Thomas J. Proctor, Santa Rosa; Mr. William Barnett, Mr. James Krage, New York.

CURRENT VERSE.

The Groundswell.

With heavy doleful clamour, hour on hour, and day on day,
The muddy groundswell lifts and breaks and falls and slides away.

The cold and naked wind runs shivering over the sands,
Salt are its eyes, open its mouth, its brow wet, blue its hands.

It finds naught but a starving gull whose wings trail at its side,
And the dull battered wreckage, grey jetsam of the tide.

The lifeless chilly slaty sky with no blue hope is lit,
A rusty waddling steamer plants a smudge of smoke on it.

Stupidly stand the factory chimneys staring over all,
The grey grows ever denser, and soon the night will fall:

The wind runs sobbing over the beach and touches with its hands
Straw, chaff, old bottles, broken crates, the litter of the sands.

Sometimes the bloated carcass of a dog or fish is found,
Sometimes the rumped feathers of a sea-gull shot or drowned.

Last year it was an unknown man who came up from the sea,
There is his grave hard by the dunes under a stunted tree.

With heavy doleful clamour, hour on hour, and day on day,
The muddy groundswell lifts and breaks and falls and slides away.

—From "Sand and Spray" in "Preludes and Symphonies," by John Gould Fletcher.

The Curlew and Golden Plover.

The Curlew and Golden Plover
Nest highest upon the moor,
Hatching their eggs and dwelling
The nearest to heaven's door.

There by the lonely summit,
On the black and heathy earth,
In the haunt of the clouds and thunder,
They break from the shell to birth.

With never a tree to screen them,
And no roof but the skies,
They neighbor the naked vastness
That over the cloudland lies.

The sun is their foster-father;
They bask in him without let;
The first to welcome his rising,
The last to watch him set.

The moon is their sweet companion;
She lends them her lamp for guide
When they roam to feed by the rivers,
Or the sea-beach at ebbtide.

With voices tuned to the tempest
That rocks them as they fly,
They send up into the vastness
A lonely challenging cry.

They love the sublime things only;
They have strength enough for their mood;
They scorn to crowd on the lowland
With creatures of tamer blood.

The heart of their joy is freedom;
The sun, the moon, the heath—
These have sufficed them living;
These shall suffice them in death.

Night and day by the summit,
While round the tempest rolls,
They purify in the vastness
Their clean and passionate souls.

—R. C. K. Ensor in the Nation and the Atheneum.

Donations for the Doctor's Daughters.

Donation Days for the Doctor's Daughters have been set for October 25th, 26th, and 27th, when representatives of the society will be at the White House and the City of Paris to receive contributions for next year's work.

This is one of San Francisco's most effective and valued charities. Its object is to give temporary aid to those in distress and to help them to help themselves. Milk, groceries, meat, coal and clothing are sent, and in many cases rent is paid. Doctors are asked to visit those who are ill and hospital care is furnished for operations and severe illness.

This society was organized thirty-seven years ago by Rev. Dr. Mackenzie, at that time pastor of the First Presbyterian Church, and the members thereafter called themselves "The Doctor's Daughters." The society is non-sectarian in membership and work. There are no overhead expenses. The visiting and the work is done by active members. Immediate response is made to calls of emergency and every case receives careful attention.

The officers of the organization are: President, Miss Jennie M. Blair; first vice-president, Mrs. George B. Somers; second vice-president, Mrs. William B. Weir; recording secretary, Mrs. Robert C. Bolton; corresponding secretary, Mrs. Arthur Sharp; treasurer, Mrs. Charles Suydam.

Miss Blair is chairman of Donation Days. Checks should be made payable to the Doctor's Daughters and sent to Mrs. F. C. McCreary, 2020 Pacific Avenue, San Francisco.

The Symphony in Berkeley.

The autumn season of symphony concerts for Berkeley, to be given by the San Francisco Orchestra in Harmon Gymnasium, will begin on October 26th, and will be followed by concerts on November 9th and 22d and December 7th.

The music committee of the Twentieth Century Club, under the leadership of its chairman, Mrs. Genevieve Wade Hatch, is devoting one meeting a month to the study of the programmes which Mr. Hertz has announced. Not only does this group study the lives of the composers and the circumstances under which each work was written, but it also takes up the compositions in detail. The themes of the various movements of a symphony are played and the works as a whole interpreted and explained. These meetings are open to the public.

At the St. Francis.

The Garden and Fable Room of the Hotel St. Francis were the Monday luncheon places for several small parties. Mrs. Walter Foster, who has just returned from Europe, was greeted by many friends while at luncheon with her daughter, Miss Helen Foster. Mrs. Ritchie Dunn was with Miss Celia and Miss Maud O'Connor. Mrs. W. S. Porter was one of a group that included Mrs. Rudolph Spreckels, Mrs. George T. Marye, Mrs. Frederick McNear, just back from a trip through Europe which included a visit to Egypt, and Miss Jennie Hooker.

Another group included Mrs. George S. Romanovsky, Mrs. E. F. Hutton, Miss Anne Peters, and José Gimeno, the Spanish consul. Mrs. Sydney Cloman and Mrs. Thomas Eastland were together, and another of the groups had as its members Mrs. George Newhall, Mrs. Gerald Rathbone, and Mrs. Mountford S. Wilson.

Dinner Dance at the Granada.

The Granada Hotel has inaugurated dinner-dances for the winter season with the Stanford University Orchestra furnishing the music. Among the innovations lately introduced by the Granada is afternoon tea, served informally in the Red Room, between 3 and 4 o'clock—coffee being served in a like manner after the evening repeat.

Graduate Cosmetic Specialist
Peggy Jane
Beauty Shop
(ESTHER M. FISHER)
Wrinkle Eradicating
Studio 203 — 545 Sutter Street
Garfield 576

THE SANTA BARBARA GIRLS' SCHOOL
Resident and Day Pupils. Eleven acres.
Country Life and Sports. Sleeping-porches.
Open-air school rooms. Riding. Swimming all the year round. Basis of work, clear thinking.
MARION L. CHAMBERLAIN, A. M., Principal
P.O. Box 548, SANTA BARBARA, CAL.

The Katharine Branson School, Inc.
ROSS, MARIN COUNTY, CALIFORNIA
A COUNTRY SCHOOL FOR GIRLS
DAY AND RESIDENT COLLEGE PREPARATORY
Heads: Katharine Fleming Branson, A. B., Bryn Mawr
Laura Elizabeth Branson, A. B., Bryn Mawr

THE ALLEGED HUMORISTS.

"I hear Enid is going on the stage." "Why, she can't act; she doesn't even know how to behave."—L'f.

Overheard at the first tee on a public course in a mid-West city: "Well, where's the first goal?"—Golfers Magazine.

"Sistah Smith, I's sorry, but I needs must depaht." "Oh, Mr. Johnsing—needs you must?"—Nashville Tennessean.

The Wayfarer—An aeroplane just fell in your clover patch. The Farmer—Fine! That'll bring the aviator good luck.—Paris Le Rive.

"What sort of fisherman is he?" "I'll tell you. He's the kind that always wants to try it somewhere else."—Detroit Free Press.

Conclusion of a story on the children's page in a magazine says, "And they were married and lived happily even after."—Kansas City Star.

Gardener—Yes, mom! I know the place aint lookin' good. It's that daylight savin'—the extra hour o' daylight just burns up the garden.—Life.

"Ah! my poor man, I suppose poverty brought you to this?" "On the contrary, guv'nor, I was simply coining money."—London Passing Show.

Guide (on sight-seeing charabanc)—Ladies an' gentlemen, we are now passin' one o' the oldest public-'ouses in the country. Startled Passenger—Wot for?—Punch.

First Golfer—I'd rather play golf than eat. Second Golfer—What does your wife think of that? First Golfer—She's satisfied; she'd rather play bridge than cook.—Judge.

Gentleman of the Road—Wot's the trouble? Genius—Failure—failure! Isn't it always the failures that sit on the Embankment? Gentleman of the Road—'Ere—speak for yerself.—Punch.

Small Boy (on arrival at country cottage)—Mummy, where's the bathroom? Mother—There isn't any bathroom, dear. Small Boy—Good! This is going to be a real holiday.—Punch.

"In this part," said the movie director, "you have to do a number of funny falls. How are you on falls?" "I rank next to Niagara," the applicant replied confidently.—Boston Transcript.

District Visitor—What a well-behaved little boy yours is, Mrs. Blobs. Mrs. Blobs—Yes, just like his father. My husband always gets a few weeks taken off his sentence for good conduct.—London Ideas.

All were quiet in the cinema watching the comic man counterfeiting intoxication. The silence was broken by a small boy's shrill voice: "That ain't the way to be drunk, is it, farver?"—Pearson's Weekly (London).

Departing Passenger—This is miserable street-car service. Conductor—Why, what's the matter? Couldn't you get a seat? Passenger—Sure I got a seat. But my wife had to stand up all the way.—Chicago Ledger.

Golf is having a refining influence in Sick Horse Creek, Alta., according to the Saskatoon Daily Star. It is no longer considered etiquette to draw a gun on Main Street without hollering "Fore."—Louisville Courier-Journal.

Two Americans met in a Strand bar. "Why," exclaimed one, "I thought you always reckoned this time of year to be tarpon fishing. What are you doing over here?" "After Bass," was the feeling answer.—London Morning Post.

Mae—Jack was over to see me the other night and I kept telling him what a reputation he had for being a devil among the women. Mary (animatedly)—And did he live up to it? Mae—No, he just sat there like a perfect boob and kept denying it.—Michigan Gargoyle.

"What has come over Blinks? He used to be one of the best-tempered men I ever knew and now he is always yowling and swearing. A regular old grouch," said Brown. "Yes, I noticed the change in him a week after he bought that second-hand car," replied Smith.—Cincinnati Enquirer.

"Daughter, did I not see you sitting on that young man's lap when I passed the parlor door last evening?" "Yes, and it was very embarrassing. I wish you had not told me to." "Good heavens! I never told you to do anything of the kind!" "You did. You told me that if he attempted to get sentimental I must sit on him."—Pathfinder.

A small London boy was looking at an old lady's dog in the street. "Look at the little dawg," he shouted to his friend. "What a funny little dawg." The old lady turned round. "It is not a 'dawg,'" she said. "It's a dog. My little man—dog, d-o-g." "Lumme," said the boy, "it looked to me just like a dawg."—Pearson's Weekly (London).

Gladys—I am afraid you aren't as pretty as mamma. Mamma—What makes you think that?

Gladys—We've been walking in the park a whole hour, and not a single policeman has said, "Hullo, baby, how's nurse?"—Pearson's Weekly.

Crawford—You shouldn't say you're beginning to feel your age. Crabshaw—I just can't help feeling it. Just as my eyesight started to fail the girls began wearing short skirts, and now that my hearing is getting bad the radio fad sets in.—New York Sun.

CHANAK, CITY OF POTS.

Chanak, the strategic point on the Asiatic side of the Dardanelles, which figured in the headlines for weeks after the fall of Smyrna as a sort of threatened British Thermopylae, means "pots"—scullery ware—according to a bulletin dealing with the region issued by the National Geographic Society.

But though it has a hum-drum name, continues the bulletin, Chanak—or Tchanak-Kalessi—and its neighborhood have more than once been the stage for acts which have radically molded the world's history and even the world's literature. Barely twenty miles to the south rose Troy, furnishing inspiration alike to Homer and his myriad of readers. Within a stone's throw of Chanak, Xerxes in 480 B. C. led his thousands of Persians across the Dardanelles on a bridge of boats in the first formidable expedition of Asiatics into Europe which history records. At the same spot a century and a half later Alexander led his smaller but more highly trained army into Asia on his triumphant conquest of the world.

It was from Chanak in 1353 that the Turks crossed to their first foothold in Europe—a crossing that gave Europe a problem that has bred wars and massacres and broken treaties for more than 500 years.

The Sea of Marmora, into which the Dardanelles and the Bosphorus widen, forms a barrier between Asia and Europe. The roads between the two continents lie across the two straits at its ends. Constantinople at the narrowest point of the Bosphorus is the front door; Chanak, where the Dardanelles is most constricted, is at the back door.

Castle after castle, each fortified, comes into view on both the Asiatic and the European sides of the Dardanelles as one steams from the Aegean toward Constantinople. But the narrow opposite Chanak are reserved for the castles of castles: The Castle of Asia on the right, the Castle of Europe on the left. The Chanak fortifications were first constructed in 1470 not long after Constantinople fell to the Turks. Ever since Chanak has been a place of importance. In recent decades it has been the point of administration for all the Dardanelles defenses—the solar plexus of the outer straits. German artillery experts resided there during the world war and modernized the fortifications.

Chanak, too, has been the gateway to Constantinople for shipping. There each of the 12,000 ships that passed through the Dardanelles in pre-war days was held until its papers were found to be satisfactory; and none could pass after nightfall. Nearby was anchored an important unit of the Turkish fleet.

To the Western observer steaming up the Dardanelles the rôles of Asia and Europe seem reversed. All the scenic beauty is on the Asiatic side, where the steep slopes are clad with beautiful forests. The European side is rugged and largely barren.

Of the beauty spots on the Asiatic shore few surpass those about Chanak, where the constricted stream suddenly widens out to form at once the Dardanelles' most striking cape and bay. Barely five miles to the south are the ruins of the ancient city of Dardanus, which gives the strait its name. A few miles farther to the southwest rises Mt. Ida, where gods communed and from whence flowed the famous Scamander to water the plains of Troy.

We cut our forests four times as fast as they grow. If we could do that with our hair the barbers would starve.

KING COAL

High in Heat Units
Low in Ash

FOR SALE BY ALL DEALERS
IN CALIFORNIA

KING COAL CO.

Main Office
EXCHANGE BLOCK
San Francisco

Wholesale Only

If you had $50,000 or $5000 worth of deeds, stocks, bonds, etc., and your business future depended on your ability to lay hands on them tomorrow morning at 9 o'clock, would you dare trust such precious documents to your office safe?

We think not. Fire tonight might leave you helpless, for no office safe can withstand a hot fire.

BUT—a safe deposit box in the vaults of the Crocker Bank is proof against any fire. These vaults went through the great San Francisco fire without even scorching a single sheet of paper. For $4 a year you can secure a box there—and you're SAFE.

Crocker Safe Deposit Vaults

Crocker Building

Post and Market Sts.

English Religious Music.

The long-standing reproach that the English are not a musical people seems likely to be in part removed, through the researches of Dr. Terry, the musical director of the great Roman Catholic Cathedral at Westminster, says the New York Tribune. According to the Catholic News, he has discovered in the museums and libraries of Great Britain rich musical treasures, representative of the national genius, which for centuries had fallen into unjust oblivion. His discoveries comprise many important works of church music, emanating from English composers belonging to the period of the Tudors and the reformation. These works have been copied from the manuscripts in the libraries.

The pieces display all kinds of forms: Masses, anthems, sacred compositions, offertories, proses, liturgical hymns. They show, to the great surprise of experts, that in the Catholic epoch England possessed a school of composers whose works rival those of the most famous musicians of the Continent. After the Anglican Reformation these sacred works must have found a refuge in the dusty archives of the libraries. Several among them are extracted from venerable manuscripts, the finding of which indicates that they were used in the royal chapel when Henry VIII and his first wife, Catherine of Aragon, attended the state masses.

"This discovery," adds the Catholic News, "will have considerable effects: It makes the Westminster Cathedral the sanctuary where the national spirit will recognize itself again in some of its richest treasures. Its influence on church music in England will be incalculable; it can only be compared with the results that followed the restoration of plain chant."

It is proposed to slaughter a thousand surplus buffalo bulls in the Canadian government's park at Wainwright, Alberta, says the Vancouver Daily Province, and ship the meat to American and Canadian markets. Buffalo meat, especially the hump, was formerly considered a great delicacy by the pioneers. When the last census was taken of the herd it numbered 6146 head, the largest in the world. The nucleus of the herd, numbering 700, was originally obtained from Pablo, a half-breed Indian of Montana, thirteen years ago.

The Biological Survey finds that many of the birds migrating between the United States and Canada spend their winters in South America. Among these are the barn-swallow, the golden plover, and the pectoral sandpiper. Some travel as far south as the Straits of Magellan. Federal protection of migratory birds has resulted in a marked increase in game birds.

Submarine Painting.

The Paris literary journal, L'Opinion, prints some interesting reminiscences of the first experiments in submarine landscapes—if one may employ the term—begun by the painter Ritchard. The painter made his first descent in 1905, when he was traveling in Tahiti, going overboard in a diver's suit and walking about on the sea bottom until he found a view that suited him. Then his canvas, easel, brushes, and colors were lowered to him through twenty meters of water.

The canvases had previously been prepared with oil, so that they were not affected by sea water, and the colors were so mixed that they, too, could be used at the bottom of the ocean. Working at this depth, the artist-diver could remain for a half-hour only; and on coming to the surface he would leave canvas, easel, and all at the bottom of the sea, returning the next day to find them undisturbed. Only, adds L'Opinion, "there were a few big fishes around, playing the part of the curious gamins of the Paris square."

It is estimated that 13,000,000 persons in the United States own their homes.

The Catacombs of Cypress Lawn

Comparable with the luxurious tombs of ancient Egyptian kings, yet within the means of people of moderate circumstances.

A stone edifice, highly artistic in appearance, containing a magnificent chapel. Eleven Tomb Rooms, 425 Crypts.

Cypress Lawn Cemetery Association

Phone Douglas 4772

995 Market St.

FOR A
CLEAR COMPLEXION
and a HEALTHY COLOR
eat
FLEISCHMANN'S YEAST
Three Cakes a Day

The Argonaut.

VOL. LXXXI. No. 2379.

SAN FRANCISCO, OCTOBER 28, 1922.

Price Ten Cents

PUBLISHER'S NOTICE: The Argonaut (title trade-marked) is published every week by the Argonaut Publishing Company. Subscriptions, $5.00 per year; six months, $2.55; three months, $1.50, payable in advance—postage prepaid. Subscriptions to all foreign countries within the Postal Union, $6.00 per year. Sample copies free. Single copies, 10 cents. News Dealers and Agents in the interior supplied by the San Francisco News Company, 747 Howard Street, San Francisco. Subscribers wishing their addresses changed should give their old as well as new addresses. The American News Company, New York, are agents for the Eastern trade. The Argonaut may be ordered from any News Dealer or Postmaster in the United States or Europe. Special advertising rates to publishers. Address all communications to The Argonaut, 207 Powell Street, San Francisco. Make all checks, drafts, postal orders, etc., payable to "The Argonaut Publishing Company."

Entered at the San Francisco Postoffice as second-class matter. The Argonaut can be obtained in London at the International News Co., Breems Building, Chancery Lane; American Newspaper and Advertising Agency, Trafalgar Square, Northumberland Avenue; and at Daws Steamship Agency, 17 Green Street, Leicester Square, and can be ordered from any of the news-stands of W. H. Smith & Son. In Paris, at 37 Avenue de l'Opera. In New York, at Brentano's, Fifth Avenue and Twenty-Fourth Street. In Chicago, Western News Company. In Washington, at Adams' News Agency, Ninth and G Streets.

The Argonaut is on sale at the Ferry Station, San Francisco, by Foster & Orear; on the ferryboats of the Key Route system by the news agents, and by the Van Noy-Interstate Company on Southern Pacific boats and trains.

Telephone, Kearny 5895. Publication office, 207 Powell Street. WM. J. MILLIKEN, Business Manager.

FORTY-SIXTH YEAR

ALFRED HOLMAN - - - - - EDITOR

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

|   |         |
|---|---------|
| EDITORIAL: Prussianism in Education—The Crisis in British Politics—Tinkering the Laws.....                      | 273-275 |
| LETTERS TO THE EDITOR.....  | 275     |
| CONSTANTINOPLE: Yesterday and Today in the City of the Eastern Caesars, the Sultans, and the Dogs.....          | 275-276 |
| INDIVIDUALITIES: Notes About Prominent People All Over the World.....   | 276     |
| OLD FAVORITES.....  | 276     |
| WOMAN AND REVOLUTION: Female Contributions to the Social Upheaval in France a Century and a Quarter Ago.....    | 277     |
| BANKING AND INVESTMENT NEWS.....  | 278-279 |
| BOOKS ON THE TABLE: Notes of Books and Authors.....   | 280     |
| REVIEWS AND NOTICES: New Books Received.....  | 281     |
| DRAMA: "Romeo and Juliet"; The Macbeth Concert; Modern Tendencies; Old Daly Days. By Josephine Hart Phelps..... | 282     |
| VANITY FAIR: The Geraldine Farrar Auction—Some Effects of a Star.....   | 284     |
| STORYETTES: Grave and Gay, Epigrammatic and Otherwise.....  | 285     |
| THE MERRY MUSE.....   | 285     |
| FOYER AND BOX-OFFICE.....   | 286     |
| PERSONAL: Social Notes—Movements and Whereabouts.....   | 286-287 |
| THE ALLEGED HUMORISTS: Paragraphs Ground Out by the Dismal Wits of the Day.....                                 | 288     |

Prussianism in Education.

Under the rule of the "Initiative" there has been placed before the electorate of our neighboring state, Oregon, a proposal for compulsory education that differs from the Prussian system only in the circumstance that it out-Prussias Prussia. By this measure, which is to be voted upon in the coming election, November 7th, it is required that all children between the ages of eight and sixteen shall not only attend school, but that they shall attend a public school. The rule is positive, there being no exceptions excepting where there is mental or physical abnormality; and parents or guardians who may seek to evade the rule either by educating their children at home or by sending them to private schools are subject to penalties as follows:

If any parent, guardian, or other person having control or charge or custody of any child between the age of eight and sixteen years, shall fail to comply with any provision of this section, he shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and shall, on conviction thereof, be subject to a fine of not less than $5, nor more than $100, or to imprisonment in the county jail not less than two nor more than thirty days, or by both such fine and imprisonment in the discretion of the court. * * * Each day's failure to send such child to a public school shall constitute a separate offense.

This proposal is sponsored openly and actively by the Masonic bodies of Oregon, by the Ku Klux Klan, which has become a large factor in the political life of Oregon, and by numbers of well-meaning enthusiasts who have forgotten the traditions and the fundamental guarantees that lie at the foundation of our system.

The declared motive is to place the children of Oregon from their infancy under influences tending to "Americanization." The theory is that "no private school * * * can equal for the purposes under which it exists the public school which draws unto itself every child without regard to birth, creed, or affiliation." In their "official argument" the proposers say:

The assimilation and education of our foreign-born citizens in the principles of our government, the hopes and inspiration of our people, are best secured by and through attendance of all children in our public schools. * * * Mix the children of the foreign born with the native born, and the rich with the poor. Mix those with prejudices in the public school melting-pot for a few years while their minds are plastic, and finally bring out the finished product—a true American.

It goes without saying that if this measure shall be adopted it will give to the public schools of Oregon absolute monopoly of the education of young children. It will destroy the private school of whatever type; and here very obviously we have the underlying motive of the proposal. It is aimed against church schools, to which many parents—Catholic, Protestant, and other—prefer to send their children to the end that they may be nurtured in the faiths or social practices and standards to which they are attached sentimentally and under motives of conscience. It is a direct blow against religious liberty, which since the landing of the Pilgrims has stood as the cornerstone of American institutions.

Education is primarily a parental duty. The parents of a child are responsible for its preparation for life. It is an essential part of their duty to train their children in such ways and in such form of religious faith as belongs to their judgment and preference. In our American theory the state steps in, not to monopolize education or to cast the children of the country in a common mold, or forcibly to deprive them of all religious training and instruction, but merely to prevent damage to itself. It offers free opportunity of elementary education to every child, and usually much more than that, in tax-supported schools. But it is no business of the state to prevent the freest choice by parents of the teachers and the schools under whose influence they shall submit their children.

It is a not uncommon error to assume that the school is the sole educational instrument and that the school alone is responsible for a child's training. But while the school has its share, and a great share, in the training of the child, education is a coöperative undertaking in which family, school, and church may each bear its appropriate part. Any measure which makes coöperation between these agencies impossible or difficult is a step backward, a violation of American tradition, a step fraught with disaster to sound education.

One of the worst things about a destructive measure of this sort is that nobody knows exactly what it is going to destroy. Progress is not by programme. No one can foresee in what form it may occur. To abolish private schools might well be to prevent the development of some such genius as Herbert Spencer, or Charles Darwin, neither of whom received a standardized, or lock-step, education. Humanity gets on best when it is free. This sort of thing is not consistent with liberty, not consistent with the spirit of America.

We have in the German system of education as practiced previous to the war an instructive illustration of what comes through state monopolization of education. There the system was carried to its logical effects. All forms of education were under the hand of the state; and the result was—the Prussian. If Germany had won the war the proposal now made in Oregon is precisely the kind of rule that it would have enforced in every country under its control. It is a rule contradictory in its relation to American ideals. It is a blow at the fundamental principle of liberty. It strikes directly at the authority and dignity of the family. Its title should be, not as its advocates have styled it, "The American System of Education," but rather "A Measure to Make Impossible the American System of Education in Oregon." It is fundamentally un-American in its principle, in its purpose and its certain reactions, and it ought to be defeated with an emphasis marking the survival of the spirit of social and religious liberty in this country.

The Crisis in British Politics.

It is only by approximation that political events in one country may be comprehended in their true significance by the people of another country. This is notably true as related to America and Britain, since there is a special factor of confusion in things essentially different, but that appear similar or go by relatively similar names. There is still deeper confusion when there is search for expert counsels, since no two sources of interpretation are ever by any chance in agreement. The rule works both ways with a single historical exception on either side: It is of record that Alexander Hamilton "divined Europe" and the late Lord Bryce alone of all foreigners comprehended America.

We shall come nearer to the meaning of the latest notable event in British politics—the retirement of Lloyd George—by glancing at the fundamental motives inherent in British conditions and inevitably potent as related to British politics. First, the economics of British life: England, including Scotland, is a relatively small country with a relatively large population. It is possible that under intensive agriculture England might feed herself, but practically she does not do it and is not in the way of doing it. For food England must depend upon importation. She must buy the bulk of what her people consume in foreign markets; and in order to do this she must sell in foreign markets products of her manufacturing industries. She must then have markets that her people may live. And it is to the end of maintaining markets that British policy is directed. It must be so; and any government, be it Conservative, Liberal, Labor, or what not, must pursue the paramount essential purpose. The search for markets for British products has been the dominating motive of Mr. Lloyd George's government since the war, and it will continue as the dominating motive with Mr. Bonar Law and whoever else, under whatever party name, may follow. It is the necessity for markets that prompted the changed attitude of the British government toward Germany, illustrated in the recent confabulations at Genoa, The Hague, and elsewhere. England wants a market for her products in Germany, and concurrently she wants sources of supply for her factories in Germany. This is why resentment and the spirit of revenge have given place to moderation and to cooing advances; and, incidentally, to differences with France. For France, being able to supply her people from her own soil, is less solicitous for markets than for security and for reparations. Britain's search for markets has become terribly serious, for under the new conditions of dearer coal and higher wages her power in the world of general competition has been measurably lessened.

Another fundamental factor in British policy is the exposed position of her great Indian dependencies. India lies far off and is reachable only by water. If Britain is to retain her hold upon India she must maintain actual control of the seas or such relation to them that her ships may not be interfered with. She must hold access to the Mediterranean and she must hold such influences in the countries that border the Suez Canal as to render her transports immune from interference. Neither the Turk, the Egyptian, nor anybody else must attain such measure of power as to deny to Britain a secure route to India. On the land side there is another condition, since India is approachable from the north. This being the situation, there must be, if English policy can prevent it, no development or coördination of unfriendly powers having direct access to land routes to India. Here is the explanation of Britain's attitude towards Russia—even towards Germany. For it is quite within the possibilities that Germany and Russia may first or last come into an association fatal to England's hold upon India.

So in recent years or months we have seen England, over the protest of France, more or less delicately flirting with Germany and casting amiable eyes on the de facto government of Russia. The former must not in the British view be permitted to exploit the latter alone, since combination of the two would be a menace to British domination of India. The situation being what it is, Britain needing the markets of Germany and the food supplies of Russia and being fearful of the co-ordination of these countries as related to India, it is quite within the cards that there shall grow up between the three a species of alliance or at least of sympathetic coöperation looking to their common interests. We may yet see a combination of British capital and German skill in industry working harmoniously in the reconstruction of Russia. Assuredly England can not safely permit Germany to act alone in this great and essential enterprise.

The points of differences between political parties in Britain are related mainly to internal matters. Foreign policy has little to do with them, since whoever may be in authority must pursue the essential aims above defined. It is only in relation to matters of domestic interest that there are positive differences of opinion sufficiently vital to sustain varied party organizations; and these differences are not what they were. The war took a good deal of the starch out of conservatism. It had varied effects upon radicalism. Nobody now can tell just what the Conservative, the Liberal, or the Labor party wants; and nobody knows the measure of their several powers. It has been so long since a general election under normal conditions that the situation from the party standpoint is one of uncertainty. Mr. Lloyd George, a man without a party, has held the premiership for full seven years with a cabinet made up of representatives of all parties. The condition has been anomalous and it has broken down under an accumulation of dissatisfactions in which men of all parties have shared. For the moment the Conservatives are in possession of the government, but under conditions that make their tenure difficult and uncertain—so difficult that their leader upon taking office took immediate measures for "going to the country"—that is, for a general election that will by its results declare the sentiment and will of the country. The position of the new premier, Mr. Bonar Law, is that of a stop-gap. His party, that of the Conservatives, may or may not win in elections dated for mid-November. What is hoped for from these elections is an expression from the electorate that will place the government in hands supported by one or another of the British parties.

Conservatism has a tremendous hold upon the British people. It falls in with their traditions. But there are in its spirit fixed motives and tendencies not in accord with the spirit of the age. Progressivism in one form or another dominates the world today; and it will not be surprising if out of the ruck of the present situation in Britain there may develop a party that is neither conservative nor liberal nor labor, but a party on advanced lines—a party more liberal than conservative. Mr. Lloyd George, though for the moment in the discard, is none the less the foremost figure in the political life of Britain. Plainly it is his intention to "come back" if he can. He is in the prime of individual powers and he enjoys an unmatched prestige as well as an unmatched ability of popular appeal. As a man without a party, but with affiliations in all parties, he is free to outline any policy and to pursue any course calculated to win popular favor. He is essentially a man of the people, essentially a commoner, traditionally a man of radical mind. His parliamentary career preceding his taking office identified him with movements of a kind that we would call progressive. It was Lloyd George who, before the war, led the fight that took away many privileges from the aristocratic order, that imposed new taxes upon the property class, that led to the enfranchisement of large numbers of the lower social orders, that promoted social legislation. Thus, with the record of a reformer, with the prestige of great service in the war period and since, and with the arts, not only of the statesman, but of the demagogue as well, Mr. Lloyd George may still be regarded as the strongest man in the realm, and with the largest potential following. He is likely to come back, and to come back as a leader of a modernized Britain upon principles and with policies in accord with the spirit of this after-war period.

The Right Honorable David Lloyd George is a Welshman, the son of a Unitarian minister, born in 1863. Upon the foundation of a moderate education he became a lawyer, but soon abandoned his profession for politics, in which he has been a notable figure for twenty-five years. He is a chunky little man with a characteristic Welsh face and a shock of yellow-gray hair, a bulging forehead, and an eye that apparently looks, not only at, but through every person with whom he comes in contact. His temperament is electrically vital and his mind works with the force and precision of a dynamo. No man living has readier command of powers of intellectual assimilation and of expression. In a few hours he is able to master the intricacies of any subject and he has an automatic power of logical arrangement of facts and arguments. He is a heaven-born orator, with the powers of a judicial statesman in logical argument, and upon occasion of tremendous emotional appeal. In style and manner Lloyd George is as far removed as possible from the traditional British statesman. He is as effective with a group of dockers and coal miners as with an assemblage of statesmen. No man in the British realm can match him in his ability to command the understanding, the sympathies, and the emotions. Withal and for all his great career, Mr. Lloyd George remains essentially a plain man—a man of the popular type. We have said he possesses among other arts the art of the demagogue, but he is not quite a demagogue as we understand that term in America. He has all the unction of Mr. Bryan or of Senator Reed, but with all this a solidity of understanding foreign to these gentlemen or their kind. In his political activities he is distinctly an opportunist. He seizes upon whatever may be the sentiment or interest of the moment without reference to whatever may have been his motives or relationships in times past. Thus, in his famous khaki campaign following the armistice he wrought upon the passions and the resentments of the hour. In his lexicon there is no such word as consistency. He is not embarrassed by principles. In a contest he pulls every leg in sight, heedless alike of what he may have said or done in time past or of what he may say or do in time to come; and in this respect he more nearly parallels the character of Theodore Roosevelt than of any other man in either recent British or American public life. There is no guessing what a man so endowed, so versatile and adroit, so rich in the factor of prestige may do or achieve.

Tinkering the Laws.

Single taxers, drugless healers, paternalists, direct legislationists, socialists, hang-over populists, anti-vaccinationists, middleman eliminators, spinologists, spookologists, sentimentalists, idealists, Andrew Gumps and dream weavers of every sort are to have a field day on November 7th to trim the Constitution and laws of California to suit their peculiar specifications, if they can. They recall Machinery Day during the Exposition, when there was a great procession of "Nuts, Cranks, and Wheels," with bands and floats.

Most citizens are not interested in this legislative delirium, but inasmuch as the Constitution has been made a free-for-all, to be whittled, tinkered, and patched by any person or group with enough money to put signature collectors into the field at 10 cents a name, substantial citizens must turn out and try to save California from becoming a Bedlam. There are twenty-two amendments to be voted on and eight referred or initiated statutes, and inasmuch as some readers of the Argonaut wish to know its convictions in order to vote the other way, and others to confirm their own conclusions, we present our opinion on these measures, in preparation for November 7th:

- No. 1. The Veterans' Validating Act, an initiated amendment to patch up the Veterans' Welfare Act of 1921. Vote YES.
- No. 2. Wright Prohibition Enforcement Act, submitted to the electors by referendum. The Volstead Act should satisfy all reasonable requirements. This imposes on the state the burden of enforcing Federal law which already has its own enforcement machinery. Vote NO.
- No. 3. Provides for a bond issue of $10,000,000 to assist California war veterans to acquire farms or homes. The money is to be repaid by those assisted. Vote YES.
- No. 4. This act would provide a three-million-dollar bond issue, to continue the state land settlement policy (the Delhi and Durham projects) without further appropriations from the state treasury. It is said these bonds will be paid by the settlers that buy the land. So it is a land speculation, by the state. Also it is socialism, and wrong in principle. But we are in it a million, and it forms a sort of official model of development. Under direction of Elwood Mead it will probably show in what a good way a bad thing may be done. If you wish to vote for it, don't let us dissuade you. But the Argonaut will vote no.

No. 5. State Housing Act, submitted on referendum. It includes the unfortunate "shingle bill" feature, restrictive to some extent of individual choice in roofing materials. Most of the act is good, but it ought to be withdrawn and made less minutely prescriptive. Vote NO.

No. 6. Amendment to regulate the title insurance business in a way already permitted by the law. Hence unnecessary. Vote NO.

No. 7. Amendment exempting from taxation certain classes of veteran not now exempt. Exemption from taxation has become a California disease. Nobody should be exempt from taxation. Vote NO.

No. 8. Amendment to protect cities or towns from being annexed by larger neighbors against the will of the majority of their inhabitants. Fair enough, and necessary. Vote YES.

No. 9. Amendment permitting the creation of municipal boroughs by amending existing charters, as well as by original charters as at present. Very well. Vote YES.

No. 10. Initiated amendment proposing to tax publicly-owned utilities, as privately-owned ones are now taxed. This would do equity between communities owning public utilities and those now additionally taxed to make up for the former's exemptions. Vote YES.

No. 11. Initiated amendment to put publicly-owned utilities under the regulation of the state railroad commission, which could check needless political extensions, and compel uniform accounting systems that would show the public whether the business was being conducted profitably or not. Vote YES.

No. 12. Initiated amendment requiring the governor to submit a budget, empowering him to reduce items of appropriations, and permitting a referendum against items except for usual current expenses. Vote YES.

No. 13. Amendment affecting judges' salaries. Should be passed to equalize compensation between small and large counties. The state's share would be a minimum of $3000 a year instead of half the salary as at present, and each county could then fix its own share. Vote YES.

No. 14. Amendment to permit the taxation of stocks, bonds, and similar securities on a different basis from that of other property. It would probably bring out a good deal of personal property now hidden and thus increase revenue. Vote YES.

No. 15. Amendment. Puts the King bill in substance into the Constitution, with some additional matters. Arguments against the King bill are against this. Vote NO.

No. 16. Initiated act to create a board of chiropractic examiners. Unnecessary. Both our large universities oppose it as lowering standards of scholarship. Vote NO.

No. 17. Amendment. Would permit the state or a subdivision to participate with the Federal government in the use of a stream outside of the state. Vote YES.

No. 18. Amendment to permit two or more cities to combine and develop any public utility. Too broad in present form. Vote NO.

No. 19. The Water and Power Amendment, an initiative measure empowering an unknown political board to invest one-tenth of the assessed value of California in socialism. If you want socialism, this is it. If not, vote NO.

No. 20. Initiated act to create a board of osteopathic examiners. About like No. 16. Vote NO.

No. 21. Amendment to prohibit special legislation creating irrigation, reclamation, drainage or flood control districts. No necessity for this amendment, and inasmuch as such districts differ there is often great necessity for treating them specially. Vote NO.

No. 22. Amendment authorizing legislation to give absent voters a vote when absent about their occupations, and have the votes shipped home. No necessity for it, and it opens the door to election frauds. Vote NO.

No. 23. Amendment to permit the deposit in banks in this state of moneys such as school funds in the custody of the state or a county or municipality, in addition to their own money as at present; and to other subdivisions than those now having it the privilege of depositing moneys outside the state for meeting bond payments where payable. Vote YES.

No. 24. The Lawyers' Bill, prohibiting banks and trust companies from performing certain legal services for their clients, and confining such services to lawyers. Unnecessary, and monopolistic in tendency. Vote NO.

No. 25. Amendment to require the approval of the superior court for the appointment by litigants of judges pro tempore to try causes therein. Seems reasonable. Vote YES.

No. 26. Amendment to permit the formation of school districts and the issuance of bonds of such districts in more than one county. Vote YES.

No. 27. Initiated amendment to require signatures equal to 15 per cent. of last gubernatorial vote, instead of 8 per cent. as at present, for all initiative petitions for laws relating to taxation. Would tend to reduce the biennial affliction of Fels Naptha single-tax campaigns and other nuisances. Vote YES.

No. 28. Initiated act, to prevent vivisection. If this act had existed in France in Pasteur's day every child infected by a mad dog since that time would have had to die an agonizing death, as they did before. As it is, over 99 per cent. can be saved. If it passes in California now, a great deal of valuable research will have to cease in this state. It is mere sentimentalism, of the sort which, without reflection, would sacrifice the lives of human beings to save those of a few guinea pigs. The charges of cruelty to animals made by some of its advocates against physicians are probably in almost every instance baseless. Both great California universities are against it. Vote NO.

No. 29. Single Tax Amendment. More soviet socialism. Would confiscate land values. Then an army of tax-eaters could devour the thrift of the people. Vote NO.

No. 30. Initiated amendment to give the railroad commission power to grant urban and interurban street and highway transportation franchises—including motor vehicle transportation for compensation—prescribe terms and conditions, and regulate rates. Vote YES.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR.

The Turk in Constantinople.

PUEBLO, COLORADO, October 12, 1922.

Mr. Alred Holman,
San Francisco, California—

MY DEAR SIR: Please read Morton Todd's "Constantinople" in the Argonaut of October 7th. Why not suggest that he write in similar style reviews of Rome, Athens, Jerusalem? What visions crowd the mind and imagination when we meditate upon the history of these fateful cities. Religion, intellect, art, law, romance, empires find in them their cradle. The cities of David, the Caesars, Pericles, Constantine. In material and political possibilities Constantinople was the favorite of the Creator. He made "Byzas" the crossroads of the nations. I visited Constantinople many years ago, when the old Sultan was ruler. It was filthy, degraded, corrupt. The Sultan refused to let street-cars, electric lights, or any modern enterprise enter the city, but no defilement, no obstacle, no misrule could hide or annul the combination of skies, the land, water, and location that marked it as the natural meeting place of all races—the centre and highway of the world's commerce and trade. What San Francisco is to the Pacific Constantinople is to half the globe.

Given a free world and the enterprise and inventions of modern cities and upon the Bosphorus would arise a metropolis of earth, a city to which even Los Angeles would admit that it was second. Man—the Caesars—made Rome. Deity laid the plans of the city of Constantinople upon the trestle-board of destiny. Shall the Turk be permitted to make this God-designed capital of power and righteous empire the citadel of Turkish iniquity and ruthless barbarism? Humanity and civilization forbid.

Very truly,
ALVA ADAMS.

The University and the Argonaut.

UNIVERSITY OF CALIFORNIA,
BERKELEY, CAL., October 14, 1922.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE ARGONAUT—Dear Mr. Holman: Apropos of the editorial in your issue of 7th October, entitled "The University and the Argonaut," please let me add my support to your contention that you have always been friendly to the university. Permit me further to say that I am in hearty agreement with you respecting your idea of the validity and desirability of public criticism of the university which is intended as constructive advice. No thinking person can cavil at your attitude on these matters, and being one member of the university faculty I think I can say that you are again in the right when you say, "And we are greatly mistaken if the whole faculty does not agree with that conviction."

While being in substantial and even full agreement with you on the foregoing questions, I feel constrained to point out a serious error in your editorial which the latter shares with your earlier editorials respecting the university. You deplore the prominence of excrecences in this university, which, by the way, are found in all the universities in the land; you imply that, as one prominent educator puts it, "the side shows have become more important than the show in the main tent"; you decry the "uncertainty of aim" and "educational drift." All these undesirable things, however, you ascribe in the University of California to the Academic Senate. This is absolutely contrary to the fact, as the minutes of the Academic Senate meetings show. It would be a very long story to describe the many battles which the Academic Senate has fought to prevent the incursions into the university of the superfluities which you condemn, to give an account of the constant struggle of the great mass of the faculty for the maintenance of high standards of scholarship, of character, of tolerance. I know of very few cases in fourteen years of intimate contact with university affairs in which the Academic Senate has not fought and stood for the very ideals of a university which you have so well set forth in your earlier editorials. No, you are quite wrong in placing the burden of the university's defects on the shoulders of the Academic Senate. Nearly all the things which you deprecate have been forced into the university in spite of the Academic Senate. It is only fair that your readers should know the facts, and essential that your grave error in regard to the Academic Senate be rectified. There is plenty of proof in support of what I have said above, and I hope you will publish this statement in the interest of justice and fairness.

Very sincerely yours,
CHARLES B. LIPMAN.

Water and Power.

SIERRA MADRE, CAL., October 17, 1922.

TO THE EDITOR—Sir: I often thank God for the Argonaut. Nothing too strong in my view can be said against that brazenly and colossally impudent Power and Water Act. As for "jokers," it is all joker. And yet there are some going about speaking for it. A little place like this, which has, through blood and tears so to say, preserved its rights to its own water in days past, and many other similar little cities, can surely be relied upon to do its share; but the sense of civic responsibility in this state seems to me so weak that there does seem a chance that the power of light and the water of life may be taken out of the hands of the "dear people" and put into those of the possible and very probable grafters. Do what you can, dear, reliable Argonaut, before the 7th of November. Faithfully yours,
J. G. B.

The Pleasure Is Mutual.

GALVESTON, TEXAS, October 10, 1922.

Argonaut Publishing Company,
San Francisco, California—

GENTLEMEN: I enclose herewith my check No. 80 on the City National Bank in payment of annual subscription to the Argonaut from date.

It is a pleasure to resume this subscription to a publication conducted on such a broad-minded, fearless, and sensible platform.

Yours very truly,
J. D. HODSON.

Manna.

STOCKTON, CAL., October 18, 1922.

THE ARGONAUT PUBLISHING COMPANY—Dear Sirs: Enclosed I hand you my check, value $5. If you send a renewal notice I did not receive it. I do not want the Argonaut discontinued. It is "manna in the wilderness."

Yours very truly,
E. F. FORTUNE.

CONSTANTINOPLE.

Yesterday and Today in the City of the Eastern Caesars, the Sultans, and the Dogs.

III.

To go to sleep in the Dardanelles and wake up in the Golden Horn is to experience one of the thrills of a lifetime. Earth has few lovelier scenes. From your steamer's deck you will see the gentle hills of the city of Constantine, mounting up and up from the water's edge, covered with houses, and with their rounded forms accentuated by the billowing domes of the mosques—St. Sophia, Sultan Achmet, Chazahde, Suliemanié, the Mosque of Sultana Valide, the Mosque of Mohammed the Conqueror, where the Sultan recently prayed for victory over the Greeks; and got it. And there are many more, some built by the Turk, but always on Byzantine lines and contours, probably always on the designs of Greek architects.

Their cubic bulk would seem too solid, and this particularly applies to St. Sophia, were it not for the surmounting huge quarter bubbles and half bubbles of stone that look like some petrified part of the sea; the half bubbles sometimes floating on the quarter bubbles, sometimes on windowed drums that give an air of open-work and lightness perfectly suitable to bubbles of whatever material. And in slenderness and grace there probably is no feature of any school of architecture to compare with the minarets that rise from angles of the buildings, and sometimes, through mazes of shrubbery, from the terraces on which they stand. The minarets of Stamboul are like slim girls, dainty, lissome, virginal, ethereal. True, they lack inviting waists; but they are ringed and zoned with the open-work galleries whence the human bells of Islam call to prayer, and there seems to be something in the procedure more intimate and uplifting than we Westerners get from the clangor of our belabored metal castings Sunday morning and Wednesday night.

The Turkish conquerors appear to have treated St. Sophia with considerable respect—at least as much as the Crusaders showed. Its walls were encrusted with wonderful mosaic pictures of Christian saints. These violated the Koran's prohibition of images, and inasmuch as the Mohammedan takes his religion seriously and really obeys its commandments it might have been considered a pious act to destroy them; but they were merely plastered over, as though the Turk recognized his impermanence in Europe and did not care to leave behind him the reputation of the Vandal and the iconoclast. He need not fear it for the present. Perhaps plastering over was easier than erasure. To take the easiest way—that would be Turkish, too.

This, however, is "inside stuff"; you won't see it from the steamer's deck. But you will see, covering the point where Byzas set up his little enterprise, and where Constantine had his palace, the terraced and tree-set gardens of the Seraglio stepping down in verdant loveliness to the ancient sea wall and the water side. They are gardens where anything might happen; where genii might appear, where fairies might dance o' moonlight nights, where the Giaour might tinkle a light guitar at some harem trifle until he found himself sewed in a sack and heard himself go plunk into the current of the Bosphorus.

And there is the Seraskeriat tower, the fire-alarm system of the Turks, whence a watchman warns of any fire that may happen to attract his attention, calling the quarter of the city in which it may happen to be. It is a beautiful tower, very tall, and gives a wondrous view over the city and up the Bosphorus. In response to its alarm, Turkish fire companies carrying little engines come trotting to the burning house and bargain with the owner about the fee for putting it out. In addition, whatever they can carry off is theirs.

On the other side of the Golden Horn, well separated from the Turkish part of the city, are Pera, near the water, and Galata, rising on higher land. These are the Christian quarter, with legation buildings and a regular "church of England." Christian churches have always been tolerated in Constantinople.

The most striking object on the Pera-Galata side is the old Genoese tower with the arched top, and a fig tree permitted to grow, according to the will of Allah and the nature of the Turk, from out the stones which its roots are wedging apart—at least, I have no doubt it is still growing there, after many years. It would be the perfect symbol of Turkish administration. The Turk knows it will rend the tower in time, but as long as the time has not yet come, why worry? Besides, it is the will of Allah. Our civilization is largely based on efforts to circumvent in some way, perfectly pious of course, the will of Allah. The Turk makes no such attempt. He lets Allah have His way. He could sympathize utterly with the old deacon who said when solicited for a subscription to put a lightning rod on the church: "That church is God's house, and if He wants to knock it down let Him knock." If Allah wants to disrupt the old Genoese tower by means of a fig tree, let her go. It is not for any good Mussulman to interfere. Why didn't the government do something about it? Well, the conclusion of Turkish political philosophy seems to be that government exists to collect taxes. The idea is not exclusively Turkish, either.

The Turk is a sort of Mongolian, and throughout his part of the city, in Stamboul, one sees evidences of that curious Mongolian mould which O'Brien observed creeping over the islands of the south seas wherever the Chinaman has established his jerry-built quarter with its freshly ruinous trading huts in oil-can sheathing. Wherever you turn in Stamboul you see the sad signs of ruined nobility, and grandeur in decay. The inner city belies its outward promise of beauty, except in the mosques and court yards, some fountain structures with curious and beautiful level eaves, and a few places of tourist interest for their historic importance, such as the Atmeidan—the Hippodrome. Even here there are evidences of that reversion to nature which takes place so rapidly through neglect.

One of the most exasperating things about the Turk, to a Western mind, is his disposition to let things go. And his indifference to the things Westerners have agreed to regard as vital to their culture. As an administrator, his motto might well be that familiar gag of our vaudeville stage, "Leave it lay." Part of the old sea wall below the Seraglio Point is built of material from ancient palaces, relics which to the Turk are mere blocks of stone. But he will never permit an archaeologist to extract a piece of column or architrave or an inscribed lintel or pedestal, however it might illumine Occidental history. In many parts of his territory there are Greek and Roman remains that would yield treasures to research, but the Turkish officials will have none of it. Any ignorant peasant in the neighborhood that wants a door sill may take a crowbar and pry a stone out of a temple 2000 years old and let the rest of the temple fall to the ground if it is so disposed, but the reverent investigation of Western scholars intent on uncovering the foundations of their civilization are officially repelled. Says the Turk: "What do we care for abroad?"

Indeed, he cares so little for it that he doesn't even care to be understood, or defended. He has no publicity experts to state his case, which is represented to the world by the propaganda of his enemies. This sort of representation, and the calm Mohammedan contempt for Western people and opinions by which it is permitted, does not make him the favorite child of the nations. There is much against the Turk. There may be something to be said for him; he will neither say it nor help any one else to say it. Yet it is not possible to eat lacum in Constantinople and hate the people that make it as bitterly as though you were not eating lacum in Constantinople. I wonder if that old red-fezed chap with the baggy pants still stands at the entrance to the little cable railway running down to Galata and sells that wonderful confection of sugar and nuts and pink mucilage. And speaking of red fezzes, they are contagious. Everybody wears one, soon or late. You feel uncomfortable in a Western hat and you sneak around to the bazaar and buy a fez, and wonder how you will explain it when you meet one of your party, and pretty soon you see some of them coming around a corner, all in red fezzes. Man high, the streets are a weaving sea of red. It is said the fez enables a Turk to knock his head on the ground when he prays, without taking off his hat. The Christian's prayers seldom interfere with his millinery—have never determined the form of it.

In Stamboul one used to see Turkish porters, hamals, with triangular pack-saddles on their backs, and atop of these anything from a Saratoga trunk to an upright piano. It was an ancient craft, and probably persisted through some craft-protective regulation, always inimical to progress and not peculiar to Turks. Of late the hamal has grown scarce, with much else that is Turkish.

Under the mixed commission and the influx of Russian refugees, Constantinople has lost many of its old-time characteristics. Modern ideas have a chance, and they play the dickens with ancient usage and the picturesque. Costume is disappearing. I am told the gorgeous, scimitared dragomans are gone. Once, you rarely saw women outdoors, and in Stamboul never unless veiled. Now there are many women abroad without veils, and large crews of them sweep the streets. Such changes are not all to be charged to the administration of the Allies. They began with the Young Turk revolution of 1908. Among other things, the dogs disappeared. The Turks became ashamed of them, for a wonder, and determined to be rid of them. But they had no notion of dog-euthanasia or merciful lethal chambers such as we provide in (some of) our public pounds. They did not even take the trouble to shoot them, which would have been comparatively merciful. The Turk idea seemed to be that all would be well if they just got rid of the sight of the dogs, so they gathered them up and deported them to an island in the Sea of Marmora, where the poor creatures are said to have starved until they devoured one another. One believes the story instantly, not merely because we have been trained since childhood to believe everything bad of the Turk, but also because it somehow fits in so well with his lack of civil administrative talent. It is just about what one would expect. The dogs were left to the processes of nature and the pious Turk went back to his prayers, and that is about the way a Turk would behave.

Constantinople is not what it was since they took away the dogs. Not only do those women clean the streets, which they never had to do before, but one of the most picturesque and diverting of spectacles is gone from a fascinating city. There is not a well-informed man, woman, or child in the world who need be told that in old Constantinople the dogs were the scavengers; and they did quite well at it. There were plenty of them, and they all looked alike. They had in their veins the blood of every breed that infested the Levant, the proudest canine heredity of every country on the Mediterranean Sea, and of every cur that for twenty-five centuries followed the peddlers and caravans and Crusaders from every part of the Eastern Hemisphere. It is bewildering to think of their lineage. Constantinople was the melting-pot of dogs. If you took a thousand samples of paint and poured them into one container, you would get a uniform blend of colors which the addition of one more sample would not much affect. So with dogs. The result of this great canine blend was of a light brown color, about the hue of old-fashioned butcher's paper, a good deal the complexion of a California coyote; and of about the same dimensions over all. But as they never had to chase jackass rabbits for a living they were fat and hearty. Neither did they snarl at you much, as long as you did not disturb them. They were not only the scavengers, they were the garbage incinerators. The "ash" was carefully gathered up and packed in bundles and exported to western Europe, where it was used in the tanning of the more expensive ladies' gloves. Unpleasant? Very.

There was some sort of street-cleaning organization that used to sweep up the dust into heaps, but never hauled it away. The more I think of it, the more I think the street-cleaning departments in most of our American cities must be manned by Turks. These dust heaps were the divans of the dogs, where they slumbered away the hours of daylight, only interrupted from time to time by some near-by house servant who brought the family garbage to the front door, uttered a peculiar tschuck-tschucking noise with the tongue and teeth, and so summoned the nearest to their dinner. Dogs a few divans away looked up at such times, yawned wearily, shook their heads as if to say: "Why bother us? That is not our garbage. We must have some room for the product of our own house"; and went to sleep again. In fact, the summons was a softly sibilant one, calculated to disturb as few dogs as possible. All day, with such trifling interruptions, they snoozed peacefully on their dust heaps, storing up energy for the business of the night.

Next to the mosque of St. Sophia the greatest thing in the Constantinople of a few years ago was a dog battle—not a dog fight, such as we have in this country, with from two to a dozen participants, but a battle, involving squads, platoons, companies, battalions, regiments and army corps of dogs, officered by dog field marshals, dog generals, dog colonels, dog majors, dog captains, and so on down to corporals, and then more dog privates than all these dog-on officers together could handle. It might break out at any time; you never could tell, and nobody knew how to start it. You might stall around Constantinople all summer waiting to witness this wonderful thing, and go away disappointed. And then again you might hear several. I knew a man that had heard four, but he was so proud and swelled about it he could hardly talk to a common person, or even one that had only experienced one or two. He felt his distinction keenly and thought it should be marked by medals. He was singularly blessed.

Imagine, if you can, all the water in the Whirlpool Rapids below Niagara Falls suddenly turned into dogs and boiling through a city street, barking, yelping, howling, gnashing teeth and tearing flesh right and left and under and over, every dog with the throttle open and fifteen coyote-power in lungs and throat suddenly turned on. You leap from bed and throw open the window and risk your life on the windy balcony if the room has one. You are looking down upon one of the great cataclysms of nature, something stupendous and terrible, like an eruption of Kilauea. You hear a million howling ululations proceeding from all parts of the mass, with echoes from dogs blocks away pleading not to be left out, begging their brothers not to finish it too soon, but to wait and give them just one chance. You hear bodies thumping against house walls and imagine the rending of hide and muscles, the maddened cries of the vanquished, the savage exultation of the victors. The whole world is filled with sound, sound that is solid and reaches to the reverberating sky. Down the side streets come the reinforcements, and without waiting to inquire like the Irishman if it is a private fight or if anybody can get in, these reinforcements leap on top and collide with reinforcements from the other side, and lock teeth in throats, and yowl and strangle and fang their way into the original heap, and it all goes raging down the street and seems to go over a cliff somewhere and drop into hell, and an iron silence clamps down on you like the embrace of the Iron Maiden of Nuremberg or wherever it was they had an Iron Maiden, and leaves you gasping and quivering in the backlash of one of the few great moments of all time, and weakened with the released tension of your overstretched and flabby nerves. You fall into bed gasping "My God! Did you ever hear such a row?" In the morning you awaken tired and wan and dissipated, but happy with a sort of quiet, contented ecstasy, and go down to view the corpses. And there are none.

Every dog is dozing on his dust heap, just where you left him yesterday, scratched up a little and somewhat bothered by flies, but apparently unaware that he had been participating in the wildest riot that ever split the firmament.

After that battle there was little excitement to be derived from the Plaza de Toros at Madrid or Barcelona. They only kill half a dozen bulls there or a dozen or so old hack horses, and it is all cut and dried—nothing either spontaneous or primordial in it, nothing on a really cosmic scale.

Turkey is going back to Constantinople. But without those dogs it will never be the same. With unveiled women sweeping the streets, and perhaps with fire departments that respond to electric alarms and actually put out fires without bargaining with owners or bidding against each other when more than one arrives, the city will be too Western and modern—sunk to a mere dead level of the commonplace, the trite, the ordinary. They are having "progress." Probably there will be a garbage contract, and the Seraskierate tower may become the chimney of an incinerator. The world is growing stale.

MORTON TODD.

INDIVIDUALITIES.

Mrs. Rosita Forbes McGrath, the famous British woman explorer, has recently returned from her journey to Kufra, the secret city of the Senussi. She is also a discoverer of a new trade route to Egypt.

Dr. Paul S. Reinsch, former American Minister to China, has recently accepted a post as financial adviser to that country. Dr. Reinsch is the author of several distinguished books, notably "Intellectual and Political Currents in the Far East."

Dr. Adolph Lorenz, Austria's famous bloodless surgeon, has returned to New York to work more orthopedic wonders. Dr. Lorenz is accompanied by his two sons, Albert and Conrad. The former is to assist his father in his operations and the latter to enter Columbia to study plastic surgery.

The Hungarian novelist, Miss Cecile Tormay, is an aristocrat of a very ancient Hungarian family. During the revolution which began in November, 1918, Miss Tormay was in Buda Pest, where she took an active part in the movement that brought about a counter revolution. She was proscribed by the Bolsheviks, and upon the outbreak of the Red Terror she was forced into hiding and narrowly escaped hanging at their hands.

Sheila Kaye-Smith, the English novelist, is described as "a slim woman of average height with mobile features and eyes at once suggestive of profound observation and a little weary, as eyes should be that observed the pain and disappointment of 'Green Apple Harvest' and 'Joanna Godden.'" Miss Kaye-Smith is a Sussex woman, a fact that accounts for her intimate knowledge of the life of the Rother, the river that runs south through the borderland of Sussex and Kent.

The Rt. Hon. Sir Alfred Moritz Mond, British minister of health, and one of the chief hopes for the Lloyd George campaign, is one of the wealthiest men in England. Sir Alfred, whose title was created in 1910 and whose political career dates from 1906, is an Edinburgh University man, a barrister of the Inner Temple, a member of the Royal Institution, and vice-president of the Infants' Hospital, as well as an ardent sportsman. He is the author of a number of scientific, economic, and political treatises.

Lord Rothermere, brother of Lord Northcliffe and his successor in the Times and Daily Mail interests, is one of the ancient enemies of Lloyd George who is now urging and predicting the Welsh statesman's return to office. Lord Rothermere, who was three years younger than his more famous brother, was British air minister during the crucial years 1917-18, when Northcliffe was director of the civil aerial transport committee and of propaganda in enemy countries. The success of the Union Jack Club is said to be largely due to Rothermere's support. His present backing of the ex-premier both financially and with the immense resources of publicity that he can command may swing the coming election. Harold Sydney Harmsworth was created first Viscount Rothermere in 1919.

The Rt. Hon. Andrew Bonar Law, the British premier pro tem, and leader of the Unionist party from 1911 till he resigned in 1921, is a native of America, having been born in New Brunswick. He was formerly chairman of the Glasgow Iron Trade Association and a member of two firms of iron merchants, William Kidston & Sons and William Jacks & Co. Mr. Law's political career began in 1900 as Unionist member for the Blackfriars Division of Glasgow. Since then he has almost steadily sat in the lower house, and from 1911 to 1915 was leader of the opposition. He was secretary of state for the colonies, 1915-16; chancellor of the exchequer, 1916-18; lord privy seal, 1919-1921, when he resigned; plenipotentiary, Peace Conference; leader of the House of Commons, 1916-21, when he resigned; and a member of the war cabinet, 1916-19. Mr. Law's position as veteran British statesman and recent leader of the House of Commons and Unionist party make him a logical choice for present acting prime minister.

OLD FAVORITES.

Chorus from Atalanta in Calydon.

Before the beginning of years
There came to the making of man
Time, with the gift of tears;
Grief, with a glass that ran;
Pleasure, with pain for heaven;
Summer, with flowers that fell;
Remembrance fallen from heaven,
And madness risen from hell;
Strength without hands to smite;
Love that endures for a breath;
Night, the shadow of light,
And life, the shadow of death.

And the high gods took in hand
Fire, and the falling of tears,
And a measure of sliding sand
From under the feet of the years;
And froth and drift of the sea;
And dust of the laboring earth;
And bodies of things to be
In the houses of death and of birth;
And wrought with weeping and laughter,
And fashioned with loathing and love,
With life before and after
And death beneath and above,
For a day and a night and a morrow,
That his strength might endure for a span
With travail and heavy sorrow,
The holy spirit of man.

From the winds of the north and the south
They gathered as unto strife;
They breathed upon his mouth,
They filled his body with life;
Eyesight and speech they wrought
For the veils of the soul therein,
A time for labor and thought,
A time to serve and to sin;
They gave him light in his ways,
And love, and a space for delight,
And beauty and length of days,
And night, and sleep in the night.
His speech is a burning fire;
With his lips he travaileth;
In his heart is a blind desire,
In his eyes foreknowledge of death;
He weaves, and is clothed with derision;
Sows, and he shall not reap;
His life is a watch or a vision
Between a sleep and a sleep.

—Algernon Charles Swinburne.

Phoebus Apollo.

Hear us, Phoebus Apollo, who are shorn of contempt and pride, Humbled and crushed in a world gone wrong since the smoke
on thine altars died;
Hear us, Lord of the morning, King of the Eastern Flame, Dawn on our doubts and darkness and the night of our later shame!
There are strange gods come among us, of passion, and scorn,
and greed;
They are throned in our stately cities, our sons at their altars bleed;
The smoke of their thousand battles hath blinded thy children's eyes,
And our hearts are sick for a ruler that answers us not with lies,
Sick for thy light unblemished, great fruit of Latona's pain—
Hear us, Phoebus Apollo, and come to thine own again!

Our eyes of earth grown weary, through the backward ages
peer,
Till, wooed by our eager craving, the scene of thy birth grows clear,
And across the calm Ægean, gray-green in the early morn,
We hear the cry of the circling swans that salute the god newborn—
The challenge of mighty Python, the songs of thy shafts that go
Straight to the heart of the monster, sped from the loosened bow.
Again through the vale of Tempe a magical music rings
The songs of the marching muses, the ripple of fingered strings!
But this is our dreaming only: we wait for a stronger strain:
Hear us, Phoebus Apollo, and come to thine own again!

There are some among us, Diviner, who know not thy way or will,
Some of thy rebel children who bow to the strange gods still;
Some that dream of oppression, and many that dream of gold,
Whose ears are deaf to the music that gladdened the world of old.
But we, the few and the faithful, we are weary of wars unjust,
There is left no god of our thousand gods that we love, believe,
or trust;
In our courts is justice scoffed at, in our senates gold has sway,
And the deeds of our priests and preachers make mock of the words they say!
Cardinals, kings, and captains, there is none left fit to reign:
Hear us, Phoebus Apollo, and come to thine own again!

We have hearkened to creeds unnumbered, we have given them trial and test,
And the creed of thy Delphic temple is still of them all the best:
Thy clean-limbed, lithe disciples, slender, and strong, and young,
The swing of their long processions, the lilt of the songs they sung,
Thine own majestic presence, pursuing the nymph of dawn,
In thy chariot eastward blazing, by the swans and griffons drawn:
The spell of thy liquid music, once heard in the speeding year:
These are the things, Great Archer, that we yearn to see and hear.

For beside thy creed untarnished all others are stale and vain!
Hear us, Phoebus Apollo, and come to thine own again!
Monarch of light and laughter, honor, and trust, and truth,
God of all inspiration, king of eternal youth,
Whose words are fitted to music as jewels are set in gold,
There is need of thy splendid worship in a world grown grim and old!
We have drunk the wine of ages, we are come to the dregs
and lees,
And the shrines are all unworthy where we bend reluctant knees:
The brand of the beast is on us, we grovel, and grope, and err,
Wake, Great god of the Morning, the moment has come to stir!
The stars of our night of evil on a wan horizon wane:
Hear us, Phoebus Apollo, and come to thine own again!
—Guy Wetmore Carryl in "The Garden of Years."

WOMAN AND REVOLUTION.

Female Contributions to the Social Upheaval in France a Century and a Quarter Ago.

How much did female sentimentality have to do with fomenting the French Revolution? Women were not treated especially well by it in the outcome, but in its complex development they contributed heavily to results. But how about the inception, the originating labors? How much does it owe to the fact that women feel first and think afterwards—if that is a fact? After the long train of powder was laid in the wrongs and grievances of the people, was the match that fired it glowing with female emotion which was ill grounded in actuality? We do not pretend to know what no one now will ever know, but in "Women of the French Revolution," by Winifred Stephens, there is at least one revealing glimpse into a vortex of sentiment and a miasma of myth that would indicate to an impartial mind the symptoms of plain hysteria working toward the upset of the social order; at the same time irresistibly suggesting some of the material of the "Tale of Two Cities." Here is a picture, of great clarity, standing against the dark tradition of the Bastille, and sampling to us after a century and a quarter some of the main dangers of the passions that agitate our counsels today:

It was a mere accident that aroused Mme. Legros' interest in the Bastille. Walking one day down the street, called les Fossés (the dykes) of St. Germain l'Auxerrois, her eye fell on a piece of paper lying on the ground. She picked it up, and saw it was covered with writing. This she read and found to be the complaint of a prisoner, one Henri Maser, Marquis de Latude, who for thirty-five years, so said the paper, had suffered unjust imprisonment in the Bastille and other dungeons.

Mme. Legros, seized with pity, took the paper home, showed it to her husband, and together they resolved not to rest until the prisoner was set free. They got into communication with Latude, and, with amazing courage and enterprise, started an agitation for his release. Mme. Legros, we are told, had, like Sterne's lady in the glove-shop, been in the habit of talking pleasantly on all manner of subjects to her husband's customers. To them and to others she now began to talk about Latude. For the purpose of expatiating on his misery she made acquaintances wherever she could, especially with servants in the houses of the great. Thus, at length, she gained access to influential people. One of these was the Cardinal de Rohan. This Prince of the Church was induced to take an interest in the prisoner. He spoke of Latude to his friends. In that sentimental, tearful age, the wave of compassion quickly rose and spread. It spread from house to house, as Mme. Legros, in her shabby clothes, told the prisoner's tale and distributed in the most influential quarters the particulars of his sufferings described by himself. She was immensely aided by her protégé's eloquence. Latude was an adept at painting his woes in lurid colors. Indeed, he had spent the greater part of his life in doing nothing else. His story, as he told it, was irresistible. Great ladies, Mme. de Luxembourg, Mme. de Mouches, dissolved in tears as they read it. The wife of the Comptroller General, Mme. Necker, and her brilliant daughter, Mme. de Staël, became the prisoner's advocates. The French Academy took up his case. Its perpetual secretary, D'Alembert, the great philosopher, waxed indignant as he meditated on Latude's sufferings. Not Paris alone, but the provinces, joined in Mme. Legros' campaign of mercy. Finally, the queen, Marie Antoinette herself, was touched. She pleaded for Latude with the king.

But here Mme. Legros experienced her first rebuff. She and her friends had heard of le Marquis de Latude's marvelous escapes from the Bastille and Vincennes. They knew about the ingenious ladder, one hundred and eighty feet long, which he and his fellow-prisoner had made out of pieces of wood and shreds of their own clothing. But Louis, when he came to read Latude's dossier, knew much more than this. He knew that the so-called Marquis de Latude was in reality a penniless army barber, Dany by name, a wild impostor, who, as the result of an absurd stratagem designed to bring him to the notice of Mme. de Pompadour, had found himself lodged in the Bastille, where he had been kept in great comfort at the crown's expense. Louis knew more still; for he read that more than once the pseudo Latude had lost the chance of release by haggling over the sum to be paid him in compensation for his alleged sufferings. Louis, moreover, was, from his personal knowledge, aware that Latude had actually been set free in 1777, but that he had made such a bad use of his liberty, extorting money from helpless females by threats, and making false charges against Louis' ministers, that it had been necessary to rearrest him. In face of these facts, Louis decided that Latude had best remain where he was. This was a terrible blow. All the agitators were discouraged, except one: that was Mme. Legros.

The story of Latude is well known, we imagine, and Americans that have visited Paris may recall him done in wax, lying on the floor of his cell in the model of the Bastille, where he was supposed to have lain for thirty-five years with his hands chained behind him—in which position, as a cold-blooded English observer remarked, he made the ladder 180 feet long by which he escaped.

Women certainly helped demolish the Bastille. As a symbol it was a success, and its fall is a tradition to celebrate. But as a Bastille, the Bastille is perhaps overrated. When the knitting sisterhood helped pull it down they must have been disappointed with its contents: four forgers, two madmen, a self-destroyed wreck; but seven in all—not one prisoner of state, no Man with the Iron Mask, not one "friend of the people," no martyrs of liberty, not one victim of a tyrant's malice; in fact, a very good jail as jails went at the time, before our sentimentalists had made them summer resorts for tired burglars, and rather a loss to its faubourg. Pulling it down was a physical relief, like wiping your boots on the flag of the enemy, and it showed the knitters meant business. Not to believe in the importance of the Bastille now would be to deny Liberty, or throw cold water on her arsonous torch.

Only a few old Gradgrinds care for facts, anyhow—among whom was not Carlyle. He shows us "Demoiselle Théroigne, brown-locked Théroigne, seated on a cannon," leading the famous Women's Procession to Versailles. This may be "essential verity" or "Truth" in quotes, or something of the sort. It needs some such grandiloquent apology, for fact it was not. As to the real Théroigne, she is worth attention even when she leaves her cannon home, and here is her picture:

These governess days of Théroigne are full of mystery. From Liège she would appear to have gone to Antwerp, and thence to England, how, why, and with whom is doubtful. But it is thought that in England she became the mistress of a wealthy English youth, who promised to marry her. Other stories of her life in England, that she became the mistress of the Prince of Wales and was introduced by him to the Duke of Orleans seem to be doubtful. These rumors have been recently used to bolster up the theory that Théroigne was involved in the so-called Orleanist Plot to replace Louis XVI by his Orleanist cousin. Théroigne, when arrested for taking part in that October procession, which some consider to have been part of this plot, of course took care to deny any acquaintance with the Duke. Her denial may or may not have been true. Théroigne gave her own version of the English episode in her story. This she told to her people at Marcourt after she had left England and returned home with a considerable fortune. She said she had married in England a rich Englishman, of whom she was then the widow. Relying on her relatives' ignorance of English, the crafty Théroigne appears to have produced certain documents signed "Théroigne Spinster," and to have told her family that "Spinster" was the name of her late husband. French biographers, as ignorant of our language as the Terwagnes, have conducted endless researches with the object of identifying this English "Spinster," whom they suppose to have been the father of the child alleged by Théroigne to have been born to her in England, and said to have died in infancy.

Evidently Carlyle, like the Chicago reporter, "could write a better story when he wasn't hampered by the facts." So could we all. Anyway, as a philosopher once said, you can't invent anything as strange as fact; so let's go on. As revolutionaries turned on revolutionaries, the revolution matching the appetite of Chronos and "devouring its children," so women turned on women, and toward the end of her life poor Théroigne had this to suffer for some manifestation of unfeminine conservatism:

In the quarrel between the Jacobins and the Girondins, which reached its climax in the May of this year (1793), the former had not hesitated to employ against their political enemies, les tricoteuses, les poissardes and the lowest women of the streets. The most disreputable of these women roughs, said to be in the pay of the Jacobins, used to surge in angry mobs on the Feuillants Terrace and round the doors of the Assembly. There they refused to allow any to enter who were not of their own particular brand of political opinion. It had long been the custom of these fearsome menads publicly to flog in the most humiliating manner any of their number whose views or whose conduct displeased them. The prints of the period represent many such scenes, which even our Gillray might hesitate to depict. Théroigne had protested against these indecent floggings, and had threatened to make the whippers lick the dust. They took their revenge. On the 15th of May, when at 9 o'clock in the morning Théroigne was crossing the Feuillants Terrace on her way to the Assembly, the women set upon her and flogged her with such vigor that she might have died had not the guard rescued her from their hands. According to one account Marat was her deliverer. For Marat, as we have seen, was something of a Feminist.

Perhaps such reactions fortified the opinions of Napoleon on women. At any rate:

Napoleon married a typical Directory woman, Joséphine Beauharnais, whom he had met in a typical Directory salon, that of Thérèse Cabarrus, then Mme. Tallien. Faced with Joséphine's debts, harassed by her amours, Napoleon became convinced of the utter irresponsibility of woman. He had no doubt that if social order were to be secured, every woman must be as much the property of some man as "a gooseberry bush is the property of the gardener." Consequently Article 312 of le Code Napoléon decrees that a wife shall obey her husband. At Fontainebleau, or some other museum, there is, or was, I hear the leather armchair in which Napoleon used to sit when discussing the draft Code with his counsellors. The leather cushions are terribly torn and slashed. Each rent represents a gash inflicted by this Anti-feminist in his fury at his counsellors' attempts to persuade him to alter the draft of the articles in woman's favor. The articles remained as Napoleon had planned them. The Code, which deprived Frenchmen of many political rights acquired during the Revolution, compensated them by making them tyrants in their own homes.

And yellow journalism—only its name is new. Can you think of any great American journalist who behaves through his numerous newspapers, about as here depicted?

Julie was giving one of her most brilliant fêtes in honor of General Dumouriez, who was spending his four days' leave in Paris. The Talmas had invited artists, musicians, and members of the Convention—Brissot, Vergniaud, Santerre—to meet him. Mlle. Candeille was playing the piano when suddenly there burst into the salon three uninvited guests, ferocious Jacobins. One of them was Marat, in camargole, with a dirty red scarf round his head, from which escaped locks of greasy hair, and round his neck a handkerchief loosely knotted. He and his comrades came to accuse the General of having unjustly punished two volunteers in his army. The guest of the evening had never seen Marat before. Having been informed of his identity, Dumouriez, with all the hauteur of the Frenchman of the world, scornfully looked him up and down, and then said: "Ah, so you are Marat! I have nothing to say to you." And with those frigid words the General turned his back on the intruder. Marat was furious. "This house is a hot-bed of counter-Revolutionaries," he howled as he went out, followed by one of the guests, bearing a red-hot shovel on which were sprinkled drops of perfume intended to purify the air infected by the Jacobins' pestilential presence.

The noise of the incident, this fête offered by "the daughter of Thalia to the son of Mars," was soon bruited abroad. The next morning newspaper boys were crying in the street: "Great conspiracy discovered by Marat. Great assembly of Girondins and counter-Revolutionaries at Talma's in honor of the traitor Dumouriez. Names of the conspirators who intended to assassinate the People's Friend."

As agitators many of the women of Paris and France were effective, but perhaps other women were more so as salonnières. The salon is a flower of the French temperament. It grows well on that stalk, but no better on an Anglo-Saxon one than roses on a cabbage plant; because:

Sociability is the most characteristic quality of the French nation; and the salon, the incarnation of sociability, is the most typical of French institutions. From the salon, through four centuries, have radiated wit, grace, and gallantry; in a word, the indefinable esprit français. The French Renaissance of the sixteenth century owed a debt to the salon which is not usually recognized. In the following century, as we all know, polite society in the French sense of the term was cradled in Mme. de Rambouillet's Blue Room. Fifty years later, Louis XIV was framing his policy in Mme. de Maintenon's apartments. Fifty years later still, the social philosophy, which was to transform France during the Revolution, was evolving in Mme. de Tencin's salon out of the conversation of Montesquieu and the Encyclopædists.

In some of these salons we are shown such figures as Mme. Helvétius, Mme. de Staël, Mme. Roland, Mme. de Condorcet, formulating or helping formulate dynamic ideas. The atmosphere must have been, to say the least for it, liberal, the conversation good. After all, what is better than good talk, and how can it be both good and constrained? Here are some bits:

Some of the guests of Mme. Helvétius, however, were shocked by the frankness which prevailed, and Fontenelle implored his fellow-guests not to speak of the Devil, who might well be God's business man: Messieurs, ne disons pas de mal du diable; c'est peut-être l'homme d'affaires du bon Dieu. Mme. Helvétius herself, when the conversation grew too profound or too profane, would draw her special friends apart, leaving her husband to continue with the rest, what she called "his hunt for ideas."

Mme. de Staël, one of the most brilliant talkers that ever lived—"If I were Queen," said one who knew her, "I would command Mme. de Staël to talk to me all day"—was not an ideal salonnière. She was too restless, too impulsive, too loquacious. The business of a salon lady is not so much to talk herself as to make her guests talk, to draw them out and set them at their ease. This Sophie de Condorcet achieved to perfection. Mme. de Staël never succeeded in mastering her friend Mme. Récamier's art of listening "with seduction." Neither did she possess that other quality, so indispensable in every good hostess—the quality of tact. Herein her Helvetian ancestry revealed itself. Her tactlessness was sometimes mistaken for malice, as when at a large dinner-party, addressing Garat, who years before had had a scandalous love affair, she asked loudly: "By the way, Garat, did you ever marry that girl?"

Nor was it all talk the women did, either in the salon or from the soap-box. They were dynamic in ways other than those marked by sentimental inflation. Here is one number of a practical household programme:

When, in 1792, as the result of profiteering, Lyons was on the verge of starvation, the Women's Club took matters into their own hands. Having failed to obtain satisfaction from the Town Council, they placarded a notice all over the city, fixing the price of no less than sixty necessities, including bread, wine, oil, fresh and dry vegetables, cheese, fruit, candles, etc. Then a well-organized body of women took possession of shops and markets, and for three days, the 16th, 17th, and 18th of September, until such time as the Municipal Council decided to fix prices, the Women's Club practically ruled the city.

And then, after all that Bastille business of Mme. Legros, woman was made the living symbol of Reason. Don't smile—they did it thus:

By the summer of 1793, when Marat was assassinated, the apostles of the new civisme were finding it necessary to make some concession to those anthropomorphic obsessions which, from the earliest animism down to the present day, have ever tinged the religious conceptions of mankind. Parisians of the eighteenth century, like Galileans of old, looked for a sign. And the founders of the new religion did not withhold it. Hébert and Chaumette, so soon to share the fate of other founders of religions, not satisfied with erecting on the ruins of the Bastille a colossal female statue of Liberty, resolved to give their adherents a living symbol. Pas une statue morte, said Hébert, mais une image vivante de cette divinité. Un chef d'œuvre de la nature, said Chaumette.

So Chaumette, that arch Anti-Feminist he it noticed, took woman from the domestic hearth, the place to which on other occasions he was always relegating her, and brought her out into the churches, now called "the Temples of Reason." There he put her on a pedestal, exhibited her as the Goddess of Reason and exposed her to such insults that one Goddess of Reason in a Norman town is said to have worn inscribed on her Phrygian cap the words ne me tournez pas en licence.

And here is a picture of a suffragette of a century and a quarter ago:

There was a woman, however, who, though she changed her mind from time to time as to some articles of her political creed, remained from first to last, and was, even before the Revolution, a stalwart and loyal suffragist: this woman was Olympe de Gouges. Michelet calls her "the high priestess of Feminism." She was the first of the Revolution women to organize an orderly Feminist manifestation. Hardly had the National Assembly taken up its quarters at Paris, in the Riding School of the Rue St. Honoré, when on the 28th of October, 1789, Olympe, at the head of a deputation of women, laid before the deputies a programme of Feminist reform, such as—with one exception—might well be urged today by Maria Vérone or any other leader of the women's party in France. It included complete sex equality before the law; the admission of women to all occupations for which they were fitted; the suppression of what was called the dowry system; and then came that touch of eccentricity, or shall we call it utopianism, that rendered so many of Olympe's proposals impracticable. If the dowry system must remain, said she, then let the State provide husbands for girls who were without dowries. In conclusion, Olympe, with the usual flourish, asked "why women, who from the scentre to the crook are born to scatter flowers over men's lives, should receive from them in return nothing but chains, torment, and injustice."

This book makes but modest claims on the ground of original research, but it is competently, almost masterfully written, and abounds in such clear illustration of the nature of revolutionary phenomena and woman's relation to it as we have cited. It is well worth any one's leisurely perusal, if only to enable one to meet again such spirits of flame as Lucile Desmoulins and Charlotte Corday.

WOMEN OF THE FRENCH REVOLUTION. By Winifred Stephens. New York: E. P. Dutton & Co.: $5.

BANKING AND INVESTMENT NEWS.

San Francisco bank clearings for the week ending October 21, 1922, were $175,500,000; for the corresponding week of last year, $141,100,000; an increase of $34,400,000.

Power cost in Ontario, California, is 28 per cent. less than in Ontario, Canada, according to George A. Hughes, president of the Hot Point Company, manufacturer of electrical appliances.

"We have a factory in Stratford, Ontario, and one in Ontario, California," declared Mr.

pected here if the Water and Power Act is adopted."

Business is better, and there is a growing undertone of confidence which approaches optimism. Physical evidence is loadings of revenue freight now near their record levels. While part of this is due to gains in loadings of coal, loadings of merchandise and miscellaneous freight are in excess of loadings for the corresponding weeks both of last year and of 1920. There have been considerable increases in the rates of production in most lines of manufacture. Some industries are handicapped by car shortage and others, notably the automobile manufacturers and makers of tires and automobile accessories, are experiencing the usual seasonal slackening of demand, says the National Bank of Commerce in New York.

Considering the country as a whole, retail and wholesale trade probably are better than a year ago, but conditions vary a good deal in the different localities. In the cotton states, where the crop is moving rapidly, notable improvement has taken place. Trade is also showing marked activity in the industrial towns and cities of the East and the upper Mississippi Valley, as a result of full employment at rising wages, but there is much doubt as to how good demand will be in those regions where trade is primarily dependent on conditions in the grain-growing and livestock industries.

Thus far, business expansion has been on sound lines. Manufacturers and merchants have placed forward orders cautiously and only after the most careful consideration of probable future demands. There has been no material change during recent months in the ratio between deposits and loans and investments of member banks, and commercial loans show only a very moderate expansion. The same is true of the volume of Federal Reserve notes in circulation, and even though recent increases in discounts of member banks with the Federal Reserve system seem great when measured by the low levels, their total volume on October 4th was only one-fifth of their amount at the nearest corresponding date of 1921.

The critical stage of the recovery from the depression of 1920-21 has now been reached, however, and some tendencies of a disturbing character are beginning to appear, chief among which are the rapid upward movement of prices and of wages. During the ten years from 1903 to 1913, comparative peace prevailed throughout the world, and while temporary depressions were experienced, it is probable that the general level of comfort was higher than at any preceding period. During those ten years the rise in the general price level of the United States as measured by the wholesale price index of the United States Bureau of Labor Statistics was 18 per cent. Despite the general prosperity, and the fact that price increases were fairly uniform for the main groups of commodities, this rise in prices was regarded as so disturbing as to give rise to numerous investigations of the causes of the high cost of living and its resultant unrest.

The same wholesale price index shows an increase of 12 per cent. in the eight months from January, 1922, to August, 1922. Wages are also rising. As individual employers and groups of industries bid against each other, wage increases are certain to be felt in stimulated retail and wholesale trade. There is danger that as a result of this and some other factors, the price of consumers' goods will rise so rapidly as to present a mirage of approaching prosperity.

The hysterical pseudo-prosperity of 1919-20 ran a long course because it was part of a world-wide movement. It is useless to harbor illusions about any similar movement which might develop now as a result of the present psychology of rising prices and wages. World-wide conditions are not favorable to any such development. The present upward movement of prices and wages in the United States is not and can not be uniform, for the fundamental reason that prices of all those commodities and classes of goods the surplus of which must be sold on the international markets, are determined by conditions in these markets. It is obvious that the farmer's purchases of implements, fertilizer, automobiles, dry goods, and all classes of commodities are necessarily limited when the wages of a city laborer for one six-day week at $5 per day are equivalent to the gross selling price of two good hogs or twenty-five bushels of wheat.

It is now to be demonstrated as to whether the combined judgment of the business community of the United States is wise enough and far-seeing enough to prevent developments which could only too easily nullify all the progress made thus far toward real prosperity. The situation calls for careful discrimination between expansion of demand which is evidence of the slow and normal recovery from business depression and demand which reflects purely temporary conditions; courage to resist the tendency to bid for labor and materials at rapidly rising wages and prices; and far-sightedness enough to be willing to forego the temptation of immediate profits which might be made on a rapidly rising market for the sake of permanent prosperity and the avoidance of disaster.

While the bond market has been less active during the last thirty days and prices have receded moderately, there continues to be a strong underlying demand for good investment issues. The decline in the general level of bond prices is not primarily the result of hesitation on the part of permanent investors or a symptom of saturation of the market. It is rather a reflection of the gradual elimination of speculative and temporary influences. Throughout the period of cheap money and rapidly rising prices, there was a heavy absorption of securities for the purpose of making immediate profits. Anticipation of an increased need for money for the financing of manufacturing and merchandising operations and the decreasing attractiveness of investments in bonds, except from the longer viewpoint, has resulted in a considerable selling of securities by temporary holders. Declines that have taken place are a wholesome indication of a gradual return to normal conditions in the bond market and its domination by demand from investors.

Announcement of the long-awaited government refunding bond issue answers a question which the investment world has been asking ever since it became known that Secretary Mellon had such financing in mind. The offering will consist of $500,000,000 of twenty-five to thirty-year 4½ per cent. bonds. The new offering looks attractive and should go very well. The bonds will constitute far the longest term offering of the war series. They will bear the same rate of interest as the shorter term bonds, and they appear to have the same tax exemption as the outstanding Liberties. In view of those features it would not be at all astonishing should the new issue quickly go to a premium, says Commerce and Finance.

Undoubtedly there will be some switching from the outstanding 4½s into the new bonds, especially by that numerous class of investors who desire long-term securities. Whether that switching will be sufficiently large to depress the Liberties remains to be seen. Many holders of Liberties who bought them at much lower prices will hesitate to sell because they will not wish to pay taxes on their large profits. In fixing the interest rate at 4½ per cent., Secretary Mellon indicates that he does not look for a further decline in the basis of bonds.

Pressure to sell relaxed in the bond market last week and prices rallied as the outcome of the passing of European war clouds and the easier tone of money. However, the volume of new financing decreased, with the result that there was a perceptible lull in the investment field which contrasted rather sharply with recent activity. It is probable that the absence from the city of bankers attending the annual convention of the Investment Bankers in Del Monte accounted for the dullness of the market for new capital issues, now that the most urgent requirements of corporations and of municipalities have been provided for. Another factor tending to restrict the volume of new emissions was the knowledge that an early announcement from Washington on the much-discussed govern-

To Yield 7.22%

Willow Vista
Land & Cattle Company

First Mortgage 7%
Sinking Fund Gold Bonds

Send for circular

BRADFORD KIMBALL & CO.
BONDS
SECOND FLOOR INSURANCE EXCHANGE BUILDING
San Francisco
Sutter 8206

ment refunding plan was forthcoming. It was gratifying to note that of the $70,579,000 of new issues sold in the past week, only $6,602,000 were municipal bonds and that $13,500,000 were industrials, while $35,477,000 were public utility. The decrease in municipal offerings was timely, as state and municipal debts have lately been piling up at an alarming rate. Issues of that description last month aggregated $111,434,248, bringing the grand total for nine months up to $1,039,938,541. Rates for state and municipal bonds have been stabilized, with an average return to the investor of a fraction more than 4 per cent., which it is calculated by the Bond Buyer, is actually the equivalent of 9 per cent. on a taxable bond to an investors with an annual income of $100,000. It is that high tax differential which has so enormously stimulated the emission of tax-exempt municipals this year and tempted many county and municipal governments to assume a dangerous load of debt.

Despite the competition of tax-exempt issues a large volume of corporate financing

H&C
BONDS

INVESTMENT SECURITIES

Government, Municipal and Corporation Bonds in denominations of $100, $500, and $1000 for the investment of Banks, Trust Funds, and Individual Investors. Inquiries Invited.

HUNTER, DULIN & Co.
THE SECOND FLOOR—
256 MONTGOMERY ST.

Los Angeles Pasadena San Francisco Oakland San Diego

was accomplished last month, the total reaching $282,351,680, according to reliable compilations. Total of all domestic issues for nine months was $2,542,091,150, exclusive of government and municipal bonds.

Nearly $547,500,000 of that financing, or about 21 per cent., was for railroads, a striking proof of the improvement in railroad credit compared with recent years when it was impossible to sell any railroad emissions. The foundation has been laid for stock financing in substantial amounts, which probably will be a feature of the investment market later on.

So much was said at the recent convention of the American Bankers' Association on the subject of cancellation of foreign war debts, and the proposition has such an intimate bearing on our own problem of reducing

STOCK
NEW YORK EXCHANGE
MEMBERS

Private Wires
Coast to Coast

E. F. Hutton & Co.
MEMBERS
NEW YORK STOCK EXCHANGE
HUTTON BUILDING
Montgomery and Bush Sts.
HOTEL ST. FRANCIS
DEL MONTE HOTEL

NEW ISSUE
to Yield
6 1/4%
Tax Exempt

The obligation of an established agricultural community

FREEMAN SMITH & CAMP CO.

GOVERNMENT BONDS
MUNICIPAL CORPORATION

SECOND FLOOR
FIRST NATIONAL BANK BLDG.
Douglas 2121

Hughes, "and in Southern California, under private ownership, we pay 28 per cent. less for light and power than we do in Canada under public ownership. As our company is the largest manufacturer of electrical appliances in the world and depends upon low rates for electrical current, if the proponents of the Water and Power Act could convince me that it would mean lower rates, I would be for it. My fear is that the rates would be higher instead of lower.

"I also fear the act because I lived in

Buy Bonds From This Bank

When you purchase securities from our Bond Department, you have the counsel of bankers as well as bond experts.

The advantages of dealing with the Bond Department of this bank are numerous. Call or write, and we will explain how you can have the Anglo-California Trust Company as your investment advisor.

Telephone Sutter 6900

ANGLO-CALIFORNIA TRUST COMPANY

COMMERCIAL SAVINGS TRUST-BOND DEPARTMENT

"The City Wide Bank"

Market & Sansome Streets

San Francisco

MARKET-MCALLISTER
AND JONES STREETS
101 MARKET

MISSION AND 16TH
HILLMORE AND GEAR
THIRD AND 20TH

North Dakota and know what happened there when the state went into business. The people set up and ran flour mills and grain elevators, went into the home-building business and other enterprises, and established a state bank to finance them. Taxes rose 300 per cent., many banks failed, the state bank became badly involved, and state bonds could not be sold at any price. A repetition of North Dakota's disaster on a larger scale is to be ex-

McDONNELL & Co.

STOCK
NEW YORK EXCHANGE
MEMBERS

And Other Leading Exchanges

633 Market St., at New Montgomery
SAN FRANCISCO
TELEPHONE SUTTER 7676
N. Y. Office, 120 Broadway
Los Angeles, 634 So. Spring St.

PRIVATE WIRES

CARSTENS & EARLES, INCORPORATED

GOVERNMENT, MUNICIPAL AND CORPORATION BONDS

ESTABLISHED 1891

Ground Floor

California Commercial Union Building

San Francisco

Telephone Douglas 6050

SEATTLE LOS ANGELES SPOKANE SAN FRANCISCO

The Oldest Bond House in California

Member of San Francisco
Stock and Bond Exchange

E · H · ROLLINS · & · SONS

300 Montgomery Street, San Francisco

Telephone Kearny 3807

taxes, that it may be worth while considering briefly what debt cancellation would mean. Sifted down to fundamentals, the proposition would be that the United States should pay the German indemnity instead of the Germans themselves. It is doubtful if this country ever would consent to such altruism until it should be proved conclusively that the Germans had made a sincere effort to pay for the devasta-

BONDS

$2,000,000

Southern California Gas Company
First and Refunding Mortgage 5½% Series
"B" of 1952 Gold Bonds

Due September 1, 1952

George H. Burr & Co.

KOHL BUILDING
SAN FRANCISCO

|              |             |           |
|--------------|-------------|-----------|
| NEW YORK     | LOS ANGELES | CLEVELAND |
| BOSTON       | ATLANTA     | DETROIT   |
| PHILADELPHIA | CHICAGO     | PITTSBURG |
| SCRANTON     | ST. LOUIS   | SEATTLE   |

"A National Yet Personal Service"

tion they wrought and had failed. Germany's insincerity in handling her reparations problem was demonstrated by her failure to prohibit expatriation of private capital after the war as Great Britain did, by her refusal to tax her citizens to the limit of their ability to pay as England and France did, and further, by her failure to float a series of large internal loans. Instead of adopting such sound financial methods the Germans deliberately depreciated their currency by printing hundreds of billions of paper marks and selling them in foreign markets for what they would bring. On the other hand, the United States could well afford to be more liberal with its European debtors than it has been. Let this government fix a nominal rate of interest on war loans instead of the 4¼ per cent. minimum provided by the War Debt Funding Act, which imposes an almost impossible burden on debtor governments. A per cent. interest rate would lighten their load, while at the same time it would be a source of revenue to this country which would enable the government gradually to reduce taxation.

The proposed Argentine loan in this country for approximately $200,000,000 is definitely off, through expiration of the time limit set on the offer of the American bankers.

The shift of funds from commercial uses to investment purposes during the last year has been an important factor in the rise of the bond market, or to put it differently, in the decline of the interest return upon securities. What that decline amounts to is indicated by such refunding operations as the recent issue of 5 per cent. by Swift & Co., to take up 7 per cents. put out in August, 1921. The 7s were sold at 97½ and the 5s at 97, showing a drop of nearly a clear 2 per cent. in one year, says the National City Bank of New York.

Rates upon real estate mortgage loans have been declining along with those upon listed bonds, and are now commonly ranging at 5½ to 6 per cent., both upon city property and farms. Insurance companies, who have been large buyers of bonds ever since the war, are increasing their activities in the farm mortgage field.

Interest rates are not back to the pre-war level, and are not likely to be for some years to come. The world is too far behind with construction work for that. But before the war 4½ per cent. was a common rate on general refunding mortgage bonds of good railroads.

With the present business outlook, it is reasonable to conclude that the absorption of securities by banks is about at an end, and if there should be much of an increase in the demand for bank loans the bonds held by the banks will begin to come back on the market. That is a factor to be reckoned with, and the recent weakness in Liberty issues, which have been favorites with bankers, indicates that the movement already has commenced.

The treasury has a considerable amount of refinancing to do in the next six months, and is likely to bring most of it along soon, but as it will release as much credit as it calls for it will have but temporary influence upon the market.

The preliminary estimate of the Dominion Bureau of Statistics for the wheat crop of Canada is 388,773,000 bushels, an average of 17.25 bushels per acre, as against final returns for 1921 of 300,858,000 bushels, or an average of 13 bushels per acre. This is equivalent to an increase of 29 per cent. over the volume of wheat harvested last year, and when it is remembered that this return comes within 5,000,000 bushels of the record harvest of 1915, there is good reason for thankfulness, says the Canadian Bank of Commerce in its monthly financial letter. The general level of the grain market, however, continued to be low until the latter part of September, when uncertainty as to the outcome of the crisis in the Near East gave a considerable stimulus to wheat. Although the farmer has been handicapped by the continued high cost of harvesting and, in some sections at least, by a scarcity of farm labor, and although market prices are still a severe disappointment to him, he is on the whole in a much better position than at this time last year. The element of uncertainty which always enters into the market favored, at that time, a further decline in agricultural prices; today the probability is that they will show greater firmness. The deciding factor is, of course, the demand from abroad and the ability of would-be purchasers to pay, and at present nearly every element in the situation appears to favor an increased and steady demand for Canadian wheat. The world production of wheat is reported to be about 40,000,000 bushels below that of last year. The United States Department of Agriculture estimates the year's crop, exclusive of Russia and Mexico, at 3,019,526,000 bushels. It is thought that the Russian crop will meet all the requirements of that country this winter, but in any event this factor is not likely to affect the market; its chief importance will probably lie in its giving Russia the ability to take an active part in Balkan affairs. The Indian and Japanese crops are larger than last year, and it is reported that the Argentine will be able to put on the market in 1923 a larger amount of wheat than she did this spring. The decrease in the European wheat harvest, however amounts to 139,000,000 bushels from last year, and 174,000,000 bushels from the pre-war average. Europe should, therefore, require considerably more wheat from Canada this year than last, and the general improvement in sterling and the continental exchanges, together with the lower price of wheat, should enable her to increase her purchases. There has recently been a marked acceleration in orders for Canadian wheat.

The facilities for the chief Canadian ports are being taxed to their utmost, and already, in the early part of September, Montreal is reported to have made a world record by loading 1,569,393 bushels of wheat for sea in a single day. Farmers are marketing their grain freely, and the crop movement from Western Canada is proceeding at a satisfactory rate.

The live stock market is still suffering depression, but it is believed that this is due not so much to the general low level of agricultural markets as to the largest amount of unfinished cattle being placed at the present time upon the Western markets. The demand for prime beef cattle still continues to vary from fair to good, and the supply of first-class dairy cattle is reported to be far short of Western requirements. In fact the provincial government of Saskatchewan has announced its intention of supplementing the local herds by bringing in dairy stock from Eastern Canada. Early in the season some fear was expressed that there would not be enough green feed on the prairies to carry the cattle over the winter, but the late rains have considerably heartened the farmers and it is probable that they will hold a large percentage of their cattle until the spring.

Reports that business is showing marked improvement are becoming more and more frequent from all parts of the country. There is still, of course, an unevenness in industrial conditions, and certain industries which depend primarily upon large supplies of coal, iron, and steel have, in a number of cases, been obliged to close their plants. But this is obviously the result of an artificial curtailment of supply rather than of a decreased demand. On the other hand, an increasing number of factories are running at full capacity, with many working overtime, the building trades continue to be extremely active, and there has been a marked revival of highway and railway construction work. Unemployment on a large scale is almost a thing of the past, and there appears to be in some industries a real scarcity of skilled labor. On the whole there is little complaint from the industrial world, and in the case of the wholesale and retail trades the sobering experience of the last two years has modified to a large extent the general opinion as to what constitutes an autumn revival of business. Orders, though moderate in volume, have become steadier, collections have improved, and there appears to be a disposition on the part of customers to be satisfied with a much shorter term of credit. It is true that the number of commercial failures continues to be higher than at this time last year, but the amounts involved show a substantial decline. This may be taken to mean that, although the natural process of weeding out continues, there are no longer large accumulations of unsaleable commodities to act as a drag on the market.

The laws of economics involve many compensations, and not the least among these is that resulting from a high tariff and an adverse exchange. Within the last few years a great many manufacturing firms in the United States have built branch factories in Canada, thereby increasing the aggregate production of this country and swelling the local demand for labor and other services and, to a large extent, for Canadian materials and supplies.

STRASSBURGER
private wires to principal financial and commercial centers.

STOCKS · BONDS
COTTON · GRAIN
COMMODITIES

133 Montgomery Street
San Francisco

Members San Francisco Stock & Bond
Exchange & Chicago Board of Trade
— Douglas 2220 —

Although adverse exchange conditions no longer exist, American enterprises continue to establish themselves in Canada, and this in itself is a striking testimony to the soundness of economic conditions in this country.

While new industries, both Canadian and American, are being established in this country at a satisfactory rate, the same can not be said of new settlers. The total number of immigrants arriving in Canada during the four months ending last July is 32,849, as against 49,926 for the corresponding period last year; this decrease of 34 per cent. is ac-

LOGAN & BRYAN

STOCK, BOND, COTTON, COFFEE,
SUGAR AND GRAIN BROKERS

DIRECT PRIVATE WIRES

Pacific to Atlantic—U. S. and Canada

MEMBERS:

NEW YORK STOCK EXCHANGE
BOSTON STOCK EXCHANGE
CHICAGO STOCK EXCHANGE
NEW YORK COTTON EXCHANGE
NEW YORK COFFEE EXCHANGE
NEW YORK PRODUCE EXCHANGE
NEW ORLEANS COTTON EXCHANGE
PITTSBURG STOCK EXCHANGE
CHICAGO BOARD OF TRADE
MINNEAPOLIS CHAMBER OF COMMERCE
WINNIPEG GRAIN EXCHANGE
ST. LOUIS MERCHANTS EXCHANGE
SALT LAKE CITY STOCK EXCHANGE
LOS ANGELES STOCK EXCHANGE
PHILADELPHIA BOURSE
MONTREAL BOARD OF TRADE

SAN FRANCISCO BRANCH OFFICES AT
401 Montgomery Street

and
Merchants Exchange Bldg.

Telephone Garfield 3000

R. C. JENKINS, C. S. LAWRENCE,
San Francisco Managers

counted for chiefly by the decline in the number of arrivals from Great Britain and Europe. Now that steps are being taken to make the immigration policy of Canada less restrictive in effect, the favorable position of the Dominion should attract a large number of settlers from Great Britain and other countries.

When the Water and Power Act was first proposed in California in July, 1921, the Man-

Sixty-five Sutter Street

BONDS

Ask to be placed
on our mailing list
for monthly circular and for data regarding various bond issues.

STEPHENS & COMPANY

SAN FRANCISCO OAKLAND
Los Angeles San Diego

Sound Investments

WM. R. STAATS CO.
has for 35 years safeguarded the interests of California investors by recommending bonds which afford the highest yield consistent with first-class security.

WM. R. STAATS CO.

Established 1887

Alexander Bldg., Montgomery St., cor. of Bush

SAN FRANCISCO

Telephone Kearny 301

LOS ANGELES SAN DIEGO PASADENA

INVESTMENT SECURITIES

COMMERCIAL PAPER
AND ACCEPTANCES

GOVERNMENT
MUNICIPAL
AND CORPORATION
BONDS

BOND & GOODWIN & TUCKER

AMERICAN NATIONAL BANK BUILDING
SAN FRANCISCO
LOS ANGELES SEATTLE PORTLAND

ufacturer analyzed the measure and immediately said that the big question involved was not the attempt to break up the so-called monopoly on California water power resources, but it was a straight unadulterated attempt at establishing a socialistic form of government in the State of California.

There can be no private monopoly of California's water power resources when 85 per cent. of the water power of the United States is under Federal control and when in California virtually all undeveloped water power and much now developed is under Federal control.

The arguments pro and con on this measure during the past year have demonstrated the truth of the first analysis sent out by the Manufacturer. After all has been said and done the California Water and Power Act is the biggest piece of socialistic legislation ever attempted in the United States.

As from the first, the Manufacturer still maintains that the interests of the private power companies in the effect of the Water and Power Act is infinitesimal compared to the interest of California citizens who by the adoption of such a measure would launch their state on the sea of socialism and deprive themselves as individuals of the rights of free citizens in developing legitimate lines of industry within their own state.

Bonds for Investment

MUNICIPALS IRRIGATION DISTRICTS CORPORATIONS

Specialists in Safety

Anglo London Paris Company
One Sansome Street San Francisco
Phone Kearny 5600

The French American Bank

OF SAN FRANCISCO

108 SUTTER STREET

Commercial—Checking—Savings

Resources Over $16,000,000

A General Banking Business Transacted

Commercial and Personal Checking
Accounts Solicited

Savings Accounts receive interest at the rate of 4 per cent. per annum

SAFE DEPOSIT BOXES $3.50

OFFICERS

Leon Bocqueraz ..... President
J. M. Dupas ..... Vice-President
J. A. Bergerot ..... Vice-President
W. F. Duffy ..... Vice-Pres. and Cashier
A. Bousquet ..... Secretary
J. T. Trillary ..... Asst. Cashier
Chas. L. Ebner, Jr. .... Asst. Cashier

Member Federal Reserve System and
Associated Savings Banks of San Francisco
The San Francisco Savings and Loan Society
(THE SAN FRANCISCO BANK)

SAVINGS COMMERCIAL

526 California St., San Francisco, Cal.

MISSION BRANCH ..... Mission and 21st Streets

PARK-PRESIDIO DISTRICT BRANCH ..... Clement and 7th Ave.

HAIGHT STREET BRANCH ..... Haight and Belvedere Streets

June 30th, 1922

Assets ..... $76,170,177.18

Deposits ..... 72,440,177.18

Capital Actually Paid Up ..... 1,000,000.00

Reserv. and Contingent Funds ..... 2,700,000.00

Employees' Pension Fund ..... 385,984.61

A dividend to depositors of FOUR AND ONE-QUARTER (4 1/4) per cent. per annum was declared for the six months ending June 30th, 1922.

BOOKS ON THE TABLE.

November 12th to 18th is Children's Book Week, an event that is being observed, not only by all publishers and libraries, but also by civic authorities and educators everywhere. The Main Public Library of this city is to house classified exhibits by the book-sellers, and the Palace of Fine Arts is displaying a collection of unusually fine books of a juvenile character. In addition the board of education, the congress of mothers, the parent-teacher associations, and the state Sunday-school superintendent are all getting together to boost better books for youngsters. And meanwhile the publishers are not inactive. E. P. Dutton & Co. have published a little pamphlet which they will send any one upon request, a list of books for children, which is fairly representative of their juvenile publications and which is a dependable guide for parents. The Macmillan Company has issued in time for the dedicated week "Rainbow Gold" ($2), an anthology by Sara Teasdale of new and old poems designed particularly for boys and girls from ten to twelve, but every one, older or younger, must succumb to the lovely line drawings of the plates and decorations by Dugald Walker. The text is selected anywhere from Jonson and Shakespeare to Yeats and de la Mare, choice being made, of course, from the gayest and most vivid of their poems. Scribner's have published "Poems of American Patriotism" ($3.50), chosen by Brander Matthews, in a handsome color-plated edition. A very much needed juvenile which also bears the Scribner imprint is "The Children's Bible" ($3.50), arranged by Henry A. Sherman and Charles Foster Kent. This extremely attractive book is the best possible introduction to the Bible for young children. Mother Goose and her friends make their bow to the latest generation in "Tales Told by the Gander" and interpreted by Maud Radford Warren and Eve Davenport (Doran; $2.50). And the J. B. Lippincott Company has brought out a grand gift edition of Miss Muloch's classics, "The Adventures of a Brownie and Other Stories" ($3.50), the latter being the even more popular "Little Lane Prince" and "Poor Prin." "Through the Cloud Mountain," by Florence Scott Bernard (Lippincott; $2.50), is a highly imaginative hodge podge in which all the famous characters from Robinson Crusoe to Alice in Wonderland are found at the heart of a magic mountain. Both these books, as well as the Doran Mother Goose and the Scribner's Bible, are vividly illustrated. An efficient and modern history of our nation is "The True Story of the United States of America," by Elbridge S. Brooks (Lothrop, Lee & Shepard; $2). And finally, the Atlantic Monthly Press is responsible for a quaint, odd-sized volume by Ralph Bergengren, called "David the Dreamer." The text is quite juvenile, but will be enjoyed by all imaginative children, as will the whimsical dreamy drawings by a young Roumanian artist who illustrates the text. Tom Freud's work has been highly rated in Europe. The present volume serves as his American introduction.

For one of the inexplicable reasons that govern the rises and falls of popular fancy, George Gissing is enjoying a posthumous revival. He meets one on every side. Mr. C. Lewis Hind's "More Authors and I" (Dodd, Mead & Co.) includes a revealing chapter on the mysterious personality of the author of "By the Ionian Sea," though that fact in itself would not connote a Gissing fad, since Mr. Hind snapshots exactly fifty of his contemporaries and ex-contemporaries with his usual knack of catching them in an informal attitude and with their natural mien. However, the Gissing sketch there is noteworthy because of other Gissing expositions. Mr. Hind has revealed the secret quixotic act that caused him to become a hermit for life and which undoubtedly was the root of the "complex" that alone explains his personal idiosyncrasies. It is well for George Gissing that he did not live many years more—he died in 1903. For "The Private Papers of Henry Rycroft" (Dutton; $2.50), whose recent reprinting also emphasizes the trend of the Gissing curve, and which is considered by many as his best book and his second best by many more, reveals a temperament that could ill have stood the clamor and the bloodshed of the late war. Even poor Gissing—somehow he is one of the most pathetic of figures—could hardly have done as his autobiographical character, Henry Rycroft, said he would do in the improbable event of a European war. He was wrought up over some one, probably Kipling, having sounded a warning of the coming conflict. "Let the fools go to it!" says Gissing, alias Henry Rycroft. "... Let them blast the cornfield and the orchard, fire the home. For all that, there will yet be found some silent few, who go their way amid the still meadows, who bend to the flower and watch the sunset; and these alone are worth a thought." Poor George Gissing! R. G.

Notes of Books and Authors

Among the sequestered German property marked for disposal in France is Goethe's manuscript of "Faust."

Dr. Emile Coué, the famous founder of the Nancy School of Autosuggestion, is planning to visit the United States next January for a series of lectures.

E. P. Dutton & Co. announce for early publication a critical biography of William Dean Howells by Delmar Gross Cooke, which is said by those who have read the manuscript to be an exceptionally fine piece of work that will have lasting value.

Mr. E. V. Lucas has gone to Venice and Florence for a few weeks. Mr. Lucas has experimented successfully in almost every department of letters. Now he has written a play which is to be produced before the end of the year.

France's war premier, Viviani, in his book, "The Mistakes of the Kaiser," will reply to Wilhelm's Memoirs. M. Viviani has already started work on his book, and later will drop all business and private affairs and go to Algeria to complete it.

Mr. C. B. Cochran, the well-known theatre manager, has promised to write his autobiography. Mr. Cochran was at school with Aubrey Beardsley, and has known an enormous number of distinguished people in the social, literary, theatrical, and sporting world.

The Houghton Mifflin Company published on the 20th of October the "Letters of Franklin K. Lane"; "The History of Medicine," by Walter Libby; "The Development of the British Empire," by Howard Robinson; Maurice Baring's novel, "Overlooked"; Frances Jenkins Olcott's "Good Stories for Great Birthdays," and "The Soul of Dorset," by E. J. Darton.

The famous Swedish economist, Gustav Cassel, in a new Macmillan book called "Money and Foreign Exchange After 1914," gives an account of the fortunes of the world's monetary system from the outbreak of the war up to the present time. He discusses such subjects as the abolition of the gold standard, the rise in prices, the influence of inflation on gold, the discount policy, the exchange rates, reform programmes, and the problem of stabilization.

The late Sir Frank Crisp was an authority on mediæval gardens. He had a fine one himself at his country home and he was engaged in writing a book on gardens in the middle ages at the time of his death. To that end, says John o' London's, he had made an exhaustive collection of mediæval prints and paintings illustrating the subject. His book will be published by John Lane this autumn.

Owen Wister's long-looked-for volume of experiences and impressions in France during and since the war needs only to be announced. "Neighbors Henceforth" is the title of the book, and it aptly expresses Mr. Wister's attitude and motive. He says: "The plight of France, the deed of Germany, and the international destiny of the United States are the main themes of this volume, which closes a series of three, begun with 'The Pentecost of Calamity,' followed by 'A Straight Deal.'"

The two photographers kept busy by the Harvard University Athletic Association during every football game on the fall schedule have furnished forty of the best of the photographs that have been obtained for public view in "Football and How to Watch It," by Percy D. Haughton, scheduled for late September publication by the Marshall Jones Company of Boston. They are printed the full size of the page in order that every possible bit of detail may be preserved. A full-page description faces each.

A forthcoming Scribner publication is the "Papers and Correspondence of John Addington Symonds," whom Walt Whitman called "some ways the most indicative, penetrating, and significant man of our time." The letters and papers cover the period from 1865 to 1893, the year of Symonds' death. They touch upon many topics of interest during the last phase of the Victorian period, and include interesting recollections of noted literary figures of the time. Horatio F. Brown has edited the volume.

Edwin Balmer, whose new novel, "The Breath of Scandal," deals with social conditions in a big and growing American city—Chicago, to be specific—may congratulate himself upon his choice of parents. His mother, though brought up in the conservative atmosphere of the South, in St. Louis, Missouri, determined to enter Vassar College at a time, early in the '70s, when the idea of higher education for women was just beginning to be entertained, even in the North. Shortly after her marriage she began literary work, and in the '90s was a contributor to the Saturday Evening Post and other magazines. In the same year that her son Edwin received his A. B. at Northwestern University, Chicago, she took her M. A. in the post-graduate department of that university. His father, who came to Virginia soon after the civil war, was at first an exporter of tobacco there, but became interested in advertising, and made his real reputation in that business. He has been given credit for the first effective campaign to clean out fake and quack advertising from the columns of reputable publications. Edwin Balmer says that it is only recently that he has ceased to be known as the son of Tom Balmer.

You be the judge

Clean out your crankcase and refill with Zerolene. Note the increase in power, speed, and gasoline mileage—and the absence of carbon troubles.

Compare Zerolene with any other oil you know of—prove for yourself its superiority.

STANDARD OIL COMPANY (CALIFORNIA)

REVIEWS AND NOTICES.

Some Birds of the Country Side.

H. J. Massingham, whose tribute to the art of William H. Hudson appeared in the Nation and the Athenaeum shortly after the great naturalist's death, is himself the author of books that are strongly Hudsonian in flavor, both in their loyalty to the minutiae of nature and in their finished literary form. The Duttons have recently published "Some Birds of the Countryside, or the Art of Nature," a volume that will delight all naturalists. Mr. Massingham is an English journalist and a "lover and student of the wild life of the English countryside," as one paper describes him. He has here recorded his experiences in bird observation in the more characteristic bird haunts of England and Wales, the south coast of the latter, and Dorset, Hampshire, Selborne, and London of the former. There is a charming essay on Gilbert White, the father of modern scientific naturalists, and his countryside, Selborne. And that other early ornithologist, Charles Waterton—a Yorkshire squire who owned a large estate near Wakefield, where he had a bird sanctuary stocked with many a rara avis—is also given his just dues here. Now that Hudson is dead, Mr. Massingham is probably the most distinguished of his disciples, of his and Waterton's and Gilbert White's—men all of whom believed in the union of art and science in strong distinction to "our absurd departmentalizing of truth," as Mr. Massingham calls it so aptly that we can only quote.

SOME BIRDS OF THE COUNTRYSIDE. By H. J. Massingham. New York: E. P. Dutton & Co.; $5.

Max Beerbohm on Cosmetics.

A new edition of a quarter-century-old essay of the inimitable Max has just been published, doubtless because of its perennial message. In fact, so modern is "A Defense of Cosmetics" that without a curious glance at the copyright the uninitiate would naturally assume it was the latest symptom of acute flapperitis. Every age considers its own follies both the nicest and the naughtiest, and it is obvious from a perusal of Mr. Beerbohm's semi-satiric, semi-panegyric fantasy that the ladies of '94 considered their make-up the last word in dissipated rakishness. Says Max in that year, "And now that the use of pigments is becoming general, and most women are not so young as they are painted, it may be asked curiously how the prejudice ever came into being." We offer this for solace to the souls of such flappers as have not discarded them.

A DEFENSE OF COSMETICS. By Max Beerbohm. New York: Dodd, Mead & Co.

Two Garden Books.

Those who collect books on gardening have been able to add two unusually beautiful horticultural books to their libraries in the last few weeks. "The Shakespeare Garden," by Esther Singleton, the literary devotee of old houses and gardens, is a book with a triple interest. Primarily for gardeners, amateur or professional, it also appeals to Shakespeare enthusiasts and to the reader with a thirst for unusual information. For though gardening was a highly cultivated art in Shakespeare's day and a more popular hobby than it is at present, comparatively little has been written or published on the subject. Shakespeare himself supplies some of our information. But there were a few garden authors, chief among whom was Didymus Mountain, whose real name was the analogous Thomas Hill, and Gervase Markham, whose "The Country Farm," translated from an earlier

French book, "La Maison Rustique," was one of the most popular of early panegyrics on the joys of horticulture. John Parkinson, apothecary to James I, was an ardent horticulturist and one of the great authorities of his day. His book, "Paradisi in Sole; Paradisus Terrestris," appeared in London in 1629, the most complete botanical treatise in England before Ray. The boom in Elizabethan gardening was largely due to Nicholas Leate, a London merchant who about 1590 became a member of the Levant Company. Being an enthusiastic gardener and a wealthy man, he was able to import many new flowers from the East to London, including tulips, certain lilies, irises, and many new anemones. Leate also was the first to import the yellow sops-in-wine, a famous carnation from Poland, which had not been previously known in England, and an unusual yellow double rose from Constantinople. He employed collectors to hunt for specimens in Turkey and Syria. Mathis de Lobel, a distinguished Dutch physician and botanist who became botanist to James I, was another great influence on early English garden cultivation. Miss Singleton has traced the history of her subject from the small enclosed castle garden of the middle ages, which was merely an outdoor living room, through the early sixteenth-century herbal garden for practical and medicinal purposes to the height of its glory as a cultivated art in Elizabeth's and Shakespeare's time.

Our second garden book is even more lovely to the eye, but its text is strictly technical and is therefore more limited to the specialist. "Garden Color" is a sumptuously illustrated and bound treatise on this phase of landscape gardening by four experts on horticultural color. Forty-eight water-color sketches of gardens at all seasons of the year, by Margaret Waterfield, are masterpieces of tone in themselves.

THE SHAKESPEARE GARDEN. By Esther Singleton. New York: The Century Company; $3.
GARDEN COLOR. Spring, by Mrs. C. W. Earle; Summer, by E. V. B.; Autumn, by Rose Kingsley; Winter, by the Hon. Vicary Gibbs. New York: E. P. Dutton & Co.; $6.

Moby Dick.

The recent and belated popularity of Herman Melville's books makes this holiday illustrated edition of "Moby Dick" particularly timely. In fact Dodd, Mead & Co. are to be commended for bringing out our newly-discovered American classic, which Masefield calls one of "the world's great works of art," in adequate de luxe form. For people who may have withstood the temptation of reading an unknown and much-boomed epic of the sea in the Everyman's Series can scarcely be excused for overlooking "Moby Dick" or passing up Ishmael's gusty narrative now that Mead Schaeffer has contributed twelve paintings and a noble title page that reek of the salt tang of the sea fully as much as the text they illustrate.

MOBY DICK. By Herman Melville. New York: Dodd, Mead & Co.; $3.50.

A Maxwell Novel.

According to the printed list of W. B. Maxwell's novels "Spinster of This Parish" is the sixteenth. Mr. Maxwell has inherited from his mother, M. E. Braddon, author of "Lady Audley's Secret," a talent for storytelling. It is noticeable in nearly all of his novels. That is to say, he can clutch and hold the reader's absorbed attention throughout the tale.

"Spinster of This Parish" is no exception. It is a recital of the love story of an old maid, who has lived, and loved, and anguished, forsworn peace of mind, and periled comfort and safety for love's sake; and who has held for a quarter of a century the love of a famous English explorer. For this love she renounced home, family, friends, reputation, because her lover was bound fast, according to the stupid English law, by his marriage to a maniac.

In "For Better for Worse" Mr. Maxwell drove a shining lance straight at the imbecilities of the British laws governing marriage and divorce. But, while the author paints with loving strokes the long, selfless and heroic devotion of a mild, sweet gentlewoman who, if she and her lover had been Americans, would have had a lifetime of happy, legitimate union with the man of her heart, he manages to do his propaganda very unobtrusively but effectively against the British law. Evidently he recognizes that that is the only way to influence dogged British opinion.

Sir Arthur Conan Doyle places W. B. Maxwell somewhere near the head of living British novelists; an estimate showing that, as a literary critic, Sir Arthur has more enthusiasm than balance. The Maxwell novels are very interesting and absorbing, but none of them are great, and this latest one has the good qualities of his best ones; but also their limitations.

SPINSTER OF THIS PARISH. By W. B. Maxwell. New York: Dodd, Mead & Co.; $2.

The Ambush.

Arthur Richman, whose comedy, "The Awful Truth," was presented in San Francisco during the recent season of the Henry Miller company, soared to the heights of seriousness in "The Ambush." It is, in common with many of the plays of the day that dare to depict life as it is, a realistic view of family life at close range. And for the leading feminine rôle it presents a young woman of the day, with all her intolerance for the humdrum of daily life, and the adventurous spirit springing from it.

The complication is the restraining influence of a father whose native dignity and worth, as well as his faith in the integrity of his daughter, cause that daughter to make her adventurous sorties with secrecy and circumspection.

It is a queer situation of feminine intrigue against the peace of a good man, for the mother, who backs up the daughter, is subconsciously aware that there is something fishy in the situation, and she endures it in order to hold the daughter.

"Ambush" is thoroughly modern drama; the kind held in disesteem by the average play-goer because it unshrinkingly depicts situations founded on life.

The pathos in the situation lies in the effort finally made by the father to compromise with his principles in order to retain the affection of his daughter. The outcome outrages the rosy-spectacled sentimentalist, but the character of Margaret, the daughter, is a truthful representation of the advanced young female egoist of the present day whose principles have not been able to bear up against the license that she draws from her twentieth-century freedom. Characters, situation, dialogue, plot, all are logical; too logical, indeed, for the play, when it was produced in New York, was only a succes d'estime.

THE AMBUSH. By Arthur Richman. New York: Duffield & Co.

New Books Received.

FIELDING SARGENT. By Elsa Barker. New York: E. P. Dutton & Co.; $2.

A novel of psycho-analysis.

ARGONAUTS OF THE WESTERN PACIFIC. By Bronislaw Malinowski. New York: E. P. Dutton & Co.; $8.

An account of native enterprise and adventure in the archipelagoes of Melanesia. New Guinea.

THREE ASSSES IN BOLIVIA. By Lionel L. Portman. Boston: Houghton Mifflin Company; $4.

Travel.

GEORGE WASHINGTON. By William Roscoe Thayer. Boston: Houghton Mifflin Company; $3.50.

A biography.

VANDERDECK. By H. de Vere Stacpoole. New York: Robert M. McBride & Co.

A light-hearted venture story.

THE GREEN OVERCOAT. By Hilaire Belloc. New York: Robert M. McBride & Co.; $1.75.

A new edition with illustrations by G. K. Chesterton.

MORE AUTHORS AND I. By G. Lewis Hind. New York: Dodd, Mead & Co.

A new book of intimate pen pictures of writers by the author of "Authors and I."

THE TALE OF TRIONA. By William J. Locke. New York: Dodd, Mead & Co.; $2.

A romance.

SAND. By Olive Wadsley. New York: Dodd, Mead & Co.; $1.75.

A romance of the desert.

WHAT I SAW IN AMERICA. By G. K. Chesterton. New York: Dodd, Mead & Co.; $3.

Chesterton's American observations.

THE TOCIN IN REVOLT. By Brander Matthews. New York: Charles Scribner's Sons; $2.

And other essays.

THE CAVE WOMAN. By Norval Richardson. New York: Charles Scribner's Sons; $1.75.

A novel.

PLAYING WITH SOULS. By Countess de Chamberlain. New York: Charles Scribner's Sons; $1.75.

A novel.

AMERICANS BY CHOICE. By John Palmer Gavit. New York: Harper & Brothers; $2.50.

Americanization studies.

SELLING THE EASTERN STATES. By John T. Faris. Philadelphia: J. B. Lippincott Company; $5.

The latest addition to the Faris travel books.

DELAWARE AND THE EASTERN SHORE. By Edward

IT'S THE WATER.

Prepared with Glacier Water from Shasta Springs

AT ALL DEALERS

SHASTA WATER COMPANY

Noble Vallandigham. Philadelphia: J. B. Lippincott Company; $5.

"Some aspects of a peninsula pleasant and well beloved."

WINONA ON HER OWN. By Margaret Widdemer. Philadelphia: J. B. Lippincott Company; $1.75.

Camp-Fire Girl Series.

THE A B C'S OF BUSINESS. By Henry S. McKee. New York: The Macmillan Company; $1.

Elementary principles of economics.

The White House

The Valley of Content

By BLANCHE UPRIGHT

A San Francisco author's first novel

—the dramatic version to be produced in New York this season, by Marjorie Rambeau. $1.90

Book Dept., Main Floor.

Raphael Wall & Co. Inc.

All Books that are reviewed in the Argonaut can be obtained at

Robertson's

222 STOCKTON ST.

Union Square San Francisco

THE HOLMES BOOK CO.

707 Market St. 152 Kearny St. 22 Third St.

Largest variety of new and second-hand books in the city. A visit to our stores will convince you of the truth of this assertion. We buy libraries or single books for cash. See us before selling. Phone—Douglas 3283.

SAN FRANCISCO, CAL.

IF YOU ARE A REAL BOOK-LOVER

Spend a pleasant hour in the real "Old Book Shop" at 2 TILLMAN PLACE, OFF GRANT AVENUE—below Sutter.

Rare Old Books Bought, Sold and Hunted For by GEORGE HARGENS (formerly of the White House)

BOOKS AT PAUL ELDER'S

239 POST ST., SAN FRANCISCO

NEWBEGIN'S BOOKSTORE

358 POST STREET SAN FRANCISCO

Opposite Union Square

A Shop known for its courteous service, and a pleasant place to browse.

Information on books, authors and editions gladly given. Books bought and sold. Buyer will call.

Telephone Douglas 2810

JOHN HOWELL

IMPORTER BOOKS PUBLISHER

Rare Books and First Editions

Libraries Bought and Sold

328 Post Street : Union Square

Sutter 3268

SAN FRANCISCO

The Wright Magazine

("Not for self, but for others")

Only $1.00 a Year.

Besides a serial and short stories it contains departments for literary and music, women and children, farm and garden, a people's forum, manuscript markets, radio notes and other interesting features.

THE WRIGHT MAGAZINE

P. O. Box 894 Little Rock, Ark.

$1500 SCENARIO

Reproduced in typewritten form, exactly as written by noted screen author (former editor-in-chief of American Film Company) and produced as a feature picture with famous star.

One of the author's thirty successful photoplays.

Shows you by actual, authoritative example just what a scenario is and how it is written.

Includes the complete five-reel continuity used by the director in "shooting" the picture. Also, glossary of technical terms and introductory chapter of illuminating facts and pointers.

Interesting to every one as a specimen of the world's new literary art, and invaluable to scenario writers as a model and practical guide.

By mail, $3.00.

HARVARD PRESS

2943 Harvard Boulevard LOS ANGELES

"ROMEO AND JULIET."

This week Evelyn Vaughan is realizing the ambition of all actresses who love their profession by appearing as Juliet. With her is William S. Rainey as Romeo, although since this young actor has quite a number of Shakespearean rôles to his credit and is now making his first appearance as Romeo, we may perhaps assume that he had chosen by preference the other rôles first. The two players gave so interesting, romantically pictorial, and, in Miss Vaughan's case, so moving a portrayal of the great love tragedy that it seems as if the pair, with Emelie Melville along for her traditionally correct conception of the nurse, ought to go on tour and boldly storm the Eastern citadels.

For against the space-restricted but gracefully artistic background provided by the scenic artists at the Players Theatre we saw the ancient tragedy played out to its woeful conclusion with unusual elements to lend it distinctiveness and grace.

Evelyn Vaughan made Juliet a thing of beauty. She costumed her in the sweeping, graceful robes that we now so rarely see. Her tall figure gained æsthetic perfection in those ivory-pale costumes. She and Mr. Rainey give perhaps a more intellectual coloring to their interpretation of the emotions undergone by the two lovers. But in Miss Vaughan's case there is, even so, an extremely fine and carefully detailed presentment of all Juliet's phases—her young expectancy in the first act, her instinctive recognition of the flavor of woe in the "sudden bud of love," the later full flowering of that bud, the woman's suffering, and the desperate courage with which she nerves herself to her fearful ordeal in the potion scene.

As for Mr. Rainey, he presented that rare stage figure, a young, handsome, slender and graceful Romeo, and gave the Shakespearean lines with music and poetic feeling. What was particularly lacking was complete submergence in the nature and emotions of the fiery lover; a fault that repetition will doubtless correct; or partly, at any rate.

Miss Vaughan's always searching study of all her rôles and her invaluable sophistication in her profession enables her to give all the detail necessary to make herself into the outward presentment of Juliet. And her reading is admirable; that of an actress who never slights the meaning of a word or a phrase.

This was particularly noticeable in the potion scene, one of the most taxing scenes in all Shakespeare, in which the actress gave every utterance its full emotional significance, leading up to a finely graded climax that was worthy of an actress of great reputation.

Emelie Melville's nurse was worthy of Miss Vaughan's Juliet, the two playing those charming lighter scenes which, like a sunlit lull before a storm, prelude the great cloudburst in the traditional spirit. In them, however, while Miss Vaughan's technic was impeccable, the imagination within her was scarcely fused to the white heat that sufficiently conveys the youthful emotions of a young Italian maiden.

It is scarcely to be expected that so long a cast could be adequately supplied in a semi-amateur company. But in the fencing and street brawling scenes the inexperienced support provided the necessary youth and excitement, and they went off very well, while in the more obvious essentials the performance was carefully looked after and showed intelligent and painstaking direction.

Romeo made a gallant figure; a little too much titivated, perhaps, in the earlier scenes, but that was probably to indicate the frivolous gallantry that preceded his great love. I am of the opinion that a wig would deprive Mr. Rainey of some of the modernism of his face, although it can not but be a temptation for a young Romeo with a head of hair to show it. Few indeed are the Romeos of my recollection who dared show themselves without a wig.

As with the fencing scenes, those at the Capulet festivity which showed the guests dancing were well contrived, and full of an agreeably youthful atmosphere.

And so, thinking it all over on the morning after, setting aside the business consideration, which is a ticklish proposition these times, and merely viewing the question on its merits, I believe that Evelyn Vaughan and William Rainey might win considerable professional prestige if the Travers-Rainey combination stormed the Eastern circuit with "Romeo and Juliet."

THE MACBETH CONCERT.

Florence Macbeth is a most engaging little figure on the concert platform with her pretty face, her blonde coloring, her petite figure, and the dainty costume with its piquant blend of modern smartness and Watteau coquettishness, with which she so provocatively enhanced her native graces.

Miss Macbeth proved a notable attraction at the opening of the third season of Alice Seckel's "Matinées Musicales," the large gathering of music lovers present in the Hotel St. Francis ballroom on that occasion giving many warm demonstrations of the pleasure afforded them by the petite singer.

Miss Macbeth's voice matches her person, as it is light, gay, delicately finished, and very charming. It is a voice that ought to soar, larklike, to considerable altitudes. But there is its limitation, the spectacular upper notes becoming thin and squeezed; a temporary fault, probably, through fatigue; certainly a cause for surprise, so fresh, pure, and almost juvenile in its airy purity is the quality of her voice in the less lofty altitudes. And, besides, her technic is so reliable; that of a vocalist who has apparently added to a naturally good method the study of a joyously enthusiastic student.

So well developed is this technic that the singer gives all the gay embroideries of a Shadow Song from "Dinorah"—the aria in which Galli-Gurci made her first New York killing—with the joyous spontaneity of a bird. Her voice has remarkable flexibility, and the spontaneity with which it tosses off trills, cadenzas, and all the ornaments of the coloratura in which she excels amazes and delights her listeners.

Besides several specimens of this highly ornate vocalism, which included an unfamiliar aria from Mozart's "Il Seraglio," Rossini's "Tarantella," and the familiar "Ah, fors è lui," the singer gave seven or eight numbers characterized by lyric delicacy, in which her youthful tonal beauties and the charm of her diction were pleasingly conveyed.

The Verdi aria, however, showed some limitation of sorrowful emotional expression, for, save in the passages in which Violetta runs over the gamut of joy, the singer was away from her natural song. Joy is her specialty, as a songster, and whether she sings through the vocal intricacies of the "Shadow Song" or warbles with the spontaneous glee of a happy child of "Hayfields and Butterflies," the dainty little singer is at her best in ministering to the human delight in its beautifully artistic expression.

MODERN TENDENCIES.

In an extremely interesting interview granted to a press representative by George Middleton, the well-known American playwright who wrote "Circles," "Polly with a Past," and "The Light of the World," a very enlightened and intelligent survey of the French and German stage is presented. Mr. Middleton's deductions after his close and comprehensive study are enlightening. He finds that the French drama is more nationalistic than the German, which is hospitable to foreign importations. This is due to the centralization of Paris in all art matters, which still further limits the nature of the drama in Paris. All good Frenchmen go to the theatre when they go to Paris, and as the provincial wishes no reflection of his duller life on the stage, and the Parisian takes no interest in life except as it is lived in Paris, it follows that the French stage is restricted in its expression to a reflection of Parisian life.

In Germany it is different. There the tendency is to break away from tradition. The hope of Germany rests in the youth of the working classes, who are non-militaristic, unconservative, and progressive.

The competition in the different sections of Germany has always had a healthy effect on the dramatic output, and theatrical men in Germany have always been readier in experimentation than those of France.

The stage in both countries is suffering from hard times, many people in the professional classes being utterly without the means of affording theatrical amusement. And the German theatres have, many of them, lost their stage subsidies, while those in France have to struggle against heavy taxes.

But there is so much vitality in the theatre that in spite of these heavy handicaps it still, to a certain extent, holds its own in both countries.

And even in conservative and, at present, poverty-stricken France there are to be staged in its capital this winter a number of American plays. They will be seen at the Odéon, a subsidized theatre, at which will be given Mr. Middleton's "The Light of the World," O'Neill's "Anna Christie" and "The Hairy Ape," Moody's "The Great Divide"—chosen, perhaps, for its essentially Western atmosphere—"Kindling," by Charles Kenyon, and "The New York Idea," by Langdon Mitchell. The activity in picture plays in Germany has reacted heavily on the stage, many of the prominent stage favorites having been attracted to the screen plays by the greater monetary reward.

And in France, while the legitimate acting profession stays on the job, spoken drama also has lost through the picture plays, the producers of which cannily recognize the growing taste for various forms of pugilism, Georges Carpentier and Eugene Criqui having been lured to show their physical prowess on the screen. But the spoken drama has rallied against this body-blow by having commandeered short plays containing scenes in which popular champions can be seen in exhibitions of boxing proficiency.

A curious feature of the German theatre is the prevalence of French farces in Berlin, which are much affected by the mental light-weights. Another tendency, newly developed, is toward the scenic play. Thus while on the whole France remains conservative, Germany, animated by the progressivism of the newly-risen generation, veers toward change.

OLD DALY DAYS.

In a recent interview in New York John Drew said that the happiest days of his professional life were those when he was in the Augustin Daly company, playing opposite Ada Rehan. Many of the old-timers in San Francisco would back him up to the extent of declaring that those were their happiest theatre-going days. For those were before the era of the long runs. That meant that there were stock companies of exceptional merit. And so, when the carefully selected Daly company came to San Francisco, instead of seeing that interesting group of players in one play only, local theatre-goers, always hungry for good plays, saw them during a prolonged season in which they would appear in a number of plays.

There seem, nowadays, to be many hints of a revival of the high-class stock company institution, players themselves having made a start, as shown by the Equity Theatre venture. Should the institution revive, it will be a godsend to the profession, for there is nothing so deadening to the art of the player as confining him to one rôle for the space of a year or two.

John Drew is right in saying that the difference in the old way and the new is caused by differing conditions. But the main difference has been caused by shrewd business men controlling the theatrical business today instead of the old-style men of artistic sympathies who ran it in the past.

The actors taking a hand, as in the stock company of the Equity Theatre, New York, is a process that is probably viewed with alarm, or, at any rate, with disapprobation, by the kingpins in stageland who have had so much say heretofore. Perhaps the players won't make it go. But many of the lights of the stage feel a great sympathy for the new venture, some of them—Jane Cowl, for instance—having relinquished the importance and the profits of stardom to embark in it, and then the twentieth century has developed a new type: men who combine artistic and business ability; so perhaps we may look for big results.

JOSEPHINE HART PHELPS.

ESMOND'S

"THE CAKE SHOP"

253 Grant Ave.

We offer a large variety of pies, cakes and pastries—all of the highest quality and flavor.

"ECCLES CAKES" Our Specialty

To Add 24 Million Gallons Daily to Our Water Supply:

Calaveras Reservoir in the Alameda County system of the Spring Valley Water Company is being increased in storage capacity, and

A new aqueduct is being constructed to carry Calaveras water to Crystal Springs, the largest reservoir in the San Mateo County system of Spring Valley Water Company.

Spring Valley builds the new aqueduct as far as Irvington, and

The City and County of San Francisco builds it from Irvington to Crystal Springs.

This Irvington-to-Crystal-Springs section of the new aqueduct will be the Bay Division of the Hetch Hetchy conduit, and will eventually carry Hetch Hetchy water to Crystal Springs.

Besides financing its own part of this project, Spring Valley pays the interest on the Hetch Hetchy bonds sold to build this Irvington-to-Crystal-Springs line, relieving all other San Francisco taxpayers of this burden, and will also pay the City for the use of the line.

Work is in progress at both ends of the new aqueduct.

While Spring Valley is raising Calaveras Dam, the City is driving the Pulgas Tunnel to Crystal Springs.

Through this program of co-operation the daily water supply of San Francisco will be increased from 42 to 66 million gallons, and our growing city will have an abundance of water for years to come.

SPRING VALLEY WATER COMPANY

COLUMBIA THEATRE

Geary at Mason Phone Franklin 150

Two Weeks—Beginning Monday, October 30
Matinees Wednesday and Saturday
Sam H. Harris Presents William Anthony McGuire's Captivating Comedy

"SIX-CYLINDER LOVE"

It Gripped N. Y. for 60 Laughful Weeks
This attraction will not play Oakland

RIVOLI OPERA HOUSE

Market at Seventh. Phone Market 373

Matinee
Saturday
and
Sunday

FERRIS HARTMAN
AND
PAUL STEINDORFF

Present the Comic Opera Classic

"The Chimes of Normandy"

Best Seats One Dollar

CURRAN THEATRE

Geary Street Phone Prospect 9300

Two Weeks Only
Matinees Wednesday and Saturday
Wm. A. Brady Presents the World-Wide Success

"The Man Who Came Back"

Prices—Nights, 50c to $2; Sat. mat., 50c to $1.50; Wed. mat., 50c.

MATINEES DAILY 25 and 50c

EVENINGS 25c TO $1.25

Except Sats., Suns. and Holidays

ALWAYS A GREAT SHOW

SMOKING PERMITTED IN DRESS CIRCLE AND LOGES

Keep California Free from Political Control of Industry

We represent many owners of real property in California. The tax burden on real property, which falls ultimately on tenants as well, and the tax burden on public utilities, which falls ultimately on rate payers, have become oppressive.

The great bulk of our California taxes are laid upon us by popular votes and not by the local and state legislative authorities. The people are too prone to vote for bonds and other expenses without calculating the cost to themselves in taxes. When they get the tax bill, they groan and wonder who saddled them with such burdens.

from Enormous Debt

State Controller Ray L. Riley in his 1921 report, recently published, says:

"During the past decade the total bonded indebtedness for all forms of government in California has increased from $93,906,423 to $321,616,238.66, or 242 per cent, while the wealth of the State has increased about 60 per cent. This tremendous increase that aggregates more than 3 per cent of the total wealth of the State should have the attention of all tax-levying bodies. California's credit must not be jeopardized by over-financing and the same ratio of increase during the next ten years would impose confiscating tax burdens upon the people."

"During the past year the total amount expended for interest and redemption of debt was $27,559,297. To produce this amount it would require a tax rate of 56 cents on every $100 of assessed valuation."

from Destructive Taxes

In face of that warning, a proposed constitutional amendment has been put on your ballot to be voted on November 7th which creates a powerful new commission, called the Water and Power Board, and authorizes it, without further reference to the people or the legislature, to issue state bonds to the enormous amount of half a billion dollars. That bond issue will multiply the state's debt more than six times. The board is authorized to invest the money in water and power speculations and "to do any and all things necessary or convenient for the conservation, development, storage and distribution of water, and the generation, transmission and distribution of electric energy." It is authorized also "to purchase, acquire, produce, manufacture or otherwise provide facilities, materials and supplies, raw or finished, and any property or thing necessary or convenient to the accomplishment of the purposes of this article."

The board is authorized to fix its own rates, which need not be uniform, so that particular localities or industries could be favored. The proposed amendment makes an appointive board, sitting at Sacramento, the arbitrary masters of the credit and the industry of the State of California. The amendment even authorizes the board to appoint and fix the compensation of such employees as it may require and exempts the board from the state civil service.

This is bureaucracy in its completest form. We have had sufficient experience with government by bureaus to know that we don't want any more. California, prosperous as it is, cannot stand the proposed addition to the state debt and the proposed arbitrary control of industry by a board of politicians. Give a political board unrestricted authority to hire employees and fix their compensation, and give them 500 million dollars of taxpayers' money to play with, and in a year you will see the biggest political machine and the biggest tax bills that any state has ever had.

Vote NO on number 19 on your ballot November 7th

CALIFORNIA REAL ESTATE ASSOCIATION

By C. C. C. TATUM, President

VANITY FAIR.

New York has been enjoying an auction of the household effects and even some of the clothing of Geraldine Farrar, the principal patrons (or matrons) of which were women—although it is said the few men attending spent more real money in proportion to conversation. Rugs, carpets, paintings, china and glass from the Farrar home at 20 West Twenty-Fourth Street have been going at lively rates. One day's efforts of the come-on artist grossed some $22,480 for the star of the Metropolitan. It was rather difficult to sell her slippers, as they had been made to order and did not carry a size mark, and so the ladies that might have been proud to wear them, even "as was," were uncertain and failed to bid very heatedly. Captain John Emery got a 150-piece dinner service for $400 and felt lucky to have it. There have been few real souvenir hunters, which goes to show that female sentimentality automatically checks at the pocket-book. Some of the personal belongings of Miss Farrar sold were a squirrel coat, $185; a broadtail suit, edged with Japanese sable, $220; a green velvet kolinsky-trimmed opera cloak, $95; a black velvet wrap, trimmed with monkey fur, $70; Hudson seal coat, $230; black wrap with lynx collar and rose velvet lining, $135; flame-color changeable taffeta evening wrap, $45; a black lace evening gown, $70; Hudson seal hat, $15; hat of green duvetyne, trimmed with ostrich feathers, $13; Japanese sable muff, $25; brocade evening slippers, $6; patent-leather slippers, $9; coral neck charm, $35; gold, ruby-set smelling salts bottle, $100; gold checkbook case, $30; vanity case, set with diamonds and sapphires, $410; cigarette case of jade, set with diamonds and rubies, $230; gold handkerchief holder, $20; shell-cameo brooch, carved with a figure representing music, $35; lipstick holder of gold, $17.50, and a gold band bracelet, set with pearls, $50. An onyx desk set of seven pieces said to have been used by Miss Farrar for her private correspondence went for $62.50. A mahogany desk brought $110. That sine qua non of every New York apartment or flat that pretends to amount to anything, a gate-legged table, brought $10—but they do say they are going out. A California redwood manuscript box brought $3 more.

Geraldine did pretty well on pictures. She seemed to run to Venuses. A "Venus Rising from the Sea" (highly original idea) by Boucher brought $260. "Juno and Venus" sold for $180, which seems reasonable for so pulchritudinous a pair. This was by Francesco Albini, 1660. Introducing Mars in place of Juno cost Geraldine $20 two and a half centuries later, for an Albini "Mars and Venus" brought but $160. The mistress of Henry II of France did better—"Diane de Poitiers" by Laneville selling for $200. These items were followed by costumes grouped according to operas, and the star's famous collections of fans, and her autographed "favorite songs." The costumes were those in which she actually sang in "Carmen," "La Tosca," "Manon," "Zaza," "Sans-Gêne," "La Reine Fiamette," "Thais," "Faust,"

"Madame Butterfly," "Romeo and Juliet," and "La Bohème."

Little has been said as to why Geraldine is auctioning off her goods and chattels in this common, mortal manner. We suspect, however, that it is because she would rather have the money.

A woman who was playing a bugle in the Boulevard Montmartre the other day and collecting money was recognized, just as the police were taking her to the station, as the Princess Poltcouchhof, who, a former lady-in-waiting to the Czarina, had been reduced to this to buy food for herself. A compatriot recognized her and obtained her release.

An attachment has been invented that enables stockings to be darned on a sewing machine.

"Travel Without Trouble"

COOK'S TRAVEL SERVICE

World wide—Complete—Efficient

Inclusive Tours for Individual Travel
arranged, to start any day by
any route.

Explanatory circular on request

THOS. COOK & SON
(Est. 1841)

Agents for the best lines for travel by
Land, Water or Air

128 SUTTER STREET

(COOK'S BUILDING) Phone Kearny 3512

Press Clippings

Are money-makers for Contractors, Supply
Houses, Business Men and
Corporations

ALLEN'S PRESS CLIPPING BUREAU
Phone Douglas 5119 121 Second Street

THE CHARLES NELSON CO.

MANUFACTURER AND WHOLESALER
of

REDWOOD, DOUGLAS FIR,
SPRUCE, HEMLOCK,
SUGAR & WHITE PINE,
CEDAR SHINGLES & POLES.

230 California St. San Francisco

E. C. EVANS & SONS, Inc.

(Established 1881)

STEAMSHIP AGENTS

SHIP AND INSURANCE BROKERS

260 California Street, San Francisco

Phone Douglas 8040 Cable Address "DEWGRIP"

GENERAL PETROLEUM CORPORATION

Offices at

SAN FRANCISCO LOS ANGELES
Alaska Commercial Bldg. Higgins Bldg.

HAMMOND LUMBER COMPANY

260 CALIFORNIA ST.

REDWOOD, DOUGLAS FIR

AND PILING

SERVICE

To Sacramento

Observation Cars leave 7:20 A.M.,
9:00 A.M., 4:40 P.M.

Diner Service on Meteor leaving
4:40 P.M. through to Chico.

We Carry Baggage

SACRAMENTO SHORT LINE

Col. Good and Neighbors made power development possible

COLONEL GOOD and Citizen Thrifty—together with nearly fifty thousand other people, mostly Californians—are the ones who stood back of the P G and E engineers and other employees in developing the present wealth of hydro-electric power.

SUCH MEN AS Merchant Square and Judge Right—the neighborly fellows you see daily—are the ones who advanced the money to make the development work possible.

THIS "public partnership" arrangement is a source of pride with the officials of this Company. That the millions of dollars invested in this huge enterprise are only the accumulated small sums of individuals from nearly every city, town and hamlet in the state, is a fact worthy of special emphasis.

THINK OF IT! Fifty thousand people furnish the money to carry on the job—over 8000 people do the work, and 1,700,000 people are served thereby. Here is community co-operation with a vengeance.

WHEN ONE STOPS to consider it, there is small wonder that "Superior" California is so generously supplied with electrical power at the present time. Such teamwork cannot help but bring success.

IN VIEW of the fact that this section now has a surplus of power, and that this Company is rapidly developing even more power, it only remains for the people to co-operate in devising ways to make greater use of power in order to hasten a greater prosperity.

PACIFIC GAS AND ELECTRIC COMPANY

P • G • and E •
"PACIFIC SERVICE"

STORYETTES.

Grave and Gay, Epigrammatic and Otherwise.

The cyclist's hat blew off and a passing countryman restored it to him, thus saving him the trouble of getting off his machine. "I weally must get some stwing to keep this bally hat on," muttered the cyclist as he wheeled off without a word of thanks. The countryman had a better suggestion. "Get a nail, guv'nor!" he shouted.

The elderly charwoman was holding forth vituperatively concerning her mistress' laziness. As her indignation cranked itself along her self pity grew apace. "Not a 'and will she turn, mum," she fumed. "Not a 'and! On'y fancy, mum, yesterday she called me to take a black beetle off'n her own shoulder. And 'er supposed to be so fond of animals!"

Many examples of babu English are published from time to time, but an advertisement that appeared in the columns of an Indian paper must be among the best. Here it is, word for word: "Mahomed Osman, hair-cutter and clean shaver. Gentlemen's throats cut with very sharp razors with great care and skill. No irritating feeling afterwards. A trial solicited."

Bill was telling a war story. "So we started out from Wipers," he said. "Ypres," said the old lady, very correctly. "Well, as I was saying, we went from Wipers—" "Ypres," said the old lady. "We set out, as I say, and after four days up in the line we was back again in Wipers." "Ypres," said the old lady.

The soldier stopped and looking at her pityingly. "You ain't 'alf got 'iccupps," he said.

Conan Doyle describes the experiences of two little girls who discovered real fairies in the woods. Very different is the attitude of the four-year-old son of a certain scientific man, who has lived in the country most of his short life. A visitor who took him on his knee asked, "And are there any fairies in your woods here, Robert?" "No," replied the child promptly, "but there are lots of edible fungi."

Three men named Jones, all in the same line of business, opened shops next door to each other. The one on the right had the name Jones painted in large letters over the door. The one on the left immediately did the same thing. The signwriter then approached the centre Mr. Jones, asking him if he would like his name painted also. "No," said the wily one. "I want you to paint the word 'entrance' over my door."

Sambo had had the misfortune to pick out an unusually belligerent helpmeet. After three days of "moneymoon" he returned to his job looking slightly wilted and very woe-begone. His employer was facetious. "Sam, you look as if you had been in a battle." "Yo, jes' bet Ah has, boss," was Sam's mournful rejoinder. "An' what's more, it done appear that I've gone and married myself to the whole world war."

After Mr. Smith had raked his yard he took the accumulated rubbish into the road to burn. A number of neighbors' children came flocking about the bonfire, among them a little girl whom Mr. Smith did not remember having seen before. Wishing, with his usual kindness, to make the stranger feel at ease, he beamed upon her and said, heartily: "Hello! Isn't this a new face?" A deep red suffused her freckles. "No," she stammered, "it ain't new. It's just been washed."

From Ballynea to Ballyfar the railroad is a single track. The stationmaster at Ballynea once started the train without consulting any one. While he was watching it disappear in the distance the signalman stuck his head out of his box and said, "Did ye shtart her?" "I did," replied the other. "An' me just callin' the wan from Ballyfar!" cried the signalman. The other rubbed his hands, saying, "Be gor, she'll meet her match!"

Among many amusing stories that Sir Guy Fleetwood Wilson tells is one concerning two neighbors. One of them, a retired army officer, bred bull terriers, the other, a famous novelist, specialized in Persian pussies; and there was as little love lost between the soldier and the author as there was between their dogs and their cats. Presently the soldier died, and the novelist, an essentially kind-hearted man, attended the funeral. The presiding parson, rather foolishly, went up to him and said: "I can not but express my surprise at your being here." "And why the dickens shouldn't I come to the old boy's funeral?" snapped back the other. "He would have been precious glad to have come to mine."

THE MERRY MUSE.

Dear Little Hand.

Dear little hand, I hold you tight
Against my breast, while keen delight
Takes full possession of a soul
Lost to despair until you stole
So softly into mine tonight.

And now my fear is banished quite
With you my rivals I will smite,
With you past losses are made whole,
Dear little hand.

To you sweet verses I'll indite,
And make them neat like this I write,
What can't one do when such a goal
Is to be gained? See this fat roll?
Three acres full put this in sight—
Dear little hand!

—P. A. Connolly in Punch.

ORNAMENTALS, FRUIT TREES, VINES AND FIELD GROWN ROSES

Open Daily and Sunday to visitors and purchasers
GEO. C. ROEDING, Pres.

California Nursery Company

(Founded in 1865 by John Rock)
NILES, CALIFORNIA

BALFOUR, GUTHRIE & CO.

SAN FRANCISCO AND LOS ANGELES,
PORTLAND, SEATTLE, TACOMA,
AND VANCOUVER.

MERCHANTS
EXPORTERS AND IMPORTERS
MARINE AND FIRE INSURANCE
AVERAGE ADJUSTERS

Agents of
HARRISON DIRECT LINE OF STEAMERS
TO AND FROM EUROPEAN PORTS
and
COMMONWEALTH GOVERNMENT LINE

Redwood Export Company

California Redwood
Lumber and Ties

Cargoes and Parcels
"To off shore markets only"

260 CALIFORNIA STREET
SAN FRANCISCO, CALIF.

Phone Sutter 2163

UNION LUMBER CO.

CROCKER BUILDING
SAN FRANCISCO, CALIFORNIA

MANUFACTURERS AND WHOLESALERS

—OF—
REDWOOD LUMBER
RAILROAD TIES
TELEGRAPH POLES
SHINGLES

—AND—
SPLIT REDWOOD PRODUCTS

Geo. E. Billings Roy C. Ward Geo. B. Dinsmore
J. C. Muessdorffer Jas. W. Dean

GEO. E. BILLINGS CO.

ALL FORMS OF INSURANCE
EFFECTED

312 California St., San Francisco, Cal.
Phone—Douglas 6400

BONESTELL & CO. PAPER

The paper used in printing the Argonaut is
furnished by us
CALIFORNIA'S LEADING PAPER HOUSE
118 to 124 First Street, corner Minna,
San Francisco

DESTRUCTIVE "Sulpho" compounds are the cause of motor oils breaking down rapidly under engine heat. An enormous amount of money is annually lost through the presence of these unnecessary properties in oils.

Cycol will save engine owners this tremendous amount of money lost through wasted oil, wasted fuel, preventable repairs, because it is free from destructive "sulpho" compounds. These have been removed by the new Hexeon Process used exclusively by us.

When your oil contains destructive "sulpho" compounds it breaks down rapidly under engine heat. Its lubricating value becomes quickly impaired. The oil film is broken and serious damage may result.

Have your crank case thoroughly flushed—not with kerosene. Use the correct grade of Cycol as shown on the Cycol Recommendation Chart. Use Associated Gasoline. Then notice the improved performance of your motor.

ASSOCIATED OIL COMPANY
SAN FRANCISCO

CYCOL

MOTOR OIL

FREE FROM DESTRUCTIVE "SULPHO" COMPOUNDS

PERSONAL.

Social Notes.

Two engagements of interest have been announced during the week. The first, that of Miss Olive Edgington of New York to Mr. Evan S. Pillsbury, Jr., was made known on Sunday, October 15th. Miss Edgington is the daughter of Mr. and Mrs. William R. Edgington of New York. Mr. Pillsbury is the son of Mr. and Mrs. Horace D. Pillsbury of San Francisco and grandson of the late Mr. Evan S. Pillsbury and of the late General and Mrs. Charles Taylor of Boston. Mrs. Alfred de Kopp (Miss Olivia Pillsbury) was hostess at luncheon at the Town and Country Club on Tuesday afternoon, at which the formal announcement of the engagement was made. Among the guests asked to meet Miss Edgington were Miss Josephine Grant, Miss Edith Grant, Miss Renée Carhart, Miss Aileen McIntosh, Miss Frances Pringle, Miss Alice Requa, Miss Jean Howard, Miss Margaret Lee, Miss Rosamonde Lee, Miss Agnes Shreve, Miss Ethel Lilley, Miss Clara Van Ness and Miss Mary Emma Flood. Miss Edgington came to California with Mrs. Pillsbury upon the latter's return from an European trip two weeks ago, and is a house guest at the Pillsbury home.

Mr. and Mrs. William Sproule have made the announcement of the engagement of their daughter, Miss Marie Louise Baldwin, to Mr. Eugene Kelly, son of Mrs. Robert Kelly and the late Mr. Robert Kelly of Huntington, Long Island. Mr. Kelly is a grandson of the late Mr. Eugene Kelly, a pioneer Californian. Miss Baldwin is the granddaughter of Mrs. Veronica Baird and the late Captain John H. Baird. The wedding date has been set for January 6th at St. Mary's Cathedral. Miss Baldwin has spent most of the year in the East, passing part of the time as a house guest at the Kelly home at Huntington.

On Saturday afternoon, October 14th, Miss Lorraine Brown became the bride of Mr. Robert Anderson at the Laguna-Street home of her uncle, Mr. John A. Hooper. The ceremony was performed by the Rev. William Thorp of Palo Alto at 4 o'clock. Miss Jessie Carter of Pasadena attended the bride as maid of honor, Miss Veronica Price and Miss Ruth Westcott as bridesmaids. Little Frank Hooper was the ring-bearer. Mr. and Mrs. Anderson are on a motor trip in the southern part of the state. On their return they will make their home in Piedmont.

Miss Renée Carhart of New York, who is the house guest of Miss Josephine Grant and Miss Edith Grant at their Burlingame home, was the complimented guest at two affairs on Saturday. In the afternoon Miss Mary Emma Flood entertained at luncheon in Miss Carhart's honor, asking Miss Edith Grant, Miss Josephine Grant, Miss Ruth Hobart, Miss Edna Taylor, Miss Jane Carrigan and Miss Lawton Filer. In the evening Miss Josephine Grant and Miss Edith Grant made Miss Carhart the incentive for a dinner party which they gave at the Hotel St. Francis. Mr. and Mrs. William Hendrickson, Jr., chaperoned the party, which included Miss Carhart, Miss Ruth Hobart, Miss Lawton Filer, Mr. Gordon Johnson, Mr. Geoffrey Montgomery and Mr. Alfred Hendrickson.

Miss Josephine Drown and Miss Frances Ames, who returned recently from a year's travel abroad, were entertained on Tuesday at a luncheon given by Miss Adrienne Sharp at her Pacific Avenue home. Besides Miss Drown and Miss Ames, Miss Sharp entertained Miss Edna Taylor, Miss Eleanor Spreckels, Miss Alice Moffitt, Miss Lawton Filer and Miss Lillian Hopkins. Miss Drown and Miss Ames will be among the first of the winter's debutantes, while Miss Sharp will be formally presented at a ball to be given by her parents, Mr. and Mrs. Arthur Sharp, in December.

Miss Marjorie Wright, the daughter of General and Mrs. William Mason Wright, who arrived recently from Manila with her parents, was the honored guest at a dinner and dance which Miss Eleanor Martin gave on Tuesday evening at her Burlingame home. Miss Martin's guests included Mr. and Mrs. Edward Clark, Jr., Mr. and Mrs. Howard Park, Miss Edna Taylor, Miss Lawton Filer, Miss Edith Grant, Miss Josephine Grant, Miss Eleanor Spreckels, Miss Renée Carhart, Miss Ruth Hobart, Mr. Richard Schwerin, Mr. Russell Wilson, Mr. Howard Spreckels, Mr. George Montgomery, Mr. Geoffrey Montgomery, Mr. Jerome Kuhn and Mr. Alfred Hendrickson.

Miss Helen Hammersmith, complimenting Miss Frances Lent and Miss Margaret Buckbee, two brides-elect entertained at luncheon on Tuesday at the Woman's Athletic Club. Miss Hammersmith's other guests were Mrs. Paul Fagan, Miss Gladys Quarre, Miss Frances Pringle, Miss Julia Van Fleet and Miss Geraldine Grace.

Mr. and Mrs. George Pope entertained Mr. and Mrs. Augustus Taylor and Mr. and Mrs. Eugene Murphy at dinner Wednesday evening in the Fable Room of the Hotel St. Francis.

Mrs. Charles G. Morton has set the third Wednesday in every month aside as receiving day at the home of the commanding general at Fort Mason. The first of these receptions took place on October 25th. Miss Elizabeth Huff, Mrs. Morton's daughter, will be in California for the second of the receptions, when she will assist Mrs. Morton in receiving.

Mrs. I. Lowenberg gave a reception and luncheon in honor of Mrs. David Preston Barrows of the University of California in the Palm Court of the Palace Hotel, Thursday, October 26th. In the receiving line were Mrs. Ray Lyman Wilbur, Dr. Aurelia Reinhardt, Mrs. Benjamin Ide Wheeler, Mrs. Melville Tenney, Mrs. Frank K. Mott and Mrs. Andrew M. Lawrence. The following ladies assisted in receiving: Mrs. Gaillard Stoney, Mrs. Martial Davoust, Miss Barrows, Miss E. S. Heller, Mrs. W. J. Gray, Mrs. Jewett W. Adam, Mrs. George H. Cabaniss, Mrs. W. W. Wymore, Mrs. Margaret Bruce Beaumont and Mrs. M. A. Wallin.

Mrs. Chase Kennedy, who will leave for the East in the near future, was the guest of honor at a luncheon given last Tuesday by Mrs. J. K. Nuttall at her home in Jackson Street.

Mrs. James H. Bull entertained at a luncheon party on Wednesday afternoon, complimentary to Mrs. William Dougherty, widow of Colonel Dougherty, who is in California visiting Mrs. Henry Wetherbee at Fruitvale.

On Tuesday afternoon the Misses Morrison of San Jose asked a number of intimate friends to tea at the Palace Hotel to greet Mrs. Dougherty.

FOYER AND BOX-OFFICE.

At the Columbia.

Planting a segment of homely American life upon the stage was the hope of William Anthony McGuire, dramatist, and in this he succeeded countless critics say, as evidenced by his comedy, "Six Cylinder Love," a Sam H. Harris production with a record of more than five hundred performances in New York before its westward tour was undertaken. "Six Cylinder Love" comes to the Columbia Theatre Monday night, October 30th.

John Galsworthy's interesting tragi-comedy, "The Skin Game," with a special cast, will be presented at the Columbia Theatre, November 12th. William A. Brady, in association with Reandean, Ltd., London, has brought over a company of players rehearsed in London by Basil Dean and Galsworthy himself.

"Piety and Pie."

One of the plays to be given its initial performance at the Sequoia Little Theatre, 1725 Washington Street, which is to open its second season of one-act plays on November 4th, is an American novelty called "Piety and Pie," by Blanche Cumming, a San Francisco girl.

The play attracted the attention of the director, Ruth Brenner, at one of the regular meetings of the Playcrafters in their Little Theatre Studio, 1725 California Street, and was chosen as the American comedy on the all-comedy bill to be presented this season. The beginnings of suffrage and mince-pie, with other early colonial discoveries, are involved in the plot. There are two scenes, the witch-ridden Salem Wood and the cottage of Dame Anne. The name Anne suggests the first American woman who asserted herself for reform, Anne Hutchinson. Blanche Cumming's play shows an easy way of accomplishing the reform, without suffering the inconvenience of banishment, as Anne Hutchinson did. That is where the "Pie" comes in.

Miss Cumming's is the third local play to be given an opening in the Sequoia Little Theatre, and several others will be given later.

The Franklin K. Lane Letters.

Dr. W. K. Guthrie, pastor of the First Presbyterian Church, will deliver a lecture in the Paul Elder Gallery, Saturday afternoon, November 4th, on the "Letters of Franklin K. Lane." He will speak with the advantage of having known Mr. Lane personally and will therefore the more accurately give his interpretation of this work of current interest.

Franklin K. Lane was the finest type of American public man, and his idealistic life will be an inspiration to generations of Americans. He was a born writer, capable of pouring out his rich and diversified personality in his letters, which have a literary distinction as marked as their historical importance. This lecture is under the direction of Paul Elder.

Up On Pirates.

Since American readers have shown their interest in Howard Pyle by buying out several editions of "Pyle's Book of Pirates," recently published by the Harpers, it is interesting to note what his sister, Miss Katharine Pyle, has to say about the distinguished Quaker artist and his school at Wilmington: "It was after he had taught at Drexel Institute in Philadelphia that he became intensely interested in the boys and girls that he came in contact with. He felt they showed so much promise that he wanted to carry along the work he had started. First, he had a summer school at Chadd's Ford, in the old house that was Washington's headquarters. And it was really queer to see the figures in costume scattered over the meadows. There would be, perhaps, a model in the brilliant uniform of a Colonial soldier, in a field carefully selected for the absence of cattle, who would hold a rushing, hasty attitude in a motionless pose for hours. Many of these drawings were sold, for my brother liked his pupils to do practical work from the start. Later on, he built studios next to his own in Wilmington, and gathered around him a large group of men and women, who have since become very well known. Maxfield Parrish attended his lectures. Violet Oakley and Jessie Wilcox Smith studied with him. There were Sarah Stillwell, Anna Wheeler Betts, Frank Schoonover, and others."

THE HILLCREST

American and European Plan
CALIFORNIA AND JONES STS.
Phone Franklin 3240

DEL MONTE

The Largest Resort Hotel Plant in the World
Where "Thinking People" can find Recreation
in Hotel del Monte's Comfort, Service and Outdoor Life. "Here every sportsman can find his chosen recreation."
TWO CHAMPIONSHIP GOLF COURSES
CARL S. STANLEY, Manager
DEL MONTE : : CALIFORNIA

San Ysidro Ranch

Furnished bungalows of various sizes;
situated on the foothills among the orange groves, overlooking the sea. Central dining-room, electric lights, hot and cold water. Good tennis court. Six miles from
Santa Barbara, two miles from ocean.
Booklet. Address MANAGER

San Ysidro Ranch, Santa Barbara

The Lure of Marin

—it calls to all who love the open! Make the best of the remaining opportunities of the swiftly closing outing season. All modern conveniences and comforts at HOTEL
RAFAEL. Unexcelled Table and Service.

POPULAR DINNER DANCE
Saturday 8 to 12

JOSEPH'S
American Beauty Roses
This beautiful rose will be found this season exclusively in our establishment.
Phone Sutter 423 233 Grant Ave.
FLORISTS

CHAPERON.

A lady who has lived abroad a number of years, and familiar with the languages, galleries and music of Europe, is anxious to chaperon one or two young girls; is free to travel; best of references. Box I, Argonaut.

Autumn
Excursions

to

Southern California

During October and November
Southern Pacific will sell daily at San Francisco, Oakland, Alameda and Berkeley Round-trip Excursion tickets to Los Angeles, Long Beach or Wilmington, as follows:

$30.00 RETURN LIMIT
FOUR MONTHS

$22.50 RETURN LIMIT
ONE MONTH

Stopovers allowed at all points.

These tickets will be good on any of our 7
Daily trains either way, or on the "Daylight Limited" leaving Third-Street Station, San Francisco, Fridays and Saturdays at 7:45 A.M.

Southern Pacific Lines

Ferry Station

50 Post Street

Or phone Sutter 4000

Third St. Station

CRITTALL
Steel Casements

Coast Representatives

J. E. DWAN, Los Angeles

F. T. CROWE & CO., Tacoma and Seattle

WATERHOUSE-WILCOX CO., San Francisco

J. McCRAKEN, Portland

Crittall Casement Window Co., Detroit, Manufacturers

ENGLISH
CASEMENTS
and Windows
for banks, offices,
schools, hospitals, etc

for artistic residences and
other substantial buildings

Made in varied designs
to meet all conditions

STRINGER STORAGE COMPANY

Sutter near Fillmore
and
Steiner near Sutter

Conducting a Storage
Business Founded
in 1880

Storage---Shipping
Expert Packing, Protection
and Dispatch

A fully informed representative, anxious to give you any desired information, will respond to your phone call.

Phone West 999

PERSONAL.

Movements and Whereabouts.

Miss Josephine Tynan has returned from Santa Barbara, where she has been visiting for several weeks.

Mr. and Mrs. Charles C. Moore and their family, who have passed the summer at their country home at Santa Cruz, have returned to San Francisco for the winter.

Mrs. Harry Hill, who for the past several months has traveled in Europe, has arrived in New York. Mrs. Hill will remain in New York for a month or more before returning to San Francisco.

Mr. and Mrs. William F. Perkins, who have made their home at the Fairmont Hotel, have taken an apartment in Sacramento Street for the winter.

PACIFIC GAS AND ELECTRIC COMPANY

33rd Consecutive Quarterly Dividend on First Preferred Stock

THE regular dividend for the three months ending October 31st, 1922, of $1.50 per share, upon the full-paid First Preferred Capital Stock of the Company will be paid on November 15th, 1922, to shareholders of record at the end of the quarterly period. Checks will be mailed in time to reach stockholders on the date they are payable.

A. F. HOCKENBEAMER,
Vice-President and Treasurer.
San Francisco, California.

MOST BEAUTIFUL

Rota-Gravure Section

in the world

Published Each
Sunday
by the

San Francisco Chronicle

ONLY
$5.20
a
Year

Including Every Sunday Feature
of the CHRONICLE

winter. They were the guests of their daughter, Mrs. Alfred Oyster, at her Scott Street home before taking possession.

Miss Helen Holman, who has spent the past half-year in Europe, returned to her home in Stanford Court on Monday.

Mr. and Mrs. Warren Quinn have closed their town house, and will make their home at the Palace Hotel for the winter.

Miss Marian Dunne and Miss Marjorie Dunne recently returned to San Francisco, after several months spent in Europe.

Mrs. Ellsworth Van Patten (Miss Evelyn McGaw) arrived at the end of the week from San Pedro to visit her parents, Mr. and Mrs. John McGaw. Commander Van Patten is to be with the U. S. S. Arizona in San Francisco harbor for a week, and Mrs. Van Patten will be here during that time.

Mr. and Mrs. C. O. G. Miller are established at their home in Pacific Avenue, after an extended absence abroad.

Mr. and Mrs. Frederick McNear are among the group of San Francisco people who have recently returned from Europe.

Mr. and Mrs. Charles Denby are among the passengers on the President Cleveland, which sailed last Wednesday for Japan. Mr. Denby is a brother of the Secretary of the Navy.

Mrs. Lorenzo Avenali is expected back the first of the week. Mrs. Avenali has been in Italy for several weeks, collecting antique furniture and tapestries.

Mr. and Mrs. Latham McMullin have returned to town for the winter, after spending the entire summer at Woodside.

Mr. and Mrs. Julian Thorne are also in San Francisco again, having closed their home in the Woodside hills for the winter.

Mrs. Francisco de Ojeda, with her son-in-law and daughter, Mr. and Mrs. Rudolph Henning, returning during the week to their home in Chicago. They have been visiting another daughter, Mrs. Bliss Hermann, in San Francisco.

Mr. and Mrs. Frank B. King have closed their Menlo Park summer home and returned to town for the winter.

Mr. and Mrs. Roger Lapham returned to town last week from Menlo Park. They leave the first of the week for the East, to spend a month or so, returning in time for the holidays.

Mr. and Mrs. J. P. Jefferson of Santa Barbara are in San Francisco for a short time. They are returning to their home from a nine months' cruise on their yacht to the West Indies, Cuba, and through the Panama Canal.

Mrs. William McPherson Fitzhugh and her daughter, Miss Marian Fitzhugh, left the latter part of the week for a motor trip to the south.

General Charles G. Morton left last Friday for a three weeks' inspection tour of the Northwest. General Morton was accompanied by Mrs. Morton. They will motor the greater part of the time.

Mr. and Mrs. Harry Lewis and their son, Mr. Donald Lewis, arrived on Wednesday from their Los Angeles home for a visit of some length in San Francisco.

Mrs. Ella Lee is established at the Fairmont Hotel for the winter, after a summer spent with her daughter, Mrs. Arthur Seller, at San Mateo.

Mr. and Mrs. A. Roos are installed in their apartment in the Fairmont Hotel.

Mrs. Charles Butters has recently returned from Europe.

Mrs. Chase Kennedy plans to leave shortly for the East.

Mr. and Mrs. Léon Ross have returned from their European trip of some months' duration.

Mr. and Mrs. Stanley Morrison (Miss Carroll Cambon) have returned from their wedding tour, and have taken possession of their home on Russian Hill.

Mrs. Harrison Dibblee and her daughter, Miss Betsy Dibblee, of San Rafael, have postponed their trip to Europe until the spring. They had planned going abroad this fall.

Mr. and Mrs. E. S. Heller are expected to return home from abroad during the week.

Mrs. Walter Scott Franklin is back from Santa Barbara, where she passed the summer. Dr. and Mrs. Franklin are with Mrs. Franklin's mother, Mrs. A. S. Baldwin, at her home in Presidio Terrace.

Mrs. John Tallant and Miss Laura E. Bosqui are spending several weeks in Southern California.

Mrs. Hippolyte Dutard and Miss Elise Houghton, who have been abroad for the past two years traveling in Europe and in Algiers and Morocco, are returning, having sailed on the Transatlantic liner Paris from Havre October 21st. With them is Mrs. Edward T. Houghton, who recently made a hurried trip to London on learning of Mrs. Dutard's illness there.

Recent arrivals at the St. Francis include Mr. G. T. Tait, Spokane; Dr. B. Robbins, Hanford; Mr. George Houck, Marysville; Dr. W. C. Wilcox, Modesto; Mr. Charles H. Bredin, Detroit; Dr. R. C. Merryman, Pasadena; Mr. H. W. Childs, Yellowstone; Dr. G. W. Pierce, Palo Alto; Mr. W. H. Hook, Los Angeles; Mr. Law T. Freitas, Stockton; Lieutenant J. H. Carson, U. S. N.; Mr. G. F. Pendergraft, Turlock; Mr. Louis Newman, Newman.

Inspired by the New York Herald's defense of Booth Tarkington's verbal coinage, "waspen," used to describe the slenderness of a lady's waist, a writer in the Indianapolis News calls attention to the word "Indianian." Why that obtrusive "i"? Mr. Tarkington does not write "waspian." He does not, as some of his fellow-townsmen do, say "portentious," "mountainous," and "stupendous"—even "stupenjuss." The true word is Indianan. The insertion of that extra "i," says Jacob P. Dunn, "is a palpable Hoosierism—using that term in its broad sense and not as restricted to Indiana."

The largest and by far the strongest of warm-blooded creatures is the whale. A specimen of the estimated weight of sixty tons has been known to tow for a whole day a steamer of 120 horsepower, with the full force of the engines working against it.

CURRENT VERSE.

Anticipations.

I love preliminary things,
The tuning-up of flutes and strings;
The little scales musicians play
In varying keys to feel their way;
The hum—the hush in which it dies;
But most to see the curtain rise.

I love preliminary things,
The little box the postman brings;
To cut the twine, to break the seals,
And wonder what the lid reveals;
To lift the folds in which it lies
And watch the gift materialize.

The snowdrop and the daffodil,
The catkins hanging straight and still,
The blossom on the orchard trees.
Do you know greater joys than these?
Each represents the hope that springs
In all preliminary things.

—J. R. J. in Sunday Times.

Toy Ships.

Oh, who would voyage on a pond
Of lucent deeps, and mirrored blue?
In elfin boat with samite sail,
Of lustrous hue.

She has a mast of beaten gold,
A keel of silver, chiseled fine;
She is a pinnacle rarely framed,
Of gallant line.

And who will be her crew today,
To ride with her the rippled wave?
Ye must be true, of honest heart,
And spirit brave.

And, for she is a faery ship,
Ye who would sail in her must be
Skillful in visions, and in dreams
Of faery phantasy.

For she is bound to distant shores,
Where cruel snags may drag her down,
Or where the inaccessible banks
Rise slippery and brown.

But if ye go adventuring,
Fair islands ye perchance may see,
Where silken stuffs are treasured up,
And fragrant spicery.

And from the boughs of yonder oak,
Stanting across the water clear,
The fluting song of myriad birds
May charm your ear.

And yonder is a leaf-strewn beach,
Roofed over by green holly trees,
Where ye, sea-worm, may rest awhile,
And take your ease.

And ye for cargo may bring home
Gold celandine and daffodil,
And purple violets that lurk Ablossom still.

Then, as she dances down the wind,
White sails reflected in the blue,
Sing cheerily for the faery ship,
And jocund crew.

—Viola G. Garvin in Westminster Gazette.

The Haunted Field.

Of the long field, by the wood-end,
There's no legend told;

Just a quiet place, and a strange place,
From times midlittin' old.

In my raw years and my ripe years
I've come and gone there,

And have seen naught and have heard naught
Of ghosts, foul or fair.

In the long field, in the owl-light,
The young lovers stray;

By the wood-end, in the sunlight,
The small children play.

When their love's made, or their game's played,
Mouse-quiet, home they'll steal.

They've seen naught, and they've heard naught;
But, maybe, they feel!

In the long field, in the old days,
'T would seem, deeds were done

That can't rest in the earth's breast,
Nor yet face the sun.

There's no shape and there's no voice
That some ghosts dare show—

We see naught, and we hear naught,
But, deep-down, we know.

—G. M. Hort in Westminster Gazette.

Travesty.

A monkey in a little feathered hat
And scarlet breeches, dangled on a string,
Climbing for some one else's penny—that Changes the comic to a tragic thing.
Halfman, from whose unflattering eyes may, peep
A secret sorrow—does he wonder how
The world was lost, how it would be to leap,
Careless of coppers, free, from bough to bough?
The organ whines, the cord goes taut or slack;
Street after street; the same old tricks again.
Who puts us down to beg, who jerks us back
To many a dreary, oft-repeated strain? . . .
The stars give silver. . . . Hark! Across the years
Murmurs the mighty music of the spherest
—Leslie Nelson Jennings in the Nation.

The film based on Byron's life is said to have given a distinct stimulus to the sale of the poet's works.

The Katharine Branson School, Inc.

ROSS, MARIN COUNTY, CALIFORNIA

A COUNTRY SCHOOL FOR GIRLS

DAY AND RESIDENT COLLEGE PREPARATORY

Heads: Katharine Fleming Branson, A. B., Bryn Mawr
Laura Elizabeth Branson, A. B., Bryn Mawr

COLLEGE ACTORS.

A little theatre movement, inaugurated three years ago among the students of dramatic art in Washington Square College of New York University, says the Washington Star, has achieved such preliminary success that it has enlisted the active support of men and women of the professional stage, who see in such innovations in colleges and universities the promise of higher standards for the American theatre.

This little theatre enterprise, organized as the Washington Square College Players of New York University, is, as a consequence, to have the benefit of the coaching and counsel of an advisory committee from the professional stage composed of men of international prominence in stage decoration, acting and producing.

The chairmanship of the committee, it has been announced, has been accepted by Louis Calvert, veteran English and American actor and producer and author of numerous works on the theatre, among them "Problems of the Actor." Mr. Calvert is now appearing in "He Who Gets Slapped," one of the Broadway successes of the last year. Other members of the committee are Dudley Digges, whose work as Jimmy Caesar in "John Ferguson," Clegg in "Jane Clegg," and in "Mr. Pim" has placed him among America's leading actors; and Sheldon K. Viele, last season technical director of the Theatre Guild, now engaged in designing sets for several productions to be seen on Broadway this winter.

Mr. Calvert, in addition to being a member of the committee, has consented to give a course of lectures in the dramatic art department of New York University on "Shakespeare on the Stage," offering an intensive study of the plays, with special attention to the interpretation of characters and to the history of the plays on the English and American stage.

Practical experience in play production, directing, and costume designing, as well as in acting, is exacted of the New York University students, who are said to be giving to the stage the same serious study that is accorded the arts, sciences, and professions. Much of this laboratory work is obtained through the work of the Washington Square College Players, under the direction of Randolph Somerville, head of the department of dramatic art in Washington Square College of the university, who formed the organization among the students. Each student is required to stage and direct at least one play as a part of his classroom work and college credit is given for these performances.

The courses given include "History of the Theatre," "Dramatic Interpretation," "Contemporary Dramatic Art," "Principles of Playwriting," and Mr. Calvert's newly installed course in "Shakespeare on the Stage."

The players this season will present three short plays written by New York University students. They have also a repertoire of twenty-five short plays, selected from the works of Lady Gregory, Barrie, Lord Dunsany, Maurice Baring, Malcolm LaPrade, Stuart Walker, Harold Brighouse, Harold Chapin, Clare Kummer, Louis N. Parker, and J. M. Synge. They will open their third season in October in a little theatre of their own built for them in the Washington Square centre of New York University. Their first public offering will be Cohan's "Seven Keys to Baldpate." They will also be seen in A. A. Milne's "Make-Believe," Molière's "Tartuffe," in recognition of the Molière tercentenary, and six short plays not heretofore produced on any stage.

It has been pointed out that when Bobbie Burns lived and sang there were 100,000,000 persons who spoke the English language. Today there are more than 150,000,000 English-speaking persons throughout the world.

HOUSE FOR RENT OR FOR SALE.

In excellent neighborhood near town house. Ten rooms; three baths; garage; sun. West 895.

THE SANTA BARBARA GIRLS' SCHOOL

Resident and Day Pupils. Eleven acres. Country Life and Sports. Sleeping-porches. Open-air school rooms. Riding. Swimming all the year round. Basis of work, clear thinking.

MARIAN L. CHAMBERLAIN, A. M., Principal
P.O. Box 548, SANTA BARBARA, CAL.

THE ALLEGED HUMORISTS.

She—I'm simply wild about a yacht. He—Er, how do you act on a motor boat?—Brown Jug.

"Our canary died a natural death the other day." "So?" "Yes, the cat ate it."—Michigan Gargoyle.

Man has always worshiped images: at first, graven; later, as he became more civilized, reflected.—New York Sun.

Waiter—Will you have something with your dinner, sir? Banker—Yes, that little blonde over in the corner.—Judge.

Proud Winner of Last Two Holes—How do we stand now? Loser of Ditto—You're two flukes up.—London Passing Show.

"Up to the eighth stein I am a Republican, but after that I can't keep from saying what I think."—Munich Simplicissimus.

Dulciverton (at the piano recital)—What is that charming thing he is playing? Cleverly—A piano, you fool.—London Answers.

"Yes, he's one of our best amateurs—been fencing for ten years." "What? Fencing for ten years and still an amateur!"—Life.

Holiday-Maker (unpacking)—Didn't you pack my liniment? The Wife—No; it was labeled "Not to be taken!"—London Opinion.

"Extra!" shouted a newsboy in Hollywood. And in a moment he was the centre of a seething mob of supers.—American Legion Weekly.

"Ah! Back from your vacation, Mr. Gloom?" "Physically, thank you," replied J. Fuller Gloom, "but not financially."—Kansas City Star.

Irate Professor—Young man, do you know anything about this course? Young Man—A little, sir. What would you like to know?—Stanford Chaparral.

Mrs. Suburbs (hysterically)—John, you thought I didn't see you, but I did. You kissed the maid. Mr. Suburbs (reproachfully)—But, my dear, you asked me to try to persuade her to stay another week. Mrs.

Suburbs (eagerly)—Tell me quick, John dear, did she promise?—Sidney Bulletin.

Scientists say that sleeping outdoors makes one beautiful. At last! Now we know how to account for the hobo's charming appearance.—Ohio Sun Dial.

"My husband is a deceitful wretch." "What makes you think that?" "Last night he pretended to believe me when he knew I was lying to him."—Boston Transcript.

Jack—I spent last evening in the company of the one I love best in all the world. His Sister—Indeed! And didn't you get tired of being alone?—Pearson's Weekly (London).

"I hear you're writing plays at college, Gerald. You're getting to be a regular Shakespeare, aren't you?" "Well, yes. But you know, Shakespeare didn't go to college."—Life.

"Did you see a lady on a runaway horse?" "Yeah. The boss started buckin' right here." "Good heavens! Which way did she go then?" "Didn't notice. 'Wuz watchin' the boss."—Judge.

First Angler—This paper reports another case of a bather being bitten by a fish. Second Angler (after a blank day)—Ah, well—it would be safe enough bathing here.—London Opinion.

Father—Why can't you do something? If I should die, you'd have to beg for money. Son—Well, I ought to be able to do that. I've had practice enough around here.—Boston Beanpot.

Gillie (at the stalker's fourth miss)—No up to yere usual form the day. Stalker—No. Only just back from Africa. Elephants, you know. Can't see these beastly little things.—Punch.

Scotsman (offering his foreign acquaintance a drink)—What'll ye hae? Foreigner—I will take a drop of contradiction. Scotsman—What's that? Foreigner—Well, you put in de visky to make it strong, de vater to make it weak, de lemons to make it sour, and de sugar to make it sweet. Den you say, "Here's to you!" and you drink it yourself.—Pearson's Weekly (London).

If you had $50,000 or $5000 worth of deeds, stocks, bonds, etc., and your business future depended on your ability to lay hands on them tomorrow morning at 9 o'clock, would you dare trust such precious documents to your office safe?

We think not. Fire tonight might leave you helpless, for no office safe can withstand a hot fire.

BUT—a safe deposit box in the vaults of the Crocker Bank is proof against any fire. These vaults went through the great San Francisco fire without even scorching a single sheet of paper. For $4 a year you can secure a box there—and you're SAFE.

Crocker Safe Deposit Vaults

Crocker Building

Post and Market Sts.

Today in the Bret Harte Land.

Leaving Chinese Camp, an old haunt of Harte's in Tuolumne County, and following the Big Oak Flat road toward Yosemite Valley, the tourist passes through another district made famous by the short-story master, says the Boston Evening Transcript. West of Moccasin Peak, which looms up to the right of the long Priest Hill grade, is Red Mountain. Upon the western slopes of this latter elevation Harte located the mythical town of Smith's Pocket in his tale entitled "M'liss." While the episode of the "pocket" was patterned after an actual one in Six-Bit Gulch, it is probable that much of the atmosphere of Smith's Pocket was taken from Red Mountain Bar or Dom Pedro Bar, two large mining towns once located on this part of Tuolumne gorge. Dom Pedro bar had 1500 voters at the time of Lincoln's first election, but it, as well as Red Mountain Bar, has entirely disappeared and soon their sites will be covered by the waters of the great Dom Pedro reservoir.

Beyond Big Oak Flat, once a big mining camp whose numerous cabins are deserted, and Groveland, now the base of activity for the Hetch Hetchy water project, is Second Garrote. Here is a famous cabin. It was once the home of J. A. Chaffee and J. P. Chamberlain, two old bachelors whose devotion to each other was the inspiration for Harte's story of "Tennessee's Bartner." These venerable men have long since been called beyond, but the domicile where they lived and the ancient apple orchard they planted is still an object of interest to passing travelers. Across the road from their cabin is the great tree known throughout the section as the "Hangman's Oak." Seven Mexicans were strung up there in the days of Judge Lynch for robbing sluice-boxes, according to the tradition of the neighborhood.

In the lower Sierra on the edge of a region of weird volcanic rock is Knight's Ferry, once the county seat of Stanislaus, and a familiar haunt of Harte's. In another section of the same county is La Grange, also featured by the story teller. In the early days the country about La Grange was torn by the placer and hydraulic mining and of late years the gold diggers have dug their way through the river bottoms.

The vast tule lands of the central valley of California, the coast redwoods, and the coast hills also figured in Harte's writings, but it was the mining scenes of his earlier tales that brought him recognition and fame. And in the eyes of the world the locale of these first stories represents the Bret Harte country.

Caillou-qui-Bique, the house in which the poet Verhaeren lived, is being restored by the Belgian commune of Roisin in memory of the great Belgian.

An Important Industry in Danger

What the Anti-Shingle Joker of the State Housing Act Means to California

THE Burnett Bill, passed at the last session of the legislature, and known as the State Housing Act, is up for referendum in the November elections.

The bill has been accurately described as "a wood-pile wrapped around a Nigger." If it becomes law, it will be illegal for you or anybody else to build a home with a shingle roof on it—bungalow, shack or mansion—in any city, town, or incorporated community in the state of California. The anti-shingle joker would benefit hugely the manufacturers of substitute roofings, at the expense of the average taxpayer and prospective home builder of moderate means.

And it would practically destroy an industry in which millions of Californian capital are invested and which gives employment, directly and indirectly, to many thousands of people.

California is the fourth largest producer and the third largest user of shingles in the United States. Situated up and down the state from the Oregon line to Santa Cruz, there are twenty-six different mills devoted wholly or in part to the manufacture of shingles.

The State Housing Act has been publicly repudiated by the State Immigration and Housing Commission. It is unscientific, destructive to an important industry of the state, and patently against the public interest.

But it will become a law and you will have to obey it, no matter how much it costs you in money and comfort, unless you and your friends go to the polls November 7th and

VOTE NO ON THE STATE HOUSING ACT
No. 5 on the ballot

Write this office for pamphlet giving facts and figures exposing this "wood-pile wrapped around a Nigger."

EXECUTIVE COMMITTEE
CALIFORNIA LUMBERMEN
ROOM 310 ST. CLAIRE BUILDING
16 CALIFORNIA STREET
San Francisco, Cal.

KING
COAL

High in Heat Units
Low in Ash

FOR SALE BY ALL DEALERS
IN CALIFORNIA

KING COAL CO.

Main Office
EXCHANGE BLOCK
San Francisco

Wholesale Only

FOR A

CLEAR COMPLEXION

and a

HEALTHY COLOR

eat

FLEISCHMANN'S YEAST

Three Cakes a Day

The Catacombs of Cypress Lawn

Comparable with the luxurious tombs of ancient Egyptian kings, yet within the means of people of moderate circumstances.

A stone edifice, highly artistic in appearance, containing a magnificent chapel. Eleven Tomb Rooms, 425 Crypts.

Cypress Lawn Cemetery.
Association

Phone Douglas 4772

995 Market St.

The Argonaut.

VOL. LXXXI. No. 2380.

SAN FRANCISCO, NOVEMBER 4, 1922.

Price Ten Cents

PUBLISHER'S NOTICE: The Argonaut (title trade-marked) is published every week by the Argonaut Publishing Company. Subscriptions, $5.00 per year; six months, $2.55; three months, $1.50, payable in advance—postage prepaid. Subscriptions to all foreign countries within the Postal Union, $6.00 per year. Sample copies free. Single copies, 10 cents. News Dealers and Agents in the interior supplied by the San Francisco News Company, 747 Howard Street, San Francisco. Subscribers wishing their addresses changed should give their old as well as new addresses. The American News Company, New York, are agents for the Eastern trade. The Argonaut may be ordered from any News Dealer or Postmaster in the United States or Europe. Special advertising rates to publishers.

Address all communications to The Argonaut, 207 Powell Street, San Francisco. Make all checks, drafts, postal orders, etc., payable to "The Argonaut Publishing Company."

Entered at the San Francisco Postoffice as second-class matter.

The Argonaut can be obtained in London at the International News Co., Breams Building, Chancery Lane; American Newspaper and Advertising Agency, Trafalgar Square, Northumberland Avenue; and at Daws Steamship Agency, 17 Green Street, Leicester Square, and can be ordered from any of the news-stands of W. H. Smith & Son. In Paris, at 37 Avenue de l'Opéra. In New York, at Brentano's, Fifth Avenue and Twenty-Fourth Street. In Chicago, Western News Company. In Washington, at Adams' News Agency, Ninth and G Streets.

The Argonaut is on sale at the Ferry Station, San Francisco, by Foster & Orear; on the ferryboats of the Key Route system by the news agents, and by the Van Noy-Interstate Company on Southern Pacific boats and trains.

Telephone, Kearny 5895. Publication office, 207 Powell Street. WM. J. MILLIKEN, Business Manager.

FORTY-SIXTH YEAR

ALFRED HOLMAN - - - - - EDITOR

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

|   |         |
|---|---------|
| EDITORIAL: The Vital Issue in the Governorship—The Living Wage—President Harding's "Whipping Boy"—Questioning Mental Tests—On Information and Belief—The Community Chest..... | 289-291 |
| LETTERS TO THE EDITOR.....  | 291     |
| THE WHITE REVOLUTION IN ITALY: Bolsheviks Meet Their Match in the Fascist, and Conservatism Defends Itself. By Morton Todd.....   | 291-292 |
| OLD FAVORITES.....  | 292     |
| INDIVIDUALITIES: Notes About Prominent People All Over the World.....   | 292     |
| ROME, RUSSIA, AND SOCIALISM: When Individualism Has Been Devoured by the Paternalistic State, Civilization Gives It Up.....   | 293     |
| BANKING AND INVESTMENT NEWS.....  | 294-295 |
| BOOKS ON THE TABLE: Notes of Books and Authors.....   | 296     |
| REVIEWS AND NOTICES: New Books Received.....  | 297     |
| DRAMA: "Six-Cylinder Love"; "The Man Who Came Back"; "Chimes of Normandy"; "Enter Madame." By Josephine Hart Phelps.....  | 298     |
| FOYER AND BOX-OFFICE.....   | 299     |
| VANITY FAIR: Society Pugilism—The Art of the Barber.....  | 300     |
| STORYETTES: Grave and Gay, Epigrammatic and Otherwise.....  | 301     |
| THE MERRY MUSE.....   | 301     |
| PERSONAL: Social Notes—Movements and Whereabouts.....   | 302-303 |
| THE ALLEGED HUMORISTS: Paragraphs Ground Out by the Dismal Wits of the Day.....   | 304     |

The Vital Issue in the Governorship.

The interest that has been aroused in Mr. Woolwine's candidacy by his expression of personal views on prohibition illustrates the degree to which presumption and sentiment may override fact and logic. For, as a matter of fact, Mr. Woolwine's personal views, even in the improbable event of his election to the governorship, would have nothing to do with the case. Prohibition in the form that it now exists is a national as distinct from a state matter. The private opinion of the governor of California can not have the slightest effect upon the enforcement of the prohibitory laws. The effort to bring support to Woolwine because he is an anti-prohibitionist is no more logical than the same attempt would be on the score that he was an anti-vaccinationist. The issues in the gubernatorial campaign are vital and practical—and prohibition is not among them. They relate mainly to the costly "reforms" and practices of extravagance under which there has been engrafted upon our system a prodigious increase of expense with a vast enlargement of officialism. The two-score-and-more commissions set up under the Johnson régime have added enormously to the burden of the taxpayers. At last there has come a revolt and it has made Mr. Richardson its champion. Here is the real issue of the campaign. Shall we continue to support a burdensome system in our state affairs, or shall we lay the knife to the root of the trouble and cut out the commissions, cut down the roster of place-holders and reduce taxation? This is the vital issue of the campaign. A vote for Woolwine on the score of his personal views on prohibition—under the slogan "red wine, white wine, Woolwine and beer"—is a sentimental expression. A vote for Richardson is a vote for economy in state affairs.

The Living Wage.

There are some things to be thankful for, and among others is the fact that a majority of the Railroad Labor Board understands and is not afraid to say that the fallacy of the living wage "if carried to its legitimate conclusion would wreck every railroad in the United States, and if extended to other industries would carry them into economic ruin." That is courage and sense in a sentimental world, and the pennywise idealism of Edsel Ford shall not prevail against it. What is a living wage? Who shall determine it? Money fluctuates, values change with the individual need, life is never uniform, the luxuries of today are the necessities of tomorrow, the very term "necessity" has lost all meaning, different men need different things and different ways of life, progress of the race depends on such variety, and a "living wage" would never mean the same thing two months in succession nor to any two men. Especially it would never mean the same thing to any two women. In the view of our amiable sentimentalists, the guaranty of a living wage would release the human soul for higher flights. In actuality, it would do no such thing, for with a living guaranteed, the majority of men would become unconscionable slackers, industry would be wrecked, production would fall to the minimum, the nation, through scarcity, would have to go on short rations, and no soul can fly high on an empty stomach. Production is the result of work, on everybody's part, capitalist and manager and laborer included. Work is the result of some personal ambition, a little pride, a microscopic modicum of altruism which is too small to count and always will be, and about 98 per cent. anxiety and fear. It is sad, but it is so. Tenure of employment, old age guaranties, minimum wage, sure pay enough for "reasonable comfort," or a "home with a garden," are all visionary. The Labor Board is right.

President Harding's "Whipping Boy."

There is a sordid inside to the attack made by the American Legion at its recent convention in New Orleans on General Sawyer of the Army Medical Corps. Sawyer, who is a close friend of President Harding, was commissioned by the latter to straighten out differences that have existed during the past year between the Public Health Service of the Treasury Department, the Veterans' Bureau, and the Board of Managers of the National Soldiers' Homes. Between these three—or at least between the first two—there has been friction due to the fact that the government's programme for hospitalization of men disabled in the late war has not been definite. Responsibility has been divided mainly between the Public Health Service and the Veterans' Bureau. Sawyer's job was to generally coördinate the service.

The Legion, seconded by other similar organizations, demanded a large building programme—hospitals, big hospitals, more hospitals, bigger hospitals; and their demand was complicated by appeals from various parts of the country, each for the establishment of a hospital at some particular place. Members of Congress, representative of different localities, were brought to support of local demands and there followed, naturally, a carnival of log-rolling with the prospect that out of it there would come a colossal and extravagant hospital building project. General Sawyer and the commission of which he is the head undertook to put the whole matter upon a business basis, truly a difficult job under the circumstances.

Upon study of the conditions Sawyer became convinced that the building project was a rank extravagance. He observed that the government maintains soldiers' homes at Santa Monica, California; Johnson City, Tennessee; Milwaukee, Wisconsin; Hampton Roads, Virginia, and at other places. At all these points large buildings were created for the housing of homeless, aged, and decrepit veterans of previous wars. As the old soldiers pass away these homes are becoming depopulated and, as a matter of fact, all are very much larger than they need be. It occurred to Sawyer that there would be economy in taking over these old plants and using their vacant spaces for hospitals. He tried to bring about such an adjustment, but the result was a loud protest from the Legion with the charge that he was delaying the building of needed hospitals. He further found that the old soldiers' homes are managed by a national board the membership of which is largely made up of veterans of the civil war. This board proved unfriendly to the idea of a merger of the homes into hospitals under the Veterans' Bureau.

Some months back a compromise was reached, largely through modification of Sawyer's original purpose. All was going peacefully until the New Orleans convention. This convention, it will be remembered, came upon the heels of the President's veto of the bonus bill, and there were many among its members angry and resentful. On the part of an active element there was a wish to strike at Mr. Harding. To do this openly was out of the question, but there was his friend Sawyer singularly well placed to serve vicariously as a species of "whipping boy." Here is the secret of the resolution against Sawyer. To pillory him was a roundabout way of striking at the President.

No doubt President Harding understands perfectly the motive behind the demand that General Sawyer be suspended or dismissed from the service. This is made evident by the fact that he has treated the demand with the contempt it merits.

The War Debts.

It is easy to understand why Mr. Pierpont Morgan, Mr. Otto Kahn, and other American bankers doing an international business are anxious that the United States should cancel the debts of our allies and of certain smaller nations owing to us. They have made very considerable loans to various governments and to various interests in Europe and the value of the securities resting upon these advances would naturally be enhanced if the war debts were out of the way. After the habit of bankers, Morgan, Kahn, et al. think in terms of money, and no doubt they have convinced themselves that the banking interest and the public interest lie in the same path. But however inspired, the views of the gentlemen named and of others similarly related to international finance have been propagated diligently in this country and there are abundant indications that they have made a profound impression in the financial centres of the country and even at Washington. It is especially notable that certain leading newspapers which very recently were preaching against cancellation are swinging around to a policy of generosity on the part of our government toward the debtor nations.

Under the standards and practices of the banking business a debt is a debt and it is either good or bad. If not collectable it has no value and may well be relegated by the writing-off process to the limbo of things forgotten. But obligations as between the nations have another character. A government acting as a banker for the government of another nation, for reasons of international politics, may not write off even uncollectable debts. Sound policy requires that a creditor nation may legitimately hold whatever actual or potential power there may be incident to the fact that it stands creditor to other nations. It is not necessary that demand for immediate payment shall be made, but it is both legitimate and important that an obligation fairly created be kept alive. It is mere sentimentalism to insist that because a debtor country may not for the moment be able to pay its debts the sponge shall be applied to them.

This bankers' talk of cancellation comes at an unfortunate time because it tends to embarrass the work of the funding commission which has in hand the matter of adjusting our foreign credits. This commission, made up of Secretaries Hughes, Mellon, and Hoover, Senator Smoot and Representative Burton—a most excellent commission, by the way—is soon to go to Congress to ask a change in the terms of the act by which it was created. The act provides that the funding with the debtor nations must be made on the basis of complete payment within twenty-five years, and this all agree to be practically impossible. There must be provision for a longer period in which the debts may be permitted to stand, and it is for Congress to extend the time by altering the funding act. This is made practically difficult by the bankers' propaganda, which tends to create in the congressional mind suspicion of selfish motives. An appeal for extension of the period in which the debts may run is apt to be identified with the idea that there is a "nigger in the woodpile"—and this, in fact, is not very far from the truth, for it is a fact that the demand for cancellation comes from sources interested upon selfish motives in creating artificially a condition tending to increase the value of other and private obligations against European countries and interests.

It was high time that there should be an intelligent setting forth of the facts related to the war debts, and this was given by Secretary Hoover in an address at Toledo, Ohio, last week—a circumstance, by the way, scantily dealt with by the daily press which, however it may skimp serious matters, unfailingly finds space for murders, seductions, and other scandalous incidents. Mr. Hoover not only presented an authoritative analysis of the conditions, illustrated by facts and figures, but reflected the views of the commission of which he is a member and of President Harding. He places the loans due to us from twenty nations, great and small, as amounting now in principal and accrued interest to $11,500,000,000. He points out that these debts, while commonly spoken of as due to our government, are in fact owing to the taxpayers of the country. They were made at the urgent request of the powers and under their solemn assurances of payment. He said, and with pointed significance, that the American taxpayer did not participate in reparations, acquired no territory or any other benefits under the treaty of Versailles, as did our debtors. There is no question as to the moral or contractual obligation. The repudiation of these loans, in his judgment, would undermine the whole fabric of international good faith. Summing up, he said: "I do not believe any public official, either of the United States or any other country, could or should approve their cancellation. Certainly I do not."

Proposals for further postponement of interest payments arise from the belief that certain countries can not make these payments without undue strain, and that postponement of interest would contribute to general economic stability and the more rapid recovery of the debtor countries in which every one would benefit. The British ask for no favors and are arranging their payments covering some $4,750,000,000 of the total debt. The proposition, therefore, narrows itself to debtors on the Continent whose annual payments for interest and amortization would amount to a total of $350,000,000. Omitting a possible percentage of hopeless debts, estimated by Mr. Hoover at 5 per cent. of the whole, the annual payments due to us from the various countries vary in their burden upon them from 2 to 12 per cent. of their governmental income. That such payments would grievously affect the debtor countries Mr. Hoover does not believe, and than that of Mr. Hoover there is no higher authority in connection with this whole matter.

Mr. Hoover rejects the theory that payments on account of interest and amortization to the extent of $350,000,000 per year can only be made in forms that would seriously affect general economic stability. The factor of economic stability as related to the debtor countries and Europe generally requires such political and economic adjustments between the states of Europe as may yield an atmosphere of peace in replacement of an atmosphere of war. It may not be brought about by cancellation of debts due to us or to anybody else, but must come (1) through such rearrangement of economic boundaries as will give the hope of economic survival; (2) through a reduction of armaments, not only as a guaranty of peace, but as a contribution to the balance of budgets and the cessation of inflation; (3) through creation of good-will and of a peaceful working together among the independent nations. These are the things essential to the recovery of Europe; and they will not be brought about, but may rather be delayed, by the sponging out of obligations. These obligations, Mr. Hoover declares, are trivial in comparison with the waste and destruction which should be eliminated by economic process.

It is not necessary, Mr. Hoover points out, that payments on account of interest and amortization should be made in forms or terms calculated to disturb values and thus create business distress in this country. America, now as always, is pouring into Europe enormous sums of money. The sources of this movement are the expenditure of American tourists in Europe, the remittances of immigrants in the United States to their relatives abroad, the growing volume of investment made by our people in foreign countries, interest upon investments in the United States of private citizens of our debtor countries, and other items of invisible exchange. All these combine to furnish a large supply of our money to Europe, with which they in turn can make payments for interest on debts, or for the purchase of goods from us. He estimates the total of these sums in the last fiscal year to be about $1,500,000,000 and adds the prophecy that with peace in the world the outflow from the United States to Europe will grow constantly over the future.

Looking at the situation as illustrated in international balances during the last fiscal year it is discovered that the world shipped us $2,600,000,000 worth of goods. This, added to the other forms of invisible exchange, gave the world a paying power to us of about $4,100,000,000. In addition the world shipped us approximately $450,000,000 in gold and silver. During the year we exported $3,800,000,000 in goods. From these figures Mr. Hoover deduces the fact that in the past fiscal year the world had a paying power to us in excess of goods bought from us of about $750,000,000.

We should, Mr. Hoover argues, have more observation and experience of the movements of the great economic forces before we jump to the conclusion that necessity exists or that any constructive results will be obtained by placing irretrievable burdens upon the American taxpayer. It would be a misfortune to the world if by such action we make the continuation of armaments as a political disturbance that much easier. Concluding, Mr. Hoover declared:

No one can be impressed more than myself with the dangers and losses to American trade and commerce from the present instability in Europe, the lowered standards of living in many areas, the reduction of the great middle class from whom the intelligence and leadership must come, the diminished purchasing power for our products, the very practical questions of fluctuating exchange in its creation of a speculative element in all international business—all of them affect our own welfare directly. Beyond all this, we are affected morally and intellectually with any of the failures of civilization. Yet, as I have said, the retrospect of the last three years is not one of discouragement over Europe's progress, and any knowledge of her productive powers belies all discouragement except war. America earnestly wishes to be helpful to Europe, but economic matters require a degree of realism that will do justice to the American people as well as be helpful to peoples abroad.

Questioning Mental Tests.

It has been noted in these columns that under the mental tests applied to men drafted for service in the war a large percentage fell into a class not far above the moron standard. Something only a little short of half of the whole number were reported to be in their mental condition "about fourteen years of age." This finding has been widely accepted as marking a deterioration in American life and as sounding a warning of serious import. But now comes Mr. William C. Bailey of Westport, Connecticut, with a presentment that tends to discredit the system of tests as they were applied to recruits and to question their results. He points out that the scheme of examination was based on acquirements rather than upon native powers. The first test was facility in reading. Many involved arithmetical computations. Others demanded the kind of information that school studies supply and the kinds of "practical judgment" in which the schools give systematic practice. Thus the effect of the tests was to illustrate differences in educational opportunities. All this, Mr. Bailey contends, is related to schooling rather than to native quality of mind. Concluding, he says:

If the American people are discouraged by the alleged proofs of their "inferior" average mentality they should know that the nation-wide appraisal which the army tests provided in no way warrants the conclusion that the inferiority is either a congenital or an incurable national trait.

On Information and Belief.

The Argonaut's recommendations to voters on the proposed popular alterations of the Constitution, the San Francisco charter, and the laws follow. They do not represent infallible wisdom, but are based on information and belief. If any reader is still uncertain, he will probably do the lesser harm with his vote by voting "No" right down the list, and thus discouraging to the extent of his individual power the vice of incessantly tinkering and tampering with one of the fundamental conditions of life.

Constitution and statutes:

1. Veterans' Act—Vote Yes.
2. Wright Act—Vote No.
3. Veterans' bonds—Yes.
4. State land settlement—No.
5. Housing Act—No.
6. Regulating title insurance—No.
7. Tax-exempting veterans—No.
8. Protecting cities from annexation—Yes.
9. Permitting boroughs by amending charters—Yes.
10. Taxing publicly-owned utilities—Yes.
11. Putting them under Railroad Commission—Yes.
12. State budget—Yes.
13. Judges' salaries—Yes.
14. Taxation of securities—Yes.
15. King Bill in Constitution—No.
16. Chiropractic examiners—No.
17. Use of streams—Yes.
18. Combining cities for utilities—No.
19. Water and power in politics—No.
20. Osteopathic examiners—No.
21. Prohibiting special water laws—No.
22. Absentee voting—No.
23. Deposit of public moneys—Yes.
24. Lawyers' bill—No.
25. Judges pro tempore—Yes.
26. Inter-county school districts—Yes.
27. Raising initiative requirements—Yes.
28. Prohibiting vivisection—No.
29. Single tax—No.
30. Franchises by Railroad Commission—Yes.

San Francisco charter amendments and questions:

31. An impertinent futility—No.
32. Making county offices appointive—No.
33. Good sort of "private bill"—Yes.
34. Similar—Yes.
35. Governmental publicity—Yes.
36. Increasing detectives—Yes.
37. Fire and police disability decisions—Yes.
38. Compensation for registering voters—Yes.
39. Regulating voting machines, if used—Yes.
40. Foreign trade zone—Yes.
41. Highways beyond the city—Yes.
42. Official advertising—No.
43. Exempts more bonds from limit—No.
44. Leasing park concessions for five years—Yes.
45. Leasing under parks—No.
46. Raising police judges' salaries—Yes.
47. Paying back illegal taxes—Yes.
48. Selling city lands—Yes.
49. For a public service commission—Yes.
50. More pay for certain officials—Yes.
51. For a bureau of supplies—Yes.
52. Tuberculosis hospital—Yes.
53. Market Street Railway purchase—No.

The Community Chest.

The Community Chest movement comes none too soon. It comes as a necessity, first, in relation to community obligations, and second, as a relief from the intolerable nuisance of numberless overlapping and conflicting "drives." In San Francisco there are ninety-two "endorsed" charities—that is, charitable organizations that have been investigated by the Chamber of Commerce and hall-marked worthy. There are other agencies like the Y. M. C. A. and Y. W. C. A. that disclaim classification as charities, but none the less are dependent upon popular support. Then there are the churches and multitudinous agencies of public welfare. Each of these makes an annual or semi-annual or a continuous "drive," with the consequence that the relatively limited number of habitual charitable donors are pestered beyond the limit of toleration.

The Community Chest plan seeks to apply a scientific and equitable method of dealing with community problems and obligations. It establishes a single agency for the reception and apportionment of charity funds. It cuts down multiplied forms of overhead cost. By its assured responsibility it commands the confidence of charitable givers and by its insistence upon the budget system it prevents wastes, duplications, and the inequities inherent in the system of competitive solicitation and of unregulated expenditure.

There is in the Community Chest plan, as proved by experience elsewhere, a large and moral advantage in that it tends to broaden the charitable resources of the community by increasing the number of givers. Many withhold gifts to any because they can not give to all; many avoid putting their names on charity lists as a means of self-protection; many ignore the general appeal of charity through lack of confidence in this, that, or the other agency. The Community Chest, by the very magnitude of its organization, by the enthusiasm inspired by its largeness of purpose, by its strictly business methods, by its low percentage of overhead cost, makes wide moral appeal and unfailingly enlists the interest of great numbers of persons. Under this plan, as always, the bulk of charitable funds comes from large and generous givers, but a great moral result is attained when the appeal to the community is spread so broadly as to include thousands instead of hundreds. In San Francisco last year 58.3 per cent. of a total of $1,100,000 given in public charity came from 1654 persons—this in a population of upwards of 600,000. It is not fair that the burden of community obligations should thus be centered upon relatively few; it is not morally wholesome when the great bulk of the population stands absolutely apart and aside from coöperation in relation to community obligations.

Under the independent and competitive system it is impossible to avoid duplications, wastes, and neglects. Where no single agency takes a comprehensive view of community obligations, and where there is no co-operation, there is enormous loss on the one hand and certain neglect on the other. These are avoided under the Community Chest plan, by which the various forms of charitable obligation are duly appraised and systematically arranged for. In Cleveland, Cincinnati, and elsewhere where the Community Chest has been long established and is in full working operation the number of donors has been increased amazingly. Formerly in Cleveland there were less than 10,000 registered charitable donors. Today there are 164,000 regular donors, with an additional 134,000 whose gifts are less than one dollar. Thus the sense of obligation has been immeasurably widened with moral reactions that have lifted the community into a distinctly better moral atmosphere.

The Community Chest plan does not prevent any donor from applying his gift to a particular purpose which for some reason commands his personal sympathies. It thus preserves the identity of donations where they may be desired. Gifts specifically made are specifically applied, and so accounted for under the budget system as to become in effect a contribution to the community fund. Where special gifts are made, as, for example, of memorial or other structures, there is scrupulous care that the application shall be in obedience to the wishes of the donor and apart from the general scheme of charitable distribution.

As it works out practically there is a material effect of the Community Chest plan that may legitimately be considered. Industry is helped and investment of capital is promoted where there is assurance that community problems and obligations are scientifically appraised and definitely sustained. For example, Cleveland has grown industrially under the assurance that the community attends to its obligations comprehensively and practically in ways calculated to promote the common welfare. It is a matter of calculation on the part of locators of manufacturing plants to establish their works in localities and under conditions where their employees may have the benefits of a systematic agency in counsel, guardianship, and relief in cases of necessity. The Community Chest plan as related to this particular interest has the endorsement of business men and large employers in every city where it has been established.

The Community Chest plan is in effect team-play in the business of charity. It substitutes intelligent co-operation for haphazard. It broadens the basis of giving; it cuts out duplications and wastes. Both to him that gives and him that receives it applies the principle of equity.

The word tariff, meaning a schedule of duties on merchandise, imported or exported, is said to come from Tarifa, a town in Southern Spain, on the Mediterranean Sea, where duties were once levied by the Moors on all ships passing in or out of the Straits of Gibraltar.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR.

Impounding Speeders' Cars.

SAN FRANCISCO, October 30, 1922.

TO THE EDITOR—Sir: Whenever a man is convicted of speeding or cutting corners, and I am inclined to limit this remedy to those particular offenses, the car which he is driving should be impounded for a period of time commensurate with the seriousness of the offense. This remedy should be employed regardless of the ownership of the car, with the one proviso that it is not a stolen car. In other words, if the head of a family permits his car to be driven by any member of his family or even by a guest and the car is driven at a great speed, the car should be impounded. Each city and town should have an impounding area and any car impounded pay storage, 25 cents a day, which should be a lien upon the car. Of course the taking away of the particular driver's license should be concurrent with impounding of the car, but in practice it would be found that the impounding of the car would be the most effective remedy yet devised.

Any one can inquire amongst our car owners to determine this fact for himself. The paying of a fine simply adds to the cost of operation of a car, and I know several business men who run cars and consider the payment of fines a part of the operation, just like the cost of gasoline and oil. You can imagine what it would mean to these men if their cars were taken away from them and impounded for three months or six months. You can also imagine what would happen when cars being sold upon sale contracts by car dealers would be impounded. You can also imagine what would happen if the family car were impounded for six months because of fast driving on the part of one of the children. I have talked with many car owners since I saw this remedy suggested and can say with absolute conviction that while they would simply joke about paying a fine they would cease smiling if their cars were impounded.

This remedy was suggested by the action now being taken to enforce prohibition. I contend that the same kind of remedy will eliminate car speeding or bring it down to the vanishing point very rapidly. I was not at all surprised the other day when a young lady went to jail for a short term rather than have her license taken away for a long period. This is a demonstration, in a small way, of the effectiveness of the remedy which I have suggested.

Very truly,
ALBERT H. ELLIOT.

From a Negative-Minded Subscriber.

SAN FRANCISCO, October 27, 1922.

THE ARGONAUT—Dear Editor: Whenever I see in your paper condemnation or recommendation of amendments I note the number and vote the opposite, on the principle that such a rabidly capitalistic paper is not fair.

Also I think that is weak stuff, your fling about the "German descended banker." It's out of date.

I take your paper because of its high literary tone.
DORIS D. BENTON,
757 Forty-Seventh Avenue.

The Speed Maniac.

OLEMA, CAL., October 10, 1922.

TO THE EDITOR—Sir: Let me congratulate you on the article in your last paper in reference to automobile speeding. Your description is tragic beyond words to a sympathetic and sensitive mind. The article should be in the hands of every autoist or engraved in his car. We all love the well-disciplined, unselfish, courteous young man or woman, but when they take upon themselves the nature of the smart Aleck they become, not only detestable, but dangerous. But the speeder says, "Old Fogey, we must get there." Where? In the garage, the jail, the hospital, or the morgue?

Faithfully yours,
DR. J. C. SHAFTER.

Sincerity and Sentimentality

F. M. Hayes, associate professor of veterinary science at the University of California Farm at Davis, states that anti-vivisectionists are misrepresenting statements in certain bulletins published by the State University. In regard to these statements Professor Hayes says:

"Rosamonde Rae Wright, author of the argument against vivisection in the pamphlet issued by the secretary of state, entitled 'Amendments to Constitution and Proposed Statutes with Arguments Respecting the Same,' makes the following misstatement of fact in referring to Bulletin No. 229 issued by the College of Agriculture, University of California: 'Bulletin No. 229, issued by the Agricultural Experiment Station of the University of California, tells us that hog cholera is caused by improper feeding, etc. A law abolishing vivisection would tend to drive the raisers of hogs to depend upon preventive measures. Sanitation, not vaccination, prevents human and animal diseases.'

"The deliberate attempt to deceive the public by the above statements is apparent upon reference to pages 2 and 3 of the bulletin mentioned, wherein the cause of hog cholera is discussed. Concerning the cause of hog cholera the following exact words are extracted from the bulletin: 'The specific cause of hog cholera is a germ so small that it can not be seen by use of a microscope. The organisms pass through the finest filters and can not be artificially grown in the laboratory. The blood and excretions, especially the urine and feces of a hog sick with cholera, are capable of producing the disease in a susceptible hog. The virus (blood of a sick hog) is highly infectious. The accessory causes of hog cholera are numerous and include all conditions that weaken the constitution and natural resistance to disease. . . .'

"The word accessory and the related statements in reference to the cause of hog cholera have evidently been overlooked or misunderstood by the author of the argument against vivisection. Any one familiar with the diseases of man and animals knows that there are accessory, contributing or predisposing factors that lower the natural resistance to certain diseases. Such causes are not responsible, however, for the morbid picture we see in the hog suffering from hog cholera. No amount of sanitation, correct feeding, etc., will prevent the unimmunized hog from contracting this disease, following proper and sufficient contact with the specific virus. Anti-hog cholera serum is the only agent that can be depended upon to safeguard the hog against this infection.

"Vivisection, within the meaning of the proposed law, made possible the discovery of a method of protecting the hog against cholera by the use of anti-hog cholera serum. Furthermore, vivisection within the meaning of the proposed law, now makes possible the preparation of this serum for the benefit of the hog industry. Thousands of hogs are protected from the tortures of the disease, the hazard of swine raising is materially reduced and the wealth of the state considerably increased by the sanitation and vaccination, rather than by sanitation alone as the proponent of this initiative would have us believe."

To teach a child to read, and not teach it what to read, is to put a dangerous weapon into its hand.—Charles Dudley Warner.

THE WHITE REVOLUTION IN ITALY.

Bolsheviks Meet Their Match in the Fascisti, and Conservatism Defends Itself.

A languid young mother in a hammock was annoyed by the clamors of her little boy. "What does he want?" she asked the nurse sleepily. "He wants a bee, mum." "Let him have it," the mother said. Presently she was aroused by terrific outcries. "What's the matter with him now?" she demanded. "He's got it, mum," said the nurse.

For years the more radical socialists have longed for class war. In Italy they have it. That is the significance of the Fascisti movement. Radicalism has been having its class war, and has derived little pleasure from it. It is feeling the sharp, hot business end of the bee.

It is not a good bee—more like a yellow-jacket, and part of its ought to be in stripes. But it is the sort of bee radicalism has stirred up. That is a great accomplishment on radicalism's part, though unintentional; for the Fascisti movement is the first reactionary revolution in history. It means that in Italy the worm has turned and that society will no longer take the attack of the reds "lying down," as the English put it. In its latest phase it also means that the politicians who purpose to take it lying down because they are afraid to offend the radical vote have been kicked out of office. In Italy, conservatism has the drop on the reds.

The methods of the Fascisti can not be approved, any more than those of the Ku Klux Klan or any other body that purposes to set itself above the law. The movement has been attended by innumerable outrages—committed, let us say, by "sympathizers," to borrow an euphemism from our journalistic apologists for labor crimes in this country. Hundreds of strike headquarters and Chambers of Labor have been burned, sacked, or otherwise damaged or destroyed. Hundreds of radicals and bolshevist agitators have been killed. The number of wounded runs into the thousands. The Fascisti have stopped and searched railway trains, interfered with communications, burned socialist newspaper plants, made illegal arrests, forced elections by intimidation—sardonically compelling socialists to vote their way—and even expelled one communist, Misiano, from the Chamber of Deputies. They seem to have concluded that it is useless to reason with radicals. And they ought to know; their leader was a radical.

But while we can not approve their methods, we can approve their main economic purpose; that is, production. Whatever interferes with production (strikes, sabotage, slacking, socialistic propaganda, revolutionary plots, and the sort of government that adds to the misery of Italy by paltering with these things instead of suppressing them), Fascism seeks to destroy. It has put the bourgeoisie back into its place and set it to the discharge of its capitalistic function after it was partly dislodged and despoiled. It has taken over the government by violence, or threat and menace, and will try to conduct it. But that is a totally different story. It may not succeed. If it does succeed, and if it should accomplish a restoration of industry and welfare in commercially prostrate Italy, its sins will be forgiven, for that is a minor privilege of success, and Italy will be in a position to help the other nations of Central Europe to get to their feet. If it fails, the reds will probably come back stronger than ever.

Italy is a land governed by clamant minorities. Its politicians have spines more flexible than any spinologist or chiropractor ever thumped. They have little to learn from Tammany, and when an Italian goes into politics in New York he feels right at home. The art of governing consists in finding out which minority is making the most noise and showing the greatest force at the time; to know "which way the wind blows," they say. The politician breed seems pretty much the same the world over. The retiring premier, Luigi Facta, was accused of promising a pound of soap from a friendly factory to every supporter in case he was returned at the head of the list. He was not the first candidate to use soap.

For the first two years after the war the wind blew from Moscow, and the Italian bolsheviks were the minority that made the most noise and put up the greatest show of power. Socialism in Italy grew luxuriantly during the war, and after it. There was discontent among the returned soldiers as there is after every war, and the cost of living multiplied eight times, causing much misery. Extravagant wages and war taxes crippled industry, foreign competition had to be met. Labor organizations got into the hands of bolsheviks. Strikes multiplied and production fell to a minimum. Riots raged, with murder. Complaisant politicians in office during the metal trades strike permitted shop committees of workmen, Russian model, to take possession of such private property as cotton mills and motor factories and rubber works, on the socialistic principle that the instruments of production should be owned by the community. This included land, which was extensively turned over to the peasants. The General Confederation of Labor allied itself with the socialist party. When factory proprietors attempted to shut down their works because of unprofitable production there was a "lock-in"; a recent invention, the reverse of a strike, in which the workers persisted in working, but not very much; just as, when there is plenty of work, they often refuse to do it—anything the great enemy, Capital, does not want at the time. The expropriation of the middle class was going forward almost gayly. Two years ago the radicals had Italy all set for the red revolt.

Then they made a mistake. They sent a commission to Russia to learn from real artists in revolution how to start it. The commission found disorganization, industrial chaos, famine, despair, a vast empire turned into a soup kitchen and fed by charity—not the seventh heaven of socialistic vision where poverty had been abolished and men toiled in love for others with no thought of self, but a land of "hunger, pestilence, and the gallows." The commission returned to Italy and made an honest report. They should be honored for it. Men don't like to reverse themselves. In this case, while they might reverse themselves, reversing the perverted opinions of the people was a far harder thing. That took the Fascisti.

Russian propaganda was active in Italy, but labor had gained a great deal, as it had in all countries during the war, and it could not see itself sawing off the limb on which it sat in order to bring to the ground a few apples of doubtful soundness out at the farther end. After the return of the commission from Russia, few people in Italy wanted revolution, and Lenin was powerless to revive their interest in its prospective delights. The great movement for the salvation of the world divided into socialism and communism, and labor went with the socialists. But it began to foresee hard times and deflation, and seems to have resolved that it must get a continuance of its advantages through the confiscatory taxation of the middle class—to extort from the taxpayers enough, in some form of subsidy, to keep the factories going on about the old scale; to provide, let us say, for "reasonable comfort." Against such spoliation the Fascisti raises its now formidable rods and axe.

In ancient Rome the lictor was the functionary that preceded the magistrate when he went through the streets, bearing a bundle of rods and an axe, to enforce respect for the official and punish offenders. When little Johnny says he "licked" the other boy, perhaps his philology is better than that of the young mother that tries to correct him; perhaps the lictor was the fellow that licked 'em. On this point the dictionary emits only darkness, but in philology one guess is as good as another. The lictor's bundle of rods with the axe sticking out of it was called the fascis and it was the symbol of the unity and power and dignity of the state. There is a good representation of fascis on the American dime of recent coinage. In Italy the term got into modern usage to designate a band, or group, many bound together like the lictor's rods, the fascio; the members of which are termed the Fascisti. They are not all pure and holy, and their associations are not always above reproach. In southern Italy, for example, they seem to be assimilated to the old Mafia. They have spread a reign of terror, and aside from their main object their collateral purposes, such as imperialism, military dictatorship, and the like, are of not much greater merit than the methods by which they have worked and battled themselves into a position of power. But a power they have become, and are likely to remain for a time.

It is a weakness of socialism that, fastening its attention on inequalities of distribution, it proposes to correct them by measures that would leave nothing to distribute. The leader of Fascism was a socialist, and a red of reds. Sometimes it seems as though Benito Mussolini had seen the light. How can the people eat when there is nothing to eat? The main object of Fascism is to promote a condition of security in which production can take place; which is capitalism, and this is the meaning of its efforts to suppress strikes and bolshevism, and humble the labor unions. It is at the same time violently nationalistic, and purposes to extend the limits of Italy if it can. Part of its policy is said to be the annexation of Austria. Italy has already made Austria a generous loan, and sees the advisability of some commercial and industrial approach between the two countries. Its sympathies are also with the Fiume adventure, and it hungers for the Dalmatian coast, for which Italy has always hungered, desiring the harbors on the eastern shore, especially the Albanian harbor of Avlona, or Valona, which in hostile hands would become the naval padlock on the Adriatic Sea. It is also protectionistic, on behalf of the Italian industries, which have a hard time getting along, especially manufactures, in a country destitute of coal and iron. Fascism has gathered Gabriel D'Annunzio into its personnel, and that stormy character, who must have excitement if he has to enter a monastery to get it, will bring to the movement even less of calm and deliberation than it had before. But D'Annunzio is the personal symbol of nationalism, and he naturally belongs.

The problem now before Italy and Europe is, can a party of this sort govern? Its main point of policy, that of production, is economically sound. Its leader, instead of fomenting a revolution and then evading service, accepts the responsibility of office. But criticism is one thing, government another.

The situation is altogether new. No such element as fascism has appeared in Europe to attempt the straightening out of the tangle left by the war. No party seems to have had the object of producing goods for the destitute peoples. It was said that the Fascisti movement would summon to power Salandra, a cool-headed and steady old southern conservative, but his name does not even appear in the cabinet. Most of those that do are unfamiliar. The organization has shown excellent discipline of a military sort for its operations in the field, but will that avail when it enters the mazes of politics? Above all, will it stick to its principles, or step into the fatal snare of compromise which is the general curse of office? There is much difference between the task of the shipbuilder and that of the pilot. Perhaps Mussolini is qualified for both, and if he is he has his chance to show us. MORTON TODD.

OLD FAVORITES.

Indirection.

Fair are the flowers and the children—
But their subtle suggestion is fairer;
Rare is the roseburst of dawn—
But the secret that clasps it is rarer;
Sweet the exultance of song—
But the strain that precedes it is sweeter;
And never was poem yet writ—
But the meaning out-mastered the meter.

Never a daisy that grows—
But a mystery guideth the growing;
Never a river that flows—
But a majesty sceptres the flowing;
Never a Shakespeare that soared—
But a stronger than he did enfold him;
Nor ever a prophet foretells—
But a mightier seer hath foretold him.

Back of the canvas that throbs,
The painter is hinted and hidden;
Into the statue that breathes,
The soul of the sculptor is bidden;
Under the joy that is felt,
Lie the infinite issues of feeling;
Crowning the glory revealed,
Is the glory that crowns the revealing.

Great are the symbols of being—
But that which is symbolized is greater;
Vast the create and behold—
But vaster the inward creator;
Back of the sound broods the silence,
Back of the gift stands the giving;
Back of the hand that receives,
Thrill the sensitive nerves of receiving.

Space is as nothing to spirit—
The deed is, outdone by the doing.
The heart of the wooer is warm—
But warmer the heart of the wooing.
And up from the pits where these shiver,
And up from the pits where these shine,
Twin voices and shadows swim starward,
And the essence of life is divine.

—Richard Realf.

Coming Home.

(By a homeward-bound Californian.)
Tell me something, you who know,
Have you ever felt the thrill—
Homeward speeding through the snow—
Truckee—westward, down the hill?
Do you know that hammer stroke
Somewhere underneath the vest,
When the ties begin to smoke
As she plunges to the west?

Far aback the deserts lie—
Splintered rock and cañon brink—
Dreary wastes of alkali,
Sage and sand and Humboldt Sink.
All have vanished; home draws near;
We have crossed the great divide:
We are speeding with a cheer
Down the home-stretch to the tide.

O, the wildness of the way!
O, the call of bird and stream!
O, the lights and shades that play
Where the winding rivers gleam!
Throw her open! Donner lake!
Slumbers in the cup below;
All the pine-trees are awake
Shouting to us as we go.

Don't you see the fern-tips there
Where the bank is lush and green?
Can't you see the ponies flare
Through the manzanita screen?
Throw her open! From the wall
Nod the lilies as we pass,
And a thousand wild things call
From the shadows in the grass.

Whoop! She shivers on the rail;
How the cañons laugh and roar
When she hits the curving trail
Tipping downward to the shore!
Far below the valley sleeps,
Warm and tender: I can see
Where the Sacramento creeps
Willow-bordered to the sea.

O I know that sunny land;
I can hear the med-larks call;
I can see the oak trees stand
Where the wheat grows rank and tall.
Give her headway! When a son
Rushes to his mother's heart—
All his toil and wandering done
And her loving arms apart,

Nothing matters. Give her steam!
Sun and wind and skies conspire.
Love to him is not a dream
Who has touched the heart's desire.
Love to him new meaning brings
Who has felt his bosom thrill
When across the line she swings,
Truckee—westward, down the hill.

—D. S. Richardson.

INDIVIDUALITIES.

Brigadier-General William D. Connor, General Staff, U. S. A., has been ordered to China to take command of all the American posts at Tienstin. General Connor was in command of the services of supply in the A. E. F.

Lord John Carbery, tenth Baron of Freke and Bandon, and Lady Carbery are among those whom continuous civil war in Ireland have driven to this country, the Carberys having recently bought an estate on the coast between Santa Barbara and Los Angeles. Lord Carbery's ancient castle at Freke has been burned and his farmland and stock demolished. Though entitled to a seat in the Lords he has been more engrossed in agriculture than politics and was among the young nobles who upheld Sir Horace Plunkett in framing the land laws. His object in coming to California is to take up orchard farming and sheep raising.

The Tennants, whether by heredity or marriage, have a way of keeping in the limelight. Mrs. Coombe Tennant, sister-in-law of Lady Stanley and Mrs. Asquith, has recently been appointed as a British delegate to the Assembly of the League of Nations. This appointment with her candidacy for the House of Commons from the Forest of Dean promise her political prominence not surpassed by any of her countrywomen. She is not, however, the first woman to serve as a delegate to the League of Nations. Miss Helen Vacarascu has been the representative of Roumania for the past year, serving in that capacity at the Geneva meeting of the league.

Stanley Baldwin, who is described by the London Times as the outstanding personality in the movement which overthrew the Lloyd George government and also as a business man with strong leanings to art and letters, may be made the new chancellor of the exchequer, according to the latest reports from London. Last year Mr. Baldwin left the post of financial secretary of the treasury, which he had held since 1917, to become president of the Board of Trade, the portfolio vacated by Sir Robert Horne. The Rt. Hon. Stanley Baldwin, who is a member of the big steel manufacturing family of Baldwin, has represented the Bewdly Division of Worcestershire since 1908—a date that evidently marks his political début, although he was more than forty years of age. It was Mr. Bonar Law who was the first of the politicians to discover his qualities, Mr. Baldwin becoming Mr. Law's private secretary in 1916. The Baldwin interests control plants in Canada and South Wales.

The Rt. Hon. Sir Robert Stevenson Horne, who has been British chancellor of the exchequer since 1921 and representative of the Hillhead Division of Glasgow since 1918, has been recently appointed chairman of the funding commission about to visit this country. Sir Robert is the most intimate friend of Sir Auckland Geddes, the British ambassador at Washington. Thirty years ago they were fellow-students at Watson College in Edinburgh and their friendship has only strengthened with age. Sir Robert received his entire education as an honor student; or through scholarships, to use our native term. He selected the law, while his chum the present ambassador followed his father's footsteps as a physician. Both were teachers while waiting developments in their chosen careers. In 1910 Sir Robert was knighted, after gaining admission to the Scotch, Welsh, and English bars and forging to the front of his profession. The war gave him his great opportunity. He took service under Admiral Sir Eric Geddes and handled the transportation so successfully that the armistice found him third lord of the admiralty. He then entered politics and became a member of the lower house from Glasgow. He joined the Labor party and became the minister of that division of cabinet duties, later being promoted to the exchequer. Sir Robert is fifty-one years of age and a bachelor.

One of the figures which rise clearly from the chaos in the Near East is that of Halideh Edib Hanoum, Turkey's Joan of Arc, also called the most romantic figure in recent history. The father of Halideh Hanoum was treasurer to Sultan Abdul Hamid, and one of the most progressive men of his race. He gave his daughter a Western education, which was the foundation of her political career. She is credited with being the greatest influence next to Mustapha Kemal himself in the present Turkish imbroglio. She is described by one correspondent much in the words of the Gascon Cyrano in introducing himself as "poet, author, educator, and soldier." Halideh Hanoum's private career has been almost as colorful as her public. She has been married several times, having divorced her first husband because of the introduction of a second wife into his household. It was at this juncture that Halideh became the leader of a new generation, which rebelled against harem life. During the time of the Armenian massacres she was, according to one authority, the sole close associate of the triumvirate of dictators, Enver, Taltat, and Jemal. She lived in the harem of Jemal Pasha for two years at this time, when she had charge of the vast numbers of Armenian orphans who were subjected to Halideh's proselyting system of education. Later she was exiled to the Island of Malta, whence she escaped to Angora. She is at present riding high on the Turkish political wave, carrying on with new associates new methods of waging war against the Christians of Asia Minor.

ROME, RUSSIA, AND SOCIALISM.

When Individualism Has Been Devoured by the Paternalistic State, Civilization Gives It Up.

If you are a Christian you feel that the decline and fall of Rome were caused by pagan vices. If an agnostic you may feel that Christianity was the villain. If you are a militarist you know what did it was race suicide; if a Malthusian it was over-population; if a protectionist it was free trade. If you believe Kenneth L. Roberts, it was too much immigration. Leigh Irvine would say it was too much law, David Starr Jordan too much war, Anthony Comstock too much women, Mr. Volstead too much wine. If you call up the board of health they will say it was malaria; if you ask the United States Public Health Service you will be told it was healthy fleas on sick rats. And although the Roman Empire was addicted to all these debilitating diversions, this reviewer is disposed to greet with three rousing cheers the testimony that its fall came about largely through the paralysis induced by socialistic laws. The thing is quite plain. Socialistic laws will paralyze society, and a paralyzed society will die. And Rome did not so much fall, as it just naturally and tragically died. With it died civilization, at least in Western Europe, and humanity in that region plunged into the long night sagaciously designated the Dark Ages. If a lot of sentimentalists and idealists in this country and Europe can have their way, humanity will make the same high dive again. And one thing to be noticed about high divers is that they fall faster than they climb back.

The thesis that it was socialism is to be found in "Rome and the World Today," a refreshingly new and critical book by Herbert S. Hadley, professor of law in the University of Colorado. Now a professor, when real, is likely to have a good point of view, whether he possesses experience of actualities to support his conclusions or not. But Professor Hadley has larger qualifications than the average faculty member. He was once attorney-general and after that governor of the great state of Missouri. If wisdom be the flower of affliction he ought to look like a bed of pansies. Any man that has had to govern three and a half million Missourians should know what he is talking about when he talks about government.

The book is well conceived, on the theory that the lessons of history might be practical. The effort to enforce the author's views are energetic and direct. It is necessary to begin somewhere, so he begins with a survey of the growth of Roman legal institutions, and points out certain essential differences from our manner of administering justice. The Twelve Tables of the Law are gone, no one knows where, like the pair of tombstones on which Moses brought the Ten Commandments down from Sinai, but something is known of what they must have contained. The evolution of adjective law, or procedure, is traced and the slow improvement in the conception of human rights. Law was the glory of Rome that refused to die, and today more people obey the principles of Roman law than obeyed them in the time of Justinian. Roman law is the law of the greater part of mankind.

By the time of Augustus Caesar the Roman state had weakened critically, and according to Professor Hadley it would probably have fallen into ruins then, had it not been for Augustus. Augustus is his hero, as a constructive statesman who brought order into the public life of an empire; and unlike Gibbon, who brands him as a crafty tyrant, Professor Hadley claims for him high character and that essential of statesmanship, practicality. He says:

The glorification of Julius Caesar by subsequent historians and writers is the more remarkable in that he does not figure largely in the literature of the Augustan age or in the writings of the historians of the first and second centuries. Augustus was, in the judgment of contemporaries and successors, the founder of the empire. He was the second, as Romulus was the first founder of Rome. It was Augustus and not Julius who made the name "Caesar" a synonym of authority. The Caesar of Horace and Virgil's poems is Augustus and not Julius, and the Caesarea of biblical history and the other Caesareas throughout the empire were named for Augustus.

Alexander, Caesar, and Napoleon have been regarded as the great empire builders and conquerors of history. While they were all great generals, it is to be remembered that Alexander's empire died with him and Napoleon's empire ended with his defeat. Julius Caesar conquered Gaul with an army of only forty thousand men and any capable general could doubtless have accomplished the same result with less sacrifice of human lives. It should also be remembered that Augustus brought a larger extent of territory, more people and more wealth under Roman rule than did Julius or any other leader in Roman history. And yet his claim to greatness is in his work as a statesman rather than as a conqueror or a general. In this field the magnitude and duration of his services make comparisons difficult.

In his youthful rise to power and in his ability to adhere, undeterred by difficulties and defeat, to a definite plan and purpose he resembles the younger Pitt. In the character and leadership that he gave to the empire that he founded and in the impress that he left upon its life and purposes and ideals, he belongs in a class with George Washington. The work of modern empire builders like Cavour and Bismarck seems inconsequential in comparison. Augustus once in discussing with a friend the career of Alexander, whom, strange to say, he greatly admired, remarked that he could not understand why Alexander, at the age of thirty-two, should have wept for more worlds to conquer and that he "was surprised that Alexander did not regard the right ordering of the empire a heavier task than the winning of it."

Augustus is credited with vital services in the development of Roman jurisprudence and we are given these glimpses of his constructive work and his personality:

But more important was another reform that Augustus effected. By designating certain juriconsults as entitled to advise a Judex as to the decision of a case and requiring that the Judex follow their opinion, he brought into the administration of Roman law, for the first time, a public official corresponding in authority and position to the judges in England and America. Henceforth Roman law was to develop along scientific lines, based on human needs and experience. The official responses or decision of the officially designated juriconsults must also have greatly influenced, if they did not, as a matter of practice, control the edicts of the praetors. And with both the praetors and the referees, who decided the cases, directed by those learned in the law, its harmonious and logical growth was assured.

Augustus also had a sense of humor, the real test of which is to be found in one's ability to enjoy a joke upon one's self. Of him is told the story of many a monarch since, of meeting a young man who bore to him a striking resemblance. When Augustus asked him if his mother had ever been in Rome, the young man replied in the negative, but assured Augustus that his father had often been there. Augustus accepted the answer in good grace. When an old soldier asked him to appear for him in court, Augustus offered to have one of his friends represent the soldier. The latter said, "When you were in danger at Actium, Caesar, I did not get a substitute, I fought for you myself." Augustus consented to appear.

A professor of economics once said, "If you wish to learn the value of a thing, try doing without it." The value of Rome appeared when Roman authority had decayed:

The suggestion that the development of the civilization and culture of the different provinces, particularly in western Europe, naturally tended to produce separation and division is not to be taken as an expression of opinion that the breakdown of the Western Empire was a desired or beneficial result. It was one of the greatest misfortunes and calamities that ever befell mankind. The calamity was not so much in the fall of the imperial government as in the breakdown of civilization that accompanied it. No one can read the story of the Middle Ages with its ignorance and superstition, its oppressions and outrages, its lack of progress or apparent hope of progress, without appreciating how the world suffered during those dark and dreary centuries. It has hardly recovered from the effects of those years even in the enlightened civilization of the twentieth century.

Slavery, immigration, and the encroachments of barbarians introduced new ethnic elements, with no machinery for Romanization—we had almost said Americanization. Confronted with new problems arising in this way, the Romans yielded to the law-passing mania, and began to multiply bureaus and commissions and Water and Power boards in antique forms. The devotion is thus indicated:

Rome had no general system of public education to instill into these new citizens the principles and ideals of Roman civilization and when dangers and evils caused by the infusion of alien populations manifested themselves, efforts were made to correct them by the enactment of laws. In the codification of Theodosius, one can almost see these Barbarian tribes coming in vast numbers into the empire, both as invaders and immigrants. Every new condition thus produced required a new law and every new law required a new official or bureau to enforce it. Finally the machinery of government became so cumbersome and so complicated that in the increasing incapacity and disorganization of the times it almost ceased to function at all.

This is one of the dangers that confront the American people today. The practice of creating a new bureau or commission to deal with every new problem of government or to correct every real or imagined evil is likely to give us a vast and burdensome bureaucracy that will prove to be more of an evil than those which it was created to correct. We should leave the solution of some of our problems to the people without the aid of official direction.

The meddlers grew adept at meddling, and the more they were permitted to meddle the more they found to meddle with; and we get this picture of theatrical censorship, and the flapper, in the ancient world:

Boys were prohibited as a part of the new regulations from indulging in the license and dissipations of the Lupercalia; women were required to occupy the least desirable, because the most distant, seats at the gladiatorial shows and prohibited from attending the athletic contests. Why they should be conceded a long-distance view of men trying to kill each other, but denied the right to see a foot race or a wrestling match is difficult to understand.

As a part of the same effort at reform, the theatre was made a subject of regulation. Indecent displays and what might be termed "local gags" and political allusions were prohibited. An actor named Stephanio was, as a public warning to others, beaten with rods in three theatres for bringing on the stage a Roman matron with her hair cut so as to make her look like a boy. This is one of the earliest examples of an official effort to prevent "bobbed hair." To speculate on how the Roman world of this period would have regarded one of our modern "girl shows" would place too heavy a strain on the imagination.

In Rome the impetus of reform regulation, unchecked by historic experience, soon began to enslave the individual to society and condemn all his goods to public use. Not Lenin and Trotzky could have been more thorough:

Many of these efforts to legislate virtue and industry into the people, and prosperity into trade and commerce, are of interest and importance, but only one series of laws can be considered here. The existence of the collegia or guilds formed by those in various trades, occupations, and employments has already been referred to. Under Augustus and his successors during the first and second centuries they were tolerated with a mildly repressive policy. But in 230 A. D. Alexander Severus gave them a distinctly legal status, something in the nature of our public utilities, by requiring all to become incorporated. In connection with this legal recognition, they were given a monopoly of their respective trades or businesses and required to perform certain public services free of charge. Thus the importers of grain, organized as a collegium or guild, were given the sole right to import grain, and required to do what the government had theretofore done—furnish grain to the poor free of charge. The compensation for this free distribution was secured by an increased charge against the general public. Each member of the collegium was proportionately bound to the performance of this public duty on the basis of his capital and business transacted.

No Thomas Jefferson arose to remark that that government is best which governs least. Their idea was that that government is best which does the most meddling. It is an easy idea to entertain, and especially fascinating to those who lack the imagination to understand that progress goes on automatically, as the sum of individual endeavor, if you will just let it, and the more liberty the faster.

Rome had "no mother to guide her," so she went the whole distance:

When men, finding this law burdensome, sought to withdraw from the guild, a law was enacted prohibiting the withdrawal of capital once invested in the business and of profits arising therefrom. When men abandoned their property to escape its burdens, the responsibility was transferred to the remaining members of the organization and to any one who should purchase the property of a member. And when these measures seemed likely to fail, the enrolling of men of means in such organizations, with their property liable for the duties imposed, was made compulsory. In 270 Aurelian made membership in the collegia compulsory for life and increased the number engaged in public service by providing for free distribution of wine, pork, oil and salt, and bread in place of wheat.

In the next century every member, all his sons and all his property, were inalienably attached to the collegia and by an act of 369 all of a man's property, however acquired, was declared to be the property of the organization of which he was a member. When members sought to escape the burdens thus imposed by flight, by joining the army or a minor collegium, or even by selling themselves into slavery, acts were passed requiring that not only one's sons, but one's sons-in-law, should become members of the collegium of their father or their wife's father and all their property become liable for the performance of its official duties. And thus was the right of private ownership of property practically brought to an end, thus did "the empire become an immense gaol where all worked, not according to tastes, but by force."

Dill, one of the ablest commentators on conditions during the later empire, says:

"Not only has an Oriental monarchy taken the place of the principate of Augustus, but an almost Oriental caste has made every social grade and occupation practically hereditary, from senator to water man on the Tiber or the sentinel at the frontier post; and human nature is having its revenge in wholesale flight from a cruel servitude."

The butcher, the baker, the freighter, the sailor, the importer, the wine dealer, all who touched in any way the service of the public were bound to their calling from generation to generation. Further, the members of the municipal senates, the Curiales, were organized by law into collegia and made responsible with all their property for the performance of public duties, including the collection and return to the imperial government of all taxes.

To complete the economic and industrial straitjacket, Diocletian issued in 301 the famous edict of prices which, engraved on stone, was set up in every market place throughout the empire. A maximum price was fixed for every commodity of trade and maximum wages for every service whether by a common laborer, an experienced lawyer or physician. There was but one penalty for a violation by a charge in excess of the official price list and that was death, both for the one who asked it and the one who paid it. Trade was thus forbidden to fluctuate and no allowances were made for differences of conditions of production or transportation. This and other untoward influences practically ruined the commerce of the empire. The depreciation of the currency strongly contributed to bring about a return to a system of barter and men no longer bought and sold on credit or with the aid of money.

The picture of the ruin of the world's greatest empire by paternalistic legislation is thus completed:

These laws establishing a system of caste, destroying the right of private ownership of property, denying to a man of talent and ability the right to advancement or extra reward for his services, brought upon the Roman world a social, industrial, and economic breakdown that was the natural result of these efforts to run counter to the inflexible rules of human nature and the inexorable laws of supply and demand. Then, as always in the history of the world, have such efforts not only failed, but produced a melancholy train of misery and misfortune. Hope and ambition were banished from the hearts and minds of men.

So the "fall of Rome" was not a fall at all. It was the result of a social, political, and economic breakdown such as we have witnessed in our own time in Russia. And it is an interesting coincidence that as socialism caused or largely helped to cause the breakdown of civilization in the largest empire of modern times, so socialism largely contributed to the breakdown of civilization in the greatest empire of the ancient world. The "fall of Rome" was not such a "fall" as that incident to the Norman conquest in England or that of the Manchus in China. It came as the result of social disorganization and decay produced by infusion of alien populations, a disregard of moral and economic laws and the failure to provide proper methods for restoring the natural wear and tear of a highly organized government and society.

Among those that find diversion in discovering the real cause of the fall of Rome, Professor Hadley is conspicuous for breadth of view, in that he is willing to concede that there may have been something after all which his explanation does not explain. But he has certainly presented a graphic parallel between Rome and Russia, which all civilization at this juncture would do well to consider. And he is optimistic enough to say:

There is no reason why society and government should not continue from century to century if we will learn the lessons of history and direct our efforts and activities in harmony with natural laws. The forces and influences that make for conservation and growth must be maintained in the ascendancy over those that make for deterioration and decay. It is depressing to feel that all efforts to establish and maintain enduring social systems must fail, as it is inspiring to think that through representative government, social and industrial justice, education along proper lines, and the mastery of forces of nature through applied science, our civilization can continue unaffected by the periods of old age and decay which limit the lives of its members.

It is to be hoped this is not mere optimism. "If we learn the lessons of history"; that would be encouraging, if we learned them. The Argonaut recently published an article by Commander Daniels, retired, in which he said: "There is no authentic case on record where the United States took to heart the lessons of war." Are we any more likely to take to heart the lessons of peace? Professor Hadley seems to hope we may. At least, he has done what a professor and a patriot should.

ROME AND THE WORLD TODAY. By Herbert S. Hadley. New York and London: G. P. Putnam's Sons; $3.

BANKING AND INVESTMENT NEWS.

San Francisco bank clearings for the week ending October 28, 1922, were $165,500,000; for the corresponding week of last year, $127,300,000; an increase of $29,200,000.

Overshadowing all other developments in the investment field recently was the tremendous success of the first long-term refunding operation of the Treasury Department. It was of course inconceivable that, under existing conditions in the credit market, a 4 1/4 per cent. government bond running

Treasury could not have done better than have fixed a rate of 4 1/4 per cent. on a long-term government bond in peace times. Undoubtedly he could have sold a 4 per cent. bond issue of $500,000,000. On the other hand his problem is a bigger one than that of raising half a billion dollars. It contemplates refunding a total of $1,800,000,000 Victory 4 1/4 per cent. notes. The present operation is designed to take care of $870,000,000 notes called for redemption December 15th. Next May an additional $930,000,000 will mature. It is at least open to question whether a 4 per cent. bond would have proved sufficiently attractive to have absorbed such a large sum. In offering a rate which was certain to prove attractive to the public Mr. Mellon made sure of success where failure would have been disastrous.

Another point to be borne in mind is that it was desirable to make the rate sufficiently attractive to invite conversion of Victory 4 1/4 per cent. notes into the new bonds. Finally the Secretary of the Treasury had to contend with the competition of tax-free state and municipal bonds with which the investment market has been flooded this year. Having been so fortunate in his first long-term refunding operation, it is entirely possible that Mr. Mellon will attempt a 4 per cent. bond when he brings out his next offering, which is expected within a few months.

It was inevitable that the emission of $500,000,000 long-term 4 1/4 per cent. government partially tax-exempt bonds should cause some price readjustments in the investment market. However, those readjustments were attended by a minimum disturbance of values. The chief reflection was found in the old-line, low interest rate bonds of corporations. The prices of those issues declined from fractions to more than a point. That was because it was self-evident that if the government established a 4 1/4 per cent. rate on partially tax-exempt long-term bonds there was small excuse for entirely taxable bonds of private corporations to sell on a basis to yield investors only 4 1/4 per cent. or thereabouts. Liberty issues had already discounted the new bonds. There was some selling with the purpose of switching. However, the Liberties held well around par while the new 4 1/4s, as expected, commanded a slight premium selling on the Curb Exchange on a "when issued" basis.

A fact overlooked by many investors is that Liberties have a slight advantage over the new bonds in regard to taxation. Some confusion existed at first on that point, but it now is definitely known that the refunding 4 1/4 per cent. bonds are tax exempt only up to a principal sum of $5000. Liberties, on the other hand, are exempt up to $130,000 if consisting of all 4 1/4 per cent. bonds and up to $160,000 if the holder includes $30,000 converted 3 1/2 per cents. That exemption obtains until July 2, 1923. Thereafter they will be tax exempt up to a principal sum of $55,000 until July, 1926. Not until the last-named date will tax exemption be restricted to $5000 Liberties.

Private financing last week was light, although a few offerings were made after bankers learned the government loan would be heavily oversubscribed.

In the Southern Pacific-Central Pacific merger order the people of the Pacific Coast are not as much concerned with who possesses the Central Pacific as they are with what effect on transportation service will follow from separation of the two roads.

It is generally urged by the shipping public that the present arrangement is satisfactory and the consensus of opinion that no good, but probably a great deal of harm, can follow from tearing the Southern Pacific to pieces.

Shippers express the fear, and there seems to be good reason for it, that the numerous additional interchange points, necessary to deal with two railroads instead of one in ordering cars, affecting settlement of damage claims and kindred transactions—vexatious to shippers under the best conditions—that would result from separation of the Central from the Southern is bound to impair the service if not ultimately result in rate increases.

Separating the Central Pacific and Southern Pacific would theoretically create two roads, but it would not build a new mile of track nor open up a new foot of country nor give the competition of two railroad systems.

No one knows who would get the Central Pacific if it was sold. Neither can any one know what character of service or rates could be furnished by the Central Pacific operating alone or in conjunction with some other road.

When the question is disposed of before the Interstate Commerce Commission it will be settled for a long time, so now is the time to consider it and act wisely. How it is settled may be of the gravest concern to the Pacific Coast. We know what we have now, but we do not know nor can we well foresee what we shall have if the present Southern Pacific system is broken up.

In the absence of any popular demand for state development of hydro-electric resources, it is certainly up to the little group of self-appointed guardians of the public welfare who gave the birth to show substantial reasons why the people should stand great risks involved in their $500,000,000 water and power scheme.

So far advocates of the proposed amendment have confined themselves to rosy promises of "power at cost" and "no taxes" and so on that are not supported by the act itself. They have made vague charges that California's development has been backward because of improper use of our hydro-electric resources, but these charges are nullified by the incontrovertible fact that nowhere is power so cheap nor so plentiful as in California.

Half a billion dollars is a huge sum, and the idea of mortgaging all the property in the state to support a bond issue of that amount is repugnant unless some very real benefits can be absolutely assured. To entrust the uncontrolled right to spend $500,000,000 of the people's money to five men whom the people can not elect involves a risk too great to be taken unless a fair chance for some benefit is shown. So far the propagandists for the Water and Power Act have proved neither a demand for it nor a possibility of any great return from it. The reason they have not done so is obvious—the people of California have absolutely nothing to gain from the proposed amendment and everything to lose.

The risk of heavy losses and increased taxes that it entails is enough to defeat the Water and Power Act overwhelmingly. Even if this risk were minimized the folly of handing so huge a sum as $500,000,000 to an autocratic board of five men empowered to spend it as they see fit and authorized to create a political machine that would be more powerful than the people themselves is apparent enough to condemn the measure utterly.

The fourth anniversary of the ending of the war approaches under circumstances—so far as regards return to a normal political and economic position—whose influence on the public mind appears to be alternately that of creating extreme perplexity and of causing profound discouragement. Nearly as long a time has now elapsed since the armistice as was occupied by the period of warfare itself, yet the disorganization caused by the great conflict presents itself to the minds of many observers as having reached a stage of greater confusion than at any time since Germany laid down her arms, says Alexander Dana Noyes in Scribner's Magazine.

Possibly the events of the past few months have not produced the same sense of disappointed hopes as was caused by the situation of a year ago. The world had then hardly emerged from the period of mistaken inferences and premature hopefulness which had marked the first year of returning peace, when removal of earlier apprehensions of a general collapse of existing institutions had been followed by a twelvemonth's illusive commercial prosperity, due to over-expanded credit and to necessary purchase of goods to replenish exhausted stocks. Today the more prevalent attitude may perhaps be described as one of cynicism over the prospect of any return to political or financial equilibrium.

To this feeling the series of futile conferences by European governments, the increasing financial anarchy of Central Europe, and the attitude of entire aloofness of the Ameri-

To Yield 7.22%

Willow Vista
Land & Cattle Company

First Mortgage 7%
Sinking Fund Gold Bonds

Send for circular

can foreign office towards the affairs of Europe, have been the main contributing influences. The fourth year of peace ends with all European paper currencies, excepting those of neutral Switzerland, Scandinavia, and Holland, at a discount from normal parity ranging from nearly 10 per cent. in England to more than 99 per cent. in Germany, Austria, and Poland.

In England it finds unemployed labor, although much reduced from the percentage of nearly one-quarter of the trade-union membership which it reached in the middle of 1921, nevertheless running as high as 15 per cent., as against an unemployed percentage of barely 1 per cent. in the first half of 1920 and an average of less than 2 per cent. in 1913. The economic condition of Central Europe, where governments have resorted, with complete disregard of consequences, to meeting the public deficit by printing of new and increasingly depreciated paper money, has

INVESTMENT SECURITIES

Government, Municipal and Corporation Bonds in denominations of $100, $500, and $1000 for the investment of Banks, Trust Funds, and Individual Investors. Inquiries Invited.

HUNTER, DULIN & Co.

THE SECOND FLOOR—
256 MONTGOMERY ST.

Los Angeles San Francisco Oakland
Pasadena San Diego

reached a stage so utterly unfamiliar to the present generation that the inference has been drawn, even in many financial circles, that there can be no end of the resultant wild confusion, except economic collapse, political disintegration, or both.

While this was happening, the conflicting ideas and policies of the French and British governments regarding Germany seemed at times to be straining the Anglo-French Entente. The United States, though remote from these immediate complications, had been confronted with a labor dispute so formidable that at one time even government officials talked privately of a possible stoppage of all manufacturing industry and of a "social revolution." The absence of clear ideas of the economic situation and of our own country's relation to it had been shown, first by enactment of the highest tariff schedules in our history, at the moment when we were pressing European governments to pay to our treasury the war debt, which could not be paid except with the help of shipments of mer-

NEW ISSUE

to Yield

6 1/4%

Tax Exempt

The obligation of an established
agricultural community

FREEMAN
SMITH
&
CAMP
Co.

SECOND FLOOR
FIRST NATIONAL BANK BLDG.
Douglas 2121

from twenty-five to thirty years would not be fully subscribed, says Commerce and Finance. On the other hand it is doubtful whether even the most optimistic bankers foresaw that such a bond would be oversubscribed three times. It might have been supposed that, coming on the heels of the tremendous new financing this year which had reached several billions of dollars, an emission of half a billion of government securities would have tested the absorptive capacity of the country even though the terms of the issue were un-

Exchange Your Liberty Bonds

Present conditions make it advisable, in many instances, to exchange Liberty Bonds for securities offering higher yield or with longer maturity.

Confer with a representative of our Bond Department. He will analyze your needs and will recommend exchanges to your profit.

Call, write or
telephone Sutter 6900

ANGLO-CALIFORNIA
TRUST COMPANY

Commercial, Savings, Trust & Bond Departments

"The City Wide Bank"
Market & Sansome Streets
San Francisco

MARKET-MCALLISTER
AND JONES STREETS
101 MARKET

MISSION AND 16TH
FILLMORE AND GEARY
THIRD AND 20TH

expectedly favorable. That the offering should have resulted in such a veritable scramble for the new bonds is striking proof that the capacity of the investment market is yet far from exhausted. Equally impressive was the demand for the new bonds from small investors.

In view of the instantaneous success of a 4 1/4 per cent. government bond, the question has been asked whether the Secretary of the

McDONNELL &amp; Co.

And Other Leading Exchanges

633 Market St., at New Montgomery

SAN FRANCISCO

TELEPHONE SUTTER 7676

N. Y. Office, 120 Broadway

Los Angeles, 634 So. Spring St.

PRIVATE WIRES

CARSTENS &amp; EARLES, INCORPORATED

GOVERNMENT, MUNICIPAL
AND CORPORATION BONDS

ESTABLISHED 1891

Ground Floor

California Commercial Union Building
San Francisco

Telephone Douglas 6050

SEATTLE LOS ANGELES SPOKANE SAN FRANCISCO

Private Wires
Coast to Coast

E. F. Hutton & Co.

MEMBERS
NEW YORK STOCK EXCHANGE

HUTTON BUILDING

Montgomery and Bush Sts.

HOTEL ST. FRANCIS

DEL MONTE HOTEL

H. M. Hinchman W. B. Wentz W. L. W. Miller
Hinchman, Wentz & Miller
 General Agents
Fire Automobile
INSURANCE
Liability Plate Glass Compensation
 30 Leidesdorf St. SAN FRANCISCO
 Telephone Sutter 437

chandise such as the tariff bill was endeavoring to prohibit, and next by a vote in Congress (fortunately blocked by the presidential veto) for distributing some billions of dollars to the soldiers of the European war, at a moment when one of the most difficult debt-refunding operations in our history lay immediately before the treasury.

I have purposely emphasized these discouraging aspects of the economic situation, in order that the offsetting considerations—if there are any—may be fairly balanced against them. In such a discussion it is always necessary first to keep carefully in mind the lapse of time which all past experience has proved indispensable to recovery from a great economic strain. Even after one of those familiar financial and industrial crises, which recur in ordinary times at intervals of twenty unexampled strain on public and private credit; diversion during four years from their normal channels of productive industry and international trade; and, along with this, such recourse to burdensome taxation and to paper money expedients as is quite without parallel in the history of the world.

When, therefore, both political and economic unsettlement is seen today to be continuing—when the fourth year after the armistice and the second after the breakdown of the machinery of over-inflated credit have elapsed without evidence of return to normal activities in trade, finance, and industry—it may at least be said that we are only repeating history. If recovery from the reaction following what we call the recurrent financial crises in time of peace has thus been delayed, it would hardly be reasonable to look for an earlier recovery when we have not only to retrace the steps taken in a period of overdone speculation and promotion, but to rebuild the structure of capital and credit torn down in the economic recklessness of a great war.

Four years after return of peace is a short space of time for that achievement. It was in 1869, almost exactly four years after the ending of the civil war, that the utter disorganization of our paper currency received its most powerful demonstration in the long-remembered "Black Friday" panic, when the gold value of the American paper dollar fluctuated wildly in a single day between 75 and 60 cents, and when mercantile business came temporarily to a standstill. The president of the United States, in a formal message to Congress, had officially declared it to be "just and equitable" that interest payments on our war debt should be stopped and the amount previously devoted to that purpose be applied to reduction of the principal. In the same year the House of Representatives, by a large majority, had resolved that, notwithstanding the heavy depreciation of the outstanding paper currency, "the business interests of the country require an increase."

Financial and economic conditions in Europe during 1819, four years after the ending of the long French war, were in many respects more confused and chaotic than at any time since Waterloo. England tried to resume gold payments on her currency during that year, and failed; the achievement did not become possible until three years later. France had borrowed in the London market the funds to pay the war indemnity assessed against her; as a consequence, the value of all other French securities had collapsed. Continental Europe was confronted with grinding poverty; in particular, a decline of more than 75 per cent. in the price of wheat had brought international commerce to a halt. For commercial England it was a year of bankruptcies; for industrial England a season of angry labor disputes with resultant paralysis of production; for political Europe a period of uprisings against established governments, which were believed at the time to threaten the stability of existing institutions.

Now comparisons of this sort prove little except the fact that, in the world's experience of the longer past, recovery from the economic consequences of a great war has occupied a considerably longer time than the four years which have elapsed since 1918, but that, notwithstanding such disappointment of financial hopes (for there were people then, as now, who would have had the economic status quo restored in a year or two), the process of recuperation was none the less going on steadily. In those two periods of recuperation after war, the reader of history will probably allot fifteen or twenty years before financial, commercial, and industrial conditions as they existed at return of peace had been readjusted to a normal footing. But the essential fact is that they were thus readjusted, and that the signs of returning prosperity invariably came into sight at a moment when there appeared to be the least hope for them. Whether that necessary interval of recuperation ought to be shorter now than in those earlier years, because of the greater power and facilities of accumulated capital, or longer because of the vastly more complicated machinery of production and credit which was deranged or shattered in the war, is another matter. It does not affect the question how far the world at large has already actually proceeded during the four years since 1918 on the road to economic recovery.

When we look for tangible evidence on this question, we are confronted at once by some curious anomalies. If by economic recovery we mean resumption of production and trade on the pre-war scale, great activity in finance and industry, full employment for labor, then Germany is the one European country which has made and is making the most rapid forward strides. England, France, and Italy, not to mention the so-called European neutrals and the United States, are admittedly in the grip of trade reaction. Even Great Britain's foreign trade stands far below the physical volume, not only of 1913 and 1912, but of 1919 and 1920.

The first edition of "Van Dyke's Complete Four Decimal Bond Value Tables," a new bond basis book of 480 pages, is on the press and will shortly be published in desk and pocket sizes.

The Financial Press of 116 Broad Street, New York City, are the publishers, who announce that the new book is by far the most comprehensive and complete book of its kind ever published.

Bond houses, financial institutions, and investors will be interested to know that some of the features of this new four-decimal book of bond values will include a simple arrangement of all the bond value figures for quick and easy reference; the whole range of yields from 3 per cent. to 15 per cent. is given on two pages facing each other; each coupon rate is given by itself; a side thumb-index is added; an unusual number of rates and periods are covered; in addition to quarters, both eighths and tenths are given from 3 per cent. to 12 per cent. inclusive, and quarters from 12 per cent. to 15 per cent.; figures run to four decimals throughout.

G. E. Miller & Co. are offering $113,200 Fruitland Irrigation District (a municipal corporation located in the Columbia River Valley, Stevens County, Washington) 6 per cent. serial gold bonds, due serially September 1, 1931-1940.

The Fruitland Irrigation District is a municipal corporation organized under the laws of the State of Washington in 1919. It is located in the famous Columbia River Valley at the junction of the Colville and Columbia rivers. The irrigation system was constructed in 1903 and the lands now in the district have been successfully irrigated and cultivated since that time. These bonds have been issued to pay for recent reconstruction and improvements of portions of the system. The rich, fertile soil is from sixteen to thirty feet deep.

In addition to an average annual precipitation of seventeen inches, abundant water is diverted to these lands from the Colville River. This ample water supply is assured by the purchase of the riparian rights which have been confirmed by court decree. This right is the earliest on the river. The minimum flow of the Colville River over a period of thirty-two years was in August, 1920. The water supply available to these lands during

STRASSBURGER & COMPANY
 133 Montgomery St., San Francisco
 TELEPHONE DOUGLAS 2220

Stocks • Bonds
 Cotton • Grain
 Commodities

Members
 San Francisco Stock &
 Bond Exchange and
 Chicago Board of Trade

Private Wires to New
 York & other leading
 Eastern Financial and Commercial Centers

BONDS

$850,000

Fifth Street Building

First Mortgage 6% Gold Bonds

(Secured on a 99-Year Leasehold Estate)

Due Serially 1925-47

George H. Burr & Co.

KOHL BUILDING
 SAN FRANCISCO

NEW YORK LOS ANGELES CLEVELAND
 BOSTON ATLANTA DETROIT
 PHILADELPHIA CHICAGO PITTSBURG
 SCRANTON ST. LOUIS SEATTLE

"A National Yet Personal Service"

years or so, and which result from over-expanded credit and production during times of peace, complete recuperation from the resultant industrial paralysis usually occupies at least half a dozen years. It was not until 1880 that the traces of the panic of 1873 had wholly disappeared. The wreckage of the panic of 1893 was not fully cleared away until 1900. When the great European war began in 1914 neither home nor foreign markets had entirely regained the ground lost in the economic reaction after 1907.

Yet these periods of forced readjustment were merely incidents of normal financial and industrial history. The lost ground which the economic world is nowadays laboring to recover was sacrificed under far more destructive influences. What we now have to make good again is the most prodigious waste of capital, between July, 1914, and November, 1918, which the world has ever seen; a wholly that period was more than double the amount needed.

These bonds are a prior lien, ahead of all mortgages, including those of the Federal and Joint Stock Land Banks, on all of the lands, improvements, and irrigation system in the

LOGAN & BRYAN

STOCK, BOND, COTTON, COFFEE,
 SUGAR AND GRAIN BROKERS

DIRECT PRIVATE WIRES

Pacific to Atlantic—U. S. and Canada

MEMBERS:

NEW YORK STOCK EXCHANGE
 BOSTON STOCK EXCHANGE
 CHICAGO STOCK EXCHANGE
 NEW YORK COTTON EXCHANGE
 NEW YORK COFFEE EXCHANGE
 NEW YORK PRODUCE EXCHANGE
 NEW ORLEANS COTTON EXCHANGE
 PITTSBURG STOCK EXCHANGE
 CHICAGO BOARD OF TRADE
 MINNEAPOLIS CHAMBER OF COMMERCE
 WINNIPEG GRAIN EXCHANGE
 ST. LOUIS MERCHANTS EXCHANGE
 SALT LAKE CITY STOCK EXCHANGE
 LOS ANGELES STOCK EXCHANGE
 PHILADELPHIA BOURSE
 MONTREAL BOARD OF TRADE

SAN FRANCISCO BRANCH OFFICES AT 401 Montgomery Street

and
Merchants Exchange Bldg.

Telephone Garfield 3000

R. C. JENKINS, C. S. LAWRENCE,
 San Francisco Managers

entire district with an appraised value of $2,750,200. These bonds constitute the entire bonded debt of the district.

Electric light and power companies of the United States, since 1914, have sold 1,320,224 shares of stock to their customers. They added 204,550 stockholders in this way. Six per cent. of their customers are stockholders.

Dependable Advice

FOR 35 years this company has been advisor to many bond buyers in California. Our recommendations are based on the needs of the investor, and our long experience in judging securities.

We will be glad to assist you, without obligation on your part, in the planning of your investments.

WM. R. STAATS CO.

Established 1887

Alexander Bldg., Montgomery St., cor. of Bush
 SAN FRANCISCO

Telephone Kearny 301

LOS ANGELES SAN DIEGO PASADENA

We offer---
 a limited number of

7 1/2% Oregon Bonds

(Tax Exempt)

(This is the current rate for Farm Mortgage Loans
 in the State of Oregon.....)

secured by a First Mortgage on ranch property valued at nearly five times amount of bonds issued. Ask for information regarding:

JORDAN VALLEY CATTLE CO.

Phone Sutter 334

G. E. MILLER & COMPANY

MUNICIPAL BONDS CORPORATION
 GOVERNMENT

PORTLAND
 SEATTLE

JAN FRANCISCO
 LOS ANGELES

105 Montgomery Street
 SAN FRANCISCO
 Phone Sutter 334

229 First National Bank Bldg.
 OAKLAND
 Phone Lakeside 1934

INVESTMENT SECURITIES

COMMERCIAL PAPER
 AND ACCEPTANCES

GOVERNMENT
 MUNICIPAL
 AND CORPORATION
 BONDS

BOND & GOODWIN & TUCKER

AMERICAN NATIONAL BANK BUILDING
 SAN FRANCISCO
 LOS ANGELES SEATTLE PORTLAND

The number of new stockholders added in 1921 was fifty-one times the number added in 1914, says Cleveland Topics.

Thus, by selling its securities to approximately 87,000 customers, which is the only real public ownership of utility property that can ever remotely approach success, the electric light and power industry is acquainting the public with its affairs.

The man with his savings invested in a utility security will take pains to find out how that money is being used. By so doing he will learn the service standards which the utility companies impose upon themselves and have imposed on them by the various regulatory tribunals under the jurisdiction of which they operate. He will learn of the care taken by utility executives to promote efficiency and to give satisfactory service at the lowest possible rate.

He will know how to distinguish between the rant of the demagogue, and the constructive criticism of the clear thinker, which every utility welcomes. He will learn that the purpose of the utility is to serve and he will permit nothing to interfere with that service.

Customer-ownership pays big dividends, not to the utility, but to the public as well.

The record number of words sent in one minute by the Morse code is forty-nine.

BOOKS ON THE TABLE.

Books about the East multiply on all sides. The epidemic, in fact, is almost as contagious as that of South Sea literature a year ago. In addition to Mr. Somerset Maugham's purely artistic, impressionistic treatment of the Celestial country, reviewed elsewhere in this issue, we have received, in the last week or two, three other books concerned with various phases of the newly-discovered, oldest continent. "The Charm of the Middle Kingdom," by James Reid Marsh (Little, Brown & Co.; $3), is a handsome volume of the gift variety that seems to our uninitiate eyes to give a representative if perhaps too attractive picture of the Far East. Judging from the photographs of temple roofs and battlements, of marble boats and porcelain pavilions, and Oriental farms and gardens, one would suppose the Middle Kingdom the most paradisaical spot to be found in the three dimensions of a mundane existence. Unfortunately for the too easy attainment of such undeserved bliss one remembers the first-hand reports of other travelers less enamored with the romantic and aesthetic quality of the oldest extant civilization. But, after all, most of us do not go to China and we should be grateful to Mr. Marsh for supplying us with such an innocuous substitute.

Two other books deal with the political and economic aspects of modern China. "The Problem of China," by Bertrand Russell (The Century Company; $2), "sometime professor of philosophy in the Government University of Peking," is primarily a study of the effects of Western influence on Eastern civilization. Mr. Russell traces the interactions of these modern political currents and—as his brief is plainly for China—emphasizes the dangers of foreign aggression there while developing the importance of China's contribution to the West.

The third of our China books has the interest of being the work of Dr. Sun Yat-sen, ex-president of the Republic of Southern China—though one hardly dares speak even of that institution in the present tense in view of China's frequent political volte-faces. As a first-hand account of Sun Yat-sen's activities—and his original significance was as the leader of the revolution when the idea of a republic was first agitated under the dowager empress, from whom, in fact, Sun fled with a price on his neck—"The International Development of China" (G. P. Putnam's Sons; $4.50) has the value of an historical source book. A feature of the book is a large folding pocket map—most delightful adjunct of any volume.

But the devotees of Far Eastern interpretations do not limit themselves to the mainland of Asia. Literature on Japan is also rife. E. P. Dutton, notably, having lately published two books of Japanese origins, one of which, "Subjects Portrayed in Japanese Color Prints," by Basil Stewart, is not only the most complete treatise on the subject in English, but is one of the most intrinsically valuable books of art published in recent years. The other, "In Lotus-Land Japan," is far more of an exposition of national psychology than the average travel book is or can ever hope to be. It has been frequently said that casual travelers are beyond their rights in printing their impressions of a country, often based on faulty observation and almost always the result of lacking opportunity. Mr. Herbert G. Ponting, author of "In Lotus-Land Japan" (Dutton; $6), is a vehement protester against travelers of this ilk. Undoubtedly, "to understand all is to love all"; and though few have the opportunities of Mr. Ponting in cultivating this benevolent art, many of us may profit by his efforts. Still, with all the good will in the world to all the races therein, we can not help feeling that people who live long with this or that race always earnestly endeavoring to understand, to forgive, and to love, may end by sometimes conferring the benefit of the doubt too generously. The criticism does not apply particularly to Mr. Ponting's patiently sincere interpretation of the Japanese people. We simply throw it out as a precaution towards keeping the balance in all well-meant attempts to see eye-to-eye with other races.

R. G.

Notes of Books and Authors

Two posthumous books by Lord Bryce are to be published in the near future. One is the promised volume, "Memories of Travel."

The late Mr. William H. Hudson and the late Mr. Edward Thomas were great personal friends and their work had great points of resemblance. The later years of Hudson were spent in Cornwall, a county which he liked. When Thomas went away to the war, never to come back again, he had a house in Hampshire. It was a grief to Hudson when he heard of Thomas' death, and he helped to make his books better known than they were. A volume of posthumous essays by Thomas is appearing soon, and on the night he died Hudson was writing a preface which, though unfinished, will appear in it.

A new and beautifully illustrated edition of the works of Jane Austen issued recently by the Duttons is another proof of her continuing vitality. This new edition is complete in six volumes, which are sold both separately and in the set, and it has sixteen lovely illustrations in color by C. E. Brock, an English artist known as an illustrator of many eighteenth and early nineteenth-century books.

The ten best plays during the past season as selected by Burns Mantle in his third annual of the American stage, "The Best Plays of 1921-1922" (Small, Maynard & Co.), are: "Anna Christie," by Eugene O'Neill; "A Bill of Divorcement," by Clemence Dane; "Dulcy," by George S. Kaufman and Marc Connelly; "He Who Gets Slapped," by Leonid Andreyev; "Six-Cylinder Love," by William Anthony McGuire; "The Hero," by Gilbert Emery; "The Dover Road," by A. A. Milne; "Ambush," by Arthur Richman; "The Circle," by W. Somerset Maugham; "The Nest," by Paul Gerald.

A small sheaf of letters from John G. Whittier to Elizabeth Lloyd of Philadelphia will shortly be published by the Houghton Mifflin Company. It is one of the most interesting literary "finds" of the year. Whittier's friendship with the young Quakeress was known to his biographer, Pinckard, but apparently he did not know that Whittier had twice proposed marriage to her. The letters are marked throughout by a shyness and reserve, a Quaker quality that gives them both individuality and charm.

Ion Luca Caragiale, the representative man of letters of Roumania, was the son of an actor and a peasant woman whose personality is said to reflect the spirit of his country. In three years he rose from an inefficient proof-reader to a successful author—even as did our own Sinclair Lewis. Despite the fact that he was a radical in politics he was a friend of the late liberal leader, Take Jonescu. He was a passionate advocate of freedom of the press, an epicurean, a humorist, and a mystic. He had flashes of genius, but never properly capitalized them. Four comedies, one drama, and about a hundred sketches are all that he ever wrote.

Here's Where You Put Long Life in Your Motor

You put long life in your motor if you keep the crankcase full of "Aristo" Motor Oil.

A motor, like the human system, requires the right sort of food if it is to endure time, and this food—OIL—must be selected to meet the varying conditions of age, type and usage of the motor and seasons of the year.

"Aristo" Motor Oil is refined in different grades to meet these variations and the service department, maintained by the Union Oil Company is ready to advise you in the selection of the proper grade for your needs. This service is fully at your call in every part of the Pacific Coast.

Look for This Sign

Union Oil Co. of California

Bonds for Investment

MUNICIPALS IRRIGATION DISTRICTS CORPORATIONS

Specialists in Safety

Anglo London Paris Company
One Sansome Street San Francisco
Phone Kearny 5600

The French American Bank

OF SAN FRANCISCO

108 SUTTER STREET

Commercial—Checking—Savings

Resources Over $16,000,000

A General Banking Business Transacted

Commercial and Personal Checking Accounts Solicited

Savings Accounts receive interest at the rate of 4 per cent. per annum

SAFE DEPOSIT BOXES $3.50

OFFICERS

Leon Bocqueraz.....President
J. M. Dupas.....Vice-President
J. A. Bergerot.....Vice-President
W. F. Duffy.....Vice-Pres. and Cashier
A. Bousquet.....Secretary
J. T. Trillary.....Asst. Cashier
Chas. L. Ebner, Jr.....Asst. Cashier

The San Francisco Savings and Loan Society

(THE SAN FRANCISCO BANK)

SAVINGS COMMERCIAL

526 California St., San Francisco, Cal.

MISSION BRANCH.....Mission and 21st Streets

PARK-PRESIDIO DISTRICT BRANCH.....Clement and 7th Ave.

HAIGHT STREET BRANCH.....Haight and Belvedere Streets

June 30th, 1922

Assets.....$76,170,177.18

Deposits.....72,470,177.18

Capital Actually Paid Up.....1,000,000.00

Reserve and Contingent Funds.....2,700,000.00

Employees' Pension Fund.....385,984.61

A dividend to depositors of FOUR AND ONE-QUARTER (4 1/4) per cent. per annum was declared for the six months ending June 30th, 1922.

Down through the years Drifted snow has justified the place it holds as California's first Flour

SPERRY FLOUR CO. U. S. A.

They never change from -

Caswell's NATIONAL CREST Coffee

Telephone Direct Sutter 6654 Oakland 1017

1,800,000 cups served at the Panama-Pacific International Exposition.

REVIEWS AND NOTICES.

Bill the Bachelor.

Danish Mackail has all the desirable attributes of a writer of light fiction. He has just enough humor, pathos, romanticism, and whatever the other traits are to suit all readers of that indispensable class of literature, whether they be habitués or merely tired people looking for a mental vacation. Mr. Mackail supplies it, with not a little zest thrown in. "Romance to the Rescue" was very good in this line, but as his publishers justly assert, "Bill the Bachelor" is better. The latter, Mr. Mackail's third and latest novel, preserves the balance in the elements of popular fiction enumerated above so adroitly that one is apt to lose sight of the essentially light, humorous quality of Mr. Mackail's work—the acid test of true comedy. "Bill the Bachelor" is in fact a thoroughly satisfactory employment for a leisure evening, a few hours' train travel, or a period of the blues.

BILL THE BACHELOR. By Denis Mackail. Boston: Houghton Mifflin Company; $2.

The Importance of Bird Life.

Studies in natural history are very much to the fore nowadays. Perhaps the belated popularity of William H. Hudson's book has something to do with this particular kink in the book curve, but at least books on birds and beasts in general and the fauna and flora of certain regions in particular are prevalent. It may be merely one of the many reactions of the war. A late contribution to avian studies is "The Importance of Bird Life," by G. Inness Hartley, a writer who merits a word of introduction on his own quite aside from this capable book. He is a grandson of George Inness, our preëminent national landscape painter, and has quite evidently inherited his illustrious ancestor's close relationship with nature. "The Importance of Bird Life," however, is not so much on the Fabre style of research into minor forms of life as an economic and evolutionary survey of the significance of bird preservation. The average lay reader will acquire a foundation of bird lore that will rationalize his ideas on many things from domesticated fowls to feather factories.

THE IMPORTANCE OF BIRD LIFE. By G. Inness Hartley. New York: The Century Company; $2.

On a Chinese Screen.

Mr. Somerset Maugham has been traveling in the Orient—perhaps he is there still and there may be yet other literary results of the sojourn—with "On a Chinese Screen" to show as the fruit of his travels. This daintily-named volume is a collection of an immense number of Chinese thumbnail sketches, concerning which Mr. Maugham writes:

"I wrote these sketches while I was resting in my chair on the road in China, or going down one river or another in native craft. They were merely potted down as material for future work, rather than with any thought of publication; from day to day, as an odd character came across my path, or as a scene or an incident impressed me; and on re-reading them, I reflected that the reader might just as well make short stories, novels, and plays, and save me a great deal of trouble."

The results are more than raw material for stories and plays, Mr. Maugham to the contrary. They are finished products, but of the pastel or hasty etching type, and we suspect, are far more interesting presented in this extempore fashion than they would be if worked for all they are worth. The ensemble incidentally is a vivid if rather kaleidoscopic picture of present-day China.

ON A CHINESE SCREEN. By W. Somerset Maugham. New York: George H. Doran Company; $2.

The Greek Lyric.

Lovers of Greek poetry will welcome this first of the three volumes of the Greek lyric, which Mr. Edwards is preparing for the Loeb Classical Library. In the forty years since the fourth edition of Bergk's "Poetæ Lyrici Græci" appeared, our slender store of these precious fragments, thanks to the discoveries made by the Egyptian Exploration Fund and similar societies, has grown to such an extent that a new edition has been long overdue. Mr. Edmond's three volumes when completed will go far toward supplying this want. They will contain all the fragments, except those of a merely paleogeographical importance, from Eumelus to Timotheus.

Volume I includes the Greek texts and translations of Terpander, Alcman, Sappho and Alcaeus, together with the ancient accounts of such early poets as Olympos and Thaletas, of whom we have no surviving fragments, and "the chief passages in ancient literature which throw light on the life and personality of the poets and their literary reputations in antiquity." The Greek text is equipped with an apparatus criticus, and the English translation is accompanied by brief explanatory and illustrative notes. The volume has complete indices of authors and subjects and a table of cross references to older editions of the fragments.

The English translation is readable and fairly literal where it is prose, and abominable where it is verse. It is hard to understand why scholars who translate poetry persist in turning it into doggerel when ordinary prose would be better.

LYRA GRÆCA. Volume I. The Loeb Classical Library. Edited and translated by J. M. Edmonds. London: William Heinemann; New York: G. P. Putnam's Sons; $2.25.

New Books Received.

A WORLD WORTH WHILE. By W. A. Rogers. New York: Harper & Brothers; $3.

A record of "Auld Acquaintance" with an introduction by Booth Tarkington.

BATTLES AND ENCHANTMENTS RETOLD FROM ANCIENT IRISH LITERATURE. By Norreys Jephson O'Connor. Boston: Houghton Mifflin Company; $2. Irish folklore.

THE BEST PLAYS OF 1921-1922. By Burns Mantle. Boston: Small, Maynard & Co.; $2. And the Year Book of the Drama in America.

THE JUST STEWARD. By Richard Dehan. New York: George H. Doran Company; $2.

"A story of the lure, the mystery, the occult power of the East."

LAUGHTER LIMITED. By Nina Wilcox Putnam. New York: George H. Doran Company; $1.75. By the author of "West Broadway," etc.

ANN AND HER MOTHER. By O. Douglas. New York: George H. Doran Company; $1.75. The story of a Scotch parish.

THE SUN CHASER. By Jeannette Marks. Cincinnati: Stewart Kidd Company; $1.75. A play in four acts.

CONTEMPORARY ONE-ACT PLAYS OF 1921. Edited by Frank Shay. Cincinnati: Stewart & Kidd Company; $3.75. A companion volume to "Fifty Contemporary One-Act Plays."

APPRAISEMENTS AND ASPERITIES. By Felix E. Schelling. Philadelphia: J. B. Lippincott Company; $2. Contemporary comment.

RED ROBIN. By Jane Abbott. Philadelphia: J. B. Lippincott Company; $1.75. Juvenile.

PETER COTTERELL'S TREASURE. By Rupert Sargent Holland. Philadelphia: J. B. Lippincott Company; $1.75. An adventure story for boys.

THROUGH THE CLOUD MOUNTAIN. By Florence Scott Bernard. Philadelphia: J. B. Lippincott Company; $2.50. With eight color illustrations by Gertrude Kay.

ADVENTURES OF A BROWNIE. By Miss Mulock. Philadelphia: J. B. Lippincott Company; $3. Gift edition.

SUBJECTS PORTRAYED IN JAPANESE COLOUR-PRINTS. By Basil Stewart. New York: E. P. Dutton & Co.; $40. A collector's guide with list of artists, reproductions of artists' signatures, publishers' seals, and actors' crests; bibliography and index.

THE GLAND STEALERS. By Bertram Gayton. Philadelphia: J. B. Lippincott Company; $1.75. A comedy of today.

THE NEXT TO NOTHING HOUSE. By Alice Van Leer Carrick. Boston: The Atlantic Monthly Press; $2.50. With sixty interior views of the house.

DAVID THE DREAMER. By Ralph Bergengren. Boston: The Atlantic Monthly Press; $2.50. Juvenile.

WOMEN OF THE FRENCH REVOLUTION. By Winifred Stephens. New York: E. P. Dutton & Co.; $5. A picturesque history of the feminist movement during the French Revolution.

THE GENOA CONFERENCE. By J. Saxon Mills. With a foreword by the Rt. Hon. D. Lloyd George. New York: E. P. Dutton & Co.; $8.

THE PRINT OF MY REMEMBRANCE. By Augustus Thomas. New York: Charles Scribner's Sons; $4. The story of a playwright who began his career working on a railroad.

LETTERS OF JAMES GIBBON HUNEKER. New York: Charles Scribner's Sons; $3.50. Collected and edited by Josephine Huneker.

COMPANIONABLE BOOKS. By Henry Van Dyke. New York: Charles Scribner's Sons; $2. Literary studies.

THE LOVE LEGEND. By Woodward Boyd. New York: Charles Scribner's Sons; $1.75. A novel.

DICK AND LARRY, FRESHMEN. By Francis Lynde. New York: Charles Scribner's Sons; $1.60. A novel for boys.

POEMS OF AMERICAN PATRIOTISM. Chosen by Brander Matthews. New York: Charles Scribner's Sons; $3.50. An extended and revised edition illustrated by N. C. Wyeth.

WHAT YOUR HAND REVEALS. By Henri Rem. New York: E. P. Dutton & Co.; $5. Translated from the French.

PEREGRINE'S PROGRESS. By Jeffery Farnol. Boston: Little, Brown & Co.; $2. A new novel by the author of "The Broad Highway."

THE CHARM OF THE MIDDLE KINGDOM. By James Reid Marsh. Boston: Little, Brown & Co.; $3. "Intimate glimpses of the East."

THE FUN OF BEING A FAT MAN. By William Johnston. Boston: Little, Brown & Co.; 75 cents. By the retuned editor of the New York World.

THE BRIGHT SHAWL. By Joseph Hergesheimer. New York: Alfred A. Knopf; $2. A novel.

KING ARTHUR'S SOCKS. By Floyd Dell. New York: Alfred A. Knopf; $2.50. And other village plays.

GLIMPSES OF AUTHORS. By Caroline Ticknor. Boston: Houghton Mifflin Company; $3.50. Episodes of literary life.

DAVID IVES. By Arthur Stanwood Pier. Boston: Houghton Mifflin Company; $1.75. A story of St. Timothy's, a boys' boarding school.

ARIEL. By José Enrique Rodó. Translated with introductory essay by F. J. Stinson. Boston: Houghton Mifflin Company; $1.75. An essay by one of the foremost philosophers of South America.

THE WAY OF POETRY. An anthology for young readers by John Drinkwater. Boston: Houghton Mifflin Company; $2.

WONDERS OF CHEMISTRY. By A. Frederick Collins. New York: Thomas Y. Crowell Company; $1.60. Popular chemistry.

LOYALTIES. By John Galsworthy. New York: Charles Scribner's Sons; $1. A drama in three acts.

THE PENITENT. By Edna Worthley Underwood. Boston: Houghton Mifflin Company; $2. The first of a trilogy of novels that will picture the crumbling of Russian civilization beginning in

IT'S THE WATER.
Prepared with Glacier Water from
Shasta Springs
AT ALL DEALERS
SHASTA WATER COMPANY

the Napoleonic era and ending with the present day.

DANIEL BOONE, WILDERNESS SCOUT. By Stewart Edward White. Garden City: Doubleday, Page & Co.; $1.75.

A romance of the American frontier.

MORE MYSTERY TALES FOR BOYS AND GIRLS. Selected by Elva S. Smith. Boston: Lothrop, Lee & Shepard Company; $2.

Stories and poems of ghosts and wizards and hidden treasure.

The White House
The Valley of Content

By BLANCHE UPRIGHT

A San Francisco author's first novel
—the dramatic version to be produced in New York this season, by Marjorie Rameau. $1.90

Book Dept., Main Floor.

Raphael Weill & Co. Inc.

All Books that are reviewed in the Argonaut can be obtained at
Robertson's
222 STOCKTON ST.
Union Square San Francisco

THE HOLMES BOOK CO.
707 Market St. 152 Kearny St. 22 Third St.
Largest variety of new and second-hand books
in the city. A visit to our stores will convince you of the truth of this assertion. We buy libraries or single books for cash. See us
before selling. Phone—Douglas 3283.
SAN FRANCISCO, CAL.

IF YOU ARE A REAL
BOOK-LOVER
Spend a pleasant hour in the real "Old Book
Shop" at 2 TILLMAN PLACE, OFF
GRANT AVENUE—below Sutter.
Rare Old Books Bought, Sold and Hunted For by GEORGE HARGENS (formerly of the White House)

BOOKS
AT
PAUL ELDER'S
239 POST ST., SAN FRANCISCO

NEWBEGIN'S BOOKSTORE
358 POST STREET SAN FRANCISCO
Opposite Union Square
A Shop known for its courteous service, and a pleasant place to browse.
Information on books, authors and editions
gladly given. Books bought and sold. Buyer will call. Telephone Douglas 2810

IF YOU FAVOR
LIGHT WINES AND BEER
VOTE "NO" ON THE WRIGHT ACT
Proposition No. 2 on the November Ballot

|       |   |
|-------|---|
| ***** |   |
| 2     | PROHIBITION ENFORCEMENT ACT. Submitted to electors by referendum. Declares unlawful all acts and omissions prohibited by the 18th Amendment to the Federal Constitution and by the Volstead Act, adopting the penalties therein prescribed; vests state courts with jurisdiction and imposes upon prosecuting officers, grand juries, magistrates and peace officers the duty to enforce said laws; permits local enforcement of ordinances prohibiting the manufacture, sale, transportation or possession of intoxicating liquors; this act to conform, automatically, to changes in said Federal laws. |
|       | Yes   |
|       | No  |
|       | Mark X Here   |
| ***** |   |

CALIFORNIA GRAPE PROTECTIVE ASSOCIATION

JOHN HOWELL
IMPORTER BOOKS PUBLISHER
RARE BOOKS AND FIRST EDITIONS
Libraries Bought and Sold
328 Post Street : Union Square
Sutter 3768
SAN FRANCISCO

The Wright Magazine
("Not for self, but for others")

Only $1.00 a Year.

Besides a serial and short stories it contains departments for literary and music, women and children, farm and garden, a people's forum, manuscript markets, radio notes and other interesting features.

THE WRIGHT MAGAZINE
P. O. Box 894 Little Rock, Ark.

"SIX CYLINDER LOVE."

This jolly little comedy was written to the taste of the average American citizen, which means the man who buys an automobile. It is wholesome, salutary, yet breezy, and full of American humor; a brand which tickles the ribs of our quieter Anglo-Saxon cousins as well as our own.

We have some cause, indeed, to plume ourselves on a form of humor which can sugar pills of propaganda, gild the inculcation of domestic morality and business ethics, and make people laugh delightedly even while they are learning something.

Perhaps people are not really learning, in "Six-Cylinder Love," so much as clinching what they already know. For the play, in the pleasantest, breeziest, and most amusing way, points out to the average citizen that if he buys an automobile before he is financially ready for it he is going to stagger under a load as heavy as that borne by Atlas. Yes, and very much like it, for to own an automobile without being sufficiently heeled means to buy with it a very large package of worldly cares.

In "Six-Cylinder Love" we find ourselves in the society of those American families of moderate means who own small country bungalows with infinitesimal backyards; something about the same size as their bank account.

An automobile is a peregrinating edifice, and so, when a bungalow owner with a bank account that requires a magnifying glass to be seen buys an automobile he has two establishments with all their financial responsibilities. So we find, in "Six-Cylinder Love," which shows the cheerful, whisky-swizzling, cigar-abstracting, dinner-snatching brigands who prey upon the car-owner who knows not how to snub cheerful effrontery, drives his car for him, flirts with his wife, and runs up bills to his account at roadside restaurants.

I confess to not knowing the brand, but one recognizes the vaimsemblance and realizes that the comedy has grim truthfulness behind its cheerful, amusing front. For it is written in humorous vein, the dialogue is brisk, and witty, and one is tickled by the types: the newly-weds, with the innocent bride who instinctively vamps her new possession, the innocent husband who adores being vamped, the born salesman who sells automatically and by instinct, the cheerful but slightly soured old paterfamilias whose sin has been his too great indulgence to his greedy womankind, and the flock of "cushion lizards," who live in their friends' automobiles, board at their expense, and get their exercise by dancing at road houses. Of course this picture of life as she is lived during this age of a terrestrial paradise stuffed with automobiles, telephones, and ready credit is touched up to hues somewhat higher than those of life; but there is enough truth in it to make it grip more deeply into your amused and interested response.

And an excellent company and clever stage direction makes the action, as well as the dialogue, skid gayly over well-oiled rollers.

There are several old acquaintances in the company, William Friend giving a genial representation of the jolly old family man whose humor has acquired an edge since he has acquired an automobile. Clem Bevins as William Douroy, the automobile salesman, is a sort of commercial Uncle Sam, his depiction of Douroy's business talents and instinctive shrewdness, his dry yet penetrating humor, and the indication of a lurking heart under the business-toughness hide delighting by its truth to life.

Miss Nellie Burt, with her pretty, chattering voice of spring-like freshness, and the artless artfulness with which she makes the young newly-wed beguile common sense and hard-earned dollars out of her husband's pockets, is a delectable figure in the comedy. And Kingsley Benedict, who plays the husband, not only enters with spirit and humor into the comedy of the situations, but when life's rainstorms blow down the walls of his little paradise the young actor revealed himself as a player of dramatic force and sincerity; one who could touch hearts and win sympathy.

Mr. John H. Elliott, another familiar presence, gave the necessary element of shrewd kindheartedness to the old business man who knew how to administer a needed lesson, and six or eight other players rounded out competently an excellent cast, among them being Maureen Olson, the pretty actress who so cleverly played the purring, scratching cat in "Nice People."

A full auditorium testified to the local appreciation of a well-heralded play. And the audience reaped a fine harvest, not only of laughter, but of the enjoyment of seeing common-sensical ideas attractively, humorously, and gayly presented.

A good company is always enjoyable if you give them a play. And there are an unusual number of pleasant personalities in the company. Even that attractive pair, the smiling janitor and his equally smiling wife, won our pleased regard.

As for the very wealthy, they will be amused to see how nearly modest prosperity shaves poverty, and business men will chuckle over the sudden deals that spring up. In fact "Six-Cylinder Love" is an amusing comedy reflex of life as she is lived, even daring to show its more serious possibilities, and the reflection is that of the life of today.

"THE MAN WHO CAME BACK."

The world moves on, but melodrama stays by us. The public likes it, especially sentimental melodrama, to which class belongs Goodman's "The Man Who Came Back."

Speaking as a jaded critic I find the first act is the best, because it is realistic and is lightened with real humor. And the idea of the wrong that is done the child of wealth by feeding him on limitless streams of gold appeals to one's reasonable convictions.

The cabaret scene brings in sentimentality and melodrama, which stay on the job until the end. I think the audiences are delightfully thrilled by the scene in the opium joint; but to my taste dimly lighted, opium-flavored degeneracies should not be too long drawn out. There is a suggestion in this act of the old-fashioned Eden Musée chamber of horrors, of which a little, to a fastidious taste, will go a long way.

The pinery, with the two sinners clothed and in their right mind, offers the virtue of contrast. Fresh air, outdoors, an agricultural occupation, and energy and industry certainly provide a welcome change. But the playwright shows both sinners threatened with a relapse. Certainly we have no right to think that people who have wallowed in Oriental slums are going to find it any too easy to "get back."

Of course they do get back eventually, to the vast delight and sympathy of everybody all round. And son downs the old man by his moral victory, and there is a surprise at the end, which always sends an audience off blissfully happy.

Messrs. Hutchinson and Armstrong were both very good as, respectively, the father and son, Robert Armstrong contriving, through all the winding ways of sin, to invest Harry Potter with qualities that attracted likeableness and sympathy.

Peggy Allenby is a little crude in her acting, but she is young, and has plenty of time in which to develop. She did quite well, and she has some pretty graces of girlhood. Edyna Davies gives some snap to Olive, Allen Atwell cleverly differentiates his two separate rôles of the "Chink" and the Jap, and Norman Cope was effective in the rôle of the dissolute Englishman.

Although "The Man Who Came Back" is a revival, the theme seems to appeal to the average theatre-goer. There is a certain minor tone in the sentiment of the play similar to that in "The Bird of Paradise" which wins a response, and quite a large audience at the Curran on the opening night—and large audiences are scarce these times—was abandoning itself to the enjoyment of melodramatic thrills, of sentimental sympathy, and of a due proportion of laughter.

"CHIMES OF NORMANDY."

This tuneful little opera is excellent material for revivals. It will, apparently, never enter on the long rest destined for so many of the operas bouffes of its period. That was a fruitful time for pieces of this type when "The Chimes of Normandy" was born, and something in the story, some essence of drama, together with the appealing tunefulness of the music, gives it perennial vitality.

Its attractive quality is shown by the fact that about two years ago its unfading qualities attracted the attention of the directors of both the French and the Players Theatres, who, to their dismay, found themselves reviving it simultaneously. It has been a wise choice for the Rivoli this week, as it is comic, dramatic, and deliciously melodious.

I was not surprised to find that Ferris Hartman did not clown the part of the old miser. Ferris Hartman is a competent actor, and is not cast in a mold. As a result he gave a dramatic and forceful portrayal of the ancient madman, refraining from the inartistic overemphasis that the otherwise bouffe atmosphere of the piece might have caused in an actor of less judgment and experience, and giving the weird scene of midnight madness its due atmosphere.

Lillian Glaser and John Van gave excellent dramatic and vocal interpretations to their rôles of Germaine and Grenichaux, and Lavinia Winn's somewhat self-conscious comeliness was well placed in the rôle of Serpolette, whose rural conception of the airs and graces of a puffed and powdered marquise was given with spirit and humor.

Rafael Brunetto's baritone was employed with agreeable effect in the picturesque rôle of the Marquis, and that reliable pair of singers, Nona Campbell and Robert Carlson, although not cast in the opera, figured as a sort of musical gift to the audience, in that they sang a duet which was introduced, and in which the two singers appeared to advantage.

The choral numbers were much enjoyed, their fluent tunefulness sending the audience forth humming many echoes of them.

"ENTER MADAME."

This play, by Gilda Varesi and Dolly Byrne, which had a spectacularly long and successful run in New York and was the means of putting Gilda Varesi, who played the rôle of the temperamental heroine, at one bound into the limelight of the New York stage, is now being presented at the Plaza by the Stage Guild. And since history has a trick of repeating itself, the play has done the same good service to Medea Radzina in San Francisco that it did to Gilda Varesi in New York.

Medea Radzina is an actress who has been living in domestic retirement since her marriage, after considerable experience, following her training in the Art Theatre of Moscow, as a player in that theatre, and as a successful actress in the European picture-play world.

The Stage Guild was very fortunate in securing her for the rôle of Lisa Della Robbia, the volatile and emotional opera singer who has married an Anglo-Saxon, and whose wide divergence from the type of average women of his knowledge has caused her husband's affections to undergo a slump.

The idea of the play is to exhibit the fascinating, unreasoning, absorbing and trying being whom Gerald Fitzgerald has married in all her delightful volatility and variety; to show how vain it is for Gerald to try to break his chains when Madame elects to enter the lists and contest for his affections with the lady who wishes to supplant her.

Gilda Varesi, I should judge, got some suggestion of her idea from "The Great Lover," revived here within a few months by Leo Ditrichstein, in which an operatic tenor is similarly exploited as a fascinating, irresponsible, and lovable child of impulse.

"Enter Madame" is a play of theatrical effect rather than of psychological subtlety. It gives a diverting picture of an opera singer at home, in the atmosphere of domesticity, in which she is about as adaptable as a brilliant butterfly. It shows her household, and the artless democracy of her servants, who adore their mistress and live in her smile; revealing, at the same time, the essential and ineradicable differences between her nature and that of her son and husband. "Enter Madame" is a better play than "The Great Lover," which has too much bustle, too many characters, and is altogether too theatrically arranged for effect. "Enter Madame," which frankly belongs to the same class, is, however, more in the line of simple humanity, and the attention is not diverted, as in "The Great Lover," from the main group of characters by a lot of people who do not have any particular bearing on the plot.

A very careful selection of players has been made beginning with Medea Radzina, who has many qualifications to lend her figure the brilliance due to Madame Della Robbia. Medea's Radzina's Russianness, her strong accent in English speech, her foreign appearance, and her ebullient temperament all join to make her almost if not quite an ideal Madame. It has been said of her that she outshines Gilda Varesi, who underplayed the part. As a contrast to this criticism on Gilda Varesi it might almost be said of Medea Radzina that she overplays it. At any rate there is something of redundancy of gesture and inflexion that induces a slight sense of fatigue. Mme. Radzina is almost too strenuous in some of her scenes, and yet, as Madame sat at her supper-table, facing her cold-blooded rival, whose character supplied an excellent contrast to that of her own, the Russian actress was very effective in her silent acting. That is one of the points that

ESMOND'S

"THE CAKE SHOP"

253 Grant Ave.

We offer a large variety of pies, cakes and pastries—all of the highest quality and flavor.

"ECCLES CAKES" Our Specialty

Some Figures and a Moral.

An estimate by the management gives 320,000 as a round number for the total attendance at the California Industries Exposition.

A calculation based on meter reading indicates that 80,000 persons drank at the two fountains in the Spring Valley booth.

That is to say, one person out of every four who attended the exposition assuaged his thirst in Spring Valley's rest room.

Youngsters used the drinking fountains more than their elders. Boys used them more than girls.

Despite the temptation that running water offers to a small boy, keeping the Spring Valley rest room tidy presented no problem even when the attendant was absent.

San Franciscans, young and old, are polite, orderly, and appreciative of "useful service" when it is offered in a sincere and kindly spirit.

SPRING VALLEY

WATER COMPANY

Special Announcement

HAROLD KIRBY

ENGLISH CONCERT BARITONE

(Just Completed World Tour in Concert Recital)

ANNOUNCES THE OPENING OF HIS

STUDIOS In the Bay Cities

Where He Will Be Prepared to Accept a Limited Number of Pupils in

Voice Production, Singing and Dramatic Art

During this season Mr. Kirby intends to devote himself to teaching the principles of Vocal and Dramatic Art and will be actively engaged in imparting to his pupils the Knowledge and Experience acquired by him through professional association with the many famous artists with whom he has continually appeared on the programmes during his recent Concert Tours.

TONE PLACEMENT—BREATHING—PRODUCTION—INTERPRETATION—DICTION—FINISH

"Harold Kirby, apart from his public appearance as an artist, has also gained for himself an enviable reputation as a Teacher. His deep understanding of the voice, added to his appreciation of the pupils' difficulties, enables him to produce splendid, enduring results within a reasonably short time."—Musical America.

SPECIALIST IN BOYS' VOICES

Boys' Concert Choir Will Be Formed

Phone Berkeley 9232 M, or write for appointments, interviews and further information

Temporary Address, 2539 Benvenue Avenue, Berkeley

A STUDIO WILL BE OPENED IN SAN FRANCISCO AS SOON AS SUITABLE ACCOMMODATIONS CAN BE OBTAINED

The Harold Kirby Studios of Vocal and Dramatic Art

she learned at the Art Theatre of Moscow, where they have always laid great stress on the art of dramatic pantomime.

In respect to appearance she has good features, a markedly foreign physiognomy, and is very good looking, but not beautiful. The word "pretty" doesn't come in. Her features and character expression do not blend with the word "pretty." Mme. Radzina is rather petite, light, and quick in her movements, and lights up beautifully in evening dress. She has beautiful hands with exquisitely tapering fingers, whose grace and variety of gesture express the vivacity and histrionic urge of an invaluable temperament.

In respect to personality the actress is richly gifted; also vocally, her voice having a rich, luscious quality that suits her rather dazzling personality. Which reminds me of another vulnerable point. When Madame was supposed to be suddenly excited, pleasurable or otherwise, the actress' voice lost its delightful quality and rose to a note of shriekiness, which invariably caused her utterances to become partly or altogether unintelligible.

In all other respects, however, she was quite a brilliant, compelling figure in the rôle; so much so, indeed, that it is evident that in securing her for the rôle of Madame the Plaza people made a big catch that has come nearer to filling their theatre than either of the two plays previously presented.

"Enter Madame" has the usual good support, Mary Morris and Irving Pichel subordinating themselves in small rôles, Sam Hume somewhat mellowing a rather dry and inexpressive personality in the rôle of Gerald, while Mildred Martin, formerly of the Players Theatre, came out quite strong in the rôle of the pretty but coldly malicious rival. Two excellently played rôles were those of Madame's maid and chef, played by Virginia Sciaroni and Lloyd Corrigan, and Irene McSwain, Dan Totheroh, and Kichino Nishino did good service, the latter winning a glad hand from the audience by his graphic representation of the wrath of an outrivaled cook.

JOSEPHINE HART PHELPS.

FOYER AND BOX-OFFICE.

At the Curran.

"The Man Who Came Back," which has been holding forth at the Curran Theatre, will enter upon the second and final week of its local engagement with the performance Sunday night. There will be a matinee Saturday.

This drama has renewed its success of three years ago in San Francisco, and is continuing to draw large audiences. The production is up to the standard set by William A. Brady. The company is headed by Robert Armstrong and Peggy Allenby, assisted by others, including Allen Atwell, J. K. Hutchinson, Edyna Davies, Maxwell Driscoll, H. M. Switzer and Cora Calkins.

At the Columbia.

J. J. Gottlob of the Columbia Theatre, who is in New York completing bookings for the next several months, announces that the list will prove the finest offered by any theatre in the West.

Following "Six-Cylinder Love" will be seen the notable international success, John Galsworthy's "The Skin Game." Then comes Mitzi in "Lady Billy," to be followed by David Belasco's production of "The Gold Diggers," Charles Gilpin in "The Emperor Jones," the revival of "The Merry Widow," May Robson in her new play, William Gillette in "Dulcy."

Judging from the applause and comments of Columbia Theatre audiences, "Six-Cylinder Love," the current attraction, a comedy by William Anthony McGuire presented by Sam H. Harris, has made a distinct impression on local theatre-goers. The story of the play especially interests those who own automobiles, those who wish they did, and those who might own one some day. There are but few serious moments in the play, but these are filled with eloquent drama.

Kingsley Benedict, Nellie Burt, Clem Bevin, William Friend and John H. Elliott come in for large shares of the applause which is nightly bestowed at the Columbia Theatre.

Departing from custom, the Columbia Theatre offers a special performance of "Six-Cylinder Love" Sunday evening. The usual matinees are given Wednesday and Saturday.

John Galsworthy's play, "The Skin Game," will come to the Columbia Theatre, November 13th, under the management of William A. Brady, in association with Readean, Ltd., of London.

The Orpheum Next Week.

John Hyams and Leila McIntyre are a popular vaudeville team. Their latest production, "Honeysuckle," serves to introduce their daughter, Leila Hyams, and an excellent supporting company.

Percy Bronson and Winnie Baldwin are remembered for their work in musical comedy and for their vaudeville act, "1970." Their new act is a satire on mind reading.

V. and E. Stanton, "The English Boys from America," as this famous pair call themselves, have some comedy that is refreshing and new. Their eccentric "stepping" is in keeping with their characters.

Jack Norton is one of the country's foremost comedians, and was last seen here in "Bubbles." He and his company present Hugh Herbert's latest musical comedy, "Recreation," which is good fun enlivened by snappy songs and dances.

Crisp stories, odd little songs, skill at the piano and striking individuality are the trump cards of Mr. Leo Beers, who returns from a trip around the world with a mass of new material.

Monsieur Adolphus comes from the Opéra Comique in Paris, and brings with him Grace Eastman, an American danseuse, in a really artistic production entitled "Bohemian Life."

Jack George is an old-time blackface comedian who does some fine characters in burnt cork. He is assisted by a pretty little French girl.

The Snowden Sisters are two dainty misses with looks and talent. They present "Vaudeville à la Carte."

Municipal Pop Concert.

The first popular concert of the San Francisco Symphony Orchestra, Alfred Hertz conductor, to be given under the auspices of the municipality at the Exposition Auditorium next Wednesday evening, November 8th, promises to fill the hall. This is the first time in the musical history of America that a city has ever sponsored such a praiseworthy undertaking, and that the public appreciates the opportunity of hearing the best of music at a reasonable price is demonstrated by the sale of season tickets, which is just concluding, at Serman, Clay & Co.'s.

Louis Persinger, concertmaster of the orchestra, will play the violin solo incidental to Saint-Saëns' "The Deluge," and Uda Waldrop will occupy the console of the great municipal organ in the concluding march, "Pomp and Circumstance."

The orchestra will be augmented to one hundred men. The concert will begin at 8:20 sharp, and the programme is as follows:

Prelude to "Lohengrin".....Wagner
Symphony in B Minor, "Unfinished".....Schubert
Carnival in Paris.....Svendsen

Prelude to "The Deluge".....Saint-Saëns
Violin Solo, Louis Persinger
Two Hungarian Dances.....Brahms
Liebesleid.....Kreiser
Liebesfreud.....Kreiser
March, "Pomp and Circumstance".....Elgar
Uda Waldrop at the Organ

There will be 2000 reserved seats at 25 cents and 6000 at 50 cents.

The St. Francis Recitals.

An exponent of the all too seldom heard art of the chanteuse is Mona Gondre, the petite French singer who will offer her droll folk songs and ballads at the second of the Alice Seckels' matinee musicales, to be held November 13th. Her repertoire consists of folk songs in French and English, some of the former being very old.

Gondre is accompanied by Elise Sorelle, who in addition to the piano plays the harp with rare charm, and will contribute several solo numbers. With the semi-informal setting of the Colonial Room of the Hotel St. Francis, where their matinee will be given artists should prove a musical treat.

cis, where their matinee will be given artists should prove a musical treat.

Sherman, Clay & Co. are selling single tickets for the Gondre-Sorelle performance, as well as subscription books for the balance of the Alice Seckels series.

Sponsored by a group of society women, an interesting recital is arranged for the Italian Room of the Hotel St. Francis on the evening of November 16th, when Henry Schlee will give a Kipling dramatic recital.

Schlee, who is an Englishman, but has spent the greater part of his life in the Far East, is a devoted student of the poetry of Rudyard Kipling, and his recitals—he has been giving several privately at the University of California, Mills College, and some of the leading schools—have met with a response whose enthusiasm has prompted the arrangements for this public recital.

Tickets for the recital, which is under the direction of Alice Seckels, have been placed on sale at Sherman, Clay & Co.'s.

The Luxury Cruise
Next Winter
Mauretania
The Blue Ribbon Ship of the Atlantic to the Mediterranean
The Enchanted Sea of History and Romance
From New York February 10th, 1923

All that can be said of luxury in travel on sea combined with speed and perfect ship management is expressed in that magical word MAURETANIA.

And as for the MEDITERRANEAN—no single word is so full of meaning, so storied, so pictured, so compelling to the imagination. Blue skies, blue waters, sunny and fascinating. The most wonderful of all cruising waters and shores in the world.

Together these two words, MAURETANIA—MEDITERRANEAN, picture an ideal—a dream made real, under the experienced travel management of the American Express Travel Department in full cooperation with the Cunard Line—with all this means in Ship Management, Service and Cuisine.

$950 up, according to stateroom, including inland excursions from all ports of call—Madeira—Gibraltar—Algiers—Monte Carlo—Italy, Rome, Naples—the Dardanelles—Constantinople—Greece, Athens, Eleusis, Marathon—Palestine, Haifa, Jerusalem, Bethlehem, Nazareth, Tiberias, Damascus—Egypt, Cairo, Memphis, and up the Nile to Luxor, Karnak, Thebes, Assuan and the First Cataract.

In diverting the Mauretania from its regular ports for this Cruise, the Cunard Line departs from the traditional policy to make a notable and unique epoch in Cruising history.

For full information, details, itinerary, etc., call at any American Express office or write direct to

AMERICAN EXPRESS
TRAVEL DEPARTMENT
Market St. at Second, San Francisco, Cal.
752 South Broadway, Los Angeles, Cal.

ALSO:

The Pacific Liner "Ebro"
to SOUTH AMERICA
68 days across and below the Equator
From New York January 24, 1923,

Visiting the most interesting ports including Robinson Crusoe's Island—across the Andes Mountains, 8 days at Rio de Janeiro (Brazilian Centennial Exposition.) $1890 and up. Also several special tours to the Brazilian Exposition up to February 17.

Wherever you travel always carry
American Express Travelers Cheques

COLUMBIA THEATRE Leading Playhouse of the West
Geary at Mason Phone Franklin 180

Final Week Begins Sunday, Nov. 5
Matinees Wednesday and Saturday
Wm. Anthony's Delightful Comedy

"SIX-CYLINDER LOVE"

"Has a real 'kick'."—Chronicle.
Nov. 13—JOHN GALSWORTHY'S "THE SKIN GAME."

CURRAN THEATRE Geary Street Near Mason Phone Prospect 9300
Geary at Mason

Second and Last Week
Matinees Wednesday and Saturday
Wm. A. Brady Presents the Red-Blooded American Drama

"The Man Who Came Back"

Prices—Nights, 50c to $2; Sat. mat., 50c to $1.50; Wed. mat., 50c.
Next Sunday—"WHEN KNIGHTHOOD WAS IN FLOWER."

MATINEES 25 and 50c DAILY
EVENINGS 25c TO $1.25
Except Sat., Sun. and Holidays
ALWAYS A GREAT SHOW
SMOKING PERMITTED IN DRESS CIRCLE AND LOGES

Sequoia Little Theatre
1725 Washington St. Tel. Polk St. and Van Ness Ave.

Tuesday and Saturday Nights in November
Three One-Act Plays
Dunsanny-Galsworthy-G. Bernard Shaw
Prices $1 and 50c. plus tax.
Sherman, Clay's and Paul Elder's

THE CITY OF SAN FRANCISCO presents the

SAN FRANCISCO SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
ALFRED HERTZ—CONDUCTOR

in a season of
5-POP CONCERTS-5
EXPOSITION AUDITORIUM
Nov. 8th, Dec. 9th, Jan. 4th, Feb. 1st, Mar. 1st, at 8:20 p. m.

FIRST CONCERT, WEDNESDAY, NOV. 8
LOUIS PERSINGER, Violin Soloist
UDA WALDROP at the Organ

2000 reserved seats, 25c; 6000 reserved seats, 50c; others, 75c and $1. Season tickets at Sherman, Clay & Co.'s at these reduced prices: Five $1 seats, $4; five 75c seats, $3; five 50c seats, $2; five 25c seats, $1.
All Seats Reserved—Exempt from War Tax

VANITY FAIR.

No use talking, New York society does enjoy its charity work. It appears to include some of the most altruistic people on earth. One recent day a lot of them assembled on the estate of Mrs. William A. Reed, near Purchase, Westchester County, to help the poor. It was a noble illustration of devotion and sacrifice, and not one complaint of the heavy burden of the day was heard. The loving service of humanity was given definite direction by William Muldoon, who has reconditioned some of the greatest business men of the country, and saved many a poor, near-paralytic millionaire from a timely grave. Mr. Muldoon had transported to the estate a stage with some dressing-rooms and a sixteen-foot ring. This ring was not for the philanthropists, but for some twenty-eight prize-fighters of national reputation as widely extended as New Jersey to batter each other in, while the philanthropists sat in comfortable seats and applauded with daintily gloved hands the bruising and rending tactics of the three-round principals. Among the debutantes thus favorably brought to the notice of society were Joe Gans, Johnny Dundee, Pancho Villa, Harry Greb and Kid Norfolk, all doing their blushing best in charity's sweet name, all willing to bleed, but more willing to make the other fellow bleed, for the sake of the poor and needy. The bouts were to have gone four rounds, the regular ham-and-eggs limit, but there were so many of these hemaidens to be presented that it was necessary to reduce the time. For three rounds, then, they slammed each other in the slats, banged each other on the bezer, beamed each other, broke each other's beaks, and helped the poor wonderfully. Only one real faux pas was made, although that was repeated. The referee at intervals yelled "Break! Break!" He should, of course, have said "Gentlemen, please, I request you to separate." His use of so vulgar a word in such refined surroundings had a curious result. One society lady summoned Mr. Muldoon and asked him to "Stop that brute. He's ordering those young men to break each other's arms and legs." Mr. Muldoon quieted the dowager with the assurance that "break" was a mere brutality of the ring, and they would, unfortunately, get over it. The soiree was conducted by the Westchester County Children's Association, on behalf of sick and crippled children. The sick and crippled children were wonderfully assisted. Society was edified. The ham-and-eggs got their ham and eggs. Everybody happy.

The Barber Supply Dealers' Association has been having a convention at Chicago, and evolving some aids to the ancient and helpful craft of barbering. Sad to say, these aids seem to take the direction of making it less helpful and therefore less honorable. One of the new devices is the come-back hair-cut—a hair-cut guaranteed not to last more than a week or ten days. It is accomplished by a slight trimming, and a smoothing of what is left with a sort of salve that reduces the bulk and makes it appear like a sure-enough cut.

With the hardware shops of the world flooded with cheap German clippers, with which a not too particular man can have his hair well cut by his wife, one would suppose the barbers would exercise a little sense in order to keep a little trade; and perhaps some will. Not all mulcting of the public is profitable. And it developed at the convention that the old-fashioned individual shaving mug is coming back, the kind that used to stand in solid ranks with gilded rims and pink roses, and some of the chastest mottoes ever heard of, perhaps to cleanse the atmosphere. It gave an intimate, personal touch to things, made it feel homelike, to know that your own mug was being lathered out of your own mug. It seemed more sanitary. The tips of the barber's fingers, however, with which he rubbed in the soap, belonged to him alone.

"Travel Without Trouble"

COOK'S TRAVEL SERVICE

World wide—Complete—Efficient

Inclusive Tours for Individual Travel
arranged, to start any day by
any route.

Explanatory circular on request

THOS. COOK & SON
(Est. 1841)

Agents for the best lines for travel by
Land, Water or Air

128 SUTTER STREET
(COOK'S BUILDING) Phone Kearny 3512

Press Clippings

Are money-makers for Contractors, Supply
Houses, Business Men and
Corporations

ALLEN'S PRESS CLIPPING BUREAU
Phone Douglas 5119 121 Second Street

THE CHARLES NELSON CO.

MANUFACTURER AND WHOLESALE

of

REDWOOD, DOUGLAS FIR,
SPRUCE, HEMLOCK,
SUGAR & WHITE PINE,
CEDAR SHINGLES & POLES.

230 California St. San Francisco

E. C. EVANS & SONS, Inc.

(Established 1881)

STEAMSHIP AGENTS

SHIP AND INSURANCE BROKERS

260 California Street, San Francisco
Phone Douglas 8040 Cable Address "DEWGRIP"

GENERAL PETROLEUM CORPORATION

Offices at

SAN FRANCISCO LOS ANGELES
Alaska Commercial Bldg. Higgins Bldg.

HAMMOND LUMBER COMPANY

260 CALIFORNIA ST.
REDWOOD, DOUGLAS FIR
AND PILING

SERVICE

To Sacramento

Observation Cars.

Dining Car Service on Meteor
leaving 4:40 P.M. through to Chico.

We Carry Baggage

SACRAMENTO SHORT LINE

Everyone benefits by the Activities of this Company

EVERYONE residing in "Superior" California has benefited either directly or indirectly by the activities of this Company.

When over 8000 people are given employment—when over a million dollars a month is put into circulation—the butcher, baker and every home maker feels the prosperity created by such a payroll.

But the enterprise of the P G and E has benefited this section in other far reaching ways. Take for example, the Pit River development work:

The great amount of power ultimately to be generated in this one district will be equivalent to the work of five million laborers a day. This in itself will insure the industrial and agricultural growth for years to come.

And think of this: For every one horsepower in power plant development, on the average of 12 acres of unproductive land worth $300 may have four horsepower in motors for irrigation and general use applied to them. Such land then usually produces $1000 in new crops each year and becomes worth approximately $2400.

To industry it means that every time 25 horsepower is harnessed in the mountains, an average of a factory and a half is started involving a capital investment of almost $150,000, providing work for about 34 more people who can produce over $200,000 in new commodities.

At the present time this Company has developed power in excess of the immediate demand. While the work of developing power is progressing every effort must be directed to creating more uses for power, in order that the best interests of the community will be served.

PACIFIC GAS AND ELECTRIC COMPANY

P • G • and E •
"PACIFIC SERVICE"

STORYETTES.

Grave and Gay, Epigrammatic and Otherwise.

Two dark-complexioned sports meeting on the principal residence street of the colored section of a certain Southern town observed a conspicuously dressed and very buxom negro woman queening it down the opposite side of the street. "Jake, who is dat pouter pigeon woman yonder carrying herself so protuberant?" asked Sam. "Why dat's Miss Sary Johnson down here on a visit from Charleston," said Jake. "Lawdy," said Sam, "she shore do present herself, don't she?"

No more independent folk are to be found anywhere than the Yorkshire moorland dwellers. And drunkenness and fighting are considered excusable sins among them. A man brought before a local justice of the peace charged with drunkenness and assault was given the following sentence by the magistrate: "Noo thens, for t' assault we'll fine you a shilling and costs. As for t' drunkenness, we'll say nowt about it, as we get drunk oorsels."

The newsboy was telling about the fire. "A guy on de eight floor come to de winder an' looked down. De crowd hollered 'G'wan, jump, yuh won't git hoit. De blanket'll ketch yuh!' But de guy dasn't. He went back in an' de fire got hotter 'n' hotter an' he come to de winder again. An' de crowd yelled 'Come on, de firemen's got de blanket, yuh won't git hoit!' But it looked too far down. Finally he comes to de winder again, an' de crowd yells, 'G'wan, jump it. De blanket 'll ketch yuh!' An' de guy jumped, an' de blanket wasn't dere, an' I had to laugh."

While on his recent visit to this country Marshal Foch made a witty reply to a man who, when one of the guests at a dinner party in Denver, given by a party of Americans, took exception to French politeness. "There is nothing in it but wind," he said with questionable taste. "Neither is there anything but wind in a pneumatic tire," retorted the gallant marshal, "yet it eases the jolts along life's highway wonderfully."

A newspaper that was not making expenses decided to economize, and accordingly two reporters and a special writer were dismissed. The other employees became nervous with the exception of one man who showed no symptoms of uneasiness. He worked in what was known as the art department, for the journal published a great many pictures. Asked if he had had no qualms as to the stability of his job, he said: "Oh, no. They can't fire me." "Why not? They are cutting all along the line." "Waal, I figure that the paper can't afford to make a cut in its art department. You see we have so many subscribers who do not read."

A British tar, home on leave and celebrating the occasion, had got himself into a dilemma. He had hired a taxi, only to discover when approaching his destination that he was penniless. He had dined and wine, not wisely, but too well. But the British navy is a training school of resourcefulness. He caught up the speaking tube, shouted "Stop!"

and jumped out. "I just want to pop into this tobacconist's and get some matches," he explained to the driver. "I've dropped a pound note somewhere in the cab and can't find it in the dark." He entered the tobacconist's, and as he did so the cab and its driver vanished into the night, as he had anticipated.

Lord Jellicoe, at a meeting of the New Zealand Yacht Squadron, prefaced a very witty speech by saying that if it were not for the fact that he was wearing pearl studs he would have any number of good stories to tell. "Scientific people in Paris," he continued, "have discovered that if you wear pearls you can't remember things, and that's why I can't remember the stories I had prepared for tonight. I am rather deaf, I have been suffering all day from a buzzing in my ears; and it reminds me of the lady who went to the doctor and told him that her husband was suffering from buzzing in the ears, and asked him what she should do for it. He replied, 'Take him to the seaside.' She said, 'He won't go.' So the doctor said, 'Go yourself; that will do as well.'"

THE MERRY MUSE.

Sonnet of Strange Similes.

My love is like a stick of spearmint gum—
The flavor lasts—my love is like the tune
My neighbor plays each morning until noon
(That is, it haunts me always); mute and dumb
My love is, like a punctured kettledrum.
'Tis brightest after sunset, like the moon,
And, like the onion, strongest during June;
My love is ardent as forbidden rum.
Sometimes my love is diffident and shy,
Like a Ford car seeking a place to park,
Or like a husband in a corset shop;
Sometimes it struts and holds its head up high,
Like a Knight Templar or a meadow lark,
Or a dress-suited freshman at a hop.
—S. K. in Life.

The manufacture of paper was an important industry in Japan as far back as the time of the Emperor Suiko, A. D. 592-629, the art having been introduced from China.

California claims the largest hog house, one that will accommodate the largest hog. It is 1200 feet long.

ORNAMENTALS, FRUIT TREES,
VINES AND FIELD GROWN ROSES

Open Daily and Sunday to visitors and purchasers

GEO. C. ROEDING, Pres.

California Nursery Company

(Founded in 1865 by John Rock)

NILES, CALIFORNIA

BALFOUR, GUTHRIE & CO.

SAN FRANCISCO AND LOS ANGELES,
PORTLAND, SEATTLE, TACOMA,
AND VANCOUVER.

MERCHANTS

EXPORTERS AND IMPORTERS

MARINE AND FIRE INSURANCE

AVERAGE ADJUSTERS

Agents of

HARRISON DIRECT LINE OF STEAMERS

TO AND FROM EUROPEAN PORTS

and

COMMONWEALTH GOVERNMENT LINE

Redwood Export Company

California Redwood
Lumber and Ties

Cargoes and Parcels
"To off shore markets only"

260 CALIFORNIA STREET
SAN FRANCISCO, CALIF.

Phone Sutter 2163

UNION LUMBER CO.

CROCKER BUILDING

SAN FRANCISCO, CALIFORNIA

MANUFACTURERS and WHOLESALERS

— OF —

REDWOOD LUMBER;

RAILROAD TIES

TELEGRAPH POLES

SHINGLES

— AND —

SPLIT REDWOOD PRODUCTS

Geo. E. Billings Roy C. Ward Geo. B. Dinsmore
J. C. Muesdorffer Jas. W. Dean

GEO. E. BILLINGS CO.

ALL FORMS OF INSURANCE
EFFECTED

312 California St., San Francisco, Cal.
Phone—Douglas 6400

BONESTELL & CO.
PAPER

The paper used in printing the Argonaut is
furnished by us
CALIFORNIA'S LEADING PAPER HOUSE
118 to 124 First Street, corner Minna,
San Francisco

DESTRUCTIVE "Sulpho" compounds are the cause of motor oils breaking down rapidly under engine heat. An enormous amount of money is annually lost through the presence of these unnecessary properties in oils.

Cycol will save engine owners this tremendous amount of money lost through wasted oil, wasted fuel, preventable repairs, because it is free from destructive "sulpho" compounds. These have been removed by the new Hexeon Process used exclusively by us.

When your oil contains destructive "sulpho" compounds it breaks down rapidly under engine heat. Its lubricating value becomes quickly impaired. The oil film is broken and serious damage may result.

Have your crank case thoroughly flushed—not with kerosene. Use the correct grade of Cycol as shown on the Cycol Recommendation Chart. Use Associated Gasoline. Then notice the improved performance of your motor.

ASSOCIATED OIL COMPANY
SAN FRANCISCO

CYCOL

MOTOR OIL

FREE FROM DESTRUCTIVE "SULPHO" COMPOUNDS

PERSONAL.

Social Notes.

Miss Mary Boardman, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. George Chauncey Boardman, announced her engagement to Mr. Oze Van Wyck at a luncheon party at her home on Wednesday. Mr. Oze Van Wyck is the son of Mr. and Mrs. Oze Broyel Van Wyck of Anderson, South Carolina. Guests at the announcement luncheon were Mrs. Ernest Gunther, Mrs. Chester Cramer, Mrs. Stanley Morrison, Mrs. John Straughan, Mrs. Wilson Meyer, Miss Agnes Harrison, Miss Mary Harrison, Miss Mary Adams, Miss Margaret Monroe and Miss Helen Lynch. Miss Boardman announced that the date for the wedding had been set for the early part of January.

Announcement of the engagement of Mrs. Martha Ruddy Leet to Mr. Archibald Johnson, son of Senator and Mrs. Hiram Johnson, was made on Friday at a luncheon at the Francisca Club at which Mrs. George Bowles was the hostess. No date for the wedding was announced.

Miss Marian Black, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Alfred Black, was married on Tuesday evening, October 24th, to Mr. Carroll Wagner of Los Angeles. The ceremony was performed at the Black home by Dean J. Wilmer Gresham, relatives and friends of the two families attending. Mrs. William Kew, a sister of Miss Black, attended her as matron of honor, Miss Katherine Stone as maid of honor. Mrs. Frederick Boole and Miss Elizabeth Wagner were bridesmaids. Mr. Walter Church was best man for Mr. Wagner, Mr. Harold Black, Mr. Joseph Hamilton, Mr. Charles Knox and Mr. Lewis Martin acting as ushers. Following their wedding trip, Mr. and Mrs. Wagner will make their home in Southern California.

Mr. and Mrs. Horace P. Howard were hosts on Friday evening at the first ball of the season, at which they presented their daughter, Miss Jean Howard. The ball was held in the Borgia Room of the Hotel St. Francis, Mr. and Mrs. Howard and Miss Jean Howard receiving their guests in the entrance hall, converted into a reception room and massed with dawn chrysanthemums. The guest list included some of the younger married couples, the debutantes of the last season and those who will be presented this winter. Preceding the ball many dinner parties were given, the largest that at which Mrs. John J. Spieker entertained in honor of Miss Howard. Miss Spieker's guests included, besides Miss Howard, Miss Edna Taylor, Miss Frances Ames, Miss Josephine Drown, Miss Alice Moffitt, Miss Adrienne Sharp, Miss Virginia Hanna, Mr. Leon Walker, Mr. Paul Kennedy, Mr. Coy Filmer, Mr. Gerald Herrmann, Mr. Benjamin Cory, Mr. Bliss Rucker and Mr. Orel Goldaracena. Other dinner hosts preceding the ball were Miss Edith and Miss Josephine Grant, Miss Hélène de Latour, Mr. and Mrs. Russell Slade, Mr. and Mrs. Marshall Madison and Miss Doris Schmiedell. Lieutenant-Commander Ellsworth Van Patten and Mrs. Van Patten (Miss Evelyn McGaw) entertained on Wednesday afternoon at an informal tea on board Commander Van Patten's ship, the U. S. S. Arizona, for the officers of the ship and some of Mrs. Van Patten's intimate friends. Mrs. Orville Baldwin, Mrs. John McGaw, Miss Helen Head, Miss Cornelia Gwynn, Miss Helen Deamer, Miss Virginia Dwight, Miss Alysse Allen and Miss Virginia Chadbourne were among Commander and Mrs. Van Patten's guests.

Mrs. Lawrence W. Harris had Mrs. Horace Van Sicken, Mrs. Francis Langton, Miss Josephine Drown, Miss Frances Ames and Miss Adrienne Sharp as her luncheon guests at the Francisca Club on Monday afternoon, taking her guests to the first of the matinee musicales at the Hotel St. Francis.

Mrs. Horace Davis Pillsbury gave a tea in honor of Miss Olive Edgington of New York, fiancée of Mrs. Pillsbury's son, Mr. Evan S. Pillsbury, Jr. Miss Edgington returns to her home in New York shortly.

Mrs. Andrew Davis of Berkeley entertained at luncheon on Monday afternoon at the Women's Athletic Club for Miss Fernanda Pratt, who plans returning to New York in the near future. Among Mrs. Davis' guests were Mrs. Benjamin Ide Wheeler, Mrs. Ernest Simpson, Mrs. Dennis Arnold, Mrs. Edgar Peixotto, Mrs. T. A. Rickard and Mrs. George Davis.

Mr. and Mrs. C. O. G. Miller were hosts at a dinner party on Wednesday evening in honor of Miss Olive Edgington of New York, whose engagement to Mr. Evan S. Pillsbury, Jr., was recently announced. Mr. and Mrs. John Knox, Miss Margaret Buckbee, Miss Elizabeth Watt, Miss Ruth Langdon, Mr. Orel Goldaracena, and Mr. John Boyden were Mr. and Mrs. Miller's other guests.

Preceding the ball which Mr. and Mrs. Harry Scott and Mrs. Preston Drown will give for their daughters, Miss Frances Ames and Miss Josephine Drown, Mr. and Mrs. Alan Lowery, Mr. and Mrs. Mountford Wilson and Miss Lawton Filer and Mr. and Mrs. Walter Martin will entertain groups of friends at dinner parties.

The Club Royal announces the opening of its initial season Saturday evening, December 9th, at the Club Royal Terrace of the Fairmont Hotel. The Club Royal, which is founded on the principle of the Pall Mall Club of New York City, is a dancing cotillon which will meet every Saturday evening. Reservations must be made in advance through the Club Royal, Fairmont Hotel. Patrons and patronesses are as follows: Mr. and Mrs. Frederick Bradley, Mr. and Mrs. George Cameron, Mr. and Mrs. Georges de Latour, Mr. and Mrs. A. B. C. Dohrmann, Mr. and Mrs. Charles Fay, Mr. and Mrs. Frederick McNear, Mr. and Mrs. Walton N. Moore, Mr. and Mrs. Arthur S. Sharp, Mr. and Mrs. Nion Tucker, Mrs. Frederick Beaver, Mrs. Amelia M. McWilliams.

The Community Chest Organization.

Organization of the budget and finance committees and the speakers' bureau of the Community Chest was effected during the past week at the headquarters in the Sharon Building, and an impetus given to the city-wide movement to raise funds for all charitable and welfare work in the city. M. C. Sloss, former justice of the state supreme court, has been chosen chairman of the budget committee. The speakers' bureau was formed Thursday at a luncheon at the Commercial Club. The finance committee held a meeting Tuesday afternoon and also made permanent organization. The members of the finance committee are W. W. Crocker, Charles W. Fay, Mark Gerstle, Andrew Griffin, Reuben B. Hale, F. L. Lipman, C. F. Michaels. On the budget committee are Chairman M. C. Sloss, James A. Bacigalupi, F. W. Bradley, R. W. Costello, Fred Dohrmann, Jr., Alfred I. Esbreg, Morgan A. Gunst, Frederick J. Koster, Dr. William Palmer Lucas, Charles K. McIntosh, Charles C. Moore, Walton N. Moore, William Sproule, Frank I. Turner, and Dr. Ray Lyman Wilbur.

The Dondo Marionettes.

The Salon Français always keeps a look-out for French speakers who come our way, and who have something to tell that is worth the telling. At their last meeting Professor Mathurin Dondo was introduced, and gave a most interesting discourse on marionettes.

Several of these were exhibited by the lecturer, who has become a familiar figure in many of the prominent colleges of the East on account of his taking his marionette plant with him and unlocking to the students that world of fairyland and fantasy, of religious and historical drama, in which the grotesque little automatons of the middle ages played so prominent a part.

The per capita consumption of lumber in this country has dropped from 500 board feet in 1906 to 316 board feet in 1920, according to the United States Forest Service.

By the state of the hair it is possible to judge the general health of a person, say some doctors.

CHAPERON.

A lady who has lived abroad a number of years, and familiar with the languages, galleries and music of Europe, is anxious to chaperon one or two young girls; is free to travel; best of references. Box 1, Argonaut.

THE HILLCREST

American and European Plan
CALIFORNIA AND JONES STS.
Phone Franklin 3240

DEL MONTE

The Largest Resort Hotel Plant in the World
Where "Thinking People" can find Recreation in Hotel del Monte's Comfort, Service and Outdoor Life. "Here every sportsman can find his chosen recreation."

TWO CHAMPIONSHIP GOLF COURSES
CARL S. STANLEY, Manager
DEL MONTE : : CALIFORNIA

San Ysidro Ranch

Furnished bungalows of various sizes; situated on the foothills among the orange groves, overlooking the sea. Central dining-room, electric lights, hot and cold water. Good tennis court. Six miles from Santa Barbara, two miles from ocean. Booklet. Address MANAGER

San Ysidro Ranch, Santa Barbara

Matchless Marin

—most beautiful country in the West; ideal for outing parties and week-end visits. Hotel Rafael is modern in every respect and conveniently located. Whether your stay is long or short, it will be enjoyable at Hotel Rafael!

POPULAR DINNER DANCE
Saturday 8 to 12

The ST. FRANCIS
One of the world's great hotels
Facing Union Square

SAN FRANCISCO CALIFORNIA

WHERE SERVICE AND COMFORTS ARE PLANNED FOR GUESTS WHO APPRECIATE THE BEST

Thos. J. Coleman
Manager

American Beauty Roses
For the Debutant.

JOSEPH'S
FLORISTS

Phone Sutter 423 233 Grant Ave.

CARIBBEAN CRUISE

JANUARY 1923

Pacific Coast to New Orleans, Havana, Panama Canal, Costa Rica and Return.
F. L. R. on Request.

BENNETT'S TRAVEL BUREAU, INC.

681 Market Street SAN FRANCISCO

St. Louis
Express

A daily through train for Denver,
Kansas City and
St. Louis.

Over

American Canyon
Route

Via Ogden

Crossing the Great Salt
Lake Cut-Off

|                          |            |
|--------------------------|------------|
| Ly San Francisco (Ferry) | 1:00 p.m.  |
| Ar Denver                | 12:15 p.m. |
| Ar Kansas City           | 9:15 a.m.  |
| Ar St. Louis             | 6:15 p.m.  |

Connecting at Kansas City and St. Louis with all trains East and South.

Observation and Dining Cars,
Pullman Standard and Tourist
Sleepers.

Our agents will gladly furnish you further information.

Southern Pacific

Ferry Station

50 Post St.

Phone Sutter 4000

3rd St. Station

Many in Use
Around San Francisco

Cuts 24 Inches
H. V. CARTER MOTOR CO.
52 Beale St. SAN FRANCISCO
(Hand, Horse and Power Motors)

THE SANTA BARBARA GIRLS' SCHOOL

Resident and Day Pupils. Eleven acres. Country Life and Sports. Sleeping-porches. Open-air school rooms. Riding. Swimming all the year round. Basis of work, clear thinking.

MARIAN L. CHAMBERLAIN, A. M., Principal
P.O. Box 548, SANTA BARBARA, CAL.

STRINGER STORAGE
COMPANY

Sutter near Fillmore
and
Steiner near Sutter

Conducting a Storage
Business Founded
in 1880

Storage--Shipping
Expert Packing, Protection
and Dispatch

A fully informed representative, anxious to give you any desired information, will respond to your phone call.

Phone West 999

PERSONAL.

Movements and Whereabouts.

Mr. and Mrs. Louis Titus left on Thursday for their home in Washington, D. C., closing their Burlingame home for the winter.
Mr. and Mrs. Joseph T. Grace and their daughter, Miss Geraldine Grace, are in town for a few days. Later in the season they will move to town for a few months.
Mr. James L. Flood, Mr. James Flood, Jr., Mr. Frederick Moody, Mr. Perry Eyre and Mr. M. Boule formed a party who motored to Santa Barbara for the week-end at El Mirasol.
Mrs. Florence Porter Pfingst has returned to her apartment in the Fairmont Hotel, after a visit of more than two months to her mother, Mrs. John T. Porter, at her ranch near Watsonville.

Mrs. Arthur Page-Brown has taken an apartment at the Burlingame Country Club, where she will pass the winter months.
Mr. and Mrs. Henry Van Torchiana sailed last Wednesday for Honolulu for a month's visit.
Mrs. Peter F. Dunne and her daughters, Miss Marjorie Dunne and Miss Marian Dunne, plan to return soon to Europe for an indefinite stay.
Mrs. Daniel Gardner (Miss Lois Crosby) is visiting her aunt, Mrs. Charles Butters, at her Piedmont home.
Mrs. William Summers, who has been for several weeks at San Julian ranch as the guest of her mother, Mrs. Thomas Dibblée, has returned to her Green Street home.
Mr. Henry Foster Dutton has returned to San Francisco. Mrs. Dutton who went East with Mr. Dutton, decided to remain until just before the Christmas holidays.
Mr. and Mrs. Thomas Eastland have returned from their Eastern trip, and are established at their home in Burlingame for the winter.
Mr. and Mrs. George Armsby and their daughter, Miss Leonore Armsby, are expecting soon to close their New York home and come to California for the winter.
Mr. and Mrs. Willis Walker and Mr. Léon Walker left for the East several days ago. Mrs. Walker will remain in the East until before the Christmas holidays, Mr. Walker and his son returning in a week or so.
Commander and Mrs. Ellsworth Van Patten are visiting Mrs. Van Patten's parents, Mr. and Mrs. John McGaw, during the time while Commander Van Patten's ship is in San Francisco harbor.
Miss Ruth Hobart is with her father, Mr. Walter Hobart, at their San Mateo home. Mrs. Walter Hobart is at her ranch in Nevada, and will not return to San Mateo for a few weeks.
Mrs. Joseph Sadoc Tobin is established in an apartment in Paris for the winter.
Mr. and Mrs. Charles W. Clark will return to California in a week or so. Their daughters have entered the Spence School in New York.
Mr. and Mrs. Frederick McNear, who recently returned from a trip abroad, will return to Europe in January, where they will join Mrs. McNear's son, Mr. John Breeden, who is studying in France.
Mr. and Mrs. Arthur Rose Vincent will return to California early in November to spend the winter in Burlingame.
Mrs. Ashton Potter has returned to San Francisco from the East, after nearly a year's absence. Miss Potter has entered school in New York.
Mrs. Thomas Cromell of Montclair, New Jersey (Miss Pauline Whittlesey) and her small son are guests of Mr. and Mrs. James T. Whittlesey in Berkeley.
Mr. and Mrs. Philip Bowles have taken an apartment at Stanford Court where they will spend the winter.
Rear-Admiral and Mrs. Joseph L. Jayne are established for the winter in Washington, D. C., where Miss Alma Jayne has entered school.
Mrs. William Geer Hitchcock and her son, Mr. Gordon Hitchcock, who is at present in Honolulu, will spend the winter in San Francisco.
Miss Frances Lent is visiting her sister, Mrs. Paul Fagan, during the absence of her parents, Mr. and Mrs. Eugene Lent, in the East.
Mrs. George F. Neal has returned to San Francisco, after a long absence. Commander Neal, U. S. N., will have his headquarters in the Bay region.
Mrs. John Kirkpatrick is spending a fortnight in San Francisco as the guest of her son-in-law and daughter, Mr. and Mrs. Alan MacDonald.
Mr. and Mrs. Charles Schlusser have arrived in New York, after a summer abroad. They will reach California the end of the week.
Mr. and Mrs. Frank Deering and their daughter, Miss Francesca Deering, arrived in San Francisco on Sunday. They have been abroad since the early part of the year.
Mr. and Mrs. Robert Oxnard left during the week for Portland, Oregon, where they will visit their niece, Mrs. Sydney Van Wyck Peters. From Portland Mr. and Mrs. Oxnard will take the Canadian route to New York, to sail for Europe, where they will spend the entire winter.
Mr. and Mrs. George T. Marye are closing their Burlingame home this week, moving to town for the winter months.
Mrs. Jane Selby Hayne is closing her Pebble Beach home November 1st, and is returning to her San Mateo home.
Mrs. Henry Percival Dodge is visiting at the Daniel T. Murphy home in Burlingame. Mrs. Dodge expects to leave about the middle of November for Belgravia, where she will join her husband.
Mr. and Mrs. William Doud have returned from their European tour, and have taken a house on Russian Hill for the winter.
Mr. and Mrs. J. C. Berendsen returned last week to their Broadway home after the summer spent abroad.
Sir Gilbert Parker has arrived from the East and London and is at the Fairmont Hotel.
Mrs. Edward De Laveaga is visiting in Milwaukee and in the East.
Mr. and Mrs. Clinton La Montagne and their children have returned to San Francisco from Atherton, where they have had the Atherton Macdonay house for two years.
Mr. and Mrs. William Fries have returned from a five months' trip through France, Germany, Switzerland and Italy, and are again occupying their apartment at the Hotel St. Francis. The entire trip was made by motor, except the passage of the English Channel, which they did by aeroplane from Paris to London.

A New Baritone.

John Charles Thomas, a young American baritone who is creating a most favorable impression as a concert singer, appeared on October 15th at Aeolian Hall, New York, and so favorable were the reports telegraphed to Manager Frank W. Healy that he immediately began negotiations for the appearance of Thomas in San Francisco.
It is anticipated by Mr. Healy that he will be able to present Thomas here in a concert late in November. The New York Morning Telegraph said of Thomas' concert:

"John Charles Thomas, American baritone, returned to the New York concert stage yesterday afternoon, after a prolonged tour of Europe. Mr. Thomas is best known to the New York public as a foremost singer in musical comedy and comic opera, one of his most notable popular successes having been in 'Apple Blossoms,' wherein he had opportunity to intone some of the lovely music written for that production by Kreisler and the late lamented Jacoby.
"At yesterday's matinee recital Mr. Thomas unfolded all of the splendid qualities of the essentially lyric tendencies of his voice, a baritone instrument of such plastic and expressive beauty that his big audience went quite 'dotty' over his singing. Unlike his programme of two years ago, when he essayed a recital in Aeolian Hall, his list yesterday was chosen with admirable and exact knowledge of his special powers and limitations. He sang better than at any of his earlier appearances here, whether in recital or musical play; displayed a discretion and reticence in use of his voice that delighted the experts as well as the wholly friendly crowd.

"His two songs without accompaniment, 'Ships That Pass' and 'A Song of Soldiers,' were a forthright and unpretentious display of beautiful singing by a voice that comprises every quality essential to supreme balladry. In his French group Mr. Thomas was even more successful and his delivery of Pessard's 'Requiem de Cœur' will linger long in the memory of his hearers as one of the loveliest and most sincere incidents of the local concert stage."

At the Paul Elder Gallery.

Lilian J. Martin will lecture on "Mind in the Making" in the Paul Elder Gallery, Saturday afternoon, November 11th, at 2:30 o'clock. This lecture is the closing event in the Paul Elder Gallery for the fall season. The series of lectures will be resumed after the Christmas holidays.

The Katharine Branson School, Inc.
ROSS, MARIN COUNTY, CALIFORNIA

A COUNTRY SCHOOL FOR GIRLS

DAY AND RESIDENT COLLEGE PREPARATORY

Heads: Katharine Fleming Branson, A. B., Bryn Mawr
Laura Elizabeth Branson, A. B., Bryn Mawr

(Casa Grande)

A Rare Opportunity to Buy
This Wonderful Estate.

Approximately 1800 acres, twelve miles south of San Jose, Santa Clara County, California. Comprises part of the famous New Almaden quicksilver mining property. Includes the picturesque village of historic New Almaden, together with the 18-room brick Casa Grande or "big house" (see photo). This home is surrounded by two acres of beautiful grounds, including a cement-bottomed lake (see photo) built for swimming as well as beauty.

Wonderfully adapted for a gentlemen's country home—sanatorium—stock raising—game preserve—exclusive summer resort—or country club. Ideal golf course could be constructed with natural hazards, and, just think, a large, unfailing water supply. Most picturesque bungalow sites. No fogs. Lake of several acres could easily be made. Vichy springs on property. Acknowledged by eminent physicians to have the most salubrious climate in the United States. The air is pure Pacific, filtered thru twenty-five miles of the Santa Cruz mountain pines and redwoods. Only two hours' by motor from San Francisco on highway.

Address No. 801, Kohl Building, San Francisco, Calif.

(Casa Grande Lake)

HOTEL OAKLAND

"One of America's most satisfying hotels."

Situated in the heart of Oakland close to beautiful Lake Merritt and the shopping district.

Management
W. C. JURGENS

MOST BEAUTIFUL
Rota-Gravure
Section
in the world
Published Each
Sunday
by the
San Francisco Chronicle

ONLY
$5.20
a
Year

Including Every Sunday Feature
of the CHRONICLE

THE ALLEGED HUMORISTS.

Palmist—Tell your fortune? Passerby—No, thanks. I know how much it is.—Nashville Tennessean.

"Are you certain you love him?" "My dear, you don't suppose I've been engaged three times without knowing the symptoms."—Life.

Professor Carmichael says that the man who smokes is a fool. Professor Carmichael talks like a man who smokes.—Boston Transcript.

"She is very clever, but terribly malicious." "Oh, well, there are a lot of malicious people who aren't the least bit clever."—Paris L'Illustration.

Aiken—I was just reading about a dog that wears a wrist watch. Payne—Ah, but the real curiosity is the dog's owner.—Youngstown Telegram.

Ma (to Willie)—Willie, what did you study in school today? Willie—We had two films of history and one reel of geographies.—Atlanta Constitution.

Movie Lamp—Haven't you a tighter gown than this? Tired Wardrobe Manager—No, madam, I am a costumer, not a taxidermist.—London Passing Show.

"Isn't there some fable about the ass disguising himself with a lion skin?" "Yes, but now the colleges do the trick with a sheepskin."—Washington Dirge.

"Say, young feller, d'ye know how clost ye come to shootin' my prize Holstein? Ye knocked the hat off the hired man when he wuz a-milkin' of 'er."—Judge.

Small Boy—Mother, will you ask the hotel man if I can have some other bedroom? Mother—But isn't yours a nice room? Small Boy—Quite; but it's on fire.—Punch.

Servant—There's a man to see you, sir. Master—Tell him to take a chair. Servant—He has, sir. He's taken them all, and they're moving out the piano now. He's from the furniture store.—Dartmouth Jack o' Lantern.

Professor—The only cure for yellow fever is whisky and glycerine. Pre-Medic—Where can you get it? Professor—What, whisky? Pre-Medic—No, yellow fever.—Syracuse Orange Peel.

Proud Father—That is a sunset my daughter painted. You know she studied painting abroad. Student—Ah! That explains it. I never saw a sunset like that in this country.—Boston Beanpot.

"And you wouldn't begin a journey on Friday?" "Not I." "I can't understand how you can have faith in such a silly superstition." "No superstition about it. Saturday's my pay day."—Pathfinder.

The Lady—You ought to be ashamed of yourself, a great big able-bodied man like you asking for money. The Tramp—Well, wot's a feller to do? I've just done six months for takin' it wivout askin'.—Punch.

Housewife—I want a servant. She must be honest, industrious, clean, and reliable. Employment Agent—You had better take four, ma'am. You will possibly find those virtues among them.—Christiania Hvepsen.

Mother (trying to draw her sullen son away from a music shop)—What is it you want now? Boy—Buy me that harp in the window, mum. Mother—What do you want a harp for? Boy—To make a wireless set with, of course.—London Daily News.

Gentleman (consulting city directory)—Bookbinders — bookkeepers — booksellers — bootmakers — Drug Store Clerk—Maybe I can help you find what you're looking for. Gentleman—No use—I guess bootleggers aren't listed yet.—New York World.

"Now, Mr. Smith," said the law professor, "will you please tell the class what weight you would give to circumstantial evidence?" "I will, sir," said the student, "if you will tell me whether I am supposed to be prosecuting attorney or counsel for the defendant."—Richmond Times-Dispatch.

The dean was exceedingly angry. "So you confess that this unfortunate young man was carried to the pond and drenched? Now, what part did you take in this disgraceful affair?" "The right leg, sir," answered the sophomore meekly.—Johns Hopkins Black and Blue Jay.

Key to a Safe Deposit Box in
Crocker Safe Deposit
Vaults Means
Security.

Crocker Safe Deposit Vaults
Crocker Building Post and Market Sts.

The Grandeur of Confucius.

Confucianism, instead of teaching that there is a finality in the utterances of the servants of God, tells us that after all the essence of a worthy life is to be found in ourselves, writes Chang Hsin-Lai in the North American Review. Confucius says, in a characteristic way, that about the utterances of the divine there is no absolute certainty. We must continue to disagree as to what exactly the divine utterances are. He acknowledges a divinity, but the divine is what each one must find for himself. It is therefore only wise that we should pursue the divine in a purely positivistic way. We must in other words begin from the human, from our own nature. "If we do not know the human, how are we to know the divine?" There is no gulf between the human and the divine. The divine is realized in the ultimate realization of the human. And each one must realize the human through himself. There is thus no need for the establishment of a distinct class of people who are supposed to possess the power of ministering to the divine. Confucianism has no priesthood: the moral and religious life is the personal problem of the individual himself. . . . It says that each person must be his own savior, and to save himself he must cultivate the inner life. The inner life is in continual process of cultivation: the individual must continue to realize in him the highest and noblest ideals of human life. The ultimate product is therefore the man of absolute moral perfection.

A Napoleon In the Legion.

M. Lempereur, who also calls himself Napoleon—there are coincidences!—has been named a Knight of the Legion of Honor, which he well deserves, says the New York Tribune. For his nomination is adorned with this noble citation: "He has consecrated himself with unremitting devotion to the professional reeducation of the war victims." But this goes to show that after the lapse of a century Lempereur does the very opposite of what was done by l'Empereur Napoleon. But this reminds La Victoire of an adventure that happened to the late Felix Fauré, on his visit to Russia, and which had as its starting point a joke on the part of the imperial court, where they were perhaps wanting subjects of entertainment. At his arrival in Cronstadt the French President was decorating the officers of the regiment which served as his escort. By chance this regiment was commanded by a Frenchman, who, at the moment when Fauré was about to place upon his tunic the badge of Knight of the Legion of Honor, bent toward him and whispered in his ear: "Pardon me, Mr. President, I am Grand-Cross by birth."

It was, in fact, an authentic Napoleon in service of Russia.

Do You Want Shingle Roofs Outlawed in California?

THEN VOTE NO on the State Housing Act, which is up for referendum in the November election.

This amazing act virtually outlaws the shingle roofed house—not merely in the congested districts of cities, but in every town or incorporated community of California. If this State Housing Act becomes a law it will be illegal for you to shingle the roof of a house of any kind, whether bungalow, shack or mansion, within the corporate limits of city or town. You will find yourself paying involuntary tribute to the substitute roofing manufacturers—forced by law to buy a roof which costs twice as much to build and lasts half as long!

Who wants this act?

Not the State Immigration and Housing Commission, which has publicly repudiated the act as unscientific and against the public interest.

Not the workers in the building trades, because the immediate effect of the act, if passed, would be to handicap building operations seriously and reduce employment.

Not the ordinary householder and prospective home-builder of moderate means, who would find himself victimized by higher rents and higher building costs.

Nobody wants the act except the special interests which, with incredible effrontery, lobbied it through the last legislature.

The State Housing Act has been accurately described as "a woodpile wrapped around a Nigger."

Unfortunately the joke is on you, or will be, unless you and your friends and your neighbors—the average citizen whose pockets are threatened by this extraordinary piece of legislative buccaneering—go to the polls November 7th in overwhelming numbers and

VOTE NO ON THE STATE HOUSING ACT
No. 5 on the ballot

Write this office for a supply of pamphlets exposing the act, for distribution among your friends and neighbors.

EXECUTIVE COMMITTEE
CALIFORNIA LUMBERMEN

ROOM 310 ST. CLAIRE BUILDING

16 CALIFORNIA STREET

San Francisco, Cal.

KING COAL

High in Heat Units
Low in Ash

FOR SALE BY ALL DEALERS
IN CALIFORNIA

KING COAL CO.

Main Office
EXCHANGE BLOCK
San Francisco

Wholesale Only

FOR A

CLEAR COMPLEXION

and a

HEALTHY COLOR

eat

FLEISCHMANN'S YEAST

Three Cakes a Day

The Catacombs of Cypress Lawn

Comparable with the luxurious tombs of ancient Egyptian kings, yet within the means of people of moderate circumstances.

A stone edifice, highly artistic in appearance, containing a magnificent chapel. Eleven Tomb Rooms, 425 Crypts.

Cypress Lawn Cemetery Association

Paepe Douglas 4772

995 Market St.

The Argonaut.

VOL. LXXXI. No. 2381.

SAN FRANCISCO, NOVEMBER 11, 1922.

Price Ten Cents

PUBLISHER'S NOTICE: The Argonaut (title trade-marked) is published every week by the Argonaut Publishing Company. Subscriptions, $5.00 per year; six months, $2.55; three months, $1.50, payable in advance—postage prepaid. Subscriptions to all foreign countries within the Postal Union, $6.00 per year. Sample copies free. Single copies, 10 cents. News Dealers and Agents in the interior supplied by the San Francisco News Company, 747 Howard Street, San Francisco. Subscribers wishing their addresses changed should give their old as well as new addresses. The American News Company, New York, are agents for the Eastern trade. The Argonaut may be ordered from any News Dealer or Postmaster in the United States or Europe. Special advertising rates to publishers. Address all communications to The Argonaut, 207 Powell Street, San Francisco. Make all checks, drafts, postal orders, etc., payable to "The Argonaut Publishing Company."

Entered at the San Francisco Postoffice as second-class matter. The Argonaut can be obtained in London at the International News Co., Breems Building, Chancery Lane; American Newspaper and Advertising Agency, Trafalgar Square, Northumberland Avenue; and at Daws Steamship Agency, 17 Green Street, Leicester Square, and can be ordered from any of the news-stands of W. H. Smith & Son. In Paris, at 37 Avenue de l'Opéra. In New York, at Brentano's, Fifth Avenue and Twenty-Fourth Street. In Chicago, Western News Company. In Washington, at Adams News Agency, Ninth and G Streets.

The Argonaut is on sale at the Ferry Station, San Francisco, by Foster & Orear; on the ferryboats of the Key Route system by the news agents, and by the Van Noy-Interstate Company on Southern Pacific boats and trains.

Telephone, Kearny 5895. Publication office, 207 Powell Street. WM. J. MILLIKEN, Business Manager.

FORTY-SIXTH YEAR

ALFRED HOLMAN - - - - - EDITOR

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

|   |         |
|---|---------|
| EDITORIAL: The League—The Election—The Hand of Esau—The Turkish Tangle—The Drift Toward Political Chaos—Germany's Fiscal Policy—State Participation in Education—Editorial Notes..... | 305-307 |
| LETTERS TO THE EDITOR.....  | 307     |
| CONSTANTINOPLE: Its Position Makes It the Nerve Ganglion of Much European and Asiatic Commerce.....   | 307-308 |
| OLD FAVORITES.....  | 308     |
| INDIVIDUALITIES: Notes About Prominent People All Over the World.....   | 308     |
| JOHN DREW AND HIS WORLD: Sparkling Reminiscences of a Leading Figure of the American Stage.....   | 309     |
| BANKING AND INVESTMENT NEWS.....  | 310-311 |
| BOOKS ON THE TABLE: Notes of Books and Authors.....   | 312     |
| REVIEWS AND NOTICES: New Books Received.....  | 313     |
| DRAMA: The Sequoia Little Theatre; At the Orpheum. By Josephine Hart Phelps.....  | 314     |
| VANITY FAIR: An Occult Wedding—Psychology, Common and Preferred.....  | 316     |
| STORYETTES: Grave and Gay, Epigrammatic and Otherwise.....  | 317     |
| THE MERRY MUSE.....   | 317     |
| PERSONAL: Social Notes—Movements and Whereabouts.....   | 318-319 |
| FOYER AND BOX-OFFICE.....   | 319     |
| THE ALLEGED HUMORISTS: Paragraphs Ground Out by the Dismal Wits of the Day.....   | 320     |

The League.

Every little while the world is solemnly assured that the "League of Nations is functioning." And no doubt it is in the sense that it holds periodical formal sessions, that it has a highly organized secretariat, that its presses are kept busy printing reports, etc. But is the league functioning in respect of its fundamental and essential purpose, namely, that of maintaining peace between the nations?

Assuredly the league was not functioning when Poland, one of its members, invaded Russia without submitting its boundary contention to the league. It did not function when Armenia appealed to the league to protect her from the Turks; and it took no action when Armenia was wiped off the map. The league did not function when Persia made appeal to it for protection. The league did not function in respect to a similar request on the part of Georgia. The league attempted to function in 1920 when there was a mix-up between Poland and Lithuania and it demanded and secured a promise of truce from both sides; but this did not prevent renewal of the fight a month later and it did not prevent the Turks from taking Vilna or retaining it. Again the league did not function when the Greeks started upon their Asiatic campaign—a movement which has been succeeded by a thousand horrors and stands today a menace to the peace of Europe.

The plain truth is that the league, after the manner of mutual admiration societies, is busy about incon-sequential matters, including the care of its own machinery and the collection of its revenues. It has now been in existence well over three years and its membership includes pretty much all the nations, great and small, excepting the United States, Germany, and Russia. But it does nothing and seems incapable of doing anything in the way of promoting the vital and essential purpose for which it was created.

It seems impossible to get it out of the European mind that by one means or another America may be brought into the league. So late as last week so intelligent a statesman as Mr. Lloyd George spoke hopefully of the prospect of drawing America into the league. And this is only one of many expressions from various sources to the same effect. It is a vain dream. America will not become a member of the league or of anything even measurably like it. We have gone too long and too successfully on our own, so to speak, to yoke up with the chronically warring countries of Europe.

The Election.

Despite certain dramatic surprises Tuesday's election may fairly be interpreted as sustaining the national administration. Apparently (we write upon the basis of partial returns) it leaves both Senate and House of Representatives in the hands of the Republican party; and the condition is none the less wholesome because the majority in the House is cut down to a narrow margin. This was expected and even desired, since a too-great majority tends to heedlessness of party obligations and to a fatal slackness of party discipline.

It is to be noted that while the Senate as revised by this election remains nominally in the hands of Mr. Harding's party, it is by no means certain that there is implied in that fact assured support of the President and his policies. Several newcomers who are nominally Republicans, very notably Brookhart of Iowa and Howell of Nebraska, are radicals of a type somewhat between La Follette and Borah—Republicans in name rather than in dependability. Time and events will define their status, but it is to be suspected that their affiliation in the Senate will be with the group of which Borah of Idaho is the leader and our own Hiram a shining light.

Viewing the situation broadly and in the light of experience in the period of Mr. Harding's incumbency of the presidential office, change in the attitude of the executive toward the legislative branch seems necessary. With party loyalty in the Senate uncertain and with the party margin in the House reduced, there is a condition in which the President needs to stiffen his grip upon the Big Stick. The country expects, and has a right to expect, carrying out of the pledges of the Chicago platform of 1920. Experience has shown that this may only be achieved by a firm course on the part of the President. Congress, left to its own courses, will not act promptly or effectively. The President must lead—in a sense he must drive. This was Roosevelt's method, and as political life and character has shaped itself in recent years there is no other way to get things done.

The overwhelming vote given to Mr. Richardson may be taken as a measure of the revolt of the taxpayers of California against the riot of extravagance that began in the period of Mr. Johnson's governorship and that has been continued and augmented by his successor. Expenditure on state account has become intolerable. Mr. Richardson promises to cut down the roster of tax-eaters and to cut down waste in many forms. His great vote was based upon public confidence in his sincerity and in his ability.

Particularly gratifying in its proof of public sanity is the overwhelming defeat of the five-hundred-million-dollar hydro-electric proposal. This was a project conceived in reckless disregard of principles fundamental in our system and of every standard of political and financial discretion. If it had succeeded it would have launched California upon a programme similar to that which has bankrupted North Dakota and not unlike the régime of bolshevism in Russia. It has been properly and emphatically rebuked.

The Hand of Esau.

With the tearing apart of our California railroad system now decreed finally by the Supreme Court there has come an open effort—we came near saying a piratical raid—on the part of the Union Pacific to possess itself of the several links of the Southern Pacific system that bear the name Central Pacific. The motive is in view. The Union Pacific now reaches westward from Omaha—through its connections, practically from Chicago—on the south to Los Angeles and on the north to Portland and Seattle. It seeks now to extend itself by the most direct and shortest line to the Pacific Coast, terminating at San Francisco—this by the easy process of "taking over" the property of another company.

But the decree of the Supreme Court is not a finality, since there abides in the Interstate Commerce Commission, under the Esch-Cummins law, authority to group the railroad lines of the country under adjustments calculated to promote efficiency and economy. Thus the Interstate Commerce Commission, despite the decree of the Supreme Court, may in its discretion assign the Central Pacific properties to the Southern Pacific, or it may turn them over to the Union Pacific, or it may make any other assignment that in its determination may make for convenience and advantage.

There is no doubt about the authority of the Interstate Commerce Commission in this matter. Its mandate is clear. Yet we read in the news reports that on Friday of last week agents of the Union Pacific appeared before the Interstate Commission and in the face of the plain mandate of the Esch-Cummins law protested that the commission is without jurisdiction. A more audacious or a more selfish assault upon the principle of private property could hardly be conceived. It may fall a little short of an actual attempt at piracy, but in morals it is not far removed from just that.

In the circumstances and conditions of the case as it now stands there is the basis of a contest in relation to which California is far from being a disinterested spectator. The Southern Pacific Railroad system, with its Central Pacific properties, is a creation of our own. It was conceived and built by Californians to serve California. It has grown with the growth of the country, expanding in understanding of its needs. Its centre of gravity is here and has always been here. It is essentially Californian, associated with California's history, imbued with California's spirit, responsive to Californian conditions. If at times we have resented its courses and have administered corrective chastisement, we none the less regard it with affection and pride. As Mr. John Stubbs once remarked, "The Southern Pacific is California's baby." Under the threat of its destruction or impairment through disintegration California with one voice cries out in protest. Surely this raid upon an agency so fixed and identified in its relation to the community, this gross injustice and injury, may not be done. Assuredly it may not be done if the will of California, whose interest is direct and positive, shall be considered and respected.

The Turkish Tangle.

Some sinister possibilities in the Near East are suggested in European dispatches. The Turks refuse to abide by the terms of the Mudania armistice, they demand salutes, they say no vessels can pass through the Dardanelles without their permission, they have ordered the Allies out of Constantinople and seem determined to have military as well as civil possession of it, they have deposed the Sultan, they want, not merely Eastern Thrace to the Mauritza River, but Western Thrace as well, their nervous sensibilities have been greatly irritated by the discovery that the Greeks drove the work animals out of Eastern Thrace when they evacuated it, and they have ordered fifteen thousand men in Constantinople to stand by for a call to the colors. Moreover, they are believed to be working under a secret agreement with the Bolshevists. What it might mean if Russians and Turks should block the Bosphorus against future exports of Russian grain is indicated in Mr. Morton Todd's article on Constantinople in this issue of the Argonaut. With a dubious Italian foreign policy and the Balkans inflammable as ever, it looks as though, as old Omar would have put it, "the bird of peace has but a little way to flutter, and that bird is on the wing."

The Drift Toward Political Chaos.

Those who assert, and they are many, that there has come a breakdown in political organization—in other words, a breakdown of parties—are not far out of line with the facts of the case. To agree with William Allen White that the real governing force at Washington is found in the various "soviets" representative of geographical sections or group interests that maintain headquarters there would be going too far. But it is true that these several "bloc" organizations exert a more positive influence over legislation than either the Republican or the Democratic national party organizations. In the campaign just ended all have been busy. Congressional candidates have been deluged with questionnaires in attempts to pledge them in advance, and in many cases—perhaps in most—the plan has worked out successfully. Similar pledges caused Congress to pass the soldiers' bonus bill last session over its own sounder and better judgment. In the recent campaign the advocates of the bonus have been urging their questionnaires, and many congressmen, against their own judgment, have put their heads into the trap, now being pledged in advance to support the demand for a bonus when it shall again be presented. The agency at Washington representing farmers' organizations has been busy with questionnaires and it succeeded in securing from many timid candidates promise to vote for repeal of the Esch-Cummins transportation law, which they want wiped off the statute books. Organized labor has put its questionnaires up to congressional candidates and has pledged a very considerable number to vote against all attempts to regulate labor, to protest attempts to secure injunction legislation, and to weaken the Federal judicial system. The pacifists, the feminists, the wets, the dries and all the rest of the gang have interviewed candidates, and there is little doubt that the effects of this campaign will appear during the next two years. All this clearly implies breakdown of party authority in government. If what Mr. White with characteristic exaggeration styles the "soviets," representing various groups and interests, are seeking and gaining control of legislation, then where do party principles and party authority come in?

The breakdown of the old system is by no means confessed, but it is becoming fairly well defined in illustrative circumstances. We have seen the President of the United States openly call upon the Republicans of Texas to coöperate with conservative Democrats in an attempt to keep a representative of the Ku Klux Klan out of the Senate. In Wisconsin we have seen large numbers both of Republicans and Democrats refraining from voting for a senator in protest against La Follette, whose support is made up of socialists and radicals of many shades. In Iowa conservative Republicans, led by three former governors, in the recent campaign supported the Democratic candidate for the senatorship in protest against the Populist Brookhart, who under the direct primary system gained the Republican nomination by a minority vote. In Nebraska many Republicans voted for Hitchcock, the Democratic nominee, because they did not trust the assertions of Howells, the Republican nominee, that he had reformed and was no longer a radical. In Missouri party lines were lost in a fight that degenerated into a personal vendetta between Jim Reed's friends and his enemies. Here in California the issues of the campaign just ended have been mainly personal; and it has hardly been better in the more socially stable states on the Atlantic seaboard. In New York, notably, the issues of the campaign have been of that nature.

In view of the situation as it thus presents itself the suggestions recently made by Dr. Nicholas Murray Butler of New York for a new political alignment on the basis of conservatism on one hand and radicalism on the other is not untimely. In truth, it may be declared to be a necessity of the times if we are to preserve the two-party system as against the innumerable "blobs" organized and organizing and tending by conflicting demands and coercive methods to create a condition of political chaos.

We see in Italy the organization of conservative elements of society with the purpose of rescuing the country from dangers imminent at the hands of a socialistic radicalism. Has not the time come here when there must be, if our system is to be maintained on its traditional lines, a movement somewhat similar in purpose? The question is a serious one. Government as we have had it this century and a half is in danger of destruction at the hands of groups none the less piratical because of high moral and social pretensions.

Germany's Fiscal Policy.

In the course of several notable addresses in the New York campaign just ended Secretary Hughes brought to bear his fine powers of analysis and clarification upon the conditions and situation of Europe. He gave emphasis to the fact that the United States can not be helpful in relation to European conditions until the European nations more nearly reconcile their own differences. For us to attempt to assist adjudication of their quarrels now would result inevitably in our becoming a partisan of one or another of the European factions. That we have been generous at the point of monetary aid to Europe has repeatedly been set forth in the statistics of money that our financiers have wittingly—or otherwise—advanced to European countries.

Mr. Hughes' statements in this connection find interesting confirmation at the hands of Mr. W. J. Wohlman, a well-known financial writer. Mr. Wohlman declares that Germany's fiscal policy since the armistice has been indefensible unless it has been dictated by the purpose of making her former enemies foot her bills. Regarded as normal fiscal administration, it has been both unsound and absurd; but viewed as a bit of national trickery, it has not been void of art combined with skill, and it has been singularly successful. Thus far Germany has effected her reparations payments and paid the expenses of her government and the cost of maintaining the armies of occupation practically through one means only—the sale of marks. German financial experts put the losses of foreign buyers of marks as high as $9,000,000,000. The losses of American purchasers, as shown by an authoritative statement by the Reich Bank, are approximately $960,000,000. A well-informed German newspaper places the total foreign losses since July, 1921, alone at £750,000,000, or $3,800,000,000. These figures are truly amazing, all the more so when one considers their source. They indicate that certain neutral countries have not only paid the equivalent of German reparations payments to date, but a considerable sum in addition.

Still further of interest is the view of a writer in Die Bank, who asserts the fear on the part of the Germans that success in stabilizing the mark would provoke renewed demands on the part of the entente nations for reparations payments. He points out that pursuance of the fiscal policy of stabilizing the mark would do more damage to Germany than any burden that could be placed upon her by her old foes.

Very obviously there has been shrewd calculation in a policy which, observed from without, has the appearance of financial collapse in Germany. The low value of the mark has had several practical effects that have been to the advantage, not indeed to the German middle and wage classes, but to the country as a whole. It has in effect exploited the working classes by holding them to low wage standards, but concurrently it has enabled Germany to compete in foreign markets with the products of their own industry. German factories are busy, and their products are sold in England and elsewhere, even in the United States, at prices that enable them to take certain leading markets as against home products. Sheffield buys German cutlery and Detroit buys German automobile parts—all at prices that are profitable to the German producers, but fatal to foreign competitors. There has been shrewd calculation in a policy that has put German industry to the fore as compared with the industries of the entente countries and that has, as Mr. Wohlman points out, made Germany's enemies, not only support her government, but pay the cost of maintaining the Allied armies camped on her soil and of covering her reparations payments.

State Participation in Education.

Projects to put over upon the state the business of education, both elementary and advanced, are general throughout the country. Our neighboring state Oregon has just voted (returns not yet reported) upon a proposal to require all children between the ages of eight and sixteen to attend a public school. This proposal marks the most advanced stage of a movement which the conservative mind at least can not view without profound concern. Education of the young is primarily a parental function, and every step tending to shift this duty to the state is a movement against the law of nature and, we profoundly believe, contrary to the interest both of the individual and the community. A system that seeks to mold the youth of a country into one common and universal type surely is not inspired by consideration of differences that are fundamental in human life and that in times past have been found to be wholesome. It is further to be borne in mind that under systems of education supported and controlled by the state the tendency is toward a kind of narrowness fatal to the development of individual character. Germany has given us a striking illustration—and a warning—in the temper, spirit, and mood of the German people as exhibited for several years prior to and during the late war.

The National Bureau of Education makes an interesting exhibit of the progress of state support and control of education in the United States. As the system now stands, regarding the country as a whole, the states provide 16.8 per cent. of the support of our public schools, the counties provide 11.4 per cent., and the local districts 71.8 per cent., respectively. Advocates of a larger participation by the state urge that the states' contribution of 16.8 per cent. should be increased to one-third the total, and there are many who declare that it should be 50 per cent. or more. The respective percentages of school revenues contributed by the several states, as reported in the 1920 census, are as follows:

|                         |      |                          |      |
|-------------------------|------|--------------------------|------|
| Alabama . . . . .       | 51.3 | Nebraska . . . . .       | 6.6  |
| Arizona . . . . .       | 18.7 | Nevada . . . . .         | 26.6 |
| Arkansas . . . . .      | 23.7 | New Hampshire . . . . .  | 8.7  |
| California . . . . .    | 20.4 | New Jersey . . . . .     | 35.6 |
| Colorado . . . . .      | 9.0  | New Mexico . . . . .     | 17.6 |
| Connecticut . . . . .   | 12.3 | New York . . . . .       | 12.1 |
| Delaware . . . . .      | 35.3 | North Carolina . . . . . | 30.1 |
| Florida . . . . .       | 7.2  | North Dakota . . . . .   | 12.1 |
| Georgia . . . . .       | 43.5 | Ohio . . . . .           | 7.3  |
| Idaho . . . . .         | 9.7  | Oklahoma . . . . .       | 7.5  |
| Illinois . . . . .      | 8.7  | Oregon . . . . .         | 4.8  |
| Indiana . . . . .       | 10.6 | Pennsylvania . . . . .   | 15.9 |
| Iowa . . . . .          | 1.5  | Rhode Island . . . . .   | 5.2  |
| Kansas . . . . .        | 2.3  | South Carolina . . . . . | 15.8 |
| Kentucky . . . . .      | 37.1 | South Dakota . . . . .   | 16.6 |
| Louisiana . . . . .     | 24.5 | Tennessee . . . . .      | 17.8 |
| Maine . . . . .         | 35.6 | Texas . . . . .          | 54.0 |
| Maryland . . . . .      | 41.6 | Utah . . . . .           | 31.5 |
| Massachusetts . . . . . | 12.3 | Vermont . . . . .        | 33.1 |
| Michigan . . . . .      | 17.1 | Virginia . . . . .       | 36.7 |
| Minnesota . . . . .     | 19.5 | Washington . . . . .     | 18.1 |
| Mississippi . . . . .   | 52.1 | West Virginia . . . . .  | 6.4  |
| Missouri . . . . .      | 11.9 | Wisconsin . . . . .      | 15.6 |
| Montana . . . . .       | 9.9  | Wyoming . . . . .        | 24.3 |

California, under an initiative act that has very recently come into effect, has added $30 per capita of average attendance to its distributive school fund and in various other states, notably Arizona, Delaware, Georgia, Louisiana, Maryland, Massachusetts, Mississippi, New York, Pennsylvania, Texas, Utah, Virginia and Washington, the movement is toward similarly increasing the participation of the state in elementary as well as collegiate education.

Editorial Notes.

The disaster that befell the dirigible C-2, the third great dirigible catastrophe within the year, points to an unscientific attitude on the part of those in charge of these army balloons—whether they be those of our own government or of another. Why hydrogen should still be used to inflate dirigibles is a mystery to puzzle future ages. Hydrogen is inflammable. A concussion is apt to explode it, for the reason that it is not an inert gas and must explode if violently disturbed. If there were no other gas to use, or if all gases were inflammable, we could understand the continuing use of this one in the face of its marked inaptness for the use to which it is put. But when helium exists, and in large quantities, it is beyond comprehension that hydrogen should be used at all, let alone by obvious preference. Helium does not assure a balloon against accidents, but at least no accident will be so horrible in a helium balloon as when accompanied by the inevitable explosion and burning that attends hydrogen in any concussion. Helium is scarcer than hydrogen. But it is well known that natural gases from the wells in various parts of this country contain large quantities of helium, and according to recent figures by experts, it is escaping from them into the air at the rate of a million and a quarter cubic feet a day—or enough to inflate four dirigibles a week. Helium is easily obtained from natural gases by liquefying them—the helium remaining in the gaseous form because it is inert. It is high time that helium or a mixture of helium (a proportion of one-fourth with hydrogen is said to be safe) was used exclusively for balloon inflation. In ordinary engineering a maximum of safety and a minimum of risk is legally obligatory. It is the height of absurdity to throw caution to the wind because a more dangerous feat is being accomplished.

Mr. Lloyd George is clearly in the way of losing his campaign for reinstatement at the head of the British government. The tide has turned against him. But while likely to be defeated in his major purpose, he will be returned to Parliament, where in the character of opponent and critic of the government he will be heard from. Those who seek to apply the psychology of one country to that of another usually miss the mark, and it would be a bold American who should assume to instruct Mr. Lloyd George in the game of practical politics in his own country. But we venture so far as to say that from the American point of view Mr. Lloyd George would have done better to bide-a-wee in the matter of "coming back." Time, with the inevitable mistakes of his successor in the premiership, would surely have worked to his advantage. Furthermore, to come back as the result of a fight is one thing, and to come back upon invitation is quite another thing. Mr. Lloyd George is still a young man, relatively speaking, and he could have afforded to wait. Others, notably Mr. Gladstone and Lord Beaconsfield, played that game successfully—even to the point of reducing it to a species of hide-and-seek. That in course of time Lloyd George will return to power is almost an assurance. In politics as in war prestige is a large factor; and when prestige is associated with talents like those possessed by Mr. Lloyd George, and where tradition and precedent play the large part they do in British life, eventualities are in rather plain view.

An incident tending to illustrate one phase of life in the greatest of our American cities is afforded by the competitive congressional candidacy in the Twentieth New York District between Fiorello H. La Guardia, Republican, and Henry Frank, Democrat. This is a typical New York Jewish constituency now represented in Congress by Isaac Siegel, who was not a candidate for reelection. Frank, a Jew, made his campaign largely on racial lines, declaring that La Guardia, an Italian, former member of Congress, also former major in our army aviation service overseas, was no friend of the Jews, whereupon La Guardia challenged Frank to join him in conducting the last weeks of their oratorical competition in Yiddish.

IN MEMORY OF SIDNEY CORYN.

(Died November 14, 1921.)

Fearlessness, singleness of soul, the will Always to strive for wisdom; opened hand
And governed appetites; and piety
And love of lonely study; humbleness,
Uprightness, heed to injure nought which lives,
Truthfulness, slowness unto wrath, a mind
That lightly letteth go what others prize;
And equanimity, and charity
Which speth no man's faults; and tenderness
Towards all that suffer; a contented heart,
Fluttered by no desires; a bearing mild,
Modest, and grave, with manhood nobly mixed
With patience, fortitude, and purity;
An unrevengful spirit, never given
To rate itself too high;—such be the signs,
O Indian Prince! of him whose feet are set
On that fair path which leads to heavenly birth!

—Translated from the Bhagavad-Gita by Edwin Arnold.

Capital widely diffused under private ownership is the true American principle, says the Review of Reviews. It tends to obliterate class distinctions, and to protect society against plutocracy on the one hand and proletarianism on the other. Government under such conditions may well act as umpire, and see that the economic world, whether from the standpoint of capital, or from that of labor, does not conduct itself in disregard of the common welfare.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR.

An Educator's View on the Stadium Question.

NEW HAVEN, CONN., October 15, 1922.
TO THE EDITOR—Sir: Among the many enrichments of life which last winter's sojourn at the University of California gave me I owe you acknowledgment for my acquaintance with the Argonaut, whose sturdy good sense and sound judgment on a great variety of subjects appeal to me as among the best things in American journalism.

I am moved to make this belated acknowledgment at this time by your vigorous and illuminating editorial in the issue of September 30th entitled "The Stadium Blunder." Let us hope, as you intimate, that it is not beyond retrieving, and that others of your readers who have the interests of the university and the state, as well as of sound sports, at heart will make themselves heard on this question.

It is not often that a great university—theoretically the home of the good, the true, and the beautiful—can realize its mission in a location so magnificent as that of the University of California, backed against splendid hills and with its focus, the graceful Sather campanile, squarely in line with the Pacific portal. But the view seaward is only one element of this superb topography. Behind the tower there winds into the abrupt hills a deep valley or cañon of rare charm and beauty, which alone would suffice to give distinction to the campus even without its western outlook.

When you say that it is proposed to block completely the entrance to this extraordinary gift of nature by a huge colosseum-like structure, you say something which must seem incredible to any one who can visualize what destruction this would mean. If a city is without natural features which it may adapt or convert into park areas it will spend thousands of dollars, and perhaps millions, to make natural beauty for the refreshment of its people. It will in a small way build hills, dig valleys, and plant meadows (as Chicago has done on the sand of the old lake bottom), and consider its money well spent. To be sure, real estate enterprises, railroads, mining and lumber industries do destroy natural beauties, and sometimes ruthlessly, but they plead the necessities of the community for their products and their service, nor do they profess to be working in the cause of the true and the beautiful. With what face could California ask the government and the people for aid in protecting her magnificent redwoods if the enlightened directors of university policy insist on destroying one of the great natural beauties of the Berkeley campus? And for what? A stadium. Grant that in the development of university life a stadium is a necessity, like railroads, coal, or lumber. But why here? Because it is available, I suppose. Yes, so is the meadow and other open spaces of Central Park available for many purposes and buildings which crowded New York would find useful. And it must be said with regret that from an early time the architects and commissioners of Central Park (supported happily by a small but intelligent public sentiment) have had to fight to keep speedways, museums, public monuments, and even stadiums from these open tracts of unused land.

The late Calvert Vaux, designer of Central Park, in the course of many years' struggle to save his creation from such encroachments used to say bitterly that the American people would not be civilized until it learned that the unused ground of a park was not wasted, but was being put to the highest use. And the same could be said of Strawberry Cañon on the Berkeley campus. If it were not there the architects of that campus might well sigh that nature had reared the hills so abrupt and that a pleasant valley winding into them could not be built. But in fact nature has builded more abundantly than architects could dream, and time has filled the valley with noble oaks which it would be a desecration to touch.

On the practical and educational sides of the question your observations are admirable. The Yale bowl, placed on level ground with open spaces on all sides and with thirty-five wide exits at the exterior level is none too safe when a throng of 75,000 people pours out in the autumn twilight rushing eagerly for street-cars and automobiles. It is also true that no one at Yale would wish the Yale field and the bowl a foot nearer the campus than they are (something more than a mile). We believe in athletic sports and in the largest possible participation of students in them, but we are glad that they are separated geographically from the academic life of the colleges and the university.

The University of California needs for its athletic life a large tract of land, such as I imagine could be secured in West Berkeley, for the development of all forms of athletic sport—baseball, tennis, track, etc., as well as football. To bring these all together with clubhouse, baths, etc., in one place would result, as it does here at Yale, in making a common meeting ground for all students, irrespective of their differing academic pursuits, and it would become one of the largest educational factors in democracy and good fellowship. From our standpoint it certainly seems a colossal blunder to spend a huge sum upon the realization of a single element in this programme without contributing to the eventual solution of the whole.

G. L. HENDERICKSON,
Lampson Professor of Latin and Greek Literature, Yale University.

A Kind Word.

WALLA WALLA, WASH., October 24, 1922.

MY DEAR MR. HOLMAN: In renewing my annual subscription allow me to state how welcome the Argonaut is each week to Mrs. Anderson and myself. Of all the magazines, reviews, and papers that come to our home, none are appreciated more than the Argonaut and the Literary Review of New York. These two stand in a class high above all others.

With best wishes,

LOUIS F. ANDERSON.

A Fortuitous Circumstance!

3343 JACKSON STREET,

SAN FRANCISCO, November 7, 1922.

Alfred Holman, Esq.,
Editor, The Argonaut—

SIR: Within the last twenty minutes I have performed the now abnormal functions of a citizen of California and San Francisco at the polls. The physical operation of stamping the ballot consumed seventeen minutes by a stop watch.

If it had not been for the Argonaut and a fortuitous circumstance, casting my ballot must have taken me most of the morning and left me so prostrated that further effort in the day's work would have been futile.

I had clipped the Argonaut's recommendations concerning the endless tinkering with the Constitution and the San Francisco charter, and had left the clipping on the breakfast-table for the edification and guidance of my better half.

As I reached the top of the hill at Presidio Avenue and Jackson Street a fraction of familiar paper and type caught my eye. I picked it up, heaved a grateful sigh to Providence and the Argonaut, and once more was braced for the perils of the polling place. After voting, it was my obvious duty to drop the clipping at the same spot.

"Ibam forte via sacra."

H. C.

The United States has diplomatic representatives in fifty foreign countries.

CONSTANTINOPLE.

Its Imperial Position Makes it the Nerve Ganglion of Much European and Asiatic Commerce.

IV.

If you look at a flat map of southeastern Europe and Asia Minor you will see how the land-masses pinch the sea traffic in to the Bosphorus, and the seas pinch the land traffic in to the same point. For hundreds of miles there is no alternative, and not even the Anatolian and Balkan railroads have altered this condition. With the possible exception of Panama there is no such example of traffic concentration anywhere, and as yet Panama can not be compared in importance to the natural canal between the Mediterranean and Black seas. But looking at the ordinary flat map is one of the best ways of deceiving yourself about geography, and the history and politics that may be based upon it. A flat map, for example, tells you Greenland is five times the size of India, whereas it is about the same size; and in population, and therefore in possibilities of trouble, it is infinitely smaller. It will be a long time before there is an uprising of Mohammedan Eskimo. To understand the relative areas of real estate it would be much better to consult a globe, or B. J. S. Cahill's "butterfly" map. Even then you will miss a few points about values. Neither is adequate to depict the importance of Constantinople's position, neither tells what the Black Sea may mean.

In a military sense, Constantinople comes perilously near being the key to India. It can be made impregnable—is impregnable held by an armed nation. From the stronghold beyond the Dardanelles and the Sea of Marmora a vigorous sea power might cut England's line to the East through Suez, and make the military support of her Indian government impossible. Such points as Gibraltar, Malta, and Cyprus help police the road for the P. & O. steamers, but even these might not prove adequate with Constantinople in the possession of a powerful enemy. England had a bad enough time with the Boer war twenty-one years ago. India would be twice as difficult. If a resuscitated Russia had Constantinople she would probably soon have India. That would tend to the Russianization of the world, and make it necessary, under the operation of what some strategist has defined as the "law of mutual aid," for the other nations to combine and plunge into another world war in order to prevent it; for the world would not consent to being Russianized any more than it would to being Germanized—or even Americanized, much as we might deplore its taste in that particular. Yet in her need, during the German war, England was willing to promise Russia that she might retain Constantinople if she could take it; an arrangement under which there is not a chance in a thousand that the British public would ever have been content.

So it appears that in the wrong hands Constantinople would become the powder house of the Eastern Hemisphere. To any one nation, the wrong hands for Constantinople to be in are the hands of some other nation, especially if the other nation is strong. That is why the mixed commission has been occupying the city; neither the Italian, the Frenchman, nor the Britisher would trust the other two—wouldn't even trust one, and they all went in to watch one another. Such operations are not sentimental, but they are humanitarian in the highest sense because they are practical—we don't want another world war, in this generation at least. So it appears, again, that the Constantinople question is a little larger and a little more critical than any academic discussion as to whether the Turk is or is not a deserving person, or even what it is he deserves. Lloyd George has said that he must never be permitted to hold the gate again, but Lloyd George is out of office, and since the British municipal elections of the second of this month with their considerable laborite defeats it does not seem so certain that he will come back; at least he will not come back in time to have much influence on the coming conference at Lausanne, if the Turks agree to attend it, which they seem reluctant to do. If such a conference were held it might decide that the world would be safer if the Turk, with all his disgusting attributes of incompetence and cruelty, were left in possession, not for his own sake, but to keep the wrong party out of possession. That would be disappointing to all humane hope of getting him out of Europe; but at least he makes a passable dog in the manger. His weakness has heretofore been his recommendation to the jealous powers.

There is an even larger aspect of the position of Constantinople than the merely military one, in fact one of the main underlying reasons for its having a military aspect, and that is its relation to the commerce of the Black Sea and Central Europe. Before the war between 150,000,000 and 200,000,000 bushels of wheat went out through the Bosphorus annually, and shiploads of barley, oats, and rye—breadstuffs, and beer-stuff, for 50,000,000 people. This movement might be regarded as the agricultural drainage of the Black Sea basin, if it were not the agricultural drainage of so much more; for here again the flat map deceives us. The area involved is vast. It covers all the drainage of the Volga, as well as of the Don, the Dnieper, the Dneister; wonderful wheat regions, among the richest in the world, like those of the Dakotas, Alberta, and the Argentine, stretching beyond the Caspian Sea to the Ural Mountains and the Arctic Ocean; for the Baltic turns to iron in the Russian winter. The streams are natural canals, the Volga is joined to the Don by a short railroad, and when these regions were productive they poured all these currents of foodstuffs into the Black Sea on their way to the Bosphorus, as though by inevitable gravity. It was down hill all the way, and out by Constantinople and the Dardanelles.

It is true that the city itself did little about it in the way of financing and brokerage. Mainly it sat on the shore, Turk fashion, and watched the business go by. But it saw a great parade. A dweller on the banks of the Bosphorus could sometimes see fifteen vessels in transit, and the smoke of others coming around the bend. Twelve thousand ship a year went through. It seemed an endless procession, one of those elemental things nothing can stop, involving in any stoppage an immeasurable calamity and therefore something too tragic to contemplate. The grain had been moving through with only temporary interruptions, if any, for twenty-five centuries. One of the main concerns of humanity was to keep it moving. It was a bread-and-butter problem of stupendous magnitude.

Part of this drainage area, again, lies in the other direction. The flat map will not show us the effect of the mountains of Carniola. From the map it would appear that old Austria-Hungary's best approach to open water would naturally be through the port of Trieste, at the head of the Adriatic. But mountain ranges intervene, and although railroads cross them, European rates are very much higher than the rates in this country, and the mountains are an insuperable barrier to canalization. Only high-grade merchandise can pay its way over these grades from Hungary and a good part of old Austria to the Adriatic, and when in the Adriatic it is still at the mercy of Italy or of Serbia, or of Albania, or whatever country may control Albania with its key harbor of Avlona. But there is the Danube, not blue as in the old waltz, nor yet by half so frivolous, but slow, muddy, sober and serviceable, a great natural canal winding a long way past the northern border of Bulgaria to the Black Sea. It takes the low-grade freights. And to the Black Sea also goes a good part, if not all, of the exports of Thrace, and Roumania, and Bulgaria, making it one vast hopper, discharging past the Golden Horn and the old Seraglio Point. Even goods from the Caspian region go up the Volga and down the Don to the Black Sea. Even part of Persia contributes its output, finding it cheaper than the Persian Gulf route. It has been calculated by H. H. Powers in his significant work, "The Things Men Fight For," that the area which uses, or before the war used, the outlet of the Dardanelles, is as large as the United States, and three times the area tributary to the port of New York. And from the Caspian Sea a Russian railway stretches eastward, to meet before long a Chinese railway reaching westward from Peking. Some day all the country threaded by it will be under modern cultivation and development, and will pour a good percentage of its business down the Bosphorus. What city on the globe means so much to the world as Constantinople might some day come to mean? What position is so tempting a bait to the militaristic parties of ambitious nations? Napoleon thought the possession of Constantinople meant the dominance of the world. Of course, Napoleon had not seen New York. But perhaps he would not have changed his opinion if he had. For, although the city has little share in this tremendous tide of commerce, a strong power in possession would be able to throttle that trade, or hold it up for tolls.

When Turkey made the sad mistake of deserting her former European friends, England and France, and joined Germany in her onslaught on the Atlantic nations, this commerce ceased. Things looked very blue to people that depended on Black Sea wheat and oats and rye. Roughly speaking, the wheat exports through the Dardanelles were equal to about three-quarters of the wheat exports of this country. And the spout ceased to pour. During the first two years of the war there were bumper crops in the United States and Canada, and the shortages were partly made up. India helped, and so did the Argentine. But the years following were lean years, and Europe had to be supplied, and we got Mr. Hoover on the job, and he made us Hooverize, and eat everything on the plate and no fooling, and Europe got through by a gnat's hair. But it was too close. Because Constantinople had been in treacherous hands we had to grow potatoes on vacant lots in San Francisco. Does that indicate, perhaps, some trifling interest in European affairs? Or can we intelligently continue to say, "What do we care for abroad?"

With the destruction of the old Russian order, the Dardanelles lost their importance as a channel for the supply of grain to the world. Expropriating the princely Russian land owners, dividing the land into small farms and distributing it among the peasants, might have seemed, to some theorists, an execution of poetic justice and social reform, and to promise an ideal condition for humanity. But it doesn't produce the wheat. What it has really done has been to disorganize the methods and operations of Russian agriculture, once carried out on a baronial scale on vast acres, employing the organization and control of the great landed proprietor, with all that makes possible in the way of economical operation and skilled central management; and substitute for it the retail processes of the small farmer, who, however much he may love the land, has not yet evolved methods of production equal to the old. In the commercial and industrial chaos prevailing in that particular socialist heaven it has been difficult to get seed and machinery and replace worn-out implements. It is a strange reversal of the current of twenty-five centuries that since the socialization of Russia the wheat has had to flow the other way—some 40,000,000 bushels of it a year to keep the Russians alive. That is real revolution.

The day will certainly come, however, when the Russians are through fooling with socialism and get down to work, and the Austro-Hungarian countries resume production on their old scale, and Anatolia and Persia and the little new countries of the Black Sea area and the Caspian area come into the field of industry on a modern basis, and when the Chinese railroad across the Pamirs and Central Asia reaches a connection with Tashkend, that Constantinople will take its old place, and even a higher place of commercial importance than it had before. Who then will hold that matchless position? Will it be Turk, or Greek, or Bulgarian, or Russian, or mixed commission under an agreement for a neutralized strait? The Turks, strong with recent victory and still well organized, have ordered the Allies to get out, and the Allies have decided to decline the invitation. Europe and the world are facing one of the most ticklish problems of adjustment of all those left us by the war.

MORTON TODD.

OLD FAVORITES.

Eternity.

Boundless Eternity! the winged sands
That mark the silent lapse of flitting time
Are not for thee; thine awful empire stands
From age to age, unchangeable, sublime:
Thy domes are spread where thought can never climb,
In cloud and darkness, where vast pillars rest.
I may not fathom thee: 'twould seem a crime
Thy being of its mystery to divest.
Or boldly lift thine awful veil with hands unblest.

Thy ruins are wrecks of systems; suns
Blaze a brief space of ages, and are not;
Worlds crumble and decay, creation runs
To waste—then perishes and is forgot;
Yet thou, all changeless, heedest not the blot.
Heaven speaks once more in thunder; empty space
Trembles and wakes; new worlds in ether flit,
Teeming with new creative life, and trace
Their mighty circles, such as others shall displace.

Thine age is youth, thy youth is hoary age,
Ever beginning, never ending, thou
Bearest inscribed upon thy ample page,
Yesterday, forever, but as now
Thou art, thou hast been, thou shalt be: though
I feel myself immortal, when on thee
I muse, I shrink to nothingness, and bow
Myself before thee, dread Eternity,
With God co-eval, co-existing, still to be.

I go with thee till Time shall be no more.
I stand with thee on Time's remotest verge,
Ten thousand years, ten thousand times told o'er;
Still, still with thee my onward course I urge;
And now no longer hear the endless surge
Of Time's light billows breaking on the shore
Of distant earth; no more the solemn dirge—
Requiem of worlds, when such are numbered o'er—
Steals by: still thou art moving on forevermore.

From that dim distance would I turn to gaze
With fondly searching glance, upon the spot
Of brief existence, where I met the blaze
Of morning, bursting on my humble cot,
And gladness whispered of my happy lot:
And now 'tis dwindled to a point—a speck—
And now 'tis nothing, and my eye may not Longer distinguish it amid the wreck
Of worlds in ruins, crushed at the Almighty's beck.

Time—what is Time to thee? a passing thought
To twice ten thousand ages—a faint spark
To twice ten thousand suns; a fibre wrought
Into the web of infinite—a cork
Balanced against a world: we hardly mark
Its being—even its name hath ceased to be;
Thy wave hath swept it from us, and thy dark
Mantle of years, in dim obscurity
Hath shrouded it around: Time—what is Time to thee!
John Greenleaf Whittier.

The E'en Brings a Hame

Upon the hills the wind is sharp and cold,
The sweet young grasses wither on the wold,
And we, O Lord, have wandered from Thy fold
But evening brings us home.

Among the mists we stumbled and the rocks,
Where the brown lichen whitens, and the fox
Watches the straggler from the scattered flocks:
But evening brings us home.

The sharp thorn pricks us and our tender feet
Are cut and bleeding, and the lambs repeat
Their pitiful complaint: Oh, rest is sweet
When evening brings us home.

We have been wounded by the hunters' darts;
Our eyes are heavy and our hearts
Search for Thy coming. When the light departs
But evening brings us home.

The darkness gathers. Through the gloom no star
Rises to guide us. We have wandered far—Without Thy lamp we know not where we are:
But evening brings us home.

The clouds are round us and the snowdrifts thicken.
O, Thou dear Shepherd, leave us not to sicken
In the waste night. Our tardy footsteps quicken;
But evening brings us home.

—Fraser's Magazine, January, 1865.

INDIVIDUALITIES.

Mlle. Yvonne Nevajan, a Belgian educator, who has been appointed director of public schools in that country, is traveling in the United States to study American educational methods.

Dr. A. C. D. Van De Graeff, Netherlands Minister to Tokio, has been recently appointed Minister to the United States. He will succeed Dr. J. C. A. Everwijn, whose resignation as minister to Washington was announced in July.

Lieutenant R. L. Maughan of the United States Army, who won the Pulitzer air race at Detroit in a Curtiss biplane, thus setting the world's speed record of four miles a minute, carries a white rabbit's left hind foot as "insurance."

Italy's "dictator," Benito Mussolini, present leader of the Fascisti, was formerly a socialist editor. He renounced his political platform to organize the powerful group of young Italians whose sworn purpose is to oppose socialism and every form of bolshevism in Italy.

Lady Wentworth, great-granddaughter of the poet Byron and daughter of another poet, Wilfred Scawen Blunt, is a breeder of Arabian horses and mountain ponies. She is also an authority on toy dogs, a subject on which she has written extensively. The Baroness Wentworth was at one time world woman's tennis champion.

The Countess Janina Mieczkowska, the sole survivor of an old Polish house, is Europe's latest screen hit. When on the point of entering a convent, Janina was discovered by a movie expert, who hailed her face as the perfect photogenic one. The countess is said to be an excellent example of the fact that beauty is not the key to screen success, for though she is of course "good-looking," her manager says every city of Europe is full of handsomer women.

Arthur Bliss, perhaps the most interesting of the younger English musical composers, was born in London on August 2, 1891. He was educated at Rugby and at Pembroke College, Cambridge, taking his B. A. and Mus. B. in 1913. In 1915 he served in France with the Thirteenth Battalion of the Royal Fusiliers; he was wounded on the Somme in 1916, and mentioned in dispatches for gallantry. In 1918 he further served in France with the First Battalion Grenadier Guards, and was gassed near Cambrai.

Dr. Samuel Wesley Stratton, physicist, and for more than twenty years director of the National Bureau of Standards at Washington, D. C., has resigned that post to become president of the Massachusetts Institute of Technology. Dr. Stratton is a graduate of the University of Pittsburgh, Cambridge, and Yale, is in his early sixties and is unmarried. He is a member of the International Commission on Weights and Measures, of the American Institution of Electrical Engineers, and of the National Academy of Sciences. He served as a lieutenant in the United States Navy during the Spanish-American war and is a member of the Army and Navy Club.

To leap into the limelight in Ireland it is apparently first necessary to be a schoolteacher—a tradition perhaps from the middle ages, when Ireland was the most learned of the nations. To enumerate: James Joyce and Daniel Corkery, two of Erin's most generally recognized men of letters, were both schoolteachers. Three leaders of the Easter Week rebellion of 1916, Padraic Pearse, headmaster of a boys' school; Thomas McDonough, who was executed with Pearse and who had been a teacher in his school, and Joseph Plunkett were all of the same profession. De Valera was a professor at Dublin University, as is Professor McNeill, the Speaker of the Dail. Miss Mary McSwiney, sister of the hunger-striking lord mayor of Cork, is also an educator. To return to the author of "The Portrait of the Author as a Young Man" and the proscribed "Ulysses," James Joyce taught languages in various schools in France, Italy, and Switzerland, while he was at work on his Italian novels.

John L. Lewis, the "Man with the Iron Jaw," as he is known among his men, is the ninth of the list of leaders who have served as president of the United Mine Workers, and probably the strongest of them all. Lewis, who is still in his forties and who carries as great responsibility as any labor man, has the intimate viewpoint of the miner. He stripped soft coal as a boy in the bituminous fields of Iowa and Illinois. It will be remembered that at the conference of the mine workers during the 1919 strike, after the double-barreled order from the Federal courts enjoining the miners from striking and compelling their leaders to cancel the strike order, Lewis quelled the stormy eighteen-hour session and emerged victorious from the debate with the report, "We will obey the mandate of the court. We are Americans and will not fight our government." Lewis is the son of Welsh parentage, born in Lucas, Iowa, a small mining town, on Lincoln's birthday, in 1880. Both his father and grandfather had been coal miners in Wales. Early in life he made a name for himself as an organizer in the American Federation of Labor. He served as a member of the Coal Production Committee of the National Council of Defense and during the war cooperated with the United States Fuel Administration to maintain the maximum production of coal.

JOHN DREW AND HIS WORLD.

Sparkling Reminiscences of a Leading Figure of the Contemporary American Stage.

There has been no high degree of social development without a great stage, and of the American stage for two generations John Drew has been one of the mainstays. As America's most refined comedian, he has interpreted life, manners, social customs, all the myriad practices men and women have developed in getting on with one another and taking the rough edges off life. He has been very much the mold of form, to say nothing of the glass of fashion, to his country and his times, and perhaps he has enjoyed not a little being the observed of all observers. It would take a bold person to deny that he had excited some male emulation at times, and that he had also fluttered many female hearts. And those that saw him lately in "The Circle," that diabolical exposition of the ceaselessly whirling squirrel cage of love, when he had become a testy old ruin scolding at his mistress the way no man should scold any women except his wife, could hardly have escaped the feeling that "this person has lived." He saw the world across the footlights, but he also saw it face to face in a hundred real and vital ways. Had he not, he never could have been its interpreter, even with the best assistance of the dramatist. If one studies his art, for example in its latest expression, one is puzzled to decide which has been the more creative, Somerset Maugham with his plot and lines and fundamental understanding of the human heart, or John Drew with his aristocratic manner, his noble nose, his gouty temper, and his fundamental understanding of the human head, when the heart is gone and nothing remains but patent leather, broadcloth, and just a little for the barber to trim. Of Drew this can always be said: that he has been a sincere and conscientious artist, giving us always his best. And he has been a gentleman. And he now gives us his observations of life in a modest volume, well illustrated, entitled "My Years on the Stage." That mimic world which Augustin Daly created, a world of actors of both sexes bound together by an admirable esprit, is brightly reflected in the Drew book, and many of the reflections will prove sources of delight to the theatre-goers of mature years. What old haunter of the foyer, for instance, will fail to thrill at these familiar portraits of Ada Rehan?

Ada Rehan had a fault, if such it may be termed, which might have been a deterrent and a hindrance to her success on the stage, and that was her utter inability to keep from laughing if anything seemed at all funny. I remember that in one of the first plays in which we first appeared together, "Kitty O'Shiel," I was acting a red-coated British officer of the Third Georgian period, and, of course, I wore a white wig. We did not have dress rehearsals and when I came up to her on the stage at the performance, she burst out laughing and I under my breath tried to control her.

When we came off stage I demanded to know what was the matter.

She said: "I couldn't help it; but you looked like a sheep." Ada Rehan never quite got over this upsetting tendency and liking for the ridiculous at serious times.

Years afterward we were rehearsing at Daly's Theatre "The Foresters," by Tennyson. In one scene Maid Marian had to say to Robin Hood: "Your horn is known and feared through the forest."

Each time she would say this I covered my nose up, and it set her laughing.

Daly, who was out in front, was always annoyed when rehearsals were interrupted. The next time we reached this same line, Maid Marian burst into uncontrollable laughter, and it was some minutes before she regained her equilibrium. This time Daly demanded to know what was funny about this line and, when told that horn and nose were sometimes synonymous, he very emphatically told Ada to cut the line out of her part if she could not give it without laughing.

By that time the amusement that it caused was over, and it was given in the play. It scarcely seems a "funnymen" now; but Ada Rehan was so much a healthy, good-natured girl, even in 1892, that one was apt to laugh with her.

From this second season of the new Daly's Ada Rehan was an assured success. E. A. Dithmar at a somewhat later date wrote: "Miss Ada Rehan has no lack of appreciation and she is growing in her art. Her record belongs to the future; but it has been interesting and profitable to watch her artistic work from the days of 'Needles and Pins,' in which Miss Rehan as a kittenish girl acted as a mediator in the mature romance of a bald and bashful bachelor and a gushing yet timid spinster, portrayed by Mr. Lewis and Mrs. Gilbert."

The plot of "Needles and Pins" was complicated and sentimental, and it was not a play that could live any number of years in any theatre, but the comedy scenes were genuine good fun. I suppose that its most conspicuous merit was that it was unlike anything to be seen elsewhere in New York at that time. It belonged to the group of plays that Daly adapted from the German. Some were better than others, but the standard did not change much. They were always very pleasing, light and clean.

Hardly any actor of Drew's generation could have failed to be charmed by the life and atmosphere of the old San Francisco, the San Francisco of the days before the earthquake and fire, and long before that, the city of sparkle and gayety and abundance and brilliance, before the last departures of the generous souls of the Comstock era. They loved the drama, perhaps because their own lives were so dramatic, perhaps because it was the one vital and portable form of art that never failed to appeal to big and simple natures. There was a day when San Francisco would have pressed New York hard as the leading theatrical city of America. Such times Drew gratefully recalls, as on the occasion of his first visit, and he gives us this account of his experiences:

San Francisco in 1875 was a live town. We stayed at the Occidental, and on July 12th we opened with "London Assurance" in Platt's Hall. According to the playbill of that night, this play was to be "As represented at the Fifth Avenue Theatre to crowded and laughter-convulsed audiences." Also from the playbill: "The new scenery to be unfolded this evening will be found in Act 2—The park, and in Act 3—Oak Hall, Gloucestershire." It turned out that there was little room for all this scenery and after two nights we moved to Emerson's Minstrel Hall.

"The Big Bonanza" was not a success here, for Crane and James O'Neill had already played another version of the same play. We visited Chinatown and saw some of the interminable plays in the Chinese Theatre, at least we were told that one of the plays that we saw still had some days to go. Outwardly Chinatown was a very different place from the place I saw on numerous later trips.

In San Francisco I met John McCullough, who was running the California Theatre on regular stock lines, playing the usual plays that were popular at the time. On this first trip I met John Mackay, the father of Clarence Mackay, and James Fair, of the celebrated mining outfit, Mackay, Fair, Flood and O'Brien. They owned the Consolidated Virginia mine in Virginia City, Nevada.

We visited the mine, and there is a picture of Mrs. Gilbert, Miss Davenport, Miss Jeffries Lewis, James Lewis, Augustin Daly and myself at the entrance to the mine, all made-up in workmen's clothes. We went down to a depth of some two thousand feet, and then to some lower level on a very small lift. It was very warm in this big silver mine, and Mr. Fair had a man following us with iced champagne and we stopped to partake now and then.

In Salt Lake City he came upon one solution of the problem of the eternal triangle, or even occasional quadrangle, that must have amused him. Of a stop in the Mormon capital he says:

Curiously enough, the play selected for our opening bill in Salt Lake City was Bronson Howard's "Saratoga." Elsewhere the complications resulting from the pursuit of the hero, Bob Sackett, by three infatuated women had been considered excruciatingly funny, but the Mormons, as Brigham Young himself pointed out to us, would have solved a problem like Sackett's so easily that there would have been no play.

The day after we opened, Miss Davenport, Mrs. Gilbert, Jim Lewis and Mrs. Lewis, Daly and I went to call upon Brigham Young, who gave us a sort of audience at his official residence. He seemed a familiar figure and looked very much like his pictures, except that he was older and somewhat feeble, and he had a growth or goiter that was said to have been caused by drinking snow water from the mountains. Of course this must have been false, for the water was perfectly pellucid.

He expressed a great deal of interest in our work and particularly in the play, "Saratoga." "But why," he asked, turning to Lewis, who played the part of Bob Sackett, the pursued hero, "should the author have made such a complication out of the efforts of your character to get away from the three women who are in love with him?"

Jim Lewis was somewhat puzzled by the question. "What else," he asked, "could Sackett do but try to escape?" "Marry them all," was Brigham Young's answer.

He said this so seriously that none of us knew whether he meant his solution as a wheeze or not, and we talked of other things.

In the middle 'eighties first nights at Daly's in New York had become very much the thing, and the audiences included persons of national fame. There one might see General Sherman, General Horace Porter, Mark Twain, H. C. Bunner of "Short Sixes" fame, George William Curtis, Charles Dudley Warner, Frank R. Stockton, Edmund Clarence Stedman, Edwin A. Abbey—all interested in the miniature world of the stage that for an hour or so can be made to seem so much more worth while than the real one. Mark Twain once wrote for a first-night reservation, saying: "I have written wonderful books, which have revolutionized politics and religion in the world; and you might think this is why my children hold my person to be sacred; but it isn't so; it is because I know Miss Rehan and Mr. Drew personally." Drew might well feel proud of that; at any rate he has put it in his book. It is almost as good as being the uncle of the Barrymores, "Lionel, Ethel, and John." But Clemens wished to do still more; he wished to write a play. The ambition had this disappointing outcome:

The company and the performances were beginning to attract attention and it was somewhere around this time that Mark Twain and other people prominent in literature and art began to come to the theatre. I remember that Mark Twain told me in those early days that he had thought of writing a play for the Daly company. It was a grand, brilliant, and original idea. At least so he thought when he began to work upon it. The play was a dream play, and in the end it all came out right and the disasters that happened in the play were mere distortions of the imagination. Before submitting the play to Daly he thought he would take it to some friend who knew something about dramatic construction; so he submitted the manuscript to Sinclair McKelway of the Brooklyn Eagle.

All this Twain told me with that characteristic drawl which, had any one perfected it and imitated it on the stage, would have been labeled at once as downright impossible.

When Twain got his play back from his friend there was no comment, just a list of the hundreds of different plays from 400 B. C. to the time he was writing which had had this same original idea of violent happenings that turn out to be merely dreams.

In London many adventures awaited the "Daly's." Drew met Tennyson and Browning, and Irving, and Whistler, and many another celebrity, and was made one himself. And he cites this example of hospitable tact, of a sort:

Now and then we were lured to some outside gathering, where the intent to make a circus out of the Daly company was all too clear. We were invited to a reception at the house of a woman who must be called by the name that Dickens found for all women like her, Mrs. Leo Hunter.

With Mrs. Hunter it was a matter of pride that no one came to her house who was not famous for something. At this reception Mrs. Hunter was very much afraid that I was not meeting everybody, and she introduced me to a very pleasant young man who was standing near us. She told him all about the Daly company and the parts that I played in the various plays. Then thinking that I might get the impression that he was not known for anything in particular and so that I might definitely place him, she said to me: "You may remember his favorite uncle was so frightfully mangled in the underground last year."

The book is very much of a portrait gallery, and in it these old, familiar faces come back to us:

My early impression of Maude Adams, before it was finally decided that she was to be my leading woman in my first play as a star under the management of Charles Frohman, was that she looked too frail. I had been accustomed to play with Ada Rehan, who was so much bigger and stronger. Stronger she was, as was evidenced by the blow on the jaw that as Katherine she gave me in "The Taming of the Shrew." In the scene, in the acting version, where Petruchio says:

Were it the forefoot of an angry bear,
I'd shake it off; but, as it's Kate's, I kiss it.

Katherine gives him a sound, ringing blow. There was a time when it was not considered good art actually to hit a person on the stage instead of making as if to hit; but there was no make-believe about this stage blow. It was indeed real; in fact, it seems to me now as I look back that the blow that Katherine used to give Petruchio might have given the redoubtable Dempsey a jolt.

Small wonder then that Maude Adams in her girlish slightness seemed to me too fragile for a leading woman. As a matter of fact she was never ill and never away from rehearsals in the years she played with me.

It was Mrs. Drew, my wife, who first suggested that Maude Adams become my leading woman. Maude Adams had been on the stage almost from childhood. Her mother was a leading woman in the stock company at the Salt Lake Theatre. The family name was Kiskadee. Maude, herself, had appeared when quite young in Hoyt's play, "A Midnight Bell." After that she left the stage to go to school.

A familiar figure round the New York theatres in those days of the middle 'nineties was Charles Hoyt, the writer of many successful farces. The titles of these invariably began with the article "A"—"A Temperance Town," "A Midnight Bell," "A Contented Woman," "A Stranger in New York." Hoyt was a most amusing person. He came from New Hampshire, and he had an uncompromising Yankee accent. When he died he gave his place in New Hampshire to the Lambs Club in perpetuity, so that actors who had no place else to go might go there and stay.

One of the often-told stories about him was that on the first night that Goodwin was going to play Clyde Fitch's "Nathan Hale," Hoyt had tickets for it, and there landed in on him some friend from New Hampshire. He had to entertain the man in some fashion, and he said he had two tickets for the theatre. "What is it?"

Hoyt told him: "It is the opening of the new play, 'Nathan Hale,' with Nat Goodwin."

The New Hampshire friend said: "I don't want to see Goodwin. I don't like him."

"You don't?" said Hoyt.

"No, I don't. I don't like him. I don't like him as a man; I don't like him as an actor. I don't like him."

"But," Hoyt said, "you will like him in this play."

The other fellow said: "I won't like him."

Hoyt said: "Yes, you will; they hang him in the last act."

Nat Goodwin, whose personality was perhaps not genial to every one, was one of the finest of American comedians. He was a great mimic and his imitations of Jefferson and J. H. Stoddard were most extraordinary. He even looked like Jefferson and Stoddard.

Goodwin got his start as the hind legs of the heifer in the famous production of "Evangeline" in Boston, where his father had been a gambler. Some years afterward Nat came back to Boston—he had made considerable of an impression as an actor and an imitator in the meantime—and a dinner was given him by some club.

In reply to a toast he said he was so glad to receive this kindness from the citizens of the town "where he had dwelt and his father had dealt so long."

It was Nat's idea of humor without any restriction; he could not help saying that, and he would not conceal the fact that his father had been a gambler.

Which somehow reminds your reviewer of another good old Goodwin story. The irrepressible Nat was discussing in a vein of tender reminiscence the personal characteristics of his (successive) wives, when he reached in the series the case of the stately Maxine Elliott, whose classic and somewhat glacial beauty was one of the bright particular ornaments of the American stage. "My second wife," said he, "was a Roman senator."

Something of Drew's world ramblings are noted, and among other incidents is this, having its beginning in Prague, Bohemia, or as it has the poor taste to prefer to be known, Czecho-Slovakia:

I bought a local paper. It was the most awful-looking thing. It was worse than Magyar. It looked as if a drunken compositor had just taken the type and hurled it at the sheet. Arthur Byron, who was in my company in so many plays, was playing in Chicago at that time. I decided since I could not read the paper to send it to him. I marked a certain portion of it and sent it on with a notation on the side that it was a good notice of me.

Byron told me afterwards that he received the paper just as he was coming out of the theatre after long hours of rehearsing. He had been much annoyed by an actor in the company who had been extremely nervous during the rehearsal, as a result of unwisely celebrating the night before. "What's that?" the nervous actor asked.

"You know Drew?" said Byron.

The actor agreed that he did, and Byron handed him the paper, saying: "There's a notice of Drew. He's in Germany now. It's splendid."

The nervous actor took the paper, looked at the mess of meaningless type and with a cry, fled madly.

Altogether, the Drew book is a good thing. Like Drew himself, it is well mannered, debonaire, and not at all solemn. It is well for life that there are such men as John Drew, and for literature that once in a way one of them gives us his impressions of his world.

MY YEARS ON THE STAGE. By John Drew. New York: E. P. Dutton & Co.; $5.

The famous Rembrandt mill in Hagerswoude on the Rhine, in which Rembrandt was born, is about to be torn down. The prospective destruction caused a flurry of protest in Dutch artistic and historical circles, members of which have launched an appeal for the purchase of the mill by the government as a historical monument, to be preserved for future generations in its original state, just as the Rembrandt house in Joedenbreestraat in Amsterdam is maintained as a national treasure.

BANKING AND INVESTMENT NEWS.

San Francisco bank clearings for the week ending November 4, 1922, were $165,000,000; for the corresponding week of last year, $147,700,000; an increase of $17,300,000.

A mortgage company of many years' experience in loaning on real estate in the New York district, which guarantees the mortgages that it sells, recently published a public warning regarding the large number of companies that have recently come to New York and are exploiting the mortgage field upon what it sales of excessive issues of real estate mortgage bonds, bearing high rates of interest. These old-fashioned lenders have done business with caution and success over a long term of years and their experience has taught them that 100 per cent. mortgage loans at high rates of interest spell loss to the investors who purchase them."

There is no question but that lower interest rate mortgages guaranteed by a company of large resources are safer investments than the high interest rate bonds that are making such a strong appeal to investors throughout the country. But there is something that can be said in favor of these high interest rate mortgage bonds when issued by the most conservative houses in that field. In the first place when issued by such houses they are not 100 per cent. mortgages. Furthermore, they carry an amortization feature which provides that a certain part of the mortgage shall be paid off each year out of the earnings from the property. And there are houses in this field that have had experience running back through panics and depressions and yet the holders of their real estate mortgage bonds have never suffered loss.

One of these houses in a recent educational advertisement said: "We believe that a loan of $1,200,000 on a property worth $1,600,000 or a 75 per cent. loan, where the earnings of the buildings assure funds sufficient to pay fixed charges, meet the interest and amortize the principal of the mortgage, is better than a loan of $1,200,000 on a property worth $2,000,000 or a 60 per cent. loan where there are not sufficient earnings and the property must be liquidated to repay the indebtedness. We would not loan $100,000 on property worth $500,000, or a 20 per cent. loan, if the earnings were not sufficient to make the loan self-liquidating."

This gives the two sides of the question as presented by interested parties. For the investor who wants the greatest assurance as to the safety of his investment in the real estate mortgage field, it would undoubtedly be well to heed the warning of this "old-fashioned" mortgage company and stick to guaranteed mortgages. For the investor who desires a higher return on his money and who can afford to take some risk there seem to be houses in this other field whose record entitles their offerings to his consideration. But because of the increased demand for these securities, many new and inexperienced houses have entered the field and it is timely that a warning be issued against them. It is probably too much to expect one of the "old-fashioned mortgage lenders," as this company terms itself, to discriminate among houses operating on this "new basis," but it seems that such discrimination might be exercised by investors.

An investor, however, should not place too much confidence in the statements made by these houses as to the length of their successful operation in the field. That has become one of their pet advertising phrases that does not always mean much. For instance, I recently checked over the loans of a large house in this field which makes considerable point of its record and found that more than half of the real estate mortgage bonds that it has sold was made up of sixteen of its latest and largest issues on not one of which had there yet been any serial maturities to meet, and about one-third of these were on theatres or properties related to the moving-picture industry. It will take a few more years and a period of depression to give the bonds of that house a thorough test. The head of the house, however, is a man well versed in real estate values and of long experience in the real estate field. If the investor is willing to take some of the speculative risks that he has been in the habit of taking in his real estate operations, it may work out satisfactorily, and meanwhile the investor will get a high return on his money.

Just now there is an uncertain factor in regard to real estate mortgage loans because of the high cost of building. If the properties against which the loans are made must come into competition with pre-war built properties of the same class, the time will surely come when their earnings will be reduced. And if real estate values fall from the present high levels, which seems most likely, the equity behind real estate mortgage bonds will suffer and the security for many of them may be inadequate. The real estate mortgage man of experience, of course, realizes all this and should protect his issues against it, provided he wishes to continue in businesses with a good name.

An investor should only buy such bonds from houses that enjoy a good name and have long experience and high reputation in this field. Then the investor should investigate individual issues as to the favorable location of the property, its conservative valuation and earning possibility in relation to the size of the loan and the payments due on it, and should determine whether enough of the loan is to be amortized by these payments to make it safe under any conceivable changes of conditions.

Because this present inflation of real estate values makes the situation regarding these high interest bearing bonds more uncertain than it has been in the past, it would also be well for the investor in selecting bonds of this character to choose from among the earlier maturities. Bonds due within the next two or three years seem much less likely to be affected by changes in real estate values. By dealing only with the best houses and by choosing the earlier maturities the investor reduces his risk and still secures a high rate of interest.

At a time when money rates are high, such as was the case in 1919 and early 1920, the investor should consider long-term bonds only, unless, of course, the funds are to be employed for but a few months and the risk of a fluctuation in values can not be assumed. Conversely, when interest rates are low, short-term bonds and notes should be purchased, says Forbes Magazine. This general rule must be modified to meet certain exceptions, but in the main it can be followed closely by bond buyers.

The underlying principle is that bond prices are governed by the prevailing rates for time loans, account being taken of the trend of the rates. Because capital is mobile it flows to and fro between the investment and commercial loan markets, and bond yields are consequently adjusted automatically to money rates, with allowance for safety and marketability.

Throughout the war period all branches of industry were abnormally active and the demand for capital intense. Credit, being limited, is subject to the law of supply and demand, and its cost increased as the demand grew. Commodity prices are a prime factor also in determining the cost of credit. In-

NEW ISSUE

to Yield

6 1/4%

Tax Exempt

The obligation of an established agricultural community

FREEMAN
SMITH
&
CAMP
Co.

SECOND FLOOR
FIRST NATIONAL BANK BLDG.
Douglas 2121

calls a "new basis," says John K. Barnes in the Century Magazine. The warning is a general one against those houses offering real estate mortgage bonds bearing high rates of interest and not having the resources of the houses pledged as a guarantee back of them. It is a timely warning; yet the many years of successful experience of some of the mortgage houses operating on this "new basis" would seem to justify for their offerings a little better treatment than they received in this wholesale condemnation.

"At recurrent intervals come business

5% Yield on a Government Bond

We offer Dominion of Canada 5's, due May 1, 1952, non-callable until 1942 and payable in U. S. Currency.

Canadian exchange has reached par. Obligations of the Canadian Government are everywhere in high standing and their security is unquestioned.

Call, write or telephone
for investment service!

ANGLO-CALIFORNIA TRUST COMPANY

COMMERCIAL-SAVINGS-TRUST-BOND DEPARTMENT

"The City Wide Bank"

Market & Sansome Streets
San Francisco

MARKET-MCALLISTER
AND JONES STREETS
101 MARKET

MISSION AND 16TH
FILLMORE AND GEAR
THIRD AND 20TH

panics, crises and depressions, failures of business houses, unemployment, severe drops in rent and scaling down of real estate values," says this public warning, and "it is during these periods that holders of excessive real estate bond issues will face loss." The conclusion of this warning was in these words: "To sum up—the old-fashioned mortgage lenders view with apprehension the large

McDONNELL &amp; Co.

And Other Leading Exchanges

633 Market St., at New Montgomery

SAN FRANCISCO

TELEPHONE SUTTER 7676

N. Y. Office, 120 Broadway

L. A. Angeles, 634 So. Spring St.

PRIVATE WIRES

CARSTENS &amp; EARLES, INCORPORATED

GOVERNMENT, MUNICIPAL AND CORPORATION BONDS

ESTABLISHED 1891

Ground Floor

California Commercial Union Building
San Francisco

Telephone Douglas 6050

SEATTLE

LOS ANGELES

SPOKANE

SAN FRANCISCO

To Yield 7.22%

Willow Vista Land &amp; Cattle Company

First Mortgage 7%
Sinking Fund Gold Bonds

Send for circular

BRADFORD KIMBALL & Co.
BONDS
SECOND FLOOR EXCHANGE BUILDING
San Francisco
Sutter 5200

INVESTMENT SECURITIES

Government, Municipal and Corporation Bonds in denominations of $100, $500, and $1000 for the investment of Banks, Trust Funds, and Individual Investors. Inquiries Invited.

HUNTER, DULIN &amp; Co.

THE SECOND FLOOR—
256 MONTGOMERY ST.Los Angeles
Pasadena

San Francisco

Oakland
San Diego

Sixty-five Sutter Street

BONDS

Ask to be placed
on our mailing list
for monthly circular and for data
regarding various bond issues.

STEPHENS &amp; COMPANY

SAN FRANCISCO OAKLAND
LOS ANGELES SAN DIEGO

We offer
a limited number of
7 1/2% OREGON BONDS

This is the current rate for farm mortgage loans in the state of Oregon

Secured by a First Mortgage on ranch property valued at nearly five times amount of bonds issued. Ask for information regarding

Jordan Valley Cattle Co.

Phone Sutter 334

G. E. MILLER &amp; COMPANY

105 Montgomery St. 229 First Nat. Bank Bldg.
SAN FRANCISCO OAKLANDPORTLAND
SEATTLEBONDS
Gov't.
Mun.
Corp.SAN FRANCISCO
LOS ANGELESPrivate Wires
Coast to Coast

E. F. Hutton &amp; Co.

MEMBERS
NEW YORK STOCK EXCHANGE

HUTTON BUILDING

Montgomery and Bush Sts.

HOTEL ST. FRANCIS

DEL MONTE HOTEL

The Oldest Bond House in California

Member of San Francisco
Stock and Bond Exchange

E. H. ROLLINS & SONS
300 Montgomery Street, San Francisco
Telephone Kearny 3807

dustrial activity is based on a demand for commodities and the reason for the unusual activity during the war period was the unusual demand for commodities of all kinds. As the demand for commodities increased their values increased and a constantly expanding volume of credit was needed to finance their production and turnover. Briefly, this was the condition which obtained two and a half years ago and enabled investors to place their funds in high-grade bonds at a return of about 7 per cent.

Subsequently the demand for commodities

BONDS

$850,000

Fifth Street Building

First Mortgage 6% Gold Bonds

(Secured on a 99-Year Leasehold Estate)

Due Serially 1925-47

George H. Burr & Co.

KOHL BUILDING
SAN FRANCISCO

|              |             |           |
|--------------|-------------|-----------|
| NEW YORK     | LOS ANGELES | CLEVELAND |
| BOSTON       | ATLANTA     | DETROIT   |
| PHILADELPHIA | CHICAGO     | PITTSBURG |
| SCRANTON     | ST. LOUIS   | SEATTLE   |

"A National Yet Personal Service"

declined, prices were deflated and industry slowed down. The result was a sharp contraction in the volume of credit required to carry on business, and interest rates eased correspondingly. Accompanying the decline in rates was a decline in bond yields until now a return of 5 per cent. for a high-grade issue is rare.

The low point in both production and commodity prices has been passed and it seems probable that no further decline in interest rates can be looked for. Of course, the potential supply of credit expanded enormously during and since the war and is still expanding so that business would have to reach boom proportions and commodity prices become considerably inflated before any actual scarcity was seen.

Those who made their bond commitments on a high-yield basis have no cause for alarm and will continue to receive their large return on the original investment until maturity. Others less fortunate having nothing in particular to gain in buying long-term bonds at present prices and, as a matter of fact, would do well to consider short-term bonds. If an unexpected strain in the money market should develop, bonds of an early maturity would not reflect it materially and a switch to advantage could then be made to the issues having a longer time to run. A group of short-term bonds is suggested here, the individual issues being well diversified and of varying grades.

The American Telephone and Telegraph Company has established such a dependable earning power that it can now do a large part of its new financing through the sale of capital stock instead of by the sale of bonds and notes. The company has just recently sold $115,000,000 of new stock to shareholders and retired $35,000,000 of notes out of the proceeds, using the remainder for development purposes. The new capital acquired in this manner is put to work earning, the funded debt having first claim to the income which it develops. The result is a gradually increasing margin of safety for the bonds. The company has never failed to earn its full interest charges by less than three and three-fourths times over in any one year for a decade or longer.

The American Tobacco Company has a comparatively small funded debt and interest charges consequently are not onerous. The company borrowed $10,000,000 in 1918 which it must pay on November 1, 1923. In 1921 fixed charges were earned 11.33 times and earnings for last year equaled twice the entire funded debt. Net working capital at the close of last year amounted to almost nine times the total amount of bonds outstanding.

Anaconda Copper has been doing little more than mark time for over a year and in 1921 reported an operating deficit. This was simply the result of temporary conditions obtaining in the copper industry and in no wise jeopardizes the senior obligations of the company. Net current assets are sufficient to cover the entire funded indebtedness, to say nothing of fixed assets which are equivalent to about five times the outstanding amount of bonds. Under normal conditions interest is protected by a wide margin of safety.

Baltimore & Ohio during 1922 has shown a remarkable recovery in earning power, and the investment rating of its bonds is rapidly improving. Bonded debt is heavy, but well covered by property valuation. There will be a great deal of refunding to do in 1925 and the company will make every effort to improve its financial condition meanwhile. In order for B. & O. bonds to retain their rating as legal investment in New York State the common stock must pay a dividend by March, 1923, but the company is working into a position where earning power will permit this.

The financial structure of Canadian Pacific Railway is well balanced, the capitalization being almost equally divided between bonds and stock. For a number of years this road has earned its fixed charges more than four times over annually, and as the railroad situation in Canada is improving as well as in the United States, even better results should be obtained in the future.

National Cloak & Suit Company was caught with a high-priced inventory on hand at the time deflation set in, and the losses incurred necessitated borrowing $5,000,000, in September, 1920, for a period of ten years. The new financing gave the company the largest amount of working capital it ever had and placed it in a sound condition. Normally, fixed charges should be earned from three to five times over annually. Net current assets at the close of 1921 exceeded the funded debt.

Sears, Roebuck & Co. since its president came to its rescue has scored a remarkable recovery. The company borrowed $50,000,000 in 1920, and subsequently reduced its inventory account about $50,000,000. All but $17,000,000 of the funds borrowed have been repaid. Buying power has been recovered by its customers and the normal margin of profit is now possible on sales.

The Freeman, Smith & Camp Company are offering $57,000 Florence, Arizona, 6 per cent. municipal gold bonds, due August 1, 1952, and free from Federal taxes.

Florence, the county seat of Pinal County, is one of the oldest towns in Arizona. It is situated in a healthful location, and lies in a valley with mountains in the distance in every direction. Because of its altitude Florence is not subject to the excessive heat that prevails in some parts of Arizona. Lying to the southwest of Florence extends a large fertile agricultural valley, containing thousands of acres of level, rich soil which produces large crops of grain and semi-tropical products. A source of water is the Gila River, which flows past Florence. The United States Reclamation Service constructed a diversion dam in the Gila River about eight miles above Florence, diverting the water for irrigation of the whole valley. This diversion dam is the first step toward the permanent irrigation system to be installed by the government.

According to figures compiled by the American Electric Railway Association, net earnings of the electric railway industry for 1921 were not only greater than in any previous year, but they exceeded fixed charges by a greater percentage than in any other year with the exception of 1922.

Operating ratio of eighty-one companies was 69.5 per cent. for April, 1922, a decline of 13.5 per cent. of the July, 1920, figure, which was 79.6 per cent. The annual average operating ratio of the industry rose to a peak of 74.8 per cent. for 1920 and then declined to 72.2 per cent. for 1921.

A continuously lessening proportion of the gross earnings is being absorbed by operating expenses and the net earnings remaining are increasing more rapidly than are the fixed charges. Increase in gross earnings, due to the gradual revival of business activity, should add materially to the margin of safety of net earnings over fixed charges.

Other fundamental reasons for the improving conditions of street railways include reduction of material costs, reduction of labor costs, marked economy of operation and im-

Stocks • Bonds Cotton • Grain Commodities

STRASSBURGER & COMPANY

133 Montgomery Street
San Francisco
TELEPHONE DOUGLAS 2220

Members
San Francisco Stock &
Bond Exchange and
Chicago Board of Trade

Private Wires to New York & other leading
Eastern Financial and Commercial Centers

provement in public relations. These improving conditions impart particular interest to the following discussion of the reorganization of San Francisco-Oakland Terminal Railways, the estimated earning power of the New Operating Company and ultimate potential value of old and new securities, based on authoritative figures.

Reorganization will scale down capitalization from $48,332,000 to $28,239,785, reducing

LOGAN & BRYAN

STOCK, BOND, COTTON, COFFEE,
SUGAR AND GRAIN BROKERS

DIRECT PRIVATE WIRES

Pacific to Atlantic—U. S. and Canada

MEMBERS:

NEW YORK STOCK EXCHANGE
BOSTON STOCK EXCHANGE
CHICAGO STOCK EXCHANGE
NEW YORK COTTON EXCHANGE
NEW YORK COFFEE EXCHANGE
NEW YORK PRODUCE EXCHANGE
NEW ORLEANS COTTON EXCHANGE
PITTSBURG STOCK EXCHANGE
CHICAGO BOARD OF TRADE
MINNEAPOLIS CHAMBER OF COMMERCE
WINNIPEG GRAIN EXCHANGE
ST. LOUIS MERCHANTS EXCHANGE
SALT LAKE CITY STOCK EXCHANGE
LOS ANGELES STOCK EXCHANGE
PHILADELPHIA BOURSE
MONTREAL BOARD OF TRADE

SAN FRANCISCO BRANCH OFFICES AT 401 Montgomery Street

and
Merchants Exchange Bldg.

Telephone Garfield 3000

R. C. JENKINS, C. S. LAWRENCE,
San Francisco Managers

funded debt from $20,157,000 to $14,361,385. Behind the $28,239,785 of securities, including bonds, notes, preferred and common stock, there is actual physical value of $37,938,000, or more than two and a half times the par value of the funded debt and indicating an unusually large equity for all three classes of stock.—William Cavalier & Co., Investment Securities.

COUNCIL, MOLLER & Co.

INCORPORATED

announce the removal of their offices to

Third Floor
First National Bank Building
One Montgomery Street
Telephone Garfield 2290

You are cordially invited to enjoy the increased facilities and privacy of our new location

November 1, 1922
San Francisco

Dependable Advice

FOR 35 years this company has been advisor to many bond buyers in California. Our recommendations are based on the needs of the investor, and our long experience in judging securities.

We will be glad to assist you, without obligation on your part, in the planning of your investments.

WM. R. STAATS CO.

Established 1887

Alexander Bldg., Montgomery St., cor. of Bush
SAN FRANCISCO
Telephone Kearny 301

LOS ANGELES SAN DIEGO PASADENA

INVESTMENT SECURITIES

COMMERCIAL PAPER
AND ACCEPTANCES

GOVERNMENT
MUNICIPAL
AND CORPORATION
BONDS

BOND & GOODWIN & TUCKER
AMERICAN NATIONAL BANK BUILDING
SAN FRANCISCO
LOS ANGELES SEATTLE PORTLAND

BOOKS ON THE TABLE.

Most of us have an inborn feeling that to be materialistic is to be ignoble: most of us are materialists. Meanwhile, the novelists, who are the most theoretic and idyllic of us all, and yet strangely enough represent the dead level of humanity pretty well, from H. B. Wright to H. G. Wells, have an innate idea that fiction should, nay, must be constructive and "uplifting." Of course one can paint life in its horrid and most lurid colors, and one frequently does, but the moral must always be there—such a moral, for example, as the one refuted by "The Room," that having made one's bed one must lie on it. Or any of the other thousand and one platitudes that have become almost meaningless till some poor devil of a storyteller, trailing through the dictionary of platitudes, lights on one rather than another and hurls it at us with greater or less force according to his powers or his own conviction. That is, whether one likes it or not, the formula for most novels. It is as intrepid purveyor of fiction indeed who dares fly in the face of the familiar morality of the golden rule or its corollary that if one does right one is rewarded, and most surely if the opposite is one's perverse course one is punished surely and adequately before the last chapter. True, the Russians and some other continentals have gotten away from the great white man's tradition of platitude. As we are the most sentimental of all races, we are also the most self-gullible. But those continentals are generally labeled decadent, and though the application of the label varies with one's viewpoint, there is no denying that most of them are despondent and many are morbid, according to any one's moral slant. What is really needed is a truth-telling scribe who does not mind admitting that even nice people of the admirable type one associates with heroes and heroines are selfish materialists, more concerned with creature comforts than with politics or ethics. Of course Shaw and James have done it, but the virus is spreading very, very slowly to the popular novelist, the writer every one reads instead of him of the eclectic clique. One of the first, and she should be given all the honors awarded any pioneer in dangerous territory is G. B. Stern, whose "The Room" has just been published by Mr. Knopf. "The Room" suffers, but in a very attenuated degree, from a malady rife among modern novels, of starting better than it ends. This is so common a failing it is hardly worth mentioning except that one expected "The Room" to go on being as different from most fiction and as like life to the bitter end. But Miss Stern was not quite proof against the idealism that besets all writers fatally—an ideal that they must wind up symbolically, or at any rate aesthetically, at all costs. It would never do to finish in the homely forthright fashion in which they started. One gets bitten by "form" and "composition" long before the end and forces one's material out of reality into the formula. But that prevalent weakness aside, and in fairness one must say the case of "The Room" is not so virulent as most. Miss Stern's latest novel is remarkable for its sincerity, virility, and what is most notable of all in a woman's novel, its nonchalance. It has a hardy indifference to the interests of the sex and to the sex in general. We would not affront Miss Stern by saying it might have been the work of a man, for no male could have given us Ursula. But "The Room" indubitably represents the great new phenomenon, the artistic product of a normal woman, neither a masculine George Eliot, a spinster Jane Austen, nor the violent suffragist of today.

Notes of Books and Authors

Miss Clemence Dane's "A Bill of Divorcement" has been produced in a Czech version at Prague.

In the introduction to his new book of cartoons Mr. Max Beerbohm describes Byron, Disraeli, and Rossetti as the three most interesting men of the nineteenth century.

Paul H. De Kruif, whose book, "Our Medicine Men," is just out and is said to be a terrific lashing of the medical profession for the pretensions, the mystification, the heartless exploiting of human ignorance that he sees in many phases of it, has another book already on the way still further excoriating the professional hides of the M. D.s. It, too, will be published by the Century Company.

An American edition of J. K. Huysmans' "The Cathedral" is being published by E. P. Dutton & Co., following their edition of his "En Route," which they brought out a few years ago. In "The Cathedral" Durtal, the hero of "En Route," continues his way towards righteousness in the shelter of the Catholic church and, turning his thoughts toward mysticism and the cloister, takes up his abode at Chartres, where he studies and endeavors to understand the great cathedral and the significance of its architecture, statuary, and stained glass as exponents of mediæval theology.

"Jurgen," James Branch Cabell's famous and ill-fated romance, is soon to become accessible to readers of French and German. A French translation by Raoul de Roussy de Sales has just been completed and will shortly appear in France as one of the Editions de la Sirene. It will be followed by a French translation of Mr. Cabell's volume of essays, "Beyond Life," and eventually by a complete set of his novels and tales. The German translation, which will appear in the spring of 1923 under the imprint of Georg Müller Verlag, is the work of Dr. Franz Blei, who is also undertaking the German translation of Mr. Cabell's novel, "The Cream of the Jest," for the same publishers.

One of the mysteries, in a small way, of modern literature is what became of that powerful American writer, Ambrose Bierce, remarks John O'London's Weekly. He wrote a great deal in America, and, although he never became a popular author, his work was highly admired. He came to England, lived here for some time, and also wrote here, mostly under the nom de guerre of "Dod Grile," which, indeed, is a name covering many of his writings. Where he went in later years the records do not seem to tell us, but perhaps we shall have light, for a new collected edition of his works is being talked about, and it is to be hoped that it will come along. He has much of the force and freshness of Kipling, perhaps without Kipling's elegance, and a new issue of his writings will be sure to find a much wider welcome in England today than he himself when he was here in the flesh and active with his pen.

The educational department of Doubleday, Page & Co. announces that Le Petit Journal will be issued twice each month during the calendar year. Previously the paper has appeared twice a month from October through May only. Le Petit Journal was published originally to supply school and college classes with example of current newspaper and magazine French; but it has developed so decidedly into a digest of French affairs that there has been a regular demand for it from readers who desire, not only to keep up their knowledge of French, but who, at the same time, are anxious to keep in touch with current French life.

The Harpers have received a large order from Selfridge's in London for the new Frank Schoonover edition in color of "Ivanhoe." This is significant because London is the home of the elaborately-made colored book and America has been importing this type of book. Selfridge's order turns the tables. "Ivanhoe" is the beginning of a new series to be illustrated by Frank Schoonover, because of the great popularity of his work with the Louis Rhead edition of juveniles. There are ten full illustrations in color, besides the other illustrations and decorations. Mr. Schoonover was perhaps the most gifted pupil of Howard Pyle, who so loved the Middle Ages.

It is a good many years since an Englishwoman who hid her identity under the pen-name of Michael Fairless published "The Road Mender," a little volume that has ever since been a source of deep enjoyment to book lovers wherever the English language is read. It is now twenty years since she died and E. P. Dutton & Co., in recognition of the anniversary, announce the publication shortly of a new and beautiful edition of a book that is beloved by hundreds of thousands of readers. It will have as illustrations a score of mounted photographs, many of them picturing the localities mentioned in the book.

The recent death of Enos A. Mills will come as a great loss to countless readers of his outdoor books. He was born in Kansas City in 1870, but went to the Rocky Mountains early in life and established himself in a cabin at the foot of Long's Peak. From there he explored the mountains alone, on foot and without firearms. Last winter he lectured through the country against the government's granting exclusive contracts to transportation companies. It was he who did more to forward the creation of Rocky Mountain Park than any other one person, and he wrote extensively for the protection and development of national parks. Among his books, "Your National Parks," "The Story of a Thousand-Year Pine," "Wild Life of the Rockies," "The Spell of the Rockies" are but a few of the best known.

Bonds for Investment

MUNICIPALS IRRIGATION DISTRICTS CORPORATIONS

Specialists in Safety

Anglo London Paris Company
One Sansome Street San Francisco
Phone Kearny 5600

The French American Bank

OF SAN FRANCISCO

108 SUTTER STREET

Commercial--Checking--Savings

Resources Over $16,000,000

A General Banking Business Transacted

Commercial and Personal Checking
Accounts Solicited

Savings Accounts receive interest at the rate of 4 per cent. per annum

SAFE DEPOSIT BOXES $3.50

OFFICERS

Leon Bocqueraz ..... President
J. M. Dupas ..... Vice-President
A. Bergerot ..... Vice-President
W. F. Duffy ..... Vice-Pres. and Cashier
A. Bousquet ..... Secretary
J. T. Trillary ..... Asst. Cashier
Chas. L. Ebner, Jr. .... Asst. Cashier

Member Federal Reserve System and
Associated Savings Banks of San Francisco
The San Francisco Savings and Loan Society
(THE SAN FRANCISCO BANK)

SAVINGS COMMERCIAL

526 California St., San Francisco, Cal.

MISSION BRANCH ..... Mission and 21st Streets
PARK-PRESIDIO DISTRICT BRANCH ..... Clement and 7th Ave.
HAIGHT STREET BRANCH ..... Haight and Belvedere Streets
June 30th, 1922

Assets ..... $76,170,177.18
Deposits ..... 72,470,177.18
Capital Actually Paid Up ..... 1,000,000.00
Reserve and Contingent Funds ..... 2,700,000.00
Employees' Pension Fund ..... 385,984.61

A dividend to depositors of FOUR AND ONE QUARTER (4 1/4) per cent. per annum was declared for the six months ending June 30th 1922.

New Crowell Books

The Captive Herd

By G. MURRAY ATKIN, author of
"The New World." 320 pages,
12mo. Net $1.75, postage extra.

A novel of rare charm and power.

Our Foreign-Born Citizens

What They Have Done for America

By ANNIE E. S. BEARD. Illustrated with portraits. 300 pages, 8vo. Net
$2.00, postage extra.

Biographies of aliens who have helped make America great.

Justifiable Individualism

By FRANK WILSON BLACKMAR, Professor of Sociology in the University of Kansas. 140 pages, 12mo. Net
$1.00, postage extra.

Are we depending too much on group activity for reform and progress?

Crime: Its Cause and Treatment

By CLARENCE DARROW. 300 pages,
8vo. Net $2.50, postage extra.

Is "crime" the natural result of heredity and environment instead of moral delinquency?

Society and Its Problems

By GROVE SAMUEL DOW, Professor of Sociology in the University of Denver. 608 pages, 8vo. Net $2.75,
postage extra.

An introduction to the principles of so-ciology.

Poems of Heroism in American Life

Edited by JOHN R. HOWARD. 372 pages, 12mo. Cloth, gilt top. Net
$1.75, postage extra.

A moving picture of American history,
culled from famous poets.

Self-Discove

By ORISON SWETT MARDEN. 96 pages,
12mo. Net 90c, postage extra.

Why remain a dwarf?

Four and Twenty Minds

By GIOVANNI PAPINI. Translated from the Italian by Ernest H. Wilkins, Professor of Romance Languages, University of Chicago. Portrait, 330 pages, 8vo. Net $2.50,
postage extra.

Brilliant biographical and critical essays by Italy's foremost critic.

Poe's Poems

Thin Paper Edition, edited by JAMES
A. HARRISON, R. A. STEWART, and
CHARLES W. KENT. 350 pages, 12mo.
Cloth, gilt top, net $1.75. Limp leather. Net $2.75, postage extra.

Contains also Poe's own discussions of the nature of poetry.

The New Latin America

By J. WARSHAW, Ph.D., Professor in the University of Nebraska. With an introduction by James E. LeRossignol, LL.D. Illustrations and colored maps. 435 pages, 8vo. Net $3.00,
postage extra.

A comprehensive account of modern commercial, social, and cultural development. Will dispel erroneous ideas.

An Introduction to the Study of Labor Problems

By GORDON S. WATKINS, Associate Professor of Economics, University of Illinois. 650 pages, 8vo. Net $3.00,
postage extra.

During the last decade unprecedented changes have occurred in the principles and policies of labor management, the aims and methods of organized labor, and the purposes and practices of employers' associations. These changes, together with their historical background and their social and economic significance, are described and analyzed in this book.

Everyday Uses of English

By MAURICE H. WESEEN, Assistant Professor of English, University of Nebraska. 464 pages, 8vo. Net $2.00,
postage extra.

Valuable in the office as well as the classroom.

Thomas Y. Crowell Company, Publishers, New York

REVIEWS AND NOTICES.

Clair de Lune.

Studies of the artistic temperament abound in legions, and for the most part in superfluous ones. So that, though one hails as a rare avis the book that deals with untalented normal humanity, the phenomenon of a fresh treatment of a muse-inflicted personality, which does not lean at all on its numerous colleagues for its traditions of the over-worked artistic genius, is even more of a find. Such a book is Anthony Pryde's "Clair de Lune." One wishes there was a synonym for the trite term that is the subject of this review and of Mr. Pryde's book, though to do the latter justice, this study of a musician's psychology is innocent of the term. Still, since there is no alternative—the hackneyed temperament is usually interpreted as amorous. Anthony Pryde paints it otherwise, and hence the fresh attraction of his book.

But it would be unfair both to Mr. Pryde and the possible readers of "Clair de Lune" to represent it as a psychological study, per se, however novel. Readers of Anthony Pryde's previous work know that he always has a rattling, dramatic story in addition to a message, however subtle. That is the secret of his popularity. He who runs may read, but there is lots to afford the runner pause and food for pondering. In addition, Mr. Pryde always writes well, and his delineation—though his characters have the family resemblance of well-bred English good form—is delicately and surely done. On the whole, "Clair de Lune" marks an advance in the serious quality of his work.

CLAIR DE LUNE. By Anthony Pryde. New York: Dodd, Mead & Co.; $2.

The Crock of Gold.

The Macmillans have just issued a new edition of James Stephens' classic, "The Crock of Gold," with appropriate cartoons in green and orange by Wilfred Jones. It is a relief to see Celtic fancy humorously instead of mystically illustrated, just for a change. Any one so unfortunate as to be unacquainted with Mr. Stephens' indefatigable though poetic nonsense, and of this volume of it in particular, should seize the present opportunity to meet the two philosophers of the pine wood, called Coilla Doraca, the Grey Woman of Dun Gortin, the Thin Woman of Inis Magrath, and their numerous respective clients—not to mention all the fairy clans of Erin and the great god, Pan himself.

THE CROCK OF GOLD. By James Stephens. New York: The Macmillan Company; $2.50.

Modern English Essays.

An ideal students' library of essays has just been brought out by Messrs. Dutton & Co. under the title, "Modern English Essays: 1870-1922," in five neat pocket-size volumes. Ernest Rhys, expert among anthology editors, is responsible for the selection and has redemonstrated his catholic range. Mr. Rhys explains his plan to be an attempt to put into a plain sequence the course of the English essay in the past half-century. The familiar Oxford group, Pattison, Harrison, Pater, Swinburne and the others, are evoked in book one, and before the fifth, dedicated to such contemporaries as Galsworthy, Milne, Massingham, Noyes and eighteen others (almost all of whom except the late lamented William Hudson are alive), has been reached, the reader has brushed into practically every writing man of this generation and the last one.

MODERN ENGLISH ESSAYS. Edited by Ernest Rhys. New York: E. P. Dutton & Co.

The Divine Right of Democracy.

"The Divine Right of Democracy" or "The People's Right to Rule," a study in citizenship, to give it the benefit of its two subtitles, is a little book by Clarence True Wilson, written chiefly to prove the thesis that our Constitution and government are founded on the Mosaic rule of Israel rather than a study of the early democratic tendencies of Egypt, Babylon, Greece and Rome, as most authorities rightly or wrongly claim. These latter, as Mr. Wilson truly contends, were not democracies at all. However, his statement that the founders of our country knew little of those ancient germs of government does scanty justice to the immense legal scholarship of Alexander Hamilton. For the author of "The Federalist" had not a little to do with the structure and interpretation of our Constitution.

THE DIVINE RIGHT OF DEMOCRACY. By Clarence True Wilson. New York: The Abingdon Press.

The Comedies of Menander.

What with Professor Capp's edition of several of the plays and Professor Allinson's translation in the justly-famed Loeb series, Menander has fared well in America. Praised by the ancients, Menander, though still in pieces, is now for all of us at least a partly open book. Being a Greek, he "wrote well"—with urbanity and ease that is at once apparent whether in Greek or in English. His is "an amenity that is like Elysian speech, equable and ever gracious." True, many have found his plots lacking in originality, his characters monotonous—the types of his imitator and translator, Terence—rather than creations comparable, say, to his mighty forerunner, Aristophanes, who often took his characters from life.

Menander wrote new comedy as opposed to Aristophanes' old: a comedy of manners as contrasted with a comedy of personal and political satire. This new comedy, says Professor Allinson, "no longer offers the lyric beauty, the rapier wit—or, as we know it in Menander at least—the naked licenes and the daring personal or political satire of Aristophanes. It does not, indeed, always nor only seek to provoke laughter, but is the scenic representation of human life: the pathetic, the serious, the gay, the amusing, the commonplace."

"Even this little peep into a scene of the Menander comedy helps me to conceive his method of unfolding and run of the dialogue," wrote George Meredith, greatest of moderns for his theory and practice of comedy, to a friend who had sent him an English text of the Papyrus Menander. Through Mr. Allinson's translation, by far the most complete in English, Meredith's pleasure can be extended to all lovers of comedy.

Fragments of Menander were known prior to 1905, but in that year the Cairo Papyrus discovery afforded the modern world portions of five comedies and some minor fragments.

MENANDER. Translated for the Loeb Library by Francis G. Allinson. New York: G. P. Putnam's Sons; $2.25.

New Books Received.

THE BARCAROLE OF JAMES SMITH AND OTHER POEMS. By Herbert S. Gorman. New York: G. P. Putnam's Sons; $1.75.

THE GLORY OF ENGLISH PROSE. By Stephen Coleridge. New York: G. P. Putnam's Sons; $2. Critical appreciations in the form of letters.

THE ESSENTIALS OF AMERICAN GOVERNMENT. By Francis Newton Thorpe. New York: G. P. Putnam's Sons; $1.75.

By the author of "The Constitutional History of the United States."

LEADERSHIP AND PROGRESS. By Alfred H. Lloyd. Boston: The Stratford Company; $2.

A study in personal leadership.

THE CHARM OF THE MIDDLE KINGDOM. By James Reid Marsh. Boston: Little, Brown & Co.; $3.

Intimate glimpses of the East.

MY AIN LADDIE. By David Dorley. Boston: The Stratford Company; $1.75.

A novel.

SKALALATOOT STORIES. Boston: The Stratford Company; $1.25.

A collection of Indian myths.

THE PAPER MONEYS OF EUROPE. By Francis W. Hirst. Boston: Houghton Mifflin Company; 75 cents.

THE MIRACLE. By E. Temple Thurston. New York: D. Appleton & Co.; $2.

A novel of the west coast of Ireland.

GARDEN COLOR. Spring, Summer, Autumn, Winter, by Mrs. C. W. Earle, E. V. E., Rose Kingsley

The White House

Invites You to Browse Around in Our

BOOK SECTION

Books hold the secret of hours and hours of absorbing pleasure. Make yourself at home in THE WHITE HOUSE Book Section. Here are the best authors of the day—all the golden thoughts of the world's greatest poets—school books—practical and helpful books for every age.

We carry the largest and most complete stock of Books west of Chicago. Any book not in stock we will gladly order it for you.

25 BOOKS FOR CHILDREN

These books were selected at a recent conference of the American Library Association and the National Educational Association. They are listed here in the order of their popularity. In the experience of teachers these 25 books are the children's favorites in juvenile literature. How many of them have you in your home?

|   |  |
|---|--|
| Little Women—Alcott. Illus. by Jessie Smith. Special.....         | $1.50   |
| Illus. uniform ed., $2.50  |  |
| Alice in Wonderland and Through the Looking Glass—Carroll.....    | $1.50, $1.75, $2.00, $3.50                 |
| Tom Sawyer—Mark Twain.....  | $2.25, $2.50                                 |
| Robinson Crusoe—Defoe.....  | .50c, $1.50, $1.75, $3.00                   |
| Treasure Island—Robert Louis Stevenson.....                       | $1.00, $1.50, $2.00, $3.50                 |
| Boys' Life of Lincoln—Nicolay.....                                | $1.75   |
| Jungle Book—Rudyard Kipling.....                                  | Cloth, $1.90; Leather, $2.25                 |
| Fairy Tales—Andersen.....   | $1.50, $1.75, $2.00, $3.00                 |
| Aesop's Fables.....   | $1.50, $2.00, $7.50                         |
| Robin Hood.....   | $1.25, $1.50, $1.75, $3.50                 |
| Child's Garden of Verses—Robert Louis Stevenson.....              | .50c, 75c, $1.00, $1.50, $3.50              |
| Tales of Shakespeare—Mary and Charles Lamb.....                   | .50c, $1.50, $1.75, $2.50, $5.00           |
| Arabian Nights.....   | $1.50, $1.75, $2.00, $2.50, $3.50         |
| Boys' King Arthur.....  | $1.25, $1.50, $3.50                         |
| Story of Mankind—Van Loon.....                                    | $5.00   |
| Rebecca of Sunnybrook Farm—Wiggin.....                            | .75c   |
| Home Book of Verse for Young Folks—Stevenson.....                 | $2.75   |
| Christmas Carol—Dickens.....                                      | $1.25, $1.50                                 |
| Rip Van Winkle and Legend of Sleepy Hollow—Washington Irving..... | $2.50   |
| Mother Goose.....   | $1.00, $1.25, $1.75, $2.00, $3.50, $5.00 |
| Hans Brinker.....   | $1.25, $1.50, $3.50                         |
| Boys' Life of Roosevelt—Hagedorn.....                             | $1.75   |
| Wonder Book for Boys and Girls—Hawthorne.....                     | $1.50, $2.00, $3.50                         |
| Wild Animals I Have Known—Thompson Seton.....                     | $1.00, $2.50                                 |
| Heidi—Spyri.....  | .75c, $1.50, $1.75, $2.00, $3.00, $6.00   |

The White House stock is so large and varied that we can quote these favorite titles at the wide range of prices herein listed.

Book Section, Main Floor.

Phone Kearny 5000

Raphael Wall & Co. Inc.

IT'S THE WATER.

Prepared with Glacier Water from Shasta Springs

AT ALL DEALERS

SHASTA WATER COMPANY

and the Hon. Vicary Gibbs, respectively. New York: E. P. Dutton & Co.; $6.

Colored sketches and notes by Margaret Waterfield.

SADDLE SONGS. By H. H. Knibbs. Boston: Houghton Mifflin Company; $1.50.

And other verse.

WISE MEN FROM THE EAST AND FROM THE WEST. By Abraham Mitrie Ribbany. Boston: Houghton Mifflin Company; $2.50.

An interpretation of the East to the West.

THE HEART OF LITTLE SHIKHARA. By Edison Marshall. Boston: Little, Brown & Co.; $1.90.

Stories of the Northwest.

ENRICO CARUSO. By Pierre V. R. Key in collaboration with Bruno Zirato. Boston: Little, Brown & Co.; $5.

A biography.

OUR REPUBLIC. By S. E. Forman. New York: The Century Company; $5.

A brief history of the American people.

All Books that are reviewed in the Argonaut can be obtained at
Robertson's
222 STOCKTON ST.
Union Square San Francisco

THE HOLMES BOOK CO.

707 Market St. 152 Kearny St. 22 Third St.
Largest variety of new and second-hand books in the city. A visit to our stores will convince you of the truth of this assertion. We buy libraries or single books for cash. See us before selling. Phone—Douglas 3283.
SAN FRANCISCO, CAL.

IF YOU ARE A REAL BOOK-LOVER

Spend a pleasant hour in the real "Old Book Shop" at 2 TILLMAN PLACE, OFF GRANT AVENUE—below Sutter.

Rare Old Books Bought, Sold and Hunted For by GEORGE HARGENS (formerly of the White House)

BOOKS AT PAUL ELDER'S
239 POST ST., SAN FRANCISCO

NEWBEGIN'S BOOKSTORE

358 POST STREET SAN FRANCISCO
Opposite Union Square

A Shop known for its courteous service, and a pleasant place to browse.

Information on books, authors and editions gladly given. Books bought and sold. Buyer will call.
Telephone Douglas 2810

JOHN HOWELL
IMPORTER BOOKS PUBLISHER
RARE BOOKS and FIRST EDITIONS
Libraries Bought and Sold
328 Post Street Union Square
Sutter 3268
SAN FRANCISCO

THE SEQUOIA LITTLE THEATRE.

This modest but apparently healthy young effort in the line of drama has just begun its winter season. Under the directorship of Miss Ruth Brenner the Sequoia Little Theatre has continued to work along the lines originally initiated, the opening programme on the evening of November 4th being indicative of the selected policy. One-act plays by famous playwrights, and an occasional try-out of plays by local people are part of this policy, the rest of it including the extending of encouragement and an opportunity to act in public to talented amateurs.

Miss Brenner gave a British flavor to the opening programme by giving three plays of British authorship, the first, by Lord Dunsany, being "The Glittering Gate," which Arthur Maitland presented during his first year in San Francisco.

It has been said of Lord Dunsany that he created his own mythology. Indeed in "The Gods of Pegana" this assertion is most strangely, strikingly, weirdly verified. He is a poet whose muse sees the walls of life stretching far away to the infinite; so far that there is a certain impersonality to his human figures, which are generally tiny atoms wrestling with cosmic forces.

So it is in "The Glittering Gate," one of the least comprehensible of Dunsany's plays because we can flounder between several interpretations. One, however, is quite clear; and that is that sentimental criminals recalling memories of their mother and sweetheart can not reach heaven by jimmying their way into it, as was attempted by the guilelessly criminal Bill. Whether or not Dunsany would allow us to vision a heaven beyond for better men we do not gather. But in "The Glittering Gate," while he creates a certain sympathy for the two child-like burglars with their simple, natural belief in their rights to heaven compared with other men, he gives us the surprise that is invariable in his brief plays. Slowly, solemnly, the gates slide apart, after the dramatic suspense attending the event.

And heaven is a void. Dramatically it is something of an anti-climax; and yet the element of poetic beauty, of awe, of a vast, invisible fate—one of Dunsany's created gods—attending the pigny efforts of humans to escape annihilation is powerfully indicated in "The Glittering Gate."

The two actors, Jack Miles Lusher and Albert Vince, did well with their rôles of the trusting burglar who had been shot and the cynical one who had been hanged, their character differentiation being notably good. Probably of the three plays on the programme this was the least enjoyed, and yet the one that will leave the deepest impression. There could not but be a groping attitude, the beer bottles, with their indication of materialistic appetite, and the jimmy typifying a forcing of one's way into an undeserved paradise, being puzzling in their symbolism. But the idea of a lonely half-way house between earth and heaven somewhere in the starlit void about us is conveyed with the attendant elements of the mystery and vastness of the infinite, while the malignant laughter suggests the cruelty of an invisible, relentless force that creates and destroys. For one recognizes in this piece the workings and the creation of an unusual intellect; one that can, in a prosaic age, invoke a sense of the terror of the unknown.

"The Sun," by John Galsworthy, was also presented to San Francisco audiences by Arthur Maitland. It is a brief sketch of a soldier returned from the war to find his sweetheart untrue to him. But so determined is he to rejoice in the sun of peace, and joy, and the soothing calm of the usual that he refuses to abate the laughter and cheer with which he faces restored life. Edna Oliver, Harold Myers, and Ronald Ogilvie represented the three characters with due heed to their prevailing characteristics. Mr. Ogilvie, however, being more at ease in his representation, and giving it more than a touch of the finish of the professional.

The third piece, which is by George Bernard Shaw, is "Annajanska, the Bolshevik Empress." It begins well, showing the assertiveness of the military aristocrat whose self-importance is kept alive by the kissing of royal hands. General Strammfest, in a long tirade—as the French put it—voices the feelings of the class that is at present rather on the down grade in Europe, the class that was given to placing its varnished boots on submissively unresisting necks, while kowtowing to imperial personages.

Max Newman, both in appearance and acting, carried out the author's conception, Mark Selig playing a good second as the lieutenant, while Irene Jules-Tipp assumed the snappy rôle of Annajanska, daughter of the General's Grand Panjandrum.

The lady was brisk and vigorous in indicating the royal high temper, twentieth-century independence, and a delight in daring and doing of the fair sprig of royalty whose defection from the ranks of the most high gave the reactionary general such a severe pain in his royalistic sympathies. Miss Jules-Tipp was rather lacking in vocal power for her rôle, but otherwise rendered it with credit.

The piece shows some falling off in the Shavian wit, but Shaw is constitutionally unable to write a humorless piece. So there is humor in it, and, of course, the voice of Shaw, as ever, is heard through the lips of his characters, giving utterance to the always racy opinions of G. B. S.

An almost capacity house in the fair-sized auditorium of the Sequoia Theatre proved a growing interest in the plans and purposes of the organization. The audience was markedly cordial, not only in its reception of the dramatic performance, but also of the musical numbers, which had been selected to accord with the British flavor suggested by the authorship of the pieces.

Miss Brenner promises to put on in the near future a play by Mrs. Elizabeth Gerberding, a lady widely known in San Francisco both socially and for her numerous welfare activities, who has written a timely play called "the Jolt," dealing with prohibition. Also Miss Blanche Cumming, a local playwright who inclines towards comedy, will have a one-act piece called "Piety and Pie" staged on the same occasion, which will be some time after the New Year, when Miss Brenner promises a programme composed entirely of the work of local playwrights.

AT THE ORPHEUM.

Music, dancing, joking, and larking make up a lively week's bill at the Orpheum. Jack George Duo gives good blackface comedy, and imitates a polysyllabic black preacher with the regular pulpit drone done to the life.

Following him comes Carl Gantvoort, his fine baritone giving great pleasure in "Duna," "Dannie Deever," and "Sally Roses." The singer has an agreeable stage presence; his voice, though not truly great, is a big, well-trained organ, and he sings with a sense of the dramatic value of his song, as evidenced more particularly in "Dannie Deever," to which popular old ballad he gave the freshness of a new creation.

"Recuperation" is an amusing sketch in which Jack Norton, a double-jointed humorist, falls all over the place, joking with his leg and his lip muscles simultaneously. The comedian does his work well, except for being somewhat obsessed by a desire to win sniggers from appreciators of cheap vulgarity; an easy process, scarcely worth the doing, which generally lessens the likeableness of a comedian.

The same reproach might be aimed at Percy Bronson, who, however, employs demure suggestion instead of the ear-hammering methods employed by Mr. Norton. Percy Bronson has been long at the game, so perhaps he increases his popularity by a slight flavor of the risqué occasionally. But I notice that the two English Stantons, who made the liveliest hit of the afternoon, had not a grain of vulgarity in their act. They are both artists in the conveyance of laughing nonsense of as gossamer a texture as dandelion fluff. They tossed verbal absurdities back and forth with occasionally a wave of music, a flicker of ventriloquism, a dash of dancing; and this agile-witted pair did not have to dwell on or repeat their comedy, because they had plenty to draw from. It was all just amusing nonsense, but cleanly, airily, even gracefully done.

Percy Bronson and Winnie Baldwin give a handsome setting to their act, and the black-haired Winnie has rich costumes stiff with gold embroideries, and experience tells in every syllable she utters. Something, however, of the delightful spontaneity of their earlier days has evaporated. But they can always do capital fooling, and Winnie's pretty figure is always dainty and knee-dimpled, as shown in her bewitching dancing costumes.

Mr. Leo Beers enters to the tintintabulation of the piano in the orchestra, and then proceeds to extract melodies from his own with the neat perfection characteristic of a player piano.

"Honeysuckle" exhibits the deft comedy work of John Hyams and the rather fetching imitation of a baby-voiced kitten of a Southern girl by Leila McIntyre, the piece being further brightened by the presence of Leila Hyams, a pretty young chick of pleasing decorative effect in the group of players.

The prettiest feature of the bill was the exquisite dancing of that dainty bit of pink and white girlhood, Grace Eastman. This was in the act entitled "Bohemian Life," presented by Mons. Adolphus, who has a taste for gathering artists around him. For Eunice Prosser plays the violin like an artist, and Mons. Adolphus and Grace Eastman dance like a pair of sprites, while Anna Velde makes herself into a human wheel and rotates all round the stage.

A really beautiful exhibition was given by the pair of dancers of that kind of dancing which makes the fullest demand on the body's power of balancing, the two executing their difficult feats with the ease, grace, and perfect finish which one always remarks in dancers trained in the best Russian school.

JOSEPHINE HART PHELPS.

There is Delightful Entertainment For Many a Long Evening In These Worthwhile Books

"A remarkable achievement in fiction, one that stands out far above any other book of the year!" writes Lillian C. Ford, in the Los Angeles Times, of

THE GLIMPSES OF THE MOON

By Edith Wharton

Everywhere proclaimed as Mrs. Wharton's masterpiece, a best seller since publication, this is a book you must read—and will surely enjoy. Its vivid portrayal of life in the upper circles of society will fascinate you. $2.00

FAIR HARBOR

By Joseph C. Lincoln

A new circle of lovable characters, a new plot full of lively and laughable situations—but the same delightful humor, quaint philosophy, and bracing freshness that a million readers love. "Even the most down-hearted readers must find entertainment and laughter in its pages."—N. Y. Times. $2.00

TRAMPING WITH A POET IN THE ROCKIES

By Stephen Graham

With Vachel Lindsay, the poet, Mr. Graham followed the primitive trails in the Canadian Rockies. In this volume he narrates the eventful trip and the interesting conversation of the two men. Illustrated. $2.00

THE COVERED WAGON

By Emerson Hough

All the dangers, and glory, and romance of the early days in the great West are vividly portrayed in this splendid novel. Mr. Hough has written a brilliant epic of heroic pioneers in which their thrilling experiences are told with gripping interest. $2.00

THE TRANSMISSISSIPPI WEST

By Cardinal Goodwin

The fifty years' period marking the annexation to the United States of the territory between the Mississippi and the Pacific is described fully and authoritatively in this splendid volume. Illustrated with valuable maps. $3.50

MY LIFE

By Emma Calve

In an appealingly personal style and with frank simplicity this star of the opera tells the story of her brilliant career—her early struggles, her rise to fame, the friendships she has won among the leaders of music, social and political worlds. Illustrated. $4.00

Jay William Hudson's ABBE PIERRE

In lovely old Gascony Abbe Pierre watches the unfolding of a beautiful romance. This appealing novel is, as the Boston Transcript says, "one to be read slowly that none of its delicate flavor may be lost." $2.00

THE INDISCRETIONS OF LADY SUSAN

By Lady Susan Townley

Brilliant, revealing, and brimful of extraordinary entertainment is this volume of frank reminiscences by one who has an unusually broad and varied knowledge of social and public life and leaders. Here is the book that all London is agog over, that all America is chuckling over, that will give you many an hour of delightful diversion. $5.00

NARRATIVES IN VERSE

By Ruth Comfort Mitchell

This talented writer has published many brilliant poems that have won wide popularity. Here is a collection of her verse—a volume glowing with human understanding and full of dramatic power. $1.50

Send for Free Catalogue of Children's Books and Illustrated Holiday List

D. APPLETON & COMPANY

Publishers

35 W. 32nd St.

NEW YORK

COLUMBIA THEATRE

Leading Playhouse of the West
Geary at Mason Phone Franklin 150

Two Weeks—Beginning Monday, November 13
Matinees Wednesday and Saturday

JOHN GALSWORTHY'S

Greatest Play, the International Success
"THE SKIN GAME"
London and New York Cast

CURRAN THEATRE

Geary Street Near Mason Phone Prospect 9300

Beginning Tomorrow Night
Matinee Daily Thereafter
A Picturization of Charles Major's Story of Love and Romance

"WHEN KNIGHTHOOD WAS IN FLOWER"
Prices for All Performances
50c and $1 (tax extra)

RIVOLI OPERA HOUSE

Market at Seventh. Phone Market 373

Two Weeks, Starting Monday, Nov. 13

Matinees Saturday and Sunday
FERRIS HARTMAN AND PAUL STEINDORFF
Present the Exquisite Viennese Comic Opera

"THE SPRING MAID"
Best Seats One Dollar

MATINEES DAILY 25 and 50c
EVENINGS 25c TO $1.25
Except Sats., Suns. and Holidays
ALWAYS A GREAT SHOW
SMOKING PERMITTED IN DRESS CIRCLE AND LOGES

Sequoia Little Theatre

1725 Washington St. Bet. Polk St. and Van Ness Ave.

Tuesday and Saturday Nights in November
Three One-Act Plays
Dunsany-Galsworthy-G. Bernard Shaw
Prices $1 and 50c. plus tax.
Sherman, Clay's and Paul Elder's

TICKETS NOW

At Sherman, Clay & Co.'s, Sutter at Kearny, Telephone Sutter 6000, for the Twelve Educational Symphony Concerts of the

People's Symphony Orchestra

ALEXANDER SASLAVSKY, Conductor

Season Tickets—Twelve concerts, best seats, $10; others, $7.50 and $5. War tax omitted.

ESMOND'S

"THE CAKE SHOP"

253 Grant Ave.

We offer a large variety of pies, cakes and pastries—all of the highest quality and flavor.

"ECCLES CAKES" Our Specialty

THE LIFE OF CARDINAL GIBBONS

Archbishop of Baltimore

By Allen Sinclair Will, M. A., Litt. D. LL. D.

The author, who had the fullest confidence of the Cardinal during years of close friendship, has been permitted to use a personal journal, begun in 1868, and has had free access to the archives of the archdiocese of Baltimore containing the official records of the most important period of his life and many of his letters. The range of his public services will be a revelation to most readers. In these pages we see how he became the youngest Bishop in the world; of the favor of Leo XIII, who made him a Cardinal; of his victory in obtaining the sanction of the Church for organized labor; of his winning battle for Americanism in the United States; of his marvelous accomplishments in combating religious intolerance; and of his unique position as the leader of a church of tremendous vitality. It is a book to place beside the life of your favorite great American, whoever he may be.

2 volumes, illustrated, royal 8vo. $10.00.

MY YEARS ON THE STAGE

By John Drew

With a Prefatory Appreciation by Booth Tarkington

The most distinguished actor of the American stage, just entering on his fiftieth year of acting, shares with the public which owes him already so much of pleasure these memories of his brilliant career. Quite informally he tells of the rôles he has created, the parts he has played, the noted men and women of his profession with whom he has come into contact. And it is not the life of the footlights alone, but that of the great world which he sketches with such easy charm. The most distinguished men in all walks of life were among his friends. As Booth Tarkington puts it:

"His memoirs may properly be greeted, in fact, as we should greet a birthday speech at the banquet we are too numerous to make for him—that is, with cheers as he rises to address us."

Fully illustrated. Cloth, $5.00.

A Remarkably Full List of Books Which Combine Information, Interest and Distinction

LITERATURE, ESSAYS, ETC.

William Dean Howells

By DELMAR GROSS COOKE
An exceptionally fine bit of critical biography in mental beauty, spiritual strength, and lovable truth. It should stand beside every set of Howells' novels. $3.00

The Romantic World of Music

By WILLIAM ARMSTRONG
Wherever opera has its season this book will be popular for its glimpses of leading singers past and present as a musical critic comes into contact with them. $5.00

The Sunny Side

By A. A. MILNE
Author of "The Dover Road," "The Red House Mystery," etc. Charming bits of genial humor in prose and verse. $2.00
Limited edition, $3.50

Literature and Life

By E. B. OSBORN
Literary editor of the Morning Post, London, one of the few dailies which keeps a corner for the tranquil pleasures of the mind. $2.50

The Roadmender

By MICHAEL FAIRLESS
Most beautiful of all editions of this reflective book, by reason of the mounted photographs of actual places named in it. $6.00

Modern English Essays

Collected by ERNEST RHYS
Exhibit the gradual changes in the essay form from the deliberate Quarterly article of Matthew Arnold's time to the crisp, brief formality of the present. Five vols. $6.00

Tattlers

By SYDNEY TREMAINE
With pen and ink drawings by "Fish." Epigrams, etc., full of both wit and observation. $2.00

POLITICAL, HISTORICAL AND SOCIAL.

The Genoa Conference

By J. SAXON MILLS
Foreword by the Rt. Hon. Lloyd George. $8.00

The Russian Turmoil

By GENERAL DENIKIN
Momentous history. $8.00

Prime Ministers of Britain, 1721-1921

By the Hon. CLIVE BIGHAM
With portraits. $8.00

Private Diaries of Sir Algernon West

Edited by HORACE HUTCHINSON
An intimate record of Gladstone's last administration. $7.00

Diary of a Journalist (Later Entries)

By SIR HENRY LUCY
Further records of a busy life among prominent people. $6.00

Europe and Beyond

By J. A. R. MARRIOTT
A review of the fifty years from 1870-1920. $3.00

Memoirs of a Clubman More Memoirs and Some Travels

Both by G. B. BURGIN
Chatty memories of literary London. Each $5.00

MISCELLANEOUS BOOKS.

New Testament History

By G. W. WADE, D. D.
Even more important than his well-known "Old Testament History." $7.00

Creeds or No Creeds

By the Rev. CHARLES HARRIS
On modernism. $6.00

The Life of the Spirit and the Life of To-day

By EVELYN UNDERHILL
On practical religion. $2.50

Your Right to Be Happy

By F. S. and M. B. VAN EPS
On the privilege of cooperation with God. $1.25

Robinson Crusoe, Social Engineer

By HENRY E. JACKSON
$3.00

Cheating the Junk Pile

By ETHEL PEYSER
On the selection and care of labor-saving devices. $2.50

The Book of the Sky

By M. LUCKIESH
A fascinating book on clouds and their levels, on rain, storm and winds, full of the poetry of the upper reaches as an airman feels it. Illustrated. $3.50

Garden Colour

By MRS. C. W. EARLE and others.
With 48 plates and colors. $6.00

Behind My Library Doors

By G. C. WILLIAMSON
Recreations of a collector. $3.00

The Van Eycks and Their Followers

By SIR MARTIN CONWAY
With nearly 100 illustrations. $15.00

Edward MacDowell

By JOHN F. PORTE
A biographical sketch, with portrait and musical illustrations. $3.50

American Water-Colourists

By A. E. GALLATIN
Author of "Portraits of Whistler," etc. With 30 plates. Limited edition. Ready early in November.

ON PSYCHOLOGY, ETC.

The Caveman Within Us

By WILLIAM J. FIELDING
Lucidly discusses the conclusions of the leading psycho-analysts. $3.00

Our Unconscious Mind and How to Use It

By FREDERICK PIERCE
Explains clearly the ideas of Coué, etc. 4th ed. $3.00

Psychology of Society

By MORRIS GINSBERG
Compact, scholarly, and full of insight. $2.50

The Aviator

By HENRY C. McCOMAS
On mating the man to the flying machine. $3.00

Youth and the Open Door

By GEORGE ROSS WELLS
A book for the youth of either sex who desires to use opportunity to the utmost. $2.00

ADVENTURE AND TRAVEL.

Italy Old and New

By ELIZABETH HAZELTON HAIGHT
Shows a vigorous Italy of today, enriched by a splendid past. $2.50

Argonauts of the Western Pacific

By BRONISLAS MALINOWSKI
On the curious system of barter among the Melanesian Islands. Illustrated. $8.00

Six Years in Bolivia

By A. V. L. GUISE
The adventurous experiences of a mining engineer. $7.00

People and Places

By ARTHUR KEYSER
A life in five continents, full of good stories. $6.00

Gypsying Through Central America

By EUGENE CUNNINGHAM
A journey quite off the beaten track. $7.00

Industrial and Commercial South America

By ANNIE S. PECK
Indispensable to any one needing information about any South American country. $5.00

My Balkan Log

By J. JOHNSTON ABRAHAM
A surgeon's work with the first Red Cross unit in Serbia. $5.00

In Lotus Land: Japan

By HERBERT C. PONTING
Superbly illustrated. 8 plates in colors; 80 drawings in black and white. $6.00

The Heart of Nature

By SIR FRANCIS YOUNGHUSBAND
Describes the beauty of the Himalayas, Kashmir, etc. $5.00

FICTION.

The Tramping Methodist

SHEILA KAYE-SMITH'S First Novel
It takes one's breath away to think of a girl of barely twenty writing a novel so distinctly individualized as this. It is especially interesting in comparison with "The Green Apple Harvest" and "Joanna Godden." $2.00

Valley Waters

By CHARLES D. STEWART
Author of "The Fugitive Blacksmith" and according to William Lyon Phelps, "the only logical successor to Mark Twain." $2.00

Black Pawl

By BEN AMES WILLIAMS
Author of "Evered." It is strong, tragic, and its terribly moving quality is a thing of the book as a whole, not merely of a worked-up crisis. $2.00

To Tell You the Truth

By LEONARD MERRICK
New short stories by the author of "A Chair on the Boulevard," etc. $1.90

FOR CHILDREN.

The Bird-Nest Boarding House

By VERBENA REED
Illustrated by Oliver Herford
Grown-ups' eyes are farther from the grass than children's, so they may be surprised to learn that Daddy Long-legs was the Widow Grasshopper's table boarder. But they will know better than the youngsters how deliciously witty these drawings are. $2.50

The Shadow Witch

By GERTRUDE CROWNFIELD
A companion to "The Princess White Flame" and equally fine in spirit. $2.00

Henny and Penny

By BERTHA PARKER HALL
The adventures of twin girls and their brother. Illustrated with silhouettes by Ruth Clements Farrell. $1.50

Verotchka's Tales

By MAMIN SIBERIAK
Russian tales through which runs a thread of subtle irony. Illustrations by Boris Artzybasheff. $2.00

The Story of a Cuckoo's Egg

By HILDA TERRAS
A book for any bird lover. With 8 plates in colors and other illustrations from photographs. $2.50

The Japanese Fairy Book

By YEI THEODORA OZAKI
Japanese fairy tales quaintly related. Illustrated by an artist of Tokio. $3.00

The New World Fairy Book

By HOWARD ANGUS KENNEDY
Folk tales from the Canadian border, chiefly Indian. Profusely illustrated. $2.50

The Pinafore Pocket Story Book

By MIRIAM CLARK POTTER
Whimsical fancies to read to the five-year-old who is too old for nursery rhymes and too young to read. Illustrations by Sophia Balcom. $2.50

Kari the Elephant

By DHAN GOPAL MUKERJI
The story of how a boy and an elephant worked and grew up together. $2.00

Little Lucia

By MABEL L. ROBINSON
Author of "Dr. Tam o' Shanter." A capital story for little girls, sound and true, as well as entertaining. $2.00

Sing a Song of Sleepy Head

By JAMES W. FOLEY
Author of "Boys and Girls," etc. $2.00

The Book of Giants

By HENRY C. LANIER
A gathering of giants, real and legendary, from all lands and books. $2.00

Elizabeth Ann's Delight

By MAUD DOWSON
A genuine fairy tale of delight for any child who plays in a garden. $2.00

Boys' Book of Physics

By CHARLES RAMSAY CLARKE
Directions for simple experiments with home-made apparatus. Illustrated. $2.50

BEASTS, MEN AND GODS

By Ferdinand Ossendowski

Truth that is stranger than fiction is in every page of this story of the wanderings and wild adventures of a Polish professor and prominent official in the old Russian government. The story is of fifteen months in which the fear of sudden death played an almost hourly part, yet from which the author emerged with a knowledge of conditions in Russia, Siberia and Mongolia, and especially in the inner circles of the Mongolian Buddhists, which makes the book as important as it is thrilling. $3.00

THE DRIVER

By Gareth Garrett

A story so tense and vivid that you feel as if you had been given the confidence of the one man in the country who could have been the hero of this remarkable novel. Perhaps you may recognize men who move in its pages; at least you will be thrilled by its picture of the vision which inspired some of the large-minded builders of American commerce. It is a great American novel, a story which could not have been told by any less-informed writer. $2.00

These books are obtainable through any bookstore, or, if not, they can be had, postage extra, direct from

E. P. DUTTON & CO., Publishers

681 Fifth Avenue, NEW YORK

VANITY FAIR.

New York society has been enjoying one of its characteristic little flutters recently over the secret marriage of Mrs. Ogden L. Mills, divorced wife of Mr. Ogden L. Mills, and daughter of Mrs. William K. Vanderbilt, to Sir Paul Dukes, British observer in Russia during the early days of the soviet reign. Sir Paul is probably the original of the man who was said to be an expert on Russia because he got out alive. At any rate, like Gilbert K. Chesterton, John Cowper Powys, Lawrence George, Sir Arthur Conan Doyle, Sir Oliver Lodge and other thrifty Britishers, he came to America and made a nice thing lecturing. But while they were content to carry back mere American lucre, Sir Paul walks off with an heiress. We may be lucky that he didn't take the Statue of Liberty. Such a man is dangerous. He not only got out of Russia; he got out of Nyack. Nyack is a sort of inland seaport up the Hudson from Manhattan, where there flourished a club, or colony, of the choicest brand of occultist under one prize occultist known modestly as Oom the Omnipotent, a Dr. Pierre Bernard in private life, if the life of Omnipotence can ever be private; the same being assisted apparently by one Loving Guru of the "Tantriks," who, down to about five years ago, operated some sort of mystical spook joint in New York until the climate became too warm for him. Among its other activities this institution conducts an annual society circus, presumably for the deserving poor, and probably its managers consider themselves deserving. They usually do. Mrs. Mills and her sister, Mrs. Barbara Hatch, are said to have been adepts of the cult (or about to be adepts after a few more lessons), and stellar attractions of the aforesaid society circus. In this sultry and overcharged atmosphere they met Sir Paul, who had used his Russian experiences with such effect on American audiences, and he was as occult as the seventh veil of Isis. It is said to have been Montague Glass, creator of the spirituelle characters, Potash and Perlmutter, that arranged the wedding, and it was he that admitted it, after the newspapers had made a long hunt involving the records of Greenwich, Connecticut. What New York society feels about the episode is that Sir Paul is too clever by far. A man that can not only get out of Russia with a whole skin, but clean up in America, get married in Nyack instead of Greenwich, which everybody knows is the only place for a secret wedding, take passage for Europe on the Olympic and then switch to the Berengaria to throw the yellow press off the scent is altogether too foxy to be trusted entirely as a husband. How are such a resourceful person's movements to be followed?

Dr. de Saussure of Switzerland finds that we in this country are much given to fads and the support of various sorts of imposture. Surest thing the doctor knows. Europe sends them over, and a lot of our silly women run after them and occupy what they are pleased to consider their minds with the most extravagant vagaries of the occult and the exotic and the esoteric. Almost any sort of miracle-monger can get a hearing and find a sale for his peculiar sort of merchandise. And the women are not alone here, either. "Psychology" is the great word. Some of the business men have helped spread its fame by trying to adapt it, or what they thought was it, to the art of advertising, and to the other arts of selling things. They have humbugged themselves into the belief that it can be used to bamboozle a customer into buying something he does not want and would not buy if he were in a normal frame of mind. The whole conception has been grossly overworked by persons that never took a college course in psychology, have no knowledge of authentic texts on the subject, and are totally ignorant of its peculiar field and the limits of knowledge within that field. They "believe in" certain things; vague, indefinable, but stupendous in power to effect the will and judgment of others. A good deal of the "psychology" peddled to business men as well as to susceptible women is the trashiest kind of humbug, based on nothing in particular and leading nowhere except to a condition of mind which will make it easy to collect fees for "advice." It is the present-day equivalent of the spiritualistic mining "tips" of a bygone generation. Common sense ought to warn people against delusions of the sort, but when a wonder-seeker begins to "investigate psychology" or some other ology he leaves common sense behind. Then there is always astrology. In the old days, when Market Street was rougher than it is now, or than it was just before the earthquake, a crowd assembled before a bulletin board to learn who won a certain prize-fight. An astrologer had an office near-by, but the crowd interfered with his view of the bulletins. "Who won the fight?" he asked a hoodlum on the edge of the congregation. "Can't you tell?" asked the hoodlum. "I'll throw a fit an' find out." A good many of these "psychologists" who teach psychological salesmanship are good salesmen at that—they can sell psychology.

A Puritan Maid's Wild Passion.

In an article describing early days in York, Maine, in Harper's Magazine, Agnes Repplier quotes the following letter from a young lady of the period to her fiancé:

"Mr. Barrell: I sincerely condole with you under your indisposition, and thought I said enough to your Brother to convince him I felt the most tender solicitude on that account. My being abroad [it is surmised she was in Boston] I imagined a sufficient apology for not writing you. Your assertions are certainly very unkind; and pardon me if I suggest your disorder has made you peevish. But I hope you will soon have a recruit of health and good humor, and in person congratulate me on my recovery from the toothache, which this day prevented my attendance on public worship. An hour's indisposition convinces me more of the vanity of this world than a thousand lectures from the Desk. I fear your expectations from terrestrial things are too sanguine, and that you have not yet credited the melancholy truth that all below the sun is vanity. May this short indisposition put you on the pursuit of lasting and superior joys more suited to the dignity of our rational and immortal nature, and you will have no reason to regret it. Romantick as you insinuate my conduct to you has been, I shall never require any proofs of your affection inconsistent with the Christian and the Gentleman. Pray be so great a novelty as a Rational Lover for the future, and let no Chimera of your pregnant invention wreck your quiet—I am yours, Delia."

"Travel Without Trouble"*COOK'S TRAVEL SERVICE

World wide—Complete—Efficient

Inclusive Tours for Individual Travel
arranged, to start any day by
any route.

Explanatory circular on request

THOS. COOK & SON
(Est. 1841)

Agents for the best lines for travel by
Land, Water or Air

128 SUTTER STREET
(COOK'S BUILDING) Phone Kearny 3512

Press Clippings

Are money-makers for Contractors, Supply
Houses, Business Men and
Corporations

ALLEN'S PRESS CLIPPING BUREAU
Phone Douglas 5119 121 Second Street

THE CHARLES NELSON CO.

MANUFACTURER AND WHOLESALE

of

REDWOOD, DOUGLAS FIR,
SPRUCE, HEMLOCK,
SUGAR & WHITE PINE,
CEDAR SHINGLES & POLES.

230 California St. San Francisco

E. C. EVANS & SONS, Inc.

(Established 1881)

STEAMSHIP AGENTS

SHIP AND INSURANCE BROKERS

260 California Street, San Francisco

Phone Douglas 8040 Cable Address "DEWGRIP"

GENERAL PETROLEUM CORPORATION

Offices at

SAN FRANCISCO LOS ANGELES
Alaska Commercial Bldg. Higgins Bldg.

HAMMOND LUMBER COMPANY

260 CALIFORNIA ST.
REDWOOD, DOUGLAS FIR

AND PILING

SERVICE

To Sacramento

Observation Cars.

Dining Car Service on Meteor
leaving 4:40 P.M. through to Chico.

We Carry Baggage

SACRAMENTO SHORT LINE

A Gift to Progress

California's highway of grandeur
—the Skyline Boulevard—is under construction.

Beauty and utility joined hands in the planning of this avenue of inspiration that runs from San Francisco along the westernmost verge of our continent.

The Skyline Boulevard cancels a "No Thoroughfare" sign that Nature placed on our peninsula.

From its north terminal at Sloat
Boulevard and the Great Highway, the Skyline runs for eleven miles through properties of Spring Valley
Water Company.

Two miles the Skyline runs across Lake Merced Rancho; then nine miles through Spring Valley watershed in San Mateo County, opening to travel a region that presents noble picture after picture of ocean, mountain, lake and valley.

Right-of-way for this northern unit of the Skyline Boulevard is from 80 to 100 feet wide in San Francisco, and from 80 to 90 feet wide in San Mateo County.

This right-of-way, for eleven miles in two counties, is the gift of Spring Valley Water Company.

SPRING VALLEY
WATER COMPANY

The final test

The real value of a motor lubricant can be determined in only one way—through its use in the engine for which it is intended.

Hence this company maintains an engine-testing laboratory, equipped with a Sprague dynamometer, in which Zerolene and other lubricants are constantly being tested under actual operating conditions.

This dynamometer laboratory is in charge of competent trained men, who spend all their time in conducting comparative tests of Zerolene and other lubricants in automobile, airplane, marine, truck and tractor engines.

Correct Lubrication Recommendations

On the results of these tests, supplemented by equally careful tests in the field and on the road, our Board of Lubrication Engineers bases its Chart of Recommendations.

Close attention is given to the design and construction of the engine. It is necessary to know, first, the speed of the bearing surfaces; second, clearance between bearing surfaces; third, temperatures at which bearings operate; fourth, pressures exerted in each bearing;
fifth, the means provided for the distribution of the oil to each bearing.

The recommendations embodied in the Zerolene Chart are calculated with the greatest precision, and if Zerolene is used in accordance with them, correct lubrication and maximum fuel mileage are assured.

Board of Lubrication Engineers
STANDARD OIL COMPANY
(California)

more power & speed ~
less friction and wear ~
thru Correct Lubrication

STORYETTES.

Grave and Gay, Epigrammatic and Otherwise.

George Ade, the humorous philosopher, was discussing the modern girl at the Chicago Athletic Club. "She is an athlete, certainly," he said; "a hale, hearty, open-air creature—and yet you can't kiss her without running the risk of painter's colic."

The head of a coal firm, irritated beyond endurance at the driver's blunders, told the man to go to the office and get his pay and not come back. "You are so confounded thick-headed you can't learn anything!" he shouted. "Well," answered the driver, "I have learned one thing since I've been with you." "What's that?" snapped the other. "That 1700 pounds make a ton."

Sinclair Lewis, the novelist, while abroad took a furnished flat in London, where he entertained the Bohemians of the city lavishly. At one of his supper parties a young art student said to him: "Well, do you like prohibition or not, Mr. Lewis?" "How can I tell you?" the novelist answered. "You see," he added, "we're not so dry yet that we have to pin on our postage stamps."

A regiment of untried negro troops was stationed in the front-line trenches in France and 6000 seasoned white soldiers were stationed immediately behind. One of the negroes, addressing his buddy, said: "Mose, what do you all suppose the papers gwine to say about us tomorrow?" And Mose answered, "If the rest of you niggers feels as I does dose headlines will say, 'Six Thousand White Troops Tromped to Death.'"

This happened at a conference of negro preachers. A visiting bishop was looking at the various examination papers, and came upon one marked 101 per cent. "See here, Brother Jones," he asked of the worthy who was conducting the test, "what does yo' base yo' answers on?" "One hundred per cent." advised the minister. "But how does this man come to be marked 101 per cent.?" "Oh, yo' see, suh," answered the dandy, "he answered one question we didn't ask him."

Patience was the subject of the teacher's discourse, and to illustrate her point she drew on the blackboard a picture of a small boy sitting on the bank of a stream, fishing. "You see this lad, children," she said beaming on her pupils. "He's fishing. Well, even the pleasure of fishing requires patience. He must be prepared to sit and wait." And she dilated on the importance of being patient. "Now, then, can any of you boys tell me what we need most when we go fishing," she invited. Like one voice came a chorus from the class: "Bait!"

Two venerable theologians, an Episcopal rector about eighty years old and a minister of the Presbyterian church who was somewhat younger, were very friendly despite their differences in faith. The high-churchman had always liked to be addressed as "Father." In course of time a new rector succeeded the "Father," and the Presbyterian by force of habit continued the high church title. But the new rector did not like it. "See here Doctor Smith," said the irate rector, one day, "for some time I have been asking you to stop calling me 'father.' If you do it again I shall call you 'mother,' and if, after that, you do it again I shall call you 'grandmother.'"

Senator Lodge at a Boston dinner party said apropos of an autograph collector who had bought a fake autograph of Marlowe, the Elizabethan dramatist: "That reminds me. There was once a New York man who collected books with autograph dedications. Most of these dedications were to himself. Open his Longfellow's, his Kiplings, his Bernard Shaws, or his Maupassant, and there would be his name in a flattering autograph dedication from Rudyard or Guy, from Henry or George. Now, this man's friends had noticed, or thought they had noticed, a certain similarity about the handwriting of all these dedications. Probably they were wrong, but, anyhow, after he had shown a fine folio volume of Marlowe to a festive gathering one evening, he found inscribed in the ancient book the next morning the following words: 'To Bill'—his name was William—'From his faithful old friend and schoolmate, Kit Marlowe.'"

THE MERRY MOUSE.

The Magic Melody.

We've all heard tales of how girls fall
For men who dance and sing,
And how they rave about the boys
Who make the ivories ring.

A tune is apt to win a girl,
But make it all secure
And learn to blow an auto horn;
You'll get her then for sure.

—Pennysylvania Punch Bowl.

A Post-World-Sunset.

The World is too much with us: late and soon
Somebody's always quoting Heywood Brown:
Little we say of humor that is ours,
Culling from Bowling Greens and Conning Towers;
This Dial, that bears the story of Fitzurse,—
The fellow has become a household curse!
Our sharpest quips are those we get by rote,
We talk along and never once unquote;
It gains us naught. Ye gods! I would be shunned,
Un-Worldly, badly-Posted, and un-Sunned
So might I, though the effort be forlorn,
Try something that had not been read that morn;
Surely I might say one thing with a sting
That had its birth outside the charmed ring.

—J. J. F. in Life.

ORNAMENTALS, FRUIT TREES,
VINES AND FIELD GROWN ROSES

Open Daily and Sunday to visitors and purchasers

GEO. C. ROEDING, Pres.

California Nursery Company

(Founded in 1865 by John Rock)

NILES, CALIFORNIA

BALFOUR, GUTHRIE &amp; CO.

SAN FRANCISCO AND LOS ANGELES,
PORTLAND, SEATTLE, TACOMA,
AND VANCOUVER.

MERCHANTS

EXPORTERS AND IMPORTERS

MARINE AND FIRE INSURANCE

AVERAGE ADJUSTERS

Agents of

HARRISON DIRECT LINE OF STEAMERS

TO AND FROM EUROPEAN PORTS

and

COMMONWEALTH GOVERNMENT LINE

Redwood Export Company

California Redwood
Lumber and TiesCargoes and Parcels
"To off shore markets only"260 CALIFORNIA STREET
SAN FRANCISCO, CALIF.

Phone Sutter 2163

UNION LUMBER CO.

CROCKER BUILDING

SAN FRANCISCO, CALIFORNIA

MANUFACTURERS and WHOLESALERS

— OF —

REDWOOD LUMBER;

RAILROAD TIES

TELEGRAPH POLES

SHINGLES

— AND —

SPLIT REDWOOD PRODUCTS

Geo. E. Billings Roy C. Ward Geo. B. Dinsmore
J. C. Muesdorfer Jas. W. Dean

GEO. E. BILLINGS CO.

ALL FORMS OF INSURANCE
EFFECTED312 California St., San Francisco, Cal.
Phone—Douglas 6400BONESTELL & CO.
PAPER

The paper used in printing the Argonaut is
furnished by us
CALIFORNIA'S LEADING PAPER HOUSE
118 to 124 First Street, corner Minna,
San Francisco

How We Overcame
the cause of motor oils
breaking down rapidly under engine heat

DESTRUCTIVE "Sulpho" compounds are the cause of motor oils breaking down rapidly under engine heat. An enormous amount of money is annually lost through the presence of these unnecessary properties in oils.

Cycol will save engine owners this tremendous amount of money lost through wasted oil, wasted fuel, preventable repairs, because it is free from destructive "sulpho" compounds. These have been removed by the new Hexeon Process used exclusively by us.

When your oil contains destructive "sulpho" compounds it breaks down rapidly under engine heat. Its lubricating value becomes quickly impaired. The oil film is broken and serious damage may result.

Have your crank case thoroughly flushed—not with kerosene. Use the correct grade of Cycol as shown on the Cycol Recommendation Chart. Use Associated Gasoline. Then notice the improved performance of your motor.

ASSOCIATED OIL COMPANY
SAN FRANCISCO

CYCOL

MOTOR OIL
FREE FROM DESTRUCTIVE "SULPHO" COMPOUNDS

PERSONAL.

Social Notes.

Mrs. James Cunningham has announced the engagement of her daughter, Miss Sara Morrison Cunningham, to Mr. Cornelius Van Hemert Engert of the diplomatic service at Washington, D. C. Miss Cunningham is at present in New York, visiting her sisters, Mrs. Murray Sargent and Miss Elizabeth Cunningham. Miss Cunningham expects to return to California the latter part of the month, when she will complete her plans for a January wedding. Mr. Engert is a former Californian. Recently he was appointed assistant chief of the Near East division of the diplomatic corps at Washington. Mr. Engert expects to come to California early in January.

Miss Doris Wirtner and Mr. Howard McCandless are to be married on November 15th. Miss Wirtner will be attended by her sister, Miss Harriet Wirtner, as maid of honor, Mrs. Reed Funsten and Mrs. Donald Bradford as bridesmaids. Mr. Philip Finnell will act as best man for Mr. McCandless.

Miss Lawton Filer entertained at dinner for Miss Josephine Drown and Miss Frances Ames on Saturday evening, preceding the ball at the Burlingame Country Club at which Miss Drown and Miss Ames were presented. Miss Eleanor Spreckels, Miss Eleanor Martin, Miss Adrienne Sharp, Miss Jean Howard, Miss Edith Grant, Miss Josephine Grant, Miss Alice Moffitt, Miss Jane Carrigan, Miss Ruth Hobart, Miss Leonora Armsby, Miss Aileen McIntosh, Miss Hélène de Latour, Mr. and Mrs. William Hendrickson, Jr., Mr. George Montgomery, Mr. Geoffrey Montgomery, Mr. Russell Wilson, Mr. Orel Goldaracena, Mr. George Pope, Jr., Mr. William Shuman, Mr. Alfred Hendrickson, Mr. Harry Crocker, Mr. Barroll McNear, Mr. William Magee, Jr., Mr. Leroy Nickel and Mr. Homer Curran were Miss Filer's guests.

Miss Adrienne Sharp, who is to make her début later in the season, was the hostess at a theatre party on Monday evening, followed by a supper at the Hotel St. Francis. Mr. and Mrs. John Bryant Knox chaperoned the party. Among the guests were Miss Margaret Buckbee, Miss Frances Lent, Miss Geraldine Grace, Mr. John Boyden and Mr. Hugh Porter.

Miss Mary Bernice Moore, the daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Charles C. Moore, is to make her début later in the season, bringing the number of this year's debutantes to nine. Miss Jean Howard, Miss Josephine Drown, Miss Frances Ames, Miss Adrienne Sharp, Miss Leonora Armsby, Miss Virginia Hanna, Miss Frances Deering and Miss Genevieve Tallant are the other debutantes.

On Sunday afternoon Mr. and Mrs. Rudolph Spreckels were hosts at a luncheon at the Burlingame Country Club, complimenting Mrs. Spencer Eddy, who is visiting in California with her father, Mr. Claus Spreckels. Mrs. Eddy makes her home in France. Forty guests were seated at the luncheon table, among them Colonel and Mrs.

Sydney Cloman, Mr. and Mrs. Walter Filer, Dr. and Mrs. Herbert Moffitt, Mr. and Mrs. Robert Hays Smith, Mr. and Mrs. Thomas Eastland and Mr. and Mrs. Frederick McNear.

Miss Mary Emma Flood complimented Miss Rosamonde Johnson at a dinner party which she gave on Monday evening. Miss Johnson is in San Francisco for a short time, on her way home to Boston from the Orient. Miss Flood's guests on Monday evening included Mr. and Mrs. Alfred de Ropp, Mr. and Mrs. Frederick Hope Beaver, Mr. and Mrs. Herman Phleger, Miss Roslyn Morey, Mr. Atherton Eyre, Mr. Elliott McAllister and Mr. Barroll McNear.

For the Little Children's Aid a benefit dinner-dance will be given on November 15th at the Fairmont Hotel. The proceeds from the dance are to be used in the establishment of a convalescent home at Menlo Park. Among the patronesses who will attend the dance with guests are Mrs. Georges de Latour, Mrs. Joseph Donohoe, Mrs. Edward Eyre, Mrs. William Sproule, Mrs. George Cameron, Mrs. Thomas Driscoll and Mrs. John Baumgartner. A large number of reservations have already been made for the occasion.

The proceeds from the annual rummage sale for the benefit of the Girls' Recreation and Home Club will this year be given to liquidate the indebtedness on the club. Large amounts of clothes have been accumulated for the sale, to be sold for just a fraction of their original cost. Promoting the enterprise are Mrs. Herbert Moffitt, Mrs. D. C. Jackling, Mrs. Herbert Allen, Mrs. Walter S. Martin, Mrs. Robert Hays Smith, Mrs. George Cameron and Miss Louise Boyd. The sale takes place on Thursday, November 9th, at the Civic Auditorium.

Polo in the Park.

The Pacific Coast sub-committee of the American Polo Association has made formal application to play polo in Golden Gate Park in San Francisco, which is the city playground. Herbert Fleishacker, chairman of the San Francisco Park Commission, has viewed the application with favor and there is a possibility that a stand will be outlined so that this exciting sport on horseback can be put on for the entertainment of the public.

S. F. B. Morse of Del Monte, a member of the committee, made the original proposal. He set forth the advantage of showing the public what a wonderful pastime polo is. It would have the effect of popularizing the game and furnishing another out-of-door pleasure for California.

The championship Midwick team, headed by Carleton Burke, is again going to be intact and the other California clubs are already starting to line up their players and ponies. Hugh Drury is to have a number of young players to represent Del Monte, and San Mateo may also introduce some new faces, beside having the former stars back in the saddle.

The Monterey Presidio, which is located at Del Monte, is the army polo centre on the Coast, and it will have one and possibly two teams on the field.

Schlee at the St. Francis.

Henry Schlee is to give a recital of Kipling's poems, interspersed with comments on the author's life, character, and purpose, on November 16th in the Italian Room of the Hotel St. Francis, under the direction of Alice Seckels. This recital is the result of the widespread interest occasioned by his private lectures of like character at Mills College and the University of California, and is sponsored by a group of well-known men and women who have heard him and feel that his personality and interpretation combine to offer an unusually attractive evening's entertainment.

In his recital on the 16th Schlee will illustrate Kipling by excerpts from "Natural Theology" and "Gods of the Copy-Book Maxims," and will also give a number of the Indian verses, war poems, and a group of Kipling's latest and less familiar efforts.

The Schlee recital will be something of a social event, but its sponsors are issuing tickets to the public, which can be secured from Sherman, Clay & Co.

Education in the Symphony.

The People's Symphony Association of San Francisco, composed of a number of men interested in the development of an appreciation of symphony music, has organized for the purpose of giving a series of educational concerts during the coming season at Scottish Rite Auditorium. Alexander Saslavsky, eminent violinist and conductor, who was for many years concertmaster and assistant conductor of the Walter Damrosch New York Symphony Orchestra, has been engaged, and in addition to conducting the orchestra, will give talks adequately explaining the music themes and the instruments.

Twelve concerts will be given. Season tickets for the best seats will be $10, and there will be seats as low in price as $7.50 and $5 for the series.

The board of directors consists of R. C. Newell, president; O. K. Cushing, vice-president; F. A. Denicke, secretary; D. L. McKay, treasurer; J. B. Farish, A. M. Newhall and Charles H. Kendrick.

Tickets are on sale, war tax omitted, at Sherman, Clays & Co.'s.

Among the supplies in a great Atlantic liner for one voyage there sometimes are 170,000 pounds of meat, fifty tons of potatoes and 5000 pounds of butter.

American Beauty Roses
For the Debutant.JOSEPH'S
FLORISTS

Phone Sutter 423

233 Grant Ave.

CARIBBEAN CRUISE

JANUARY 1923

Pacific Coast to New Orleans, Havana, Panama Canal, Costa Rica and Return.

Folder on Request.

BENNETT'S TRAVEL BUREAU, INC.

681 Market Street

SAN FRANCISCO

St. Louis
Express

A daily through
train for Denver,
Kansas City and
St. Louis.

Over
American Canyon
Route

Via Ogden

Crossing the Great Salt
Lake Cut-Off

Lv San Francisco (Ferry) 1:00 p.m.
Ar Denver 12:15 p.m.
Ar Kansas City 9:15 a.m.
Ar St. Louis 6:15 p.m.

Connecting at Kansas City and
St. Louis with all trains East and South.

Observation and Dining Cars,
Pullman Standard and Tourist
Sleepers.

Our agents will gladly furnish you further information.

Southern Pacific

Ferry Station

50 Post St.

Phone Sutter 4000

3rd St. Station

THE HILLCREST

American and European Plan
CALIFORNIA AND JONES STS.
Phone Franklin 3240

DEL MONTE

The Largest Resort Hotel Plant in the World
Where "Thinking People" can find Recreation
in Hotel del Monte's Comfort, Service and Outdoor Life. "Here every sportsman can find
his chosen recreation."

TWO CHAMPIONSHIP GOLF COURSES
CARL S. STANLEY, Manager
DEL MONTE : : CALIFORNIA

San Ysidro Ranch

Furnished bungalows of various sizes;
situated on the foothills among the orange groves, overlooking the sea. Central dining-room, electric lights, hot and cold water. Good tennis court. Six miles from
Santa Barbara, two miles from ocean.
Booklet. Address MANAGER

San Ysidro Ranch, Santa Barbara

Special Winter Rates

$1.50 per day and up. Over 200 cozy outside rooms, splendid view; every convenience. Unexcelled Table and Service
Breakfast 75c, Luncheon $1, Dinner, $1.50.

POPULAR DINNER DANCE
Every Saturday 8 to 12

Residence of Mrs. C. H. McCormick, Lake Forest, Ill.
Perkins, Fellows & Hamilton, Architects

Coast Representatives

J. E. DWAN, Los Angeles

F. T. CROWE &amp; CO., Tacoma and Seattle

WATERHOUSE-WILCOX CO., San Francisco

J. MCCRAKEN, Portland

Crittall Casement Window Co., Detroit, Manufacturers

ENGLISH
CASEMENTS
and Windows
for banks, offices, schools,
hospitals, etc

for artistic residences and
other substantial buildings

CRITTALL

Steel Casements

Made in varied designs
to meet all conditions

STRINGER STORAGE COMPANY

Sutter near Fillmore
and
Steiner near Sutter

Conducting a Storage
Business Founded
in 1880

Storage—Shipping

Expert Packing, Protection
and Dispatch

A fully informed representative, anxious to give you any desired information, will respond to your phone call.

Phone West 999

PERSONAL.

Movements and Whereabouts.

Mrs. George Pope has gone to New York to meet her daughter, Mrs. Moseley Taylor, who is returning from Europe.

Mr. and Mrs. H. E. Miller left during the week for an extended motor trip in the southern part of the state.

Mr. and Mrs. Edward Schmiedell have closed their Ross Valley home for the winter. They are established in their apartment in Post Street.

Mr. and Mrs. Alfred Harwood are completing a house in Washington Street, which they expect to occupy later in the month.

Miss Fernanda Pratt and her mother, Mrs. Ernest Simpson, left the latter part of the week for Santa Barbara.

Recent arrivals at the St. Francis include Lieut.

tenant-Commander Ralph Risler, U. S. N.; Mr. L. D. Manouel, Fresno; Mr. J. I. Geer, Reno; Mr. S. A. Lines, Fresno; Mr. H. Fraley, Reno; Mr. Lucien Hass, Los Angeles; Mr. J. C. Wadell, Chicago; Mr. Adolph Fleschman, Los Angeles.

Mr. Eugene Kelly of Huntington, Long Island, is expected in San Francisco early in December.

Mr. C. A. Spreckels and his daughter, Mrs. Spencer Eddy, are in San Francisco at the Fairmont Hotel.

Miss Louise Boyd of San Rafael has taken the Loring Pickering house in Washington Street for the winter.

Mrs. Frederick Sharon left on Tuesday for New York, where she will spend the winter.

Mr. and Mrs. Dean Dillman have returned from their wedding trip.

Mr. and Mrs. John Hays Hammond, their daughter, Miss Natalie Hammond, and Mr. Hammond's sister have delayed their arrival in Santa Barbara until later in the year. Mrs. Hammond and her daughter will arrive in December, Mr. Hammond joining them in January.

Mrs. Jessie Berry expects to leave early in December for Valparaiso, Chile, where she will spend the winter with her son-in-law and daughter, Mr. and Mrs. Walter Perkins.

Mr. and Mrs. Alexander Lilley and their daughter, Miss Ethel Lilley of San Rafael, have rented an apartment in California Street for the winter.

Mr. and Mrs. George T. Marye closed their summer home at Burlingame, and are occupying apartments at the Fairmont Hotel. Later they will go to Washington, D. C.

Mr. and Mrs. Charles McIntosh have closed their Marina County summer home and taken a house in Buchanan Street for the winter.

Mr. Andrew Welch is on his way home from Europe. Mrs. Welch and their two daughters, Miss Marie Welch and Miss Florence Welch, are established in Paris.

Mr. Charles T. Crocker left the early part of the week for New York to meet Mrs. Crocker. Mr. and Mrs. Crocker will return to California late in November.

Mrs. Charles C. Moore returned to her country home in Santa Cruz for a few days. Mrs. Moore will close the house for the winter.

Mrs. Mary Judge Fatjo and her daughter, Miss Paula Marie Fatjo, have taken one of the cottages at Pebble Beach for a year.

Mrs. Elizabeth Gerberding has returned from Fresno, where she was the guest of her daughter, Mrs. Carleton Gildersleeve, for some weeks.

Mr. and Mrs. U. S. Grant of San Diego are in town for a few days on their way home from Europe.

Mr. Haig Patigian will leave here November 12th for New York and Europe.

Mrs. Henry Payot returned recently from Southern California and has taken an apartment at the Hotel St. Francis.

Mr. Allen H. Daugherty sailed for Southampton recently on the Majestic.

Mrs. Daniel T. Murphy left on Thursday for New York, with Miss Mary Taylor.

Mrs. Frank Deering and her daughter, Miss Francesca Deering, who have been abroad for the past year, have returned to their home on Russian Hill.

Mr. and Mrs. Bradley Wallace sailed on the Majestic October 28th for Europe.

Mr. and Mrs. James Moffitt returned during the week from Honolulu, and are established in their new home in Webster Street.

Mr. and Mrs. Stuart Haldorn have closed their Monterey home and have come to San Francisco for a few months.

Mrs. Arthur Page-Brown is visiting at the home of her daughter, Mrs. Harry McAfee, in San Mateo.

Mr. and Mrs. Samuel Pond will close their country home at Woodside early in December. They will spend the winter at their Scott Street home.

Mr. and Mrs. Byington Ford have taken possession of their new home at Pebble Beach.

Mr. and Mrs. Samuel B. F. Morse will divide their time this winter between their home in town and their peninsula house.

Mrs. Harry Hill is expected in San Francisco the middle of the month. Mrs. Hill has spent the past six months abroad.

Mr. and Mrs. Geoffrey Holt left during the week on a motor trip through Southern California.

Mr. and Mrs. Daniel Jackling are established at the St. Regis in New York.

Mr. and Mrs. Henry Foster Dutton are at the Plaza Hotel in New York. They expect to be in the East for some months.

Mrs. Charles W. Wetmore (Elizabeth Bisland Wetmore) arrived during the week from the Orient. Mrs. Wetmore is stopping at the Palace Hotel.

Mr. and Mrs. Robert I. Bentley and their daughter, Miss Katherine Bentley, have been in the East for several weeks and expect to return to California the middle of November.

Mr. and Mrs. Walter Foster will occupy their new home in San Francisco early in January.

Mrs. Robert Elliott, who has been visiting her mother, Mrs. Edgar de Pue, left on Saturday for her home in Southern California.

Mrs. Ellsworth Harper Van Patten returned last week to Long Beach, where she will join her husband, Lieutenant-Commander Van Patten, assigned to the U. S. S. Arizona.

Miss Geraldine Graham of Santa Barbara is visiting Mr. and Mrs. Baily at the British Embassy in Washington, D. C.

Herbert Fleishhacker Honored

Mr. Herbert Fleishhacker was the honored guest at a dinner party in the palm grill at the Hotel Del Monte last Friday evening. The occasion was the birthday anniversary of Mr. Fleishhacker. A number of his friends in San Francisco came to Del Monte for the affair and he was the recipient of many presents and messages of congratulation. Among those in attendance were Mr. and Mrs. Herbert Fleishhacker, Mr. and Mrs. Mortimer Fleishhacker, Mr. and Mrs. J. S. Greenebaum, Miss Marjorie Fleishhacker, and Mr. William F. Humphrey.

FOYER AND BOX-OFFICE.

The Columbia Theatre.

An event of unusual interest to play-goers will be the presentation by William A. Brady, in association with Reandean Company, London, of "The Skin Game," the Galsworthy play which comes to the Columbia Theatre for two weeks, opening Monday night, November 13th, with matinees Wednesday and Saturday. There is a distinguished cast, selected by Galsworthy and Basil Dean, whose American production is a duplicate of the original at St. Martin's, London.

"Spring Maid" at the Rivoli.

"The Spring Maid," containing one of the most melodious musical scores to come out of Vienna, will be given its first stock production on the Pacific Coast Monday evening, when Ferris Hartman and Paul Steindorff will offer the piece at the Rivoli Opera House. Musically, the piece is known to thousands by reason of such songs as "Two Little Love Bees," "Day Dreams," "The Three Trees," and "The Mountain Fay."

"The Spring Maid" will call for all of the musical and dramatic resources of the Hartman-Steindorff organization. Among the favorites who will be seen in the cast are George Kunkel, Paul Hartman, John Van, Rafael Brunetto, Robert Carlson, Lillian Glaser, Lavinia Winn, Hazel Van Haultren, Nona Campbell and Edna Malone. Matinees will be given on Saturday and Sunday.

Knighthood at the Curran.

The next attraction at the Curran Theatre, beginning Sunday night, will be the Cosmopolitan production of "When Knighthood Was in Flower," with Marion Davies as Princess Mary Tudor. Assisting Miss Davies are Ernest Glendinning, Lyn Harding, William Norris, Theresa Maxwell Conover, Ruth Shepley, Forrest Stanley, Pedro de Cordoba and many others—fifty-five principals and hundreds of minor players. After the initial opening on Sunday night matinees will be given daily during the limited engagement.

The Orpheum Next Week.

Herbert Williams and Hilda Wolfus are what might be termed the best-known "nuts" in the country. Mr. Williams is an expert in this form of comedy.

Paul Morton and Naomi Glass, a youth who sings, dances, and chats agreeably and a "miss" who is attractive and capable, have a new skit this season entitled "April," written by Paul Girard Smith.

Every one who knows vaudeville knows Bill Robinson, "The Dark Cloud of Joy." His humor and his eccentric stepping have made him one of the favorites among local theatre-goers.

Val and Ernie Stanton, the "English Boys from America," have proved as popular comedians as ever played the Orpheum.

McDevitt, Kelly and Quinn, "The Piano Movers and the Actress," have an informal bit of comedy entertainment which is different.

Foley and Leture present "Musical Comedy Divertissements." They sing, dance, and talk in an exceptional manner.

Galletti and Koken are a new combination of performers which promises to bring one of the greatest surprises seen here in many a day.

The Three Bruntons with their "Droll Doings" present some clever comedy and entertaining feats.

Gadski and Hughes.

Mme. Johanna Gadski, who will be heard in concert at the Civic Auditorium on Friday evening, November 24th, will have as her accompanist Margo Hughes, the distinguished California pianist. Margo Hughes has won recognition throughout the East and her many friends will welcome her.

Mona Gondre.

When Mona Gondre, the French chanteuse, appears as the artist of the next Alice Seckels' matinee musicale in the Colonial Ballroom of the Hotel St. Francis next Monday afternoon, November 13th, at 3 o'clock, many of the French colony will be present, and one box draped with the French flag will be reserved for the French consul, Mr. J. Neltner, and his guests. There will also be one for Professor Michaud, the exchange professor from France now associated with the university. Mme. Gondre was a favorite of the trenches during the war, and won honors from the French government.

The Organist of Notre Dame.

Marcel Dupre, the organist of Notre Dame Cathedral, Paris, will make a single appearance in this city at the Exposition Auditorium, Tuesday evening, November 28th. He is making his first transcontinental tour.

No organist of this generation, it is said, has won so many honors as Dupre. At twenty-eight he won the highest prize offered by the French government, the coveted Grand Prix de Rome, with a cantata for mixed voices and orchestra, entitled "Psyche." At thirty he became organist at Notre Dame Cathedral, the most desirable post of the kind in Europe. At thirty-four he played the complete organ works of Bach perfectly and from memory in ten recitals at the French Conservatory. This is probably the greatest feat accomplished by a virtuoso since the organ was developed.

Many in Use
Around San Francisco

Cuts 24 Inches

H. V. CARTER MOTOR CO.
52 Beale St. SAN FRANCISCO
(Hand, Horse and Power Mowers)

THE SANTA BARBARA GIRLS' SCHOOL

Resident and Day Pupils. Eleven acres. Country Life and Sports. Sleeping-porches. Open-air school rooms. Riding. Swimming all the year round. Basis of work, clear thinking.

MARIAN L. CHAMBERLAIN, A. M., Principal
P.O. BOX 548, SANTA BARBARA, CAL.

FERNAC SCHOOL OF LANGUAGES

Class or Private Instructions

Prepares for All Colleges

Kohler & Chase Bldg. 26 O'Farrell St.
Phone Douglas 6732

Service

"I had six honest, serving men;
(They taught me all I knew):
Their names are WHAT and WHY and WHEN,
and HOW and WHERE and WHO."
(DIPLOMA)

WHAT was the Declaration of London? WHAT are consols?
WHY does the date for Easter vary from year to year?
WHEN and by whom was the great pyramid of Cheops built?
HOW can you distinguish a malarial mosquito?
WHERE is Canberra? Zeebrugge? Delhi?
WHO was Mother Bunch? Mill boy of the Slashes?
Are these "six men" serving you too? Give them an opportunity by placing

WEBSTER'S NEW INTERNATIONAL DICTIONARY

in your home, office, school, club, shop, library. This "Supreme Authority" in all knowledge offers service, immediate, constant, lasting, trustworthy. Answers all kinds of questions. A century of developing, enlarging, and perfecting under exacting care and highest scholarship insures accuracy, completeness, compactness, authority.

The name Merriam on Webster's Dictionaries has a like significance to that of the government's mark on a coin. The NEW INTERNATIONAL is the final authority for the Supreme Courts and the Government Printing Office at Washington.

Write for a sample page of the New Words, specimen of Regular and India Papers, also booklet "You are the Jury," prices, etc. To those naming this magazine we will send free a set of Pocket Maps.

G. & C. MERRIAM COMPANY, Springfield, Massachusetts, U. S. A.

Established 1831

Name..... Address.....

Cabinets

of outstanding beauty, strikingly original in design, and exceptionally fine in quality and workmanship, are now one of the interesting features of our stock.

At this store the most exacting requirements of the most particular customer can be met and satisfied both in price and merchandise.

John Breuners Co.
of San Francisco

281 Geary St. nr. Powell

THE ALLEGED HUMORISTS.

"Jack looks as if he had lost his best friend." "He has; he married her."—Life.

Young Doctor (introducing his only patient to a friend)—Mr. Brandel—my practice.—Fliegende Blätter.

"Your son spends all his time at golf." "Yes, I am giving him a thorough business training."—Judge.

Tourist—Is this a quiet place? Fisherman—Well, it were, sir, until folks began coming here to be quiet.—Punch.

Wealthy Uncle—What would you do if I should give you a hundred dollars. Young Nephew—Count it.—Williams Purple Cow.

Him—This tunnel cost millions of dollars. Her—An entire waste of money as far as you're concerned, isn't it?—Penn State Froth.

Teacher—Where was the Declaration of Independence signed? Willie (after three minutes of silence)—At the bottom.—Pitt Panther.

"Pardon me. Did you drop your handkerchief during the toddle?" "Oh! I'm so embarrassed! That's my dress."—Carolina Tar Baby.

"But, my dear girl, you shouldn't say things like that about yourself." "Oh, I tell everything. I'm so afraid of being found out."—Life.

Student—Beg pardon, sir, but what is this that you have written on my theme? Professor—I told you to write more legibly.—Iowa Fricol.

First Old Woman—Well, Mrs. 'iggins, I wish you all you wishes me. Second Old Woman—An' 'oo's sayin' nasty things now?—Boston Transcript.

Constable—I warn you that anything you say may be used in evidence against you. Have you anything to say? Prisoner—I did it. Constable—Perhaps you won't mind if I write "I done it." That is the usual expression.—Punch.

Yacht Owner—How delightful, how idyllic! I absolutely worship the waves! Lady Guest—I'm so awfully glad you like them. I had them done permanently just before I came away.—London Passing Show.

Danny—Mama, are you going to get that fur coat from papa for your birthday? Mama—No, darling. Danny—Have you tried throwing yourself on the floor and kicking with your feet like I do?—New York Mail.

Professor—Look, Martha, at the young man running in haste toward his classroom. The boy must be eager for knowledge. The Wife—But you forget that it is raining. Thomas.—Washington and Jefferson Wag Jag.

"Come over here and meet Mr. Smith," said a friend, "the great Russian expert." "What is a Russian expert?" we asked. "Well, he went to Russia and came back alive," explained the friend.—Kansas City Star.

Woman (to tramp)—This is the fourth time the last two weeks you have been begging at my door. Are you always out of work? Tony—No, madam. But I have been particularly fortunate the last few weeks.—California Pelican.

Dear Mrs. McGowan across the hall was speaking of the trouble she's been having with her car. "But everybody has trouble lately," she said; "and it's nothing in the world but them using these raw materials at the factories."—Motor Life.

"Here's a book, madam," said the book agent, "which tells you how to keep your husband. It's a wonderful little book." "I've been keeping my husband for the last fifteen years," replied the woman. "What I want is a book that would tell me how to make him go to work and keep me, for a change."—Judge.

Key to a Safe Deposit Box in
Crocker Safe Deposit
Vaults Means
Security.

Crocker Safe Deposit Vaults
Crocker Building Post and Market Sts.

Words Without Thought.

The real perils of the English language today, in my judgment, lie not in expansion or in contraction of vocabulary; but much more in a certain noisy carelessness or sloppy indifference; a failure to recognize that thought is desirable, not only before speech, but also in speech; an apparent numbness to the finer sense of words, writes Henry Van Dyke in the October Yale Review. The effects of this creeping paralysis may be observed constantly in streets and shops and ballrooms, and frequently in books and newspapers. For example, a distinguished historian writes that he proposes to "assess" a certain character, when he has no intention of taxing it, but simply means to estimate its worth. A popular novelist makes his hero leave a room "precipitously," yet without throwing him down the stairs or letting him leap from a window. An ardent advertiser proclaims the "slogan" of his ready-made clothing, although his purposes are all pacific. Even a philosopher, a Platonist, writes that certain plays "intrigue" him, when evidently he means, not that they perplex him, but merely that they interest him.

Mme. Curie owns uranium mines in Cornwall, which are at present the chief potential radium supply in the world.

The British troops in Constantinople number more than 7000 men, and cost the British taxpayer £44,000 a week.

High Cost of Polygamy.

The high cost of living is having the effect of discouraging polygamy in Zululand. Such is the report of the Danish author, Olaf Linck, who has sojourned a year in that country. A good wife costs at present eight oxen, and the market is so firm that many fathers sell their daughters on installments. The man pays one ox when the woman arrives, and one weekly. When the purchaser does not pay the installment punctually the father takes his daughter back. The husbands find this on the whole to their advantage. If a man is dissatisfied with his wife after a week or two of wedlock he simply declines to pay.

Notable New Books

from the list of

HOUGHTON MIFFLIN COMPANY

LETTERS OF FRANKLIN K. LANE.

This revelation of the inner history of the Wilson Cabinet will set all America talking. But even more important is the revelation of one of the great letter writers of our time. Secretary Lane wrote as he talked, straight from the shoulder. His letters are a delight to read and their publication is an event both in the world of literature and of affairs. Californians will be especially interested in these letters, not only because Secretary Lane was himself a resident of the state, but especially because much of the correspondence has to do with Californian persons and affairs. Illus. $5.00.

GEORGE WASHINGTON.

William Roscoe Thayer

Mr. Thayer has brought to the study of Washington the same unique ability to unveil the real man that made his studies of John Hay, Cavour, and Roosevelt preëminent in American biographical literature. Illus. $3.50.

GLIMPSES OF AUTHORS.

Caroline Ticknor

Charming sketches and piquant personal reminiscences of great literary figures of the last century, here and in England. Illus. $3.50.

THE REAL LINCOLN.

Jesse W. Weik

In this notable volume the collaborator of Herndon brings out more fully the human side of Lincoln, the incidents of his home life and his activities as a lawyer. Illus. $4.00.

WISE MEN FROM THE EAST AND FROM THE WEST.

Abraham Mitrie Rihbany

A notable interpretation of the East to the West that is essential for any one who wished to fully understand the situation in the Near East. $2.50.

JOHN BURROUGHS TALKS.

Clifton Johnson

"There have been many books written about John Burroughs, but none quite so fascinating as this, taking one into his daily life and thought."—St. Louis Globe-Democrat. Illus. $4.00.

THE LAST HARVEST.

John Burroughs

A final collection of essays by America's great naturalist, including two important studies of Emerson and Thoreau. Frontispiece. $2.00.

A CRITICAL FABLE.

Some is lampooning the present-day poets. "Both a witty and incisive piece of work."—Louis Untermeyer. "Far and away the cleverest thing I have seen in many a moon."—Jessie B. Rittenhouse. $1.00.

SADDLE SONGS.

H. H. Knibbs

A new volume of Western poems by the author of "Riders of the Stars," "Songs of the Trail," "Overland Red," "Partners of Chance," etc. $1.50.

CAPTAIN BLOOD.

Rafael Sabatini

A romance of the Spanish Main by the author of "Scaramouche." "A rip-roaring, swash-buckling, piratical, seadog, cut, thrust, slash, love story of the nth power. I certainly enjoyed it."—William Lyon Phelps. $2.00.

KING COAL

High in Heat Units
Low in Ash

FOR SALE BY ALL DEALERS
IN CALIFORNIA

KING COAL CO.

Main Office
EXCHANGE BLOCK
San Francisco

Wholesale Only

The Catacombs of Cypress Lawn

Comparable with the luxurious tombs of ancient Egyptian kings, yet within the means of people of moderate circumstances.

A stone edifice, highly artistic in appearance, containing a magnificent chapel. Eleven Tomb Rooms, 425 Crypts.

Cypress Lawn Cemetery
Association

Phone Douglas 4772

995 Market St.

FOR A

CLEAR COMPLEXION

and a

HEALTHY COLOR

eat

FLEISCHMANN'S YEAST

Three Cakes a Day

The Wright Magazine

("Not for self, but for others")

Only $1.00 a Year.

Besides a serial and short stories it contains departments for literary and music, women and children, farm and garden, a people's forum, manuscript markets, radio notes and other interesting features.

THE WRIGHT MAGAZINE

P. O. Box 894

Little Rock, Ark.

The Argonaut.

VOL. LXXXI. No. 2382.

SAN FRANCISCO, NOVEMBER 18, 1922.

Price Ten Cents

PUBLISHER'S NOTICE: The Argonaut (title trade-marked) is published every week by the Argonaut Publishing Company. Subscriptions, $5.00 per year; six months, $2.55; three months, $1.50, payable in advance—postage prepaid. Subscriptions to all foreign countries within the Postal Union, $6.00 per year. Sample copies free. Single copies, 10 cents. News Dealers and Agents in the interior supplied by the San Francisco News Company, 747 Howard Street, San Francisco. Subscribers wishing their addresses changed should give their old as well as new addresses. The American News Company, New York, are agents for the Eastern trade. The Argonaut may be ordered from any News Dealer or Postmaster in the United States or Europe. Special advertising rates to publishers. Address all communications to The Argonaut, 207 Powell Street, San Francisco. Make all checks, drafts, postal orders, etc., payable to "The Argonaut Publishing Company."

Entered at the San Francisco Postoffice as second-class matter. The Argonaut can be obtained in London at the International News Co., Brems Building, Chancery Lane; American Newspaper and Advertising Agency, Trafalgar Square, Northumberland Avenue; and at Daws Steamship Agency, 17 Green Street, Leicester Square, and can be ordered from any of the news-stands of W. H. Smith & Son. In Paris, at 37 Avenue de l'Opéra. In New York, at Brentano's, Fifth Avenue and Twenty-Fourth Street. In Chicago, Western News Company. In Washington, at Adams' News Agency, Ninth and G Streets.

The Argonaut is on sale at the Ferry Station, San Francisco, by Foster & Orear; on the ferryboats of the Key Route system by the news agents, and by the Van Noy-Interstate Company on Southern Pacific boats and trains.

Telephone, Kearny 5895. Publication office, 207 Powell Street. WM. J. MILLIKEN, Business Manager.

FORTY-SIXTH YEAR

ALFRED HOLMAN - - - - - EDITOR

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

|   |         |
|---|---------|
| EDITORIAL: The Mood of the Hour—The Lock-Step in Education—Charity and Bolshevism—Blind Guides—Washington—The Naturalist of La Plata..... | 321-323 |
| PRESENT DAY SENTIMENT IN JAPAN: Hostile Feeling Appears to Have Been Dispelled by the Washington Conference. By Francis B. Loomis.....    | 323-324 |
| OLD FAVORITES .....   | 324     |
| INDIVIDUALITIES: Notes About Prominent People All Over the World.....   | 324     |
| A CALIFORNIAN AND A KING: How David Lubin, the Sacramento Merchant, Founded the International Institute of Agriculture.....               | 325     |
| BANKING AND INVESTMENT NEWS.....  | 326-327 |
| BOOKS ON THE TABLE: Notes of Books and Authors.....   | 328     |
| BRIEFER REVIEWS: New Books Received.....  | 329     |
| DRAMA: "The Skin Game"; "When Knighthood Was in Flower"; At the Plaza. By Josephine Hart Phelps.....                                      | 330     |
| FOYER AND BOX-OFFICE.....   | 331     |
| VANITY FAIR: The Wild and the Tame—Feminism and the London Clubs—A Terrible Memoirist.....  | 332     |
| STORYETTES: Grave and Gay, Epigrammatic and Otherwise .....   | 333     |
| THE MERRY MUSE.....   | 333     |
| PERSONAL: Social Notes—Movements and Whereabouts.....   | 334-335 |
| THE ALLEGED HUMORISTS.....  | 336     |

The Mood of the Hour.

In many respects Iowa is the representative American state. It is in the middle of the great corn belt. Its population is almost wholly of American breeding. Its industries are of the traditionally American sort. It is the only state in which there still exists an indigenous and independent local press. If at many points the Iowan is narrow, and reflective of what our book men style "economic illiteracy," the fact does not differentiate him from the great mass of American folk. In Iowa, more nearly than elsewhere, we have the "average" American.

Politically Iowa has long stood in the Republican column; and it still stands there nominally despite the fact that it has just sent to the United States Senate in the person of one Brookhart a Republican who, after the pattern of our own Hiram, is no Republican at all. Brookhart is Iowa, in its immediate mood, in the flesh. He is half-farmer and half-lawyer, with a big and lank frame which in the matter of costume is accoutred to match. He speaks with dramatic fervor the mood of the hour in Iowa—and in several other states. He reflects the prejudices and discontents of many who, whether rightly or wrongly, are resentful of conditions as they exist and who are none too critical of anything proposed in the name of reform. Brookhart, as to many issues, stands with La Follette of Wisconsin; but with louder tongue and more violent gesticulation. His pledge to the Iowan constituency is to reform things radically. Just how and after what manner he will go about it remains to be developed by time and circumstance.

The spirit of Iowa as reflected in Brookhart and illustrated in his success is, in large measure, the spirit of the whole Middle West, and, in some degree, of the whole country. It is this spirit that rejected Beveridge in Indiana, elected Frazier in North Dakota, reelected La Follette in Wisconsin, and that gave Lodge a close call in Massachusetts. It is easy to denounce it as radical and dangerous, as in truth it is. But it is wiser to regard it as a symptom of the times and as a state of the popular mind that must be heeded in relation to our future politics. Whether for good or for ill, the popular mind governs the country. And just now the Brookharts, the La Follettes, and the Johnsons—in brief the radical demagogues—are the exponents and the instruments of the popular mind.

We have in the result in Iowa the lesson of last week's election in concrete form. It will be the part of wisdom to heed it.

The Lock-Step in Education.

By a popular majority of approximately 14,000 the Oregon electorate last week adopted a measure recently designated in these columns as "Prussianism in Education." In truth this characterization is inadequate, since Prussianism in education only makes education compulsory. Oregon goes further in decreeing that all children shall be educated in public schools. The rule is positive under penalties. Any parent, guardian, or other person having control of any child between the ages of eight and sixteen failing to comply with the law shall be guilty of a misdemeanor and subject to a fine of not less than $5 nor more than $100, or to imprisonment in a county jail not less than two nor more than thirty days, or by both such fine and imprisonment in the discretion of the court. Each day's failure to comply with the law shall constitute a separate offense.

The aim of this law is to reduce the education of the youth of Oregon to a dead level. It is more directly aimed at church schools—schools maintained by Catholics in particular—but its effect is to prohibit all other than public schools to the end that "the principles of our government, the hopes and inspiration of our people, are best served by and through attendance of all children in our public schools." From the official affirmative argument we excerpt this grandiloquent admonition: "Mix the children of the foreign born with the native born, and the rich with the poor. Mix those with prejudices in the public school melting pot for a few years while their minds are plastic, and finally bring out the finished product—a true American."

While the main purpose of this law is to strike at church schools, another and accompanying motive is found in the jealousy and resentment of certain classes against other classes. The fundamental idea is that what is good enough for the poor or the moderately well-to-do is good enough for anybody. Thus those whose conditions enable them to provide for their children special associations and a more elaborate or definite culture shall not have license to do it because there are others who may not be able to do it. Boiled down it is the old case of the dog in the manger—if Jones may not give his children special cultural facilities, then Smith shall not have the privilege of giving such advantages to his children.

Carried into execution this law would close the doors of every private school in Oregon and would prevent parents of a particular religious faith from bringing up their children under influences tending to sustain that faith. In effect it takes the training of children, in so far as it is dependent upon schooling, from out the hands of parents and bestows it upon those who direct the policies of the public schools.

The initiative proposal under which this issue was put before the Oregon electorate came from one of the interior and less advanced counties where the Ku Klux Klan has established itself in immediate local influence. But, surprisingly, the cause was taken up by the Masonic organizations of the state, who conducted an open affirmative campaign. The theory was as above defined, but it is to be suspected that the traditional prejudice of the Masonic order against the Catholic church was a powerful if not, in truth, the main inspiration in the matter.

The rule having been decreed, it now becomes the law of Oregon. But happily it does not go into effect until September 1, 1926, and in this period there will be time to bring the matter before the courts and to determine what rights, if any, parents or guardians have in relation to the education of children under their control. The Argonaut will not undertake to define the rule of the National Constitution as it relates to the case, but it does know that what the Oregon electorate has decreed is in gross violation of a fundamental right in domestic affairs and of a fundamental principle of our American system. What becomes of the liberty of which we boast if among our prohibitions there shall be that which strikes directly at the right of the parent to prescribe influences under which his children shall be brought up—and as directly at the authority and dignity of the home?

Immediately involved in this matter is the very principle that inspired the adventure of the Pilgrim Fathers and of the multitude that followed them to the new world of America. The ideal of the founders of our country—the ideal that made them brave the terrors of the ocean and the terrors of a wilderness—is that of the right to worship God each upon the basis of his own faith and after his own views and standards. What becomes of religious liberty when a parent—Catholic, Protestant, Jewish or what not—may not have his children bred in the faith of their fathers? The decree of the Oregon electorate is plainly a denial of the religious liberty under which there was established as upon its cornerstone a fundamental rule in American life.

Charity and Bolshevism.

The reds have been having a family party at Moscow, attended by the red representatives of forty-five nations, to celebrate the fifth anniversary of the revolution. One feature of the festivities was a grand review of the well-nourished, well-uniformed, and well-equipped revolutionary army; not the rag, tag, and bobtail crew of two years ago, effective as that army was, but a sort of brand new and fitly furnished weapon for the emancipation of humanity from the clutches of capitalism and prosperity—and, by all accounts, one of the most formidable forces now mobilized in Europe. Of course, such an army is hungry for a fight, and recent Russian policy appears to have selected Poland for its next meal. There are threats and warnings that the treaty of Riga, which has lately defined the peace between Poland and Russia, will be abrogated on the Russian side, because the Polish foreign minister or secretary of state, or whatever it is they have in Poland corresponding to that officer, found it convenient to be out of town the other day when the Russian bolshevist ambassador called. Russia, being now more sensitive than a poor relation, interprets this as an insult and a repudiation of the treaty of Riga on Poland's part, and threatens to walk right over General Pilsudski and clear across Poland, reducing it to irredeemable bolshevism, and slaughtering the last millionaire. The sabre rattling promises to out-rattle that of William Hohenzollern at his best, demonstrating the hatred of the Internationale for every form of war.

Meanwhile the Russian crop situation shows but slight signs of improvement, and the outlook for famine and cannibalism is about as terrible as it was last winter. It is said that 8,000,000 Russian children will need the relief and support of kind-hearted persons in those backward countries where a surplus of food and clothing is still supplied by the diabolical system capitalism, and the immoral peoples still subsist in comparative comfort on that form of robbery which Proudhon identified with property. So it seems that Russia can fight, but her people can not eat. Her army is well equipped, but her children have no shoes. To kill her supposed enemies her own people must starve to death—or else be fed by the hated bourgeoisie of other nations.

More than this is evident in the situation. It is evident that Russia is counting, and not without warrant, on the charity of that hated bourgeoisie class in all prosperous countries, which is to say the United States, to support her people while she gets ready to butcher the bourgeoisie of Poland. And it is also becoming evident that the bolshevist system is not likely to give place to anything better as long as the charity of this country indirectly supports it. It is terrible to think of 8,000,000 children naked and hungry. Probably America will not let this thing be. But the tragedy of the situation is that feeding these children, and the other people in want in that hapless region, only releases food and materials for the bolshevik armies. It would be heartless to let the Russians starve, and if they are not again helped from without their tyrants will probably not help them, being more dependent on the army for the time being to bolster up their power than they are on the despoiled peasants and the little hungry children. But it seems plain that when American charity supplies Russian need, and when Russian resources, scanty as they are, go for the maintenance of the most formidable army in Europe, then this country is indirectly supporting that army. Nothing will end Russia's woes as long as those woes are in any degree supportable. Until they are permitted to become insupportable, Russia will have bolshevism, with well-fed armies and starving people. The Russian experiment can never demonstrate the desirability of socialism unless socialism is complete, and can never be complete while it draws subsistence from individualistic America.

Blind Guides.

In this country, when an election is over, thank Heaven, it is over. Americans do not believe in kicking the corpse. As a people we try to be generous to a defeated enemy, and we always admire the man that can take defeat with good grace. But in the case of a bad principle we are too careless. No people can afford to be tolerant of a vicious economic idea, or to repose confidence, in public affairs, in its proponents. And it is our too easy habit to forget the dangers that have threatened as soon as a majority of us thinks it has voted them away.

Socialism in California is down—temporarily. The single tax proposal has been beaten again, the Water and Power Amendment is at rest, even the socialistic development scheme exemplified at Delhi and Durham failed to receive its needed financial support. Californians have exhibited symptoms of sanity, and of the wholesome skepticism with which they view grandiose and impossible promises. But they are not yet through with the self-appointed uplifters. It is in no spirit of vengefulness, vendetta, or proscription that the Argonaut reminds its readers that the proponents of the attempted Water and Power Amendment still constitute an active element of the electorate. Had they been candidates for office their campaign transactions would have classified them clearly in the public mind, and had office-seeking been their sole purpose they might have been amenable to the salutary influence of a good licking at the polls; a process through which politicians are sometimes chastened into serviceability. But they espoused and promoted a cause that would have been the ruin of California, and there is no reason to believe that they knew it or that they will ever know it, for the reason that a well-warned people gave them no chance to try out their expensive fantasy.

As it was, they succeeded in misleading some 200,000 persons in this state about fundamental principles of public economics, and of business, which is private economics; and about the teachings of history and the significance of contemporary events. To do it they allied themselves more or less closely with the California chapter of the Non-Partisan League, which nearly bankrupted North Dakota, and with many a socialistic humbug and peddler of political quack medicine in the state (with certain personal reservations). We grant their sincerity. And the fact that they were sincere is the worst thing about them. Mere selfish crookedness could hardly accomplish the ruin that could be achieved by industrious reformers whose hearts are in the right place, but whose heads grow hot with dreams and visions. They have been outvoted two to one; but had they succeeded they would have put California into the ditch, whether they meant to or not. They would then have deceived themselves into the belief that the troubles they caused had some other cause, or that all their scheme needed to succeed was the socialization of the rest of the state; just as the socialists in Russia think that what is needed to make socialism succeed is the socialization of the rest of the world.

The attempted Water and Power Amendment was socialism, and nothing else. It does not follow, and we do not contend, that its promoters and supporters were all socialists. Many of them did not understand the proposed measure to be socialism. Many of them thought it some abracadabra for getting electric energy for nothing, just as some taxpayers think they travel over the state highways for nothing. But if the Water and Power Amendment promoters are not socialists, they at least have in their mental composition an element of the fallacious and a susceptibility to eccentric ideas. They do not seem to understand the foundation principles of our national development. They do not seem to know that the nation, and the West in particular (because it is closest and should be understood best), were developed and made strong by individual effort and not by paternalistic interferences and restraints and state monopolies, however well that system may appear to have worked in Germany. They belong to the category of those who have not yet perceived that genuine progress is of the people, not of the politicians; that it comes from liberty, not legislation.

And being so in error about the processes of progress and the requirements of the general welfare, they can be trusted to return to their reformatory efforts with some fresh nostrum, some new sort of Pawnee Indian medicine to purge and convulse an organism which is getting on very well without it. As doctors they are clever but fanciful. As guides they can never be trusted to lead us into the fat pastures of prosperity where the dividend buttercups grow, but only into some dismal swamp of suffocated effort and general weariness. It may not seem gracious now to say these things, and it certainly would be less than gracious to publish the names of some of those who, we assume, may prefer to step out of the spotlight of publicity for a little while. But the people of California should understand that no safely constructive or progressive proposals are likely to emanate from the agitators for the Water and Power Amendment, and that whatever they seek to promote in the future should be very carefully analyzed, with reference to the fantastic ideas of its authors, before being taken into the system.

Washington.

The stage is set for a busy winter at Washington, and by way of getting a running start with the season's work, President Harding has summoned Congress in special session for the 20th instant. The idea is to achieve a clean-up of legislation during the life of the present Congress, which ends March 3d, and so avoid the necessity for a special session in the summer of next year. This is a consummation devoutly to be wished. Congress has now been in almost continuous session for several years, and it will be a relief to the country, to the Administration, and to Congress itself if the meeting of the Congress which comes in March 4th can be put over until next fall. That this may be done is doubtful, but it is worth while to make an effort to that end.

A matter very much in the mind of the President is the ship subsidy proposal, which he is convinced is a necessity both for the maintenance and the extension of our foreign trade. In his judgment this is the most important piece of constructive work on hand, and it is to be expected that he will employ every resource at his command to impress his views upon Congress. The importance of maintaining and extending our foreign trade after a fashion only to be achieved by the development of our merchant marine is universally conceded. And there would not be, we suspect, serious difficulty in enlisting the support of Congress if we had not by one imposition or another created a difficult situation. We do not permit American shipping men to buy ships where they may be had cheapest, but require that they shall be of American construction. That adds largely to capital investment. Then under the dictation of labor unionism and of sentimentalism we have enacted a code of restrictive laws under which the operation of American ships costs much more than of foreign ships with which our ships must compete. More recently we have set up a sumptuary law enforcing prohibition aboard American ships which will inevitably play into the hands of rival boats. These inhibitions, prohibitions, and restrictions, taken together, create a condition resented by many who believe that the best way to create an American merchant marine is not so much to provide it with subsidies as to release it from the fetters of arbitrary restriction. But when all is said and done the fact remains that the only practical way to put our flag upon the seas is that proposed by the President, namely, to provide subsidies sufficiently generous to nullify the handicap of our restrictive rules and so enable American ships to compete at least upon equal terms with foreign rivals.

Incidental to the special session, now soon to convene, and in advance of the usual time, the figures of the budget will be made public. There are to be drastic cuts. The President has required his Cabinet to cooperate with the Budget Bureau, and the result is understood to be a wholesale programme of curtailments and postponements. Of course there will be protest piled upon protest. The air will be vocal with the shrieks of the shorn and the afflicted. But Mr. Harding is understood to have his jaw hard set. It is well that this should be so, since for all the demands for economy, an executive can acquire more and more virulent enemies by enforcing economy in expenditures than by any other course. Every close observer of political and governmental life knows this; and every executive of experience has had it burnt into the core of his soul. This is why executives in state and national government long have compromised and permitted the growth of extravagances that have now culminated in the back-breaking tax load the country is carrying.

In casting up treasury statistics recently it was discovered that the estimated revenues of this fiscal year promise to fall $692,000,000 short of the estimated receipts, thus leaving a prospective deficit of that amount at the end of the fiscal year. Explanation is clear. The earning capacity of the taxpayers, individual and corporate, was seriously reduced in the calendar year 1921. Thus tax payments coming into the treasury this calendar year of 1922, based on the earnings of 1921, have fallen off heavily. In estimating the prospective deficit it naturally is assumed that this reduction in revenue from taxation will continue to the close of the fiscal year June 30, 1923. Thus the figure of a prospective deficit of $692,000,000 is reached; and the budget is being prepared with a view to preventing a repetition of this condition. That is sound policy. There is no greater folly than to over-appraise your expectations. But as conditions are now shaping themselves it is probable that because of present economies and, further, because of improving business throughout the country there will be no deficit at the close of the fiscal year next June.

It is true that national taxes were somewhat reduced last year and that they will be on a lower level this year (in payments to be made next year) and that the lower rates will not yield as much as was expected in current tax payments. But we find 1922 business much improved over 1921; and the significance of this fact is that the revenue from taxation to be collected in the first half of 1923 promises to be much larger than the amount collected in the first half of the present calendar year. Since the budget is based on the low yield of business in the year 1921, a pleasant surprise for the government appears to be in prospect.

Other factors are to be taken into consideration, among them the tariff bill. Imports measured both in value and by units are increasing, with consequent increase in customs receipts. Originally it was estimated that the Fordney-McCumber bill would bring in about $350,000,000 a year. Present indications are that it will bring in anywhere from $450,000,000 to $550,000,000. Improved business conditions are, when submitted to analysis, exhibiting startling results.

Congress in the coming session will concern itself chiefly with the appropriation bills and with the ship subsidy proposal. There has been a good deal of loose talk by newspapers and even by some government officials of a prospective revision upwards of the revenue laws because of the impending deficit. But with the financial affairs of the government in the condition above outlined there is little prospect of disturbing the revenue laws at this session, and probably no attempt will be made in that direction. The Administration is definitely opposed to it.

In the coming months interest is more likely to centre in the executive departments of the government than in Congress. The President has to fill a large number of official posts now vacant or in the way of being vacated, many appointments having been held back for the result of the elections. There is to be named an Associate Justice of the Supreme Court in place of Justice Day. Mr. Harding, it is understood, is inclined as a matter of political equity to appoint a Democrat and it is known that he thinks favorably of Senator Shields of Tennessee, a very capable man of judicial experience. But ex-Ambassador John W. Davis is being urged, and from many points of view this would be a better as assuredly it would be a more popular appointment. We have not heard that the Pacific Coast has a candidate for appointment in succession to Day, but there are reasons why the President might cast his eye in this direction, especially as we have in Mr. Garret McEnerney a man of outstanding qualification for high judicial office. We have no reason to believe that Mr. McEnerney is a candidate, but his appointment to the Supreme Bench would be eminently appropriate for a variety of reasons, and it would go far to strengthen a court that has, in respect to the advanced age of certain of its members, gone a bit to seed. Besides the immediate vacancy in the Supreme Court there is to be named by the President a number of Federal judges under the new law increasing the judicial organization throughout the country—one for the northern and one for the southern district of our own state. Other vacancies are two in the Federal Reserve Board, not to mention other posts of greater or less importance.

The President and Secretary Hughes will be called upon to give serious attention during the winter to our foreign relations. We may expect something very soon in regard to American participation in the Permanent Court of International Justice. Negotiations are now in progress looking to our participation in that court so soon as arrangements shall be made by which we may have a voice in selecting justices for that bench. Certain newspapers that ought to be better informed assume that to enter the Court of International Justice this government will have in a manner to associate itself with the League of Nations. There is error here. Article Fourteen of the Covenant contains all that there is in that instrument regarding the court, and that is merely an authorization to the council of the league to provide for such a court. The council delegated to a committee of justices, including Mr. Elihu Root, the task of providing a plan for the court. The committee recommended a tribunal such as has been constituted, its report including also the method of nominating members of the bench. The league adopted the report as a species of statute to which various nations announced their adherence. For the purpose of permitting the United States to nominate for future vacancies on the bench an amendment to that statute is all that is necessary, and this should not be difficult of accomplishment. The fact should not be overlooked that when the league sent out invitations for submission of nominations it specifically addressed invitations to each national group in the panel of The Hague tribunal. Thus one of these invitations came to the American group, consisting of Root, Moore, Gray and Strauss. They declined to submit American nominations on the ground that they had no authority from their government to do so, they being merely commissioned to sit on The Hague tribunal. But American right to nominate members of the court is not in immediate issue because the present bench has been elected for terms of nine years which began only last year; and barring death or resignations there will be no vacancies. The court is made up of eleven judges and four deputy judges. Both Mr. Elihu Root and Mr. John Bassett Moore were nominated by other national groups and Mr. Moore was elected, Mr. Root declining on the ground of advanced age. Moore, who is as well qualified as any man we could select, is now on the bench, thus giving American representation.

There is a possibility that some time within the winter the Administration may move in the direction of a world economic conference at Washington. Such an invitation would need to be accompanied by a proviso that the agenda shall be so drawn up as to exclude consideration of questions affecting the debts owed to the United States by European countries. How far the Administration is prepared to go is not known, perhaps not even to itself, but there is no doubt that something of the sort is very much in the minds of President Harding and Secretary Hughes.

The Naturalist of La Plata.

Since William H. Hudson's death a few weeks ago his fame has already spread thrice as far as in any year of his lifetime; he has become, in fact, almost a legendary figure. Given a generation or two and the petrifying process of legend will be complete. For the detailed facts of the great naturalist's life are not known. Hudson was born about eighty years ago somewhere on the South American pampas and his youth was spent there on the great ranches of the country absorbing nature in stretches of solitude. Probably he did not write much in youth, which accounts in part for his belated "success" in the worldly sense. Most of his books bear fairly recent dates. "The Naturalist in La Plata" was published in London by Dent in 1903. Incidentally, it has been republished by the American firm of Dutton this year and the latter house has also issued since Hudson's death "The Book of a Naturalist." Though there is no certainty about his private life, it was assumed that he had never been married. Not that Hudson cloaked his past in mystery. Broad outlines such as he has allowed his readers to discern for themselves from books it would be an exaggeration to call autobiographical, exist. We know much of the general tenor of his life on the South American pampas and of his birding pursuits in the British Isles, but of such material is legend the natural growth. The facts are very scarce indeed. He was a silent man, not a hermit, since he mingled even in the literary life of London, but he was a recluse by nature or by early training on the pampas. Hudson's extreme reticence about his affairs is interesting in the light of his confession that he had a De Quinceyish yearning to know everything about the people he met from birth to death. But that was merely an extension of his abnormal instinct to study life, whether high or low. Even the date of his birth was unknown probably by any one, as we may infer from the fact that the indefatigable Library of Congress admits defeat and leaves his date line blank. Practically every one knew of his existence and practically no one knew him intimately.

Recognition came to Hudson rather late in life as it has more recently to another recluse, Arthur Machen. But that it seems to come ultimately to those who deserve it makes one wonder whether publicity is worth the blight it has put on modern life. If complete lack of advertising can not down a man like Hudson, its chief use would seem to be that of pushing ahead of him for more immediate consideration some one less worthy of it. Publicity then runs counter to the law that the fittest survive, but the latter is potent in the end.

Contributory to the Hudson legend which we foresee are the facts that his name is far from unique and that he wrote two very different kinds of book. The student a hundred years hence who looks up the author of "The Naturalist in La Plata" and "Birds and Man" may, unless the student of the future is very much more accurate than his ancestor of today, easily conclude that his man is William Hudson, English botanist, apothecary, and naturalist, born about 1730, or roughly about a century before our Hudson was. Or, if our imaginary seeker after biographic fact in the year 2020 has been reading "The Crystal Age" or any of Hudson's other fictitious and in our opinion inferior works, may he not naturally infer they were the literary output of the other William Henry Hudson, author and professor of English literature, still alive?

It would seem almost impossible to insure the future identity of one of the greatest literary luminaries of our age. For Hudson, despite his bad novels, was all of that in addition to being one of the greatest naturalists the world has ever known. Small wonder that he had no leisure for personal pursuits when one considers his incessant devotion to the study of animal life and plant life and in the light of his immense achievement in these researches. He was a living example of the maxim that you must devote yourself whole-heartedly to the pursuit in which you would succeed—that no man can serve two masters.

PRESENT DAY SENTIMENT IN JAPAN.

Hostile Feeling Appears to Have Been Dispelled by the Washington Conference.

The editor of the Argonaut has asked me to set down some of my impressions of Japan, which I recently visited for a short time during a sojourn in the Orient.

Whatever else it may be, the Orient is always interesting, and one can not enter it through a more inviting gateway than that of Japan. The last twenty years, since her victorious contest of arms with Russia, Japan has been more or less continuously in the public's field of view. This nation has gone through many changes within this period, and perhaps none have been more marked than those which have come to fulfillment since the Washington Conference. The success of the Conference on Limitation of Armament at Washington marks the beginning of a new era in Japan. The people had already moved forward to the most advanced line marked by the Washington Conference, but they were not all fully aware of their own progress and the world at large was quite unaware of it. What I have in mind is illustrated in a concrete way in the case of Siberia. The average American thinks the Japanese army was withdrawn from Siberia solely by reason of the suggestions and urge of the Washington Conference. This, however, is not the case. The people had, in fact, made up their minds to have done with the Siberian enterprise before the Washington Conference was called. The Conference by its action, however, made it easier for them to give effect to their opinions and to express their desires through governmental agencies. The sentiment of Japan has been for a long time overwhelmingly in favor of withdrawing the troops from Siberia.

Not only has Japan withdrawn her military forces from Siberia, but she has taken out, at government expense, all the civilians with their families who were living there and who did not care to remain after the end of the Japanese occupation, for the reason that they foresaw that there would probably be a season of disorder and anarchy following the departure of the Japanese troops.

In Shantung the Japanese are fulfilling promptly and scrupulously all their obligations and responsibilities which grew out of the Washington Conference. As a matter of fact, none of the participating nations in the Washington Conference has carried out its treaty obligations with greater fidelity. Indeed Japan has gone further than any of them, with the possible exception of the United States, in this direction.

The Washington Conference has had the same salutary effect in Japan that it has had in the United States respecting the relations between the two countries. The sense of constraint, of tension, and of irritation which prevailed has disappeared and all the jingo talk about the ultimate inevitability of war between the two countries has vanished as mist beneath the rays of the sun. There never was adequate justification for such talk, and any one who visits Japan and studies conditions there could not believe that there was any desire or serious expectation on the part of the Japanese government to engage in hostilities with the United States. The Japanese people and the Japanese statesmen are highly intelligent and they have as little liking for war as any people in the world. They know the cost in men and money of modern warfare thoroughly well, and they know that they could not engage in a more unpleasant adventure than war with the United States or any other great power. What is more, they should be given credit, not only for intelligence in wishing to avoid hostilities for economic and political reasons, but they should be given credit for a fundamental and traditional kindly feeling for the United States which makes the thought of war with this country particularly abhorrent to them. I am now speaking of the governing class.

Business and financial conditions in the Orient are not reassuring for the moment. China is in a state of governmental confusion and financial disorder. Japan of course is well governed, highly organized, and a thoroughly disciplined country. Her difficulties are those which we ourselves have confronted since the world war, only with this difference—that the United States recognized changed conditions and acted upon them with greater promptness and thoroughness. Japan has not undertaken the process of deflation. War prices still rule in the Island Empire. I had opportunity to talk with many of the leading bankers, financiers, and captains of industry, and I find that they have no illusions and that they see clearly and wisely conditions as they actually exist. They know, too, what is before them and agree that Japan must face a year or two of unpleasant readjustment. Already steps are being taken to bring about deflation in certain directions, and I think we may confidently expect that Japan will work through her post-war financial difficulties with a good deal more wisdom than many of her European contemporaries.

There are a great many readjustments going on in Japan and, as I have indicated, perhaps the most significant and serious one is that which has to do with the change in public sentiment in respect to military and imperialistic activities. So far as the outside observer can see and ascertain, Japan has come to the parting of the ways and has decided that it is not worth while to attempt further commercial advance through the acquisition of foreign territory. The so-called military party, which was responsible for the Siberian enterprise and some similar activities, apparently is out of favor and an era of economic retrenchment in military expenditures and of intense development of home industries is beginning. This does not mean, of course, that Japan is going to give up what she has lawfully acquired in Manchuria or other places where she has been established for years. But it means, as I see it, that she has no present desire for further territorial conquests, but expects to consolidate what she has, to develop to a high point her manufacturing and the skill of her mechanics, and do all that she can properly do to supply the Orient with manufactured products.

I found the people in Japan, as I met them on the streets, in tramways, and on railroad trains, polite and apparently cherishing kindly feeling toward the American traveler or tourist. On the steamship returning I encountered a large number of Americans who had been traveling through the country and they reported to me that they had, without exception, encountered only courteous and fair treatment. Occasional stories that have reached this country about the unfriendly attitude of Japanese toward Americans seem to be merely isolated cases where Americans themselves often have been at fault and have themselves occasioned hostility. I think it safe to say that any well-behaved American in Japan would receive just as pleasant and courteous treatment on the streets of Tokyo or any other Japanese city as a Japanese citizen would who strolled about the streets of Washington or Philadelphia.

Contrary to the opinion of many Americans, the Japanese are not at all excited or deeply interested in the question of emigration. I had occasion in the course of some remarks before a large and representative gathering in Japan to point to the fact that the United States is thoroughly aroused to the dangers of indiscriminate immigration; that our law now limits immigration to 3 per cent. of the people of any nationality already domiciled in this country, and that in all probability a new law will be enacted which, among other things, will most certainly prohibit the entrance of Oriental labor. This law, while it will apply to the Japanese, will not be discriminatory, and for that reason will not be objected to. I find that a good many of the so-called problems and issues between the two countries are not so big nor so menacing nor so difficult when one comes face to face with important Japanese and talks, as it were, across the table with the leaders of our intelligent and enlightened neighbors across the Pacific. One outstanding fact was most clearly established in my mind in my recent visit to the Orient and to Japan, and that is that we are not, in all probability, likely to have war with Japan in the life of any man now living.

One would fail to give a true account of the new forces at work in Japan if one passed over the growing participation of Japanese women in the activities of life. For the first time, I believe, in the history of that country, one may see Japanese girls of the upper classes mingling with other dancers at the balls given at the Imperial Hotel in Tokyo. This in the eyes of the Japanese is a prodigious advance step on the part of the women and is looked upon with strange apprehension and concern by some of the older and more conservative people. The Japanese women are taking an active part as leaders in educational work. They are beginning to manifest an interest in politics and I noticed were attending public meetings. I encountered them actively engaged in journalism and noticed a very large number of young women employed in the offices of professional men and in the large banking and business houses. There is a very definite feminist movement, and I rather think that within a reasonable length of time women will win recognition and the political status which they enjoy in this country and Great Britain.

A good deal is being said these days about the attitude of foreigners in respect to Americans and about agencies for the creating of good feeling abroad. I will record one observation on this subject. On shipboard bound for the Orient were representatives of the Rockefeller Institute, a dignified, quietly working humanitarian organization which is carrying in a practical way the gospel of hygiene, correct living, and physical well-being to all parts of the globe, and which is employing the finest medical, scientific, and organizing talent that can possibly be secured. In distant and little known localities you will find these agents of the Rockefeller Institute working among the humblest natives and bringing health and bodily strength and happiness to thousands and hundreds of thousands of human beings. Not only are they relieving present physical ills, curing the sick, but they are carrying on research work of the utmost value to the race. It has been my experience when I have encountered a representative of the Rockefeller Institute that I have found myself in contact with a person of high character and competency, and I have seen them at work in many parts of the world. I know of no other influence, private or official, emanating from this country which does so much solid and enduring work abroad in the way of creating genuine good-will for America and Americans as the Rockefeller Institute.

FRANCIS B. LOOMIS.

OLD FAVORITES.

Thanksgiving.

The Superintendent of an Almshouse. A Pauper.

SUPERINTENDENT:

So you're unthankful—you'll not eat the bird?
You sit about the place all day and gird.
I understand you'll not attend the ball
That's to be given tonight in Pauper Hall.

PAUPER:

Why, that is true, precisely as you've heard:
I have no teeth and I will eat no bird.

SUPERINTENDENT:

Ah! see how good is Providence. Because
Of teeth He has denuded both your jaws
The fowl's made tender; you can overcome it
By suction; or at least—well, you can gum it,
Attesting thus the dictum of the preachers
That Providence is good to all His creatures—
Turkeys excepted. Come, ungrateful friend,
If our Thanksgiving dinner you'll attend
You shall say grace—ask God to bless at least
The soft and liquid portions of the feast.

PAUPER:

Without those teeth my speech is rather thick—
He'll hardly understand Gum Arabic.
No, I'll not dine today. As to the ball,
'T is known to you that I've no legs at all.
I had the gout—hereditary; so,
As it could not be cornered in my toe
They cut my legs off in the fond belief
That shortening me would make my anguish brief.
Lacking my legs I could not prosecute
With any good advantage a pursuit;
And so, because my father chose to court
Heaven's favor with his ortolans and Port
(Thanksgiving every day!) the Lord supplied
Saws for my legs, an almshouse for my pride
And, once a year, a bird for my inside.
No, I'll not dance—my light fantastic toe
Took to its heels some twenty years ago.
Some small repairs would be required for putting
My feelings on a saltatory footing.

(Sings)

O the legless man's an unhappy chap—
Tum-hi, tum-hi, tum-he o'haddy
The favors o' fortune fall not in his lap
Tum-hi, tum-heede-do hum.
The plums of office avoid his plate
No matter how much he may stump the state—
Tum-hi, ho-heeee.
The grass grows never beneath his feet,
But he can not hope to make both ends meet—
Tum-hi.
With a gleecless eye and a sombre heart,
He plays the rôle of his mortal part:
Wholly himself he can never be,
O, a soleless corporation is he!
Tum.

SUPERINTENDENT:

The chapel bell is calling, thankless friend.
Balls you may not, but church you shall attend.
Some recognition can not be denied
To the great mercy that has turned aside
The sword of death from us and let it fall
Upon the people's necks in Montreal;
That spared our city, steeple, roof and dome,
And drowned the Texans out of house and home;
Blessed all our continent with peace, to flood
The Balkans with a cataclysm of blood.
Compared with blessings of so high degree,
Your private woes look mighty small—to me.
—Ambrose Bierce.

The Pine Trees.

Oh, the dark pines and the dim pines in the misty winter weather,
Wreath'd with filmy lace of cobwebs, hung with raindrops tinkling low!
Oh, the green pines and the grey pines where the shadows crowd together;
Pines in splendor on the hillsides, heedless tho' the storm-winds blow.
Oh, the frost chains, oh, the snow stars in the tossing branches gleaming!
Oh, the wonder of the pine trees when the world lies sheeted white!
Like a row of lovely ladies in the realm of fairy dreaming,
How the pine trees sweep their curtseys, holding skirts
aglow with light.
Oh, the green pines, oh, the grey pines, when the other trees are sighing,
And the bare boughs sway and shudder in the wild wind
as with fear;
Oh, the green pines and the grey pines, when the winter's slowly dying,
And the spring comes in and hails them bravest children of the year.
—Fall Mall Gazette, 1908.

INDIVIDUALITIES.

John Galsworthy is said to look more like a family lawyer than a successful novelist. He is clean shaven, precise in his dress, low-voiced, and not effusive. Neatness is his chief characteristic.

Smith W. Brookhart, elected to the United States Senate to fill the vacancy caused by the resignation of Judge W. S. Kenyon of Iowa, is one of the crack rifle shots of the country and one of the men who had much to do with training raw recruits in close rifle work during the war.

Lady Sykes, wife of Sir Frederick Sykes, and elder daughter of Mr. Bonar Law, will probably officiate as hostess at No. 10 Downing Street, as the new premier has been a widower since 1909. Lady Sykes was married in 1920, when her husband was controller-general of civil aviation. She is described as a tall and very dignified blonde.

It was sight-seeing and not singing that first brought Amelita Galli-Curci to America. She landed in New York with three thousand dollars and a determination to see our country. A chance encounter resulted in two appearances at five hundred dollars each reluctantly granted by Campanini to the then totally unknown prima donna. Taking out citizenship papers early in her stay here, Galli-Curci has become doubly an American by her recent marriage to her accompanist, Homer Samuels.

If Herbert Hoover should display his degrees after his name, the average writing paper would scarcely be wide enough to carry them on one line. Few officials now active in the work of the government have been the recipients of as many honors. The Secretary of Commerce has received more than a half-dozen gold medals and is an honorary citizen of almost as many countries. The colleges and universities which have conferred degrees upon him include Brown, Pennsylvania, Harvard, Yale, Columbia, Princeton, Johns Hopkins, George Washington, Dartmouth, Boston, Rutgers, Alabama, Oberlin, Liège, Brussels, Warsaw, Cracow, Oxford, Rensselaer, Tufts, Swarthmore, Williams, Manchester, and California.

Hiram Warren Johnson, who has just redemonstrated his popular majority in California, was born in Sacramento, 1866, the son of Grove Lawrence Johnson, in whose Sacramento office the younger Johnson began the study of shorthand, law, and politics. He was admitted to the California bar in 1888, practiced awhile in his native city, and removed to San Francisco in 1902. He was a member of the staff of prosecuting attorneys in the so-called "graft cases" in this city, in 1906-07. Senator Johnson was governor of California from 1911 to 1915, and was reelected for the term 1915-19, but resigned in '17. He was a founder of the Progressive party in 1912, and the same year was nominee for Vice-President on the new party ticket. He has been United States senator from California since 1917.

Alfred Emanuel Smith, governor-elect of the Empire State and familiarly known as "Al" to all East Side New York, is a democrat at heart as well as in politics. A "plain man of the people," he prides himself on having started public life as a newsboy. Always a favorite with his home district, his positive personality combined with a genial disposition would insure his success. Smith's political course may be said to have started in 1903, when at the age of thirty he was elected to the New York Assembly, where he became the Democratic leader in 1911 and Speaker of the Assembly in 1913. After defeating Governor Whitman in 1918 and serving as governor till 1920 Smith was defeated in that year owing to the landslide for Harding for President, in New York as elsewhere. Incidentally, Governor Smith was considered a possibility for presidential candidacy on the Democratic ticket in 1920. He was actually proposed at the Democratic convention here in that year and received a complimentary delegation vote. Mr. Smith is a Roman Catholic.

The new Prime Minister of England, Mr. Bonar Law, has recently been rather neatly sketched by Herbert Sidebotham in his "Political Profiles from British Public Life." "When he comes into the House," says Mr. Sidebotham of Mr. Law, "he looks the plain, kind-hearted, decent man, dressed as though for kirk. The eyes are wide open and shy; the manner, when his critics are talking, is the blend of deference and resignation with which people listen to a sermon. But when he rises to reply one becomes conscious of ability of a rare and curious kind. He can not create an atmosphere, he has no saliences of phrase, his gestures are undistinguished, and his voice is thin and dull, and before his resignation it was somewhat indistinct and low. But if you regard argument as the weaving of an intricate pattern, there is no one in the House to approach him for skill. You feel when he rises that he can never get under your rhetorical guard, and then suddenly the net is round you, and you are caught in meshes of argumentation so fine that you hardly know they are there until you feel yourself powerless."

Henri Franklin-Bouillon, the present man of the hour in France and in the Near East situation, is half English by birth and education. Through the greater part of his political life he has worked behind others and has therefore remained practically unknown till the recent crisis. Elected to the Chamber of Deputies in 1913, he supported Joseph Caillaux throughout and won some political favor. In 1917, when for a brief period Painlevé was premier, Franklin-Bouillon was credited in informed circles with controlling the government. However, during this period he incurred the enmity of Poincaré, which doubtless slowed up his political ascent. During the war he was in Washington as a member of the French parliamentary commission. While Briand was premier and the Allied governments were first discussing Near Eastern Affairs Franklin-Bouillon went to Angora and negotiated the now famous treaty with Mustapha Kemal, which was so bitterly censured in England, particularly when it became known that the French government had actually O. K'd the self-appointed diplomat's works in Angora. In France the newly risen politician is known as a man whom expediency rules. The extension of French influence in the Slavic area of Europe is frequently said to be the result of Franklin-Bouillon's work among Slavic interests during the war and immediately after the conference. So enthusiastic is his party in France over his achievements that he said to be slated for the French portfolio to Washington. He has been characterized as a person with a genius for friendship.

A CALIFORNIAN AND A KING.

How David Lubin, the Sacramento Merchant, Founded the International Institute of Agriculture.

The International Institute of Agriculture at Rome is a strange development. It is a product of the peculiar genius of the Hebrew people, supported morally by the patronage of Victor Emanuel III, an idealistic king. It may seem of such stuff as dreams are made on, and yet with purposes and methods as utilitarian as bricks and mortar. It is one more altruistic effort, but also a practical one, to solve the endless bread-and-butter problem of the world—which problem is also the main cultural problem of civilization, for there is no culture, and no civilization, without a solid substratum of material welfare. The purposes of the institute are large, general, and perhaps a bit obscure, and the mere layman wonders why so much was expected by so many experienced minds from so apparently simple a device. But the thing of main interest about it is the welcome combination of idealism and utilitarianism; and the thing of present and local interest is that a minor Hebrew prophet arose in California, which may be regarded as a combination of Palestine and Italy, and that he got the ear of a Roman king, after trial of his pet project on seventeen other rulers. Beyond that, is the further interest that the International Institute of Agriculture is a reality, that it functions, and that all the while the war was going on and the peace was being made, it contained within it the prototype of the League of Nations, which might better have been built upon it.

The title of a new book detailing this particular prophet's life-work, "David Lubin, a Study in Practical Idealism," by Mrs. Olivia Rossetti Agresti, is enough to engage the attention of any Californian. Here is a man of humanitarian impulses, a pioneer of merchandising, and a real lover of humanity. His portrait presents a physiognomy of Lincolnian beauty. Nor did the idealism that was in him take the form of attacks on the essentials of the industrial order. He had no use for Marxian socialism, nor the carefully formulated vagaries of the Lenin and Trotzky school. What he conceived as a possible great service of mankind was based on what mankind already possessed. His life was a groping toward justice, and he grew toward it in such familiar mundane places as San Francisco and Sacramento. For that purpose who shall say they are not just as good places as Jerusalem and Nazareth? And here is a picture, reported in his own words, of a bit of the growth process as it began on the rough old waterfront of San Francisco, where Lubin had gone into business:

It was the custom to ask tremendous sums and then sell for what you could get—eighty-five dollars for a suit of clothes, say, and then sell it for four. No change under "two bits" was spoken of, and a "bit" was 12½ cents. Coppers were not taken; to offer them was looked upon as an insult. Trade was done in those days by standing at the door of your store and inviting in customers—sailors and miners formed a goodly percentage of the motley population—and then you would "soak" them for all they were worth. It was the old-world, old-time system of barter, handed down from an immemorial past. It was a matter of bargaining and haggling over prices between salesman and customer, in which the latter was very generally worsted. To me it was hateful. I could not square it up with my notions of right and wrong, and I made a poor hand at the business. I was hardly worth my salt.

I remember that I was alone one day in the store when a sailor came in. I had been doing practically nothing for weeks past, and was dissatisfied and restless. I thought I would try my hand and see what I could do as a salesman, and I did quite a stroke of business as things were with us, for I took thirty dollars from the man, handing him only 10 cents change. But when the transaction was over I had made up my mind. It was wrong. I would have nothing more to do with it, and I determined that I would start for myself on the basis of fixed prices on all goods, marked in plain figures so that all could read.

I set out to find a place to start in, but nothing suitable offered in San Francisco, so I resolved to go up the river to Sacramento and see what chances there were in the state capital.

I went by boat, landing in Sacramento with my share of the stock, and pretty poor stuff it was, too. After looking around I found a place I thought would do, on a corner of K Street, above a basement saloon. It was about 10 feet wide by twelve feet deep, separated by a thin partition from a Chinese laundry. I occupied one-half. Under me was the saloon; and under the saloon was a pool of stagnant water. On the other corner there was another saloon, and yet another on the third corner.

Well, I settled in and made shelves and painted them, set up a counter made of dry-goods boxes covered with oilcloth, and hung out a sign "D. Lubin, ONE PRICE." ["Probably the first 'one price' sign hung out in America west of the Mississippi," comments Mr. Jacob Rubel in an article written after Mr. Lubin's death.] I used to get my meals for "two bits" on the floor above me where there was a boarding place, and a sloppy place it was, too. I rigged up a bunk in the store, under the counter, and slept there. It took "some" strength to take it apart later on; it was fastened together with spikes and would have stood the weight of an ox, let alone a man. I had a straw mattress and turned in one of the nights.

That was the genesis of Weinstock, Lubin & Co., an institution in the mercantile life of the state. There is much in Mrs. Agresti's book about the management of that store, in its relations with the human material employed in it, which portrays Lubin's character as the frontispiece does his face. It was not merely a one-price mercantile institution—it was a school wherein the employees learned service and duty. Service was the key to Lubin's character, the foundation of his institute. He felt that service was the mission of Israel, and a statement to that effect once drew him into a sharp controversy with Max Nordau—Nordau, who wrote a thick book a generation or so ago to prove the degeneracy of France—a folly gloriously refuted in the flames of Verdun. And there is another institution Sacramento owes Lubin, though changing tastes and styles have perhaps lessened appreciation of it in late years. He knew little about art, but he felt that it might make life better, so he promoted an art loan exhibit in the gallery of Mrs. Margaret Crocker's mansion, and a permanent organization to carry on the work. Here are some of the difficulties arising out of the peculiar social conditions he was trying to improve, as defined in his opening address:

In canvassing for life members the committee had certain experiences not laid down in the programme and which, for the time being, produced an effect that almost neutralized their ambitious zeal. "What do you want a museum for?" said one; "can't you see all the old stuff you want in a junk shop?"

Another said, "Museum? Nonsense! Hideous idols, Indian clubs, scalp, old Patent Office reports, cranky models of impossible inventions, old mummies that have a suspicious smell about them, plaster-of-Paris men and women with no clothes on them, bottles with nasty worms so carefully preserved as to save them intact for the day of resurrection, and to add to this insult to common sense, long-winded names that would puzzle the very Chief of Hades to get into plain solid English. Trash and nonsense! No museum for me!"

A third said, "Museum, indeed! Who goes to a museum? Lank and lean young men who wear their hair long and parted in the middle, whose mysterious appearance is heightened by their eyeglass string, significantly looped over the left ear; or the old codger who mopes around musty books, who delights in antediluvian remains, whose burden of lamentations consists in groaning after the missing link. No, sir! I don't want a museum! When I want progress, I'll send my boy to the most progressive machine shop or business house."

And so it comes to pass that when a man lives by bread alone his mind becomes desynaptic. Shop and nothing but shop soon converts a man into a boot, an overall, a barrel of sugar, a banknote, or a mortgage squeezer. Practical? Come, oh, practical stomach, let us write the biography of one such as you. Don't be impatient. We won't detain you long. Birth, Feed-money, Death. No sooner dead, when your hard-earned gold vanishes like a puff of smoke into hands other than you wished or dreamt of. . . . How unlike "the image of God" such men are, allied by instinct and capacity to the brute. These are the men above all who have need of a museum. . . .

The exhibit was a success, and Lubin pressed his luck:

As the date drew near for closing the exhibition, Lubin became obsessed by the idea that the Crocker Art Gallery should belong to Sacramento, that it should be the worthy nucleus of the museum of his dreams. Mrs. Crocker's children were all settled elsewhere, and his mind's eye saw the palatial residence with its treasured contents dispersed by indifferent heirs; the empty halls falling from their high estate, used perhaps as warehouses or storerooms.

On the day before the exhibition was to close, Lubin came to his office looking as if he had passed a sleepless night. He confided to Mr. Weinstock the thoughts which had kept him awake, and as he talked them over he worked himself up to such a pitch of enthusiasm that he grabbed his hat and bolted out of the door, saying, "I am going to Mrs. Crocker right now to persuade her to give the gallery to the city."

Lubin was too practical a man to be led far by the fantasies of socialism. Mrs. Agresti says of him:

Of the socialist state as advocated by the followers of Karl Marx he had the most profound distrust. He conceived it as essentially a vast, centralized bureaucracy; an eater and not a producer of wealth; an instrument for the protection of mediocrity; crushing all initiative and enterprise; by nature, parasitic. He believed that the perpetual struggle of forces in the economic world is the only means of progress, but for that struggle to be fruitful knowledge must replace ignorance; chaos must give way to order; anarchy to the higher synthesis of forces. He was a strong believer in cooperation as a check on excessive individualism, and above all and before all he believed in democracy, which he derived as a direct consequence of the religious ideals which were his.

In industry he believed agriculture was basic, and he acquired a farm largely to learn what was the matter with farming. He felt that the exchange of the farmer's products for his necessities needed to be on a basis of justice instead of the unstable foundation of ignorance, and inasmuch as farm prices were made in world markets, he outgrew Sacramento and became international in his outlook. He conceived of an organization that would enable farmers all over the world to know the conditions of their industry and the prices they ought to receive for their labors. And with the zealot's fervor and the successful business man's tenacity and skill he proceeded to make such an institution his life-work. He needed the patronage of government, and he began a canvass of the rulers of Europe to find a government that would take this new institution under its wing. Diplomatic experience might have deterred him, but no rebuffs of bureau heads and chancelleries had any effect. He finally met the King of Italy, and he talked to him exactly as a Hebrew prophet might have talked to any king. Says his biographer:

As we drove away, he gave me some account of this strange conference. He had told the king that as the success of a merchant is reckoned at the end of a year by the amount of dollars he has been able to accumulate, so the success of a ruler is determined by the work of historic importance he has been able to perform. "I bring you the opportunity to perform a work of historic importance, which will entitle you to more enduring fame than the Caesars; they earned fame by wars, you could earn it by working for peace, the peace of righteousness. You are of course a very important person here, but remember, you are a small potato in the world, the monarch of a third-rate country. Take up this work in earnest and at one leap Italy can lead the nations in the great fight of our day—the fight for justice in economic relations."

The associations of concentrated capital and energy resulting in trust, merger, and combine, were to be countered by organizing the agricultural interests through the influences exerted directly and indirectly by an International Chamber of Agriculture. This chamber was to be semi-official, the initiative for its foundation being taken by the governments on the invitation of the King of Italy. In effect, it would be an economic parliament with advisory and consultative powers, through which the farmers of the world could express their needs and wishes. Its primary function would be to gather and disseminate, on a world-wide scale, dynamic, price-forming information on the condition and prospects of the growing crops and on the world demand for them. Such information, gathered by each nation and assembled, summarized and published telegraphically by the central chamber, would place the farmers in possession of that inside information on crop conditions and stocks, on transport facilities and market needs which had hitherto been gathered by private interests and used as the stock in trade of the astute speculator and price manipulator.

At the time Lubin was talking thus in Rome, Washington was ringing with stirring denunciations of the trusts, culminating in the Sherman and Clayton laws. Time and experience have shown which side was the exponent of the truest statesmanship in this matter, and if the organization which Lubin advocated has never yet been given a fair chance to show all it could do in this direction, the other policy has been weighed in the balance and found wanting.

In all this Lubin was far from advocating state intrusion in the domain of trade; he always looked upon such experiments with suspicion. The developments he foresaw as likely to arise from the activities of the chamber were to be the result of free association, initiative, development; they were to be no parasitic growth dependent on government subsidies. A small percentage on the business done by produce exchanges operating under the auspices of the International Chamber, or the sale of "seats" therein, would provide the means of meeting any expense, however considerable, which the formation and working of the International Chamber might entail. Government was only to set the ball rolling.

The author was a participant in Lubin's work in a secretarial relation, and gives us this intimate glimpse:

Those days were not without their humors. I remember one very stiff and starchy representative of an ultra-Tory and extremely select London paper coming to seek for information. To Lubin its name stood for nothing, and he suspected "yellow" journalism everywhere. "I am quite willing to explain the proposition; but I'm not going to tell you when I first sat up in a high chair or when I ate my first pap."

"If you knew the standing of my paper you would realize that it would accept no such trash," was the frosty reply intended to crush the ignorant Yankee.

"That's all very well," Lubin went on serenely, "but this is a question of economics. Now, I explain it to you, and that's all right; but you send in your 'copy' to your paper, and how am I know what sort of a story will be given out? Perhaps the editor will want to cut it down, and he calls in Jones. Now, Jones is the man who writes up the dog-fights, and you can imagine what sort of economics will be the result," and, utterly unconscious of the sacrifice he had committed, Lubin talked on to a listener well-nigh speechless with indignation, who afterwards remarked in an English drawing-room that he didn't think any the better of the King of Italy for taking up with that fellow Lubin!

Probably nothing is ever done just exactly as its author conceives it, and the institute underwent modification as it evolved from idea to reality. Ultimately it took this form:

The representatives of all the adhering governments were brought together in a permanent, deliberative body, in direct touch with the governments from which they emanated; while the Assembly provided the means of keeping this Permanent Committee in contact with, and under the control of the living agricultural forces of a country, provided the farmers woke up to the importance of the Institute and brought the necessary pressure to bear on their home governments.

Moreover, the Institute was to act, not only as an international crop-reporting bureau, but it was recognized as the legitimate organ through which the agricultural interests in each country could voice their wishes in the international sphere, and it was empowered to formulate them as draft conventions and to submit them to the several governments for approval.

In fact, we have here the first attempt in history to create an international parliamentary body. The protocol signed by the plenipotentiaries of the forty governments represented at the conference on the seventh of June one thousand nine hundred and five may properly claim to be a historic document, for it created the first League of Nations, a League of Nations for economic betterment.

The institute was to be an instrument of justice. But justice is a mystery, as much as truth, and perhaps this realistic-mystic saw it before he died. Here, in his own words, is one of his conclusions:

When I was in Austria in 1905 to bring the matter of the proposed Institute of Agriculture before the leading agricultural bodies in that country, I saw amongst others Count Hohenblum. We had to talk through an interpreter, as I do not speak enough German to converse with him freely. After the main outline had been set forth, and Hohenblum gathered that governments were likely to play a prominent part in the proposed Institute, that it was, in fact, proposed to make it a state institution, he began swearing and using such unparliamentary language that even my scanty German sufficed to gather that storms were raging. "What is he doing?" I asked of the interpreter. "Is he swearing at me?" "Oh, no," came the reply, "not at you; it is the bureaucracy, and do not ask me to translate; his language is awful."

Well, I thought, the old gentleman evidently has some grievance; I expect he is something of a crank. Since the Institute has been at work, I have learned much. I have learned that Hohenblum was not such a crank after all, that even the calmest might be betrayed into strong language if they had much to do with the animal known as bureaucracy. Bureaucracy is the biggest eater and the biggest loafer that ever oppressed the sons of man, and the socialists might well pause and learn from Hohenblum before they advocate that all the complicated machinery of modern life be controlled by an enlarged and inflated bureaucracy. The experience of the Institute has been enough to settle my opinion on the value of bureaucracies.

We can not follow the institution into all the details of its functioning, but at least David Lubin started something. As E. H. Harriman remarked after the San Francisco fire, it does not so much matter what you begin, as it does that you begin something. And in his motive, few finer characters have been revealed to us in these days than that of the Sacramento merchant.

DAVID LUBIN: A STUDY IN PRACTICAL IDEALISM. By Olivia Rossetti Agresti. Boston: Little, Brown & Co.; $3.50.

BANKING AND INVESTMENT NEWS.

San Francisco bank clearings for the week ending Friday, November 10, 1922 (four days), were $116,800,000; for the corresponding week of last year ending Saturday, November 12, 1921 (five days), $108,200,000; a gain of $8,600,000.

While the bond market has been less active during the last thirty days and prices have receded moderately, there continues to be a strong underlying demand for good investment issues. The decline in the general level of

Long Term—Non-Callable
Income Tax Exempt
FLORENCE, ARIZONA
General Obligation 6% Bonds
to Yield 5.25%.

Ask for Circular

SECOND FLOOR
FIRST NATIONAL BANK BLDG.
Douglas 2121

FREEMAN
SMITH
&
CAMP
CO.

bond prices is not primarily the result of hesitation on the part of permanent investors or a symptom of saturation of the market. It is rather a reflection of the gradual elimination of speculative and temporary influences. Throughout the period of cheap money and rapidly rising prices there was a heavy absorption of securities for the purpose of making immediate profits, says Commerce Monthly. Anticipation of an increased need for money for the financing of manufacturing and merchandising operations and the decrease

October 15th was the offer for subscription by Secretary Mellon on October 9th of $500,000,000 United States bonds bearing 4 1/2 per cent. interest, due in 1952 and callable in 1947. The Secretary of the Treasury reserved the right to make additional allotments to the extent that 4 1/2 per cent. Victory notes or Treasury certificates maturing December 15th might be tendered in payment.

This is the first long-term bond issue by the government since the war and marks the first step in a reduction of the short-term debt. From October 17, 1922, to January 1, 1923, inclusive, a total of $1,915,000,000 maturing United States government obligations must be paid or refunded. Of this amount $870,000,000 are Victory notes, $420,000,000 are United States certificates of indebtedness, and $625,000,000 are war savings certificates. Maturing obligations from now until January 1, 1929, amount to about $10,000,000,000, exclusive of the Second Liberty Loan bonds callable in 1927, but not due until 1942.

The results of the offer were therefore watched with the keenest interest as an indication of the absorptive power of the market for long-term United States government bonds under peace conditions with the security offered on a business basis and free from the patriotic impulse as a selling factor. It is notable that subscriptions were three times the offering, exclusive of additional bonds which may be allotted in exchange for Victory notes. Cash subscriptions amounted to $1,400,000,000, the remainder being Victory notes and Treasury certificates maturing December 15th.

Sales by holders of Liberty bonds in order to provide funds for investment in the new issue have caused substantial declines in prices of the old issues, bringing the yields on them to increasingly attractive levels.

In addition to the United States government bonds numerous industrial and public utility issues were offered in the period from September 16th to October 15th and there were a few fairly large offerings. A number of industrial corporations have taken advantage of lower rates to refund outstanding loans made at high rates at the most difficult period of the business depression. Among the more important issues during the period were: $15,000,000 Cudahy Packing Company sinking funds 5 1/2%, due October 1, 1937, offered at par; $75,000,000 Federal Land Banks 4 1/2 per cent. bonds, due May 1, 1942, offered at 101 1/2 to yield over 4.30 per cent.; $10,000,000 Brier Hill Steel Company first mortgage 5 1/2%, due in 1942, offered at par; $12,500,000 Milwaukee Electric Railway and Light Company refunding and first mortgage 5s, due in 1961, offered at 92 1/4 to yield about 5.50 per cent.; and $20,000,000 Province of Ontario twenty-year 5s, offered on a basis of about 5.06 per cent.

The security markets have been subject to a number of influences, mostly of a bullish character, and the result has been largely increased speculative activity with greater public participation and a new high level reached for the average of fifty representative stocks. This latter is proof that the general trend is still strongly upward and, while considerable distributive selling may be going on in some issues, many other stocks may be expected to sell much higher.

It is greatly to be hoped that the Allies, now that the Turkish situation is simmering down, will turn their attention to an intelligent consideration of the question of German reparations. We have made it clear that any participation by us in the matter is contingent upon Europe's checking her wild and wasteful expenditures for armament.

The almost immediate oversubscription of the government's new bond issue is excellent evidence of the sound financial condition of the country. But this financing, together with the prospect of some $3,500,000,000 more within the next year, has served to check the advancing tendency in the investment market temporarily at least. This condition has been augmented by the reviving industries' increasing demand for money and also the seasonal requirements for moving the crops.

Meanwhile, stocks and other speculative securities of industrial companies and railroads reporting large earnings and even better prospects may be expected to reflect these conditions by higher market prices. Consequently it is becoming increasingly important to exercise careful discrimination in selecting securities either for investment or speculation.

The declaration of large stock dividends by the Standard Oil and other companies has resulted in an orgy of speculation in their shares and has fired Wall Street's imagination regarding similar possibilities elsewhere in the list. There are many companies, such as United States Steel, the equipments and certain of the rails and public utilities, which have wisely conserved war-time and other earnings and are therefore in a position to cut very juicy melons.

The steel industry recovery since the settlement of the strikes has exceeded expectations and operations are now not very far from the peak of last June. This month's unfilled tonnage statement of United States Steel is the largest in nineteen months, and further heavy inquiries and orders by the railroads are being reported. Equally surprising has been the success with which the railroads are meeting the large demands upon them for the moving of coal, steel, the crops and general merchandise. Car loadings in the week ending October 30th were the largest of any single week of this year. This is a pretty good indication of satisfactory conditions in industry throughout the country. Also this heavy traffic should result in excellent net earnings for the railroads during the fall months.—The Room Trader.

The Equitable Trust Company of New York has been appointed transfer agent of the new common stock of the American-Foreign Oil Corporation.

Nothing else that has happened in the investment market this fall has caused so much comment in banking circles as the break in the new government 4 1/2 per cent. refunding bonds below par within the last few days, says Commerce and Finance. It is the big surprise of the year. Less than two weeks ago, immediately after they were issued, the new 4 1/2s commanded a handsome premium. Today they are selling at a substantial discount, while other government issues are proportionately lower. The natural query of investors is, Why should a bond which was oversubscribed three times decline so quickly below the subscription price?

It is easier to ask that question than to answer it. However, on the face of things it would appear that the oversubscription was very largely a paper one. That is to say, a large number of subscribers applied for a much larger number of bonds than they intended to take up. They did so because they expected the issue to be oversubscribed and wished to be sure to get some bonds. The consequence was that, although the total issue of the bonds to cash subscribers was only $511,390,000, or not much more than one-third of the total subscription, many of the subscribers received a larger allotment than they had expected or were prepared to take up. Accordingly when their bonds were delivered to them they were forced to liquidate a portion of them.

Another class of sellers were banks and other large investors who switched from the refunding bonds into Liberties because of the large discount at which the latter sold. Finally, so-called "sharpshooters" sold the refunding 4 1/2s short when they learned that a liquidating movement was on, with the idea of buying the bonds back at lower prices and thereby scalping a profit.

The foregoing is what may be called the superficial reasons for the break in the price of the new government bonds. One must probe deeper to ascertain the underlying cause of the decline, not only in the refunding 4 1/2s, but in Liberties as well. In the writer's opinion two causes are operating to weaken the market for government bonds. One is dear money. The other is the expectation of another large government refunding emission either late this year or early next year.

The current weakness of all government issues started in the Liberty bonds. The break in the new refunding 4 1/2s was merely a sym-

To Yield 7.22%

Willow Vista
Land & Cattle Company

First Mortgage 7%
Sinking Fund Gold Bonds

Send for circular

pathetic one. Liberties have been declining primarily because money rates have been going up. Advancing money and a rising bond market are incompatible. As heretofore observed in this column, business corporations which had surplus funds while business was slack—and most of the larger ones had—invested them in securities. Banks did the same. But when industrial and trade demands for money expanded this fall both corporations liquidated investments because it was cheaper to do so than to borrow money in the open market. Banks also liquidated in order to lend the money to commercial borrowers at higher rates of interest than Liberty bonds return. It does not appear that liquidation so far as banks are concerned has been as heavy in the East as it has been in the West, where the demand for funds to move the crops has been very large.

The question how long the liquidating movement will last is also a hard one to answer. It is likely to continue as long as the seasonal demand for money persists. On the

INVESTMENT SECURITIES

Government, Municipal and Corporation Bonds in denominations of $100, $500, and $1000 for the investment of Banks, Trust Funds, and Individual Investors. Inquiries Invited.

HUNTER, DULIN & Co.

THE SECOND FLOOR—
256 MONTGOMERY ST.

Los Angeles Pasadena San Francisco Oakland San Diego

other hand that demand probably is at its peak now. Already the reserve position of banks is strengthening and money rates are showing indications of receding. It is not likely that money will go much if any higher. Assuming that money has reached its seasonal peak, the conclusion is justified that government bonds will not go much lower than they are. Liberty bonds in particular are beginning to look cheap. Offerings are being absorbed by investors who realize that 4 1/2 per cent. government bonds selling at discounts from one and a half to two points are cheap. The writer would rather buy Liberties at present levels than sell them. Downward readjustment of prices of railroad bonds also has brought market values down to attractive levels where good investment buying by savings banks, insurance companies, and large private individuals is making its appearance.

Private Wires
Coast to Coast

E. F. Hutton & Co.

MEMBERS
NEW YORK STOCK EXCHANGE
HUTTON BUILDING
Montgomery and Bush Sts.
HOTEL ST. FRANCIS
DEL MONTE HOTEL

McDONNELL & Co.

And Other Leading Exchanges
633 Market St., at New Montgomery
SAN FRANCISCO
TELEPHONE SUTTER 7676
N. Y. Office, 120 Broadway
Los Angeles, 634 So. Spring St.

PRIVATE WIRES

CARSTENS & EARLES, INCORPORATED

GOVERNMENT, MUNICIPAL AND CORPORATION BONDS

ESTABLISHED 1891

Ground Floor

California Commercial Union Building
San Francisco

Telephone Douglas 6050

SEATTLE LOS ANGELES SPOKANE SAN FRANCISCO

H. M. Hinchman W. B. Wentz W. L. W. Miller
Hinchman, Wentz & Miller
 General Agents
Fire Automobile
INSURANCE
Liability Plate Glass Compensation
 30 Leidesdorf St. SAN FRANCISCO
 Telephone Sutter 437

There is no reason why investors who have held their corporation bonds through this readjustment period should sell them now.

New bond offerings again were on a moderate scale last week, as was to be expected in view of the unsettled condition of the general bond market. They totaled only $46,139,000. Utility issues and tax-exempt state and municipal offerings were the largest. The latter were in particularly good demand because with the near approach of winter and the necessary cessation of road-building, the volume of new emissions of that class shows signs of slackening. Price bases of bonds in the tax-exempt group ranged from 3.90 per cent. for gilt-edged securities to 6 per cent. for the less desirable descriptions, with the average basis around 4 per cent. Several issues of railroad equipment trusts were offered and were well taken. An issue of $1,800,000 Nashville, Chattanooga & St. Louis Tennessee Coal, Iron and Railroad Company and the balance with the Lorain Steel Company.

Approximately 50,000 tons of the rails, or two-thirds of the amount ordered, will be used on the Pacific system of the Southern Pacific.

This will provide a total of 330 miles of rails for use in the West, of which 217 miles is to be of 110-pound rails and 113 miles of ninety-pound rails. The 110-pound rails are the heaviest ever used in railroad construction work west of the Rocky Mountains.

Increasing traffic in the West and the use of new and heavier locomotives in hauling trains is responsible to a large extent for the huge rail order placed by the Southern Pacific.

The new rails are for use in construction work during the year 1924.

The demand for money is moderate, and rates are a little firmer than a month ago. Time money is 4 3/4 to 5 per cent., commercial paper, 4 1/2 to 4 3/4. Call money touched 6 per cent. in the last week of the month, but this was occasioned by temporary needs and the rate brought a flood of offerings. The going rate is about 4 to 4 1/2 per cent. Acceptances, 4 per cent.

The demands upon the Federal Reserve banks have increased but slightly, their discounted bills going up from $434,000,000 to $457,000,000 during October; with most of the increase in the Eastern banks. Apparently liquidation in the Western banks is taking care of new demands, says the National City Bank of New York.

The bond market has been reactionary, with the government refunding loan seemingly the disturbing factor. The loan was greatly oversubscribed, giving the impression of a sharply competitive investment market, but the fact that the bonds have since sold below par. indicates that dealers overreached themselves in their bidding. There are duplicate orders in the bond business as in merchandising, and evidently some people in this instance got more bonds than they really wanted.

Although the new government issue is part of a refunding operation, it appeals to a different class of investors than the outstanding issues, for the reason that the latter are of short maturities, while the new bonds run longer than any other obligations of the national government. Hence it was inevitable that the new issue would cause some disturbance in the markets. The entire bond list has been off several points from the top, and the reaction in bonds has been influential in the stock market as well.

It must be borne in mind that not only have banking institutions been free buyers of investment securities during the past year, but business houses have bought important amounts as well, actuated by the same motive, i. e., to keep idle funds temporarily employed.

These are the purchases which will be first dislodged by reviving business activity, and although there is no pronounced movement of this kind such selling may have been a factor in the weakness which has recently developed.

The Equitable Trust Company of New York has been appointed registrar of the stock of the Niagara Lockport and Ontario Power Company. The Equitable has also been appointed agent to disburse the stock dividend payable December 30th to common stockholders of the American Steel Foundries.

Advocates of government or municipal ownership are constantly agitating the people to expend public funds in development of industrial undertakings, says the Manufacturer.

In spite of most costly experiences the people seem to be periodically carried away with arguments or prejudices advanced for carrying out such schemes.

Detroit, Michigan, is now furnishing an object lesson. The street railway was made the goat in that city and politicians succeeded in influencing the people to purchase the private system, thus loading the city with heavy financial obligations.

Promises were made that the line would be self-supporting and that the taxpayer would not be further obligated.

What is the result? Six short months after election the voters are asked to relieve the street railway lines from paving between street-car tracks and load this expense onto the general taxpayer. The private company formerly paid for this paving.

Also the voters are asked to authorize a new $5,000,000 bond issue to cover cost of extensions and to help pay for 200 new street-cars which the campaign argument said would be paid for out of earnings of the system.

The people of Detroit are "stung," just as the people of Seattle have been "stung"; just as the people of numberless towns have been "stung," and just as the people of the United States were "stung" by political management and operation of public utilities and transportation systems.

President Harding thinks this country ought to put an end to tax-exempt securities and it is understood that the Administration will favor the passage of a bill designed to this end.

A great financial menace to this country today is the growth of tax-exempt issues, especially those issued by states and municipalities.

The result of issuing these securities cuts two ways—tax burdens are heavily increased as the result of accumulating public debt, but worst of all, every dollar of tax-exempt securities issued relieves the holder of these securities from paying any taxes on the income derived therefrom.

Thus the public pays taxes to cover the mortgage it has placed against its property

"A very interesting form of literature."
San Francisco Journal.

"The Review"
 CONTENTS:
 (November Issue)

The English Political Situation
About Russia
From All Parts

Copy mailed on request by

STRASSBURGER & COMPANY
 133 Montgomery Street - San Francisco
 Telephone Douglas 2220

and it also must make up the taxes lost through exempting holders of tax-exempt securities from paying their just share of the cost of government.

The latest figures given at the recent convention of the Farm Mortgage Bankers' Association of America show an outstanding amount of tax-exempt securities estimated at nearly $30,000,000,000.

A wealthy man can put his money in these securities and escape all taxation burdens. Should such a law remain unchanged?

BONDS

$850,000
Fifth Street Building
First Mortgage 6% Gold Bonds
 (Secured on a 99-Year Leasehold Estate)
 Due Serially 1925-47

George H. Burr & Co.
 KOHL BUILDING
 SAN FRANCISCO

|              |             |           |
|--------------|-------------|-----------|
| NEW YORK     | LOS ANGELES | CLEVELAND |
| BOSTON       | ATLANTA     | DETROIT   |
| PHILADELPHIA | CHICAGO     | PITTSBURG |
| SCRANTON     | ST. LOUIS   | SEATTLE   |

"A National Yet Personal Service"

4 1/2 per cent. equipment bonds sold at prices to yield 4.90 per cent. The coupon rate set a new low mark for equipment trusts in the New York market.

Not much is doing in foreign bonds. No European offerings are in the air at present, but a $5,000,000 Colombia loan was brought out Monday. Chile may issue $10,000,000 new bonds here.

The Southern Pacific Company has placed an order with steel plants in the East for 75,000 gross tons of rails for delivery in 1923, according to announcement made by William Sproule, president of the company. The value of the order is between $3,000,000 and $4,000,000.

Of the amount of rails ordered, substantially 73,400 tons were placed with the

Don't Wait Till Your Bonds Are Called

High coupon rate bonds are being called in increasing numbers. Far sighted investors are checking the call features of their bonds, and looking ahead for profitable re-investment.

To serve such investors, we have prepared an analysis of a high grade conservative issue which contains valuable conversion privileges and a good opportunity for appreciation.

Write, 'phone or call, and we will be glad to supply you with this information.

Call Sutter 3434

SUTRO & CO.
 ESTABLISHED 1858
 410 MONTGOMERY STREET

Members of the San Francisco Stock and Bond Exchange
 Direct Wires to All Eastern Centers and Canada

Send for copy of our Investor's Manual.

Dependable Advice

FOR 35 years this company has been advisor to many bond buyers in California. Our recommendations are based on the needs of the investor, and our long experience in judging securities.

We will be glad to assist you, without obligation on your part, in the planning of your investments.

WM. R. STAATS CO.
 Established 1887

Alexander Bldg., Montgomery St., cor. of Bush
 SAN FRANCISCO
 Telephone Kearny 301
 LOS ANGELES SAN DIEGO PASADENA

GEARY, MEIGS & CO.
 ESTABLISHED 1914

Louisville Gas & Electric Co.
 First and Ref. 5's
 Due 1952.

Secured by a first mortgage on the entire property, subject only to a comparatively small lien.

Price 91 1/2
 To Yield
5.60%

INVESTMENT BONDS
 CAL. COMMERCIAL-UNION BLDG.
 GARFIELD 3450 SAN FRANCISCO

"The downward swing of bond prices," says a Hutton dispatch, "has proceeded to a point where many investment authorities anticipate a moderate volume of tax selling. The depreciation from the 1922 peak of several foreign issues has been more than ten points, while losses running from four to eight points have been common in both the gilt-edged and more speculative investments. As usual, a great many people have neglected to recognize signs of a change in the trend until it became so strong as to really hurt their pocket-books."

INVESTMENT SECURITIES

COMMERCIAL PAPER
 AND ACCEPTANCES

GOVERNMENT
 MUNICIPAL
 AND CORPORATION
 BONDS

BOND & GOODWIN & TUCKER
 AMERICAN NATIONAL BANK BUILDING
 SAN FRANCISCO
 LOS ANGELES SEATTLE PORTLAND

BOOKS ON THE TABLE.

The Cathedral.

To Mr. Walpole, pride of place, egoism, and self-satisfaction are evidently the deadliest crimes in the calendar, whether ethical or social. For though few can rise to high position unattended by these doubtless disagreeable mannerisms, he seizes on the person of such a one in Archdeacon Brandon to mete out the most direly tragic of fates—more dire, in fact, than those bestowed on less honorable characters of "The Cathedral." Whether Mr. Walpole intended it or not, it is impossible to read that ecclesiastical novel without becoming thoroughly in sympathy with the trials and tribulations of its great central character—rather than with his erring wife or weak political enemies. All the world admires strength, and Archdeacon Brandon was a monument of the admirable commodity until

Financial Secretaryship to one or two well-to-do families Desired

by banker of twenty years' experience.
References leading San Francisco bankers.
Interview by appointment B x B Argonaut.

Bonds for Investment

MUNICIPALS IRRIGATION DISTRICTS CORPORATIONS

Specialists in Safety

Anglo London Paris Company

One Sansome Street San Francisco
Phone Kearny 5500

The French American Bank

OF SAN FRANCISCO

108 SUTTER STREET

Commercial—Checking—Savings

Resources Over $16,000,000

A General Banking Business Transacted

Commercial and Personal Checking
Accounts Solicited

Savings Accounts receive interest at rate of 4 per cent. per annum

SAFE DEPOSIT BOXES $3.50

OFFICERS

Leon Bocqueraz.....President
J. M. Dupas.....Vice-President
J. A. Bergerot.....Vice-President
W. F. Duffy.....Vice-Pres. and Cashier
A. Bousquet.....Secretary
J. T. Irilary.....Asst. Cashier
Chas. L. Ebner, Jr.....Asst. Cashier

Member Federal Reserve System and Associated Savings Banks of San Francisco The San Francisco Savings and Loan Society (THE SAN FRANCISCO BANK)

SAVINGS COMMERCIAL

526 California St., San Francisco, Cal.

MISSION BRANCH.....Mission and 21st Streets
PARK-PRESIDIO DISTRICT BRANCH.....Clement and 7th Ave.
HAIGHT STREET BRANCH.....Haight and Belvedere Streets
June 30th, 1922

Assets.....$76,170,177.18
Deposits.....$2,440,177.18
Capital Actually Paid Up.....1,000,000.00
Reserve and Contingent Funds.....2,700,000.00
Employees' Pension Fund.....385,984.61

A di-ident to depositors of FOUR AND ONE-QUARTER (4 1/4) per cent. per annum was declared for the six months ending June 30th, 1922.

fate and the author marked him for their prey. We suspect Mr. Walpole of having started with the blithe, if platitudinous, determination to illustrate the lack of beauty in an egotistic temperament and of having found the archdeacon so much more interesting in the processes of his creation and damnation than any of the mediocrities which round out the remaining dramatis personae, that almost against his will the author became a sympathetic ally. At any rate the moral of "The Cathedral" is rather the inherent nobility of a strong, unyielding character than the wages of sin which are death. Granted that the archdeacon died in the prime of life as a direct result of his self-absorbed career, and Mr. Walpole leaves no doubt on that score—the fatal continuity of events is complete—still, we are not convinced that he deserved to die. So though, alas, too few of us get our deserts in this world, whether for good or ill, the lesson of "The Cathedral" is rendered a little impotent.

As a picture of provincial ecclesiastical life "The Cathedral" will rank with Trollope's classics. It is as dry in spots and as rich in verisimilitude. R. G.

THE CATHEDRAL. By Hugh Walpole. New York: George H. Doran Company; $2.

Greek Poets of the Alexandrian Age.

When the study of Greek literature was more dominated by the romantic attitude than it is today scholars were accustomed to tell us that the fine flower of Greek literary genius withered when Athens fell and that what followed was only the uninspired work of Alexandrian pedants. Today, fortunately, a few have applied a more sensible type of criticism to that much maligned literary epoch. Those whose conception of the Alexandrian age is as antiquated as that of H. G. Wells in his "Outline of History" should read these excellent translations of three poets who, if we except Apollonius and Theocritus, are the most worthy representatives of what the Alexandrians accomplished in verse.

We have in this volume the Greek text of the "Phenomena" of Aratus, of the "Alexandria" of Lycophron, and of the hymns, epigrams, and fragments of Callimachus. The translations of Messrs. Mair are readable and scholarly. The accounts of the lives, works, manuscripts, and editions of the poets are adequate to the needs of the general reader.

CALLIMACHUS AND LYCOPHRON. With an English translation by A. W. Mair. ARATUS. With an English translation by G. R. Mair. Loeb Classical Library. London: William Heinemann; New York: G. P. Putnam's Sons; $2.25.

Chasing and Racing.

It is said of Sir Robert Walpole, England's first official prime minister and one of her most successful state pilots, that his gamekeeper's letter was the first he opened every morning. Many another man before and since, great and small, has been preëminently interested in sport, and such a one is Harding Cox, who has recently given us his sporting memoirs in "Chasing and Racing," the record of a long lifetime of recreation. One must go to Who's Who to learn that Major Cox really had any other existence at all, though in the latter sanctum of biographic candor and reticence we find that "Cockie," as he was known to sporting life, had a military, professional, and social career, not to mention his position as artistic dilettante. He was a painter, composer, and journalist, having had his finger in most of the sporting newspaper pies of the day. But he was also dramatic critic of Vanity Fair. And though hunting and racing were among his most persistent avocations, he confesses himself not primarily a horseman, but rather a breeder of terriers. But all this is about Major Cox himself, whose vital and versatile personality decidedly dominates his chronicle. The latter is a record of the author as gentleman jockey, hunter, and master of the Old Berkeley Fox Hounds.

CHASING AND RACING. By Harding Cox. New York: E. P. Dutton & Co.; $5.

Three O'Neill Plays.

If G. B. Shaw had written "The Hairy Ape," "Anna Christie," and "The First Man" he would have, with the usual Shaw candor, added them to his list of unpleasant plays. Shaw, however, compared to Eugene O'Neill, is like a brilliant antic undergraduate beside a stern ascetic, so coldly, so solemnly, and with such reprobation does O'Neill view life and humanity.

He spares us nothing; nothing, that is, that is permissible in literature. But the popularity of his plays—and that is one of the insoluble puzzles, considering the tastes of the theatre-going public—shows that the public doesn't think he goes too far.

But he gives us stern and discomfiting truths. And, being a master in dramatic construction, and in the forceful presentation of his theme, the volatile public derives the needed "kick" from his plays.

Who would have thought that the patronage of the consolidated multitude whose united favor spells success could have been attracted to "The Hairy Ape"? But the sombre O'Neill was informed by his infallible instinct that the contrast between Yank and Mildred would make an unforgettable situation. Thus, when the white-robed Mildred advances, in order to gratify her idle curiosity, into the stoker's hole she hears, "I'll show yuh! I'll crash yer skull in! I'll drive yer teet' down yer troat! I'll cut yer guts out for a nickel, yuh lousy boob, yuh dirty, crummy, muck-eatin' son of a ———." I may add that the dash is not filled, O'Neill, while supplying unlimited quantities of rough, water-front invective, carefully avoiding the use of prohibited expressions.

I feel sure that the daughters of the rich who have seen the play got quite a thrill out of this situation, in which the nonchalant Mildred, overhearing the unconscious Yank's billingsgate, faints in a sudden paralysis of horror.

The idea of the play is of man's inhumanity to man in condemning his brethren in a common humanity to live and toil under such brutalizing conditions.

"Anna Christie," which attained great success in New York, is a naturalistic play which involves the destinies of toilers of the sea and a reformed prostitute. The woman hates men, but finally learns to love an honest one. And to the amazement of everybody, the play has a so-called happy ending.

O'Neill, however, considers it no ending, but "life flowing on; of the past which is never the past—but always the birth of the future—of a problem solved for the moment, but by the very nature of its solution involving new problems."

However the author may have been misjudged or misunderstood in this play, its truthfulness allied to a touch of mystic symbolism fascinated theatre-goers, and although its plain inference that life is a rotten institution is not always acceptable to what makes up the mass of theatre-goers, still the larger percentage of them in New York attended.

In the third play, "The First Man," the author ruthlessly puts us through a hearing of the moanings and screamings of a woman in the pangs and perils of childbirth.

And besides the play of raw cosmic forces attendant on this solemn function he throws out in savage relief the small-town spite of the dying woman's relatives; or relatives by marriage, who besmirch her reputation, even to the very portals of eternity.

The husband is the type of man that hates the unconscious child who is instrumental in causing the mother's death; a dramatic enhancement, as seen through his creator's temperament, of the feeble creature such a thing is in life.

The play is decidedly inferior to the other two, and is plainly not destined for success on the boards.

THE HAIRY APE, ANNA CHRISTIE (Pulitzer Prize winner, 1922), THE FIRST MAN. By Eugene O'Neill. New York: Boni & Liveright; $2.

Frances Charles.

In 1904 there came from the press of Little, Brown & Co. the first novel of Frances Charles, a San Francisco High School graduate, entitled "In the Country God Forgot." It was an Arizona story of a year of drouth and water famine. The Nation said: "The sky, cacti, and drouth of Arizona are stamped in on the brain as one reads. The characters loom forcibly out of the arid air." Of "The Siege of Youth" the Argonaut critic wrote: "Frances Charles has once more read her title clear to the possession of uncommon power."

The place of her book is among the notably good ones of the year. "The Awakening of a Duchess" and other stories followed. Then owing to uncertain health, the busy pen and active brain were compelled to quietude for a period. On September 26, 1922, Frances Charles died at her home in San Francisco. There is said to be a book manuscript in her desk waiting the finishing touches. It is to be hoped a capable hand may give it to print.

Notes of Books and Authors

Two Macmillan books whose announcement has been received with special interest are the new history of H. G. Wells, which is to be called "A Short History of the World," and the new novel of May Sinclair, entitled "Anne Severn and the Fieldings."

Margot has a rival it seems in candor if one may judge from the publishers' announcement of the "Indiscretions of Lady Susan" (Appleton), memoirs of Lady Susan Townley, in which the distinguished reminiscer chronicles her impressions of three continents. She has evidently not been deterred by Margot's fate.

In November, 1859, Charles Darwin's "The Origin of Species" was first given to the world, Appleton being the original publishers of the American edition. D. Appleton & Co. were the publishers of not only Darwin's works, but also those of Huxley, Tyndall, Spencer, and the other pioneers of modern scientific thought.

Booksellers and publishers and librarians get used to strange mangling of titles; but a prize should certainly go to an English bookseller's assistant who got muddled between the title of Mr. W. B. Maxwell's latest novel, "Spinster of This Parish," and another "best seller" which need not be named, and sent to Mr. Maxwell's publisher for a copy of "If the Spinster Comes."

"The Man Who Knew Too Much," by Gilbert K. Chesterton, will be published by Harper & Brothers this month. The book is a collection of detective stories of crimes in diplomatic and criminal circles which must be handled with delicacy, as The Man Who Knew Too Much demonstrates. These are detective stories that are "different."

Those who are beginning to learn to ride will welcome "Elementary Equitation," to be published soon by the Duttons. Its author, J. Barretto de Souza, is an internationally known riding master who has prepared his book to fit the needs of beginners, since there are already many books for fairly expert riders. "Elementary Equitation" is superbly illustrated by Victor Nikoll, the horse painter.

Several books in special illustrated editions have been brought out by Macmillan. Pargrave's "Golden Treasury of Songs and Lyrics" is illustrated with reproductions of many of the masterpieces of art, Masfield's "Right Royal" has both color-plates and line drawings by Cecil Aldin, the English artist whose "Fallowfield Hunt" and "Old Inns of England" are so popular; a third old favorite in new guise is Stephens' "Crock of Gold," with decorations in color by Wilfred Jones.

"Climates of the Continents," by W. G. Kendrew, will be published immediately by the Oxford University Press American Branch. The author presents the main features of the climate of each region considered especially in relation to the greater units of the globe, and the text contains 149 figures. A general knowledge of meteorology is assumed. Hitherto there has been no adequate description of the actual climates of the countries of the earth, considered regionally, available in English.

Perhaps Washington never told a lie, but some of his biographers have been telling them about him ever since the days of the cherry tree. One of the two things that we all know about Washington is that he exhorted his people to beware of "entangling alliances." William Roscoe Thayer now tells us in his "George Washington" (Houghton Mifflin Company) that the phrase is not Washington's and, in fact, did not appear on the political horizon until it was first used by Thomas Jefferson in his inaugural address, 1801, sixteen months after Washington was dead and buried.

William Lyon Phelps gives the following information in regard to his new book, "Human Nature in the Bible," which was published by Charles Scribner's Sons in October: "The stories of the Old Testament are interpreted from the literary point of view, the personages judged by modern standards of character, and the Bible regarded as a continuous revelation of man, more profound in its insight and more truthful in its presentation of human nature and exhibiting more literary art than any other book in the world. The object of the book is partly to inspire renewed reading and study of the Bible, as the most interesting collection of masterpieces ever written."

THE CHARLES NELSON CO.

MANUFACTURER AND WHOLESALE

OF

REDWOOD, DOUGLAS FIR,

SPRUCE, HEMLOCK,

SUGAR & WHITE PINE,

CEDAR SHINGLES & POLES.

230 California St.

San Francisco

E. C. EVANS & SONS, Inc.

(Established 1881)

STEAMSHIP AGENTS

SHIP AND INSURANCE BROKERS

260 California Street, San Francisco

Phone
Douglas 8040

Cable Address
"DEWGRIP"

GENERAL PETROLEUM CORPORATION

Offices at

SAN FRANCISCO
Alaska Commercial Bldg.

LOS ANGELES
Higgins Bldg.

HAMMOND LUMBER COMPANY

260 CALIFORNIA ST.

REDWOOD, DOUGLAS FIR

AND

PILING

Press Clippings

Are money-makers for Contractors, Supply
Houses, Business Men and
Corporations

ALLEN'S PRESS CLIPPING BUREAU

Phone Douglas 5119

121 Second Street

BRIEFER REVIEWS.

An understanding of democratic ideals, and those of our own government particularly, is essential to intelligent citizenship—and more so since the war and its aftermath of bolshevism than ever before. Shailer Mathews, dean of the Divinity School of the University of Chicago, has planned a guide for the present generation in "The Validity of American Ideals" (The Abingdon Press; $1.75), a book that is the result of his lectures on the Bennett Foundation at Wesleyan University.

The reader who enjoys exploring odd corners of the earth vicariously will like "Last Days in New Guinea" (Dodd, Mead & Co.), which is Captain Monckton's sequel to "Taming New Guinea," a history broken off by the war. In his second book the resident magistrate of this section of the Papuan world takes up his government of the Northern Division of New Guinea, one in which all his predecessors had either met with death or disgrace. Captain Monckton's story of his successful administration over the Binandere tribe, "a people who, though fierce, warlike cannibals, were also honest, truthful, and moral to the last degree," is one of the most interesting and important travel books of the year. A profusion of photographs and two maps enhance the value of this chronicle of an, as yet, unexploited territory.

Forrestine C. Hooker has produced another charming animal story in "Star, the Story of an Indian Pony" (Doubleday, Page & Co.; $1.75), which though it purports to be the biography of a pony is also a chapter in the all but vanished Indian life of the West. Mrs. Hooker is the wife of an officer in the United States army and they have been stationed many years in Indian country, so that the author of "Star" is as familiar with the red-skin as she is with horses. The book has an introduction by Lieutenant-General Nelson A. Miles, who organized a command at Fort Dodge to move against the hostile Southwest Indians in 1874, when the latter had assembled to drive out the buffalo hunters.

A book that represents an immense amount of scholarly research, which happens incidentally to be easily assimilated as general information, is Dr. Walter Libby's "The History of Medicine in Its Salient Features" (Houghton Mifflin Company; $3). Dr. Libby is not an M. D., but a doctor of philosophy and the author of "An Introduction to the History of Science." The book, which traces the history of its subject from the priest-physicians of Egypt and Babylonia (who had already guessed at the phenomenon of the blood's circulation which was to revolutionize medical science in the seventeenth century) to the latest surgery developed by the European war, is the result of a series of lectures delivered before third-year students in one of the American schools of medicine. An observation one must make in following the history of medical science is that it owes much of its progress to war. For example, in Germany, where the universities were particularly late in providing instruction in medicine, the first celebrated German surgeons acquired their skill on the battlefield in the numerous campaigns of the fifteenth century.

Alice Day Pratt writes with gusto of her adventures as a homesteader in Oregon in "A Homesteader's Portfolio" (Macmillan; $2). Miss Pratt, who boldly describes herself as a teacher and a spinster, came West, took a holding, pitched a tent on it and raised white Leghorns. Such were her courageous and humble beginnings, to be attended as such should be by marked success. For any one contemplating a plunge into agrarian life "A Homesteader's Portfolio" can not fail to be interesting, but the book has undoubted merit also as an accurate picture of one of the most primitive existing countrysides. A vivid description of the famous Pendleton round-up is a suitable introduction to life in Oregon.

An adventure story with a new locale is "The White Desert," by Courtney Ryley Cooper (Little, Brown & Co.; $1.75). For the desert is not one of sands and arroya, but of the green-white iced stretches across the Continental Divide in Colorado. The plot bristles with crime, circumstantial evidence, bad lumber men, a good priest, a maligned hero and the inevitable little girl of the hills. Mr. Cooper places his characters in a country where romance and adventure abound on all sides.

Chamois leather is not taken from the chamois, but from the flesh side of sheepskin.

New Books Received.

ESCAPE. By Jeffery E. Jeffery. New York: Thomas Seltzer; $2.
A novel.

THE BOY MAGICIAN. By Raymond Dixie. Boston: Lothrop, Lee & Shepard Company; $1.50.
Simplified magic.

THE TRUE STORY OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA. By Elbridge S. Brooks. Boston: Lothrop, Lee & Shepard Company; $2.
Juvenile.

THE STORY OF OUR CONSTITUTION. By Eva March Tappan. Boston: Lothrop, Lee & Shepard Company; $1.50.

NEITHER HERE NOR THERE. By Oliver Herford. New York: George H. Doran Company; $1.50.
"A mirror of frivolity."

ON A CHINESE SCREEN. By W. Somerset Maugham. New York: George H. Doran Company; $2.
Travel sketches of China.

THE KING'S ARROW. By H. A. Cody. New York: George H. Doran Company; $2.
An adventure story by the author of "The Frontiersman."

TALES TOLD BY THE GANDER. By Maud Radford Warren and Eve Davenport. New York: George H. Doran Company; $2.50.

Mother Goose and her friends, illustrated by Charles A. Federer.

FOOL'S HILL. By Leona Dalrymple. New York: Robert W. McBride & Co.; $1.75.
A novel.

THE ROMANTIC WORLD OF MUSIC. By William Armstrong. New York: E. P. Dutton & Co.; $5.
Story, anecdote, and personal recollections of the leading operatic singers known to America in recent years.

DO'S AND DON'T'S FOR THE PLAYWRIGHT. By Fanny Cannon. Chicago: T. S. Denison & Co.
A manual for the writer of plays for amateurs.

THE CRITICAL GAME. By John Macy. New York: Boni & Liveright; $2.50.
A defense of criticism.

ROPE. By Holworthy Hall. New York: Dodd, Mead & Co.; $1.75.
A novel.

MEADE'S HEADQUARTERS, 1863-1865. Boston: The Atlantic Monthly; $4.
Letters of Colonel Theodore Lyman, from the Wilderness to Appomattox, selected and edited by George R. Agassiz.

THE SUBCONSCIOUS COURTSHIP. By Berta Ruck. New York: Dodd, Mead & Co.; $1.75.
A novel.

PRE-RAPHAELITES AND OTHER POETS. By Lafcadio Hearn. New York: Dodd, Mead & Co.
Lectures selected and edited by John Erskine.

THE STRANGE ATTRACTION. By Jane Mander. New York: Dodd, Mead & Co.; $1.90.
A story of New Zealand.

MOBY DICK. By Herman Melville. New York: Dodd, Mead & Co.; $3.50.
With illustrations by Mead Schaefer.

TWENTY-ONE LETTERS OF AMBROSE BIERCE.

The White House

Judith of the Godless Valley

By Honore Willisie

The story of a wild young rider of the Western cow country and the girl Judith—vivid, fearless, capable of fierce passions. A tense, bitingly human story of the New Englander transplanted in the West—what he has done and what he has failed to do. $2

Book Department, Main Floor
Phone Kearny 5000

Raphael Wall & Co. Inc.

BALFOUR, GUTHRIE & CO.

SAN FRANCISCO AND LOS ANGELES,
PORTLAND, SEATTLE, TACOMA,
AND VANCOUVER.

MERCHANTS

EXPORTERS AND IMPORTERS

MARINE AND FIRE INSURANCE

AVERAGE ADJUSTERS

Agents of

HARRISON DIRECT LINE OF STEAMERS

TO AND FROM EUROPEAN PORTS

and

COMMONWEALTH GOVERNMENT LINE

Redwood Export Company

California Redwood
Lumber and Ties

Cargoes and Parcels
"To off shore markets only"

260 CALIFORNIA STREET
SAN FRANCISCO, CALIF.

Phone Sutter 2163

UNION LUMBER CO.

CROCKER BUILDING

SAN FRANCISCO, CALIFORNIA

MANUFACTURERS and WHOLESALERS

— OF —

REDWOOD LUMBER

RAILROAD TIES

TELEGRAPH POLES

SHINGLES

— AND —

SPLIT REDWOOD PRODUCTS

Geo. E. Billings Roy C. Ward Geo. B. Dinsmore
J. C. Muesdorffer Jas. W. Dean

GEO. E. BILLINGS CO.

ALL FORMS OF INSURANCE
EFFECTED

312 California St., San Francisco, Cal.
Phone—Douglas 6400

BONESTELL & CO.
PAPER

The paper used in printing the Argonaut is
furnished by us
CALIFORNIA'S LEADING PAPER HOUSE
118 to 124 First Street, corner Minna,
San Francisco

The Wright Magazine

("Not for self, but for others")

Only $1.00 a Year.

Besides a serial and short stories it contains departments for literary and music, women and children, farm and garden, a people's forum, manuscript markets, radio notes and other interesting features.

THE WRIGHT MAGAZINE
P. O. Box 894 Little Rock, Ark.

A CRITICAL
FABLE

Second Large Printing Now Ready

"A wit, cool as wine opened under the roses, dissects schools and tendencies. . . . A gallery of portraits which shows what this age is."—Louis Untermeyer in The New Republic.

"A document."—The Nation.

"A masterly gesture towards harvesting the virtues and vices of the American poets of today."—W. S. Braithwaite in The Boston Transcript.

"An interesting summing up of the immediate present . . . too worth while to be read hurriedly."—Christian Science Monitor.

"Cleverest book that has happened in ages."—Harvard Advocate.

"Brilliant, amusing and wonderfully facile, good verse and good criticism."—Philadelphia Public Ledger.

"We have had Mirrors of Downing Street, and Washington, Gentlemen with Dusters, Darling Margot and dozens of others. . . . And this last is the best of them all. . . . Its droll whimsies delight the casual reader, its keen analysis of the modern poets is a joy to the more learned critics."—J. R. Daniels, Raleigh, N. C., Observer.

"Brilliantly amusing."—Duluth, Minn., Herald.

WHO WROTE IT?

Picture cover
Title-page in two colors
$1.00

HOUGHTON MIFFLIN CO.
Boston and New York

IT'S THE WATER.

Prepared with Glacier Water from
Shasta Springs
AT ALL DEALERS
SHASTA WATER COMPANY

Edited with a note by Samuel Loveman. Cleveland: George Kirk; Japanese vellum edition, $4; antique paper edition, $2.

VOICES AND FIGURES OF MUSIC AND THE DANCE. By H. T. Parker. New York: Dodd, Mead & Co.
Impressions by the music and dramatic editor of the Boston Evening Transcript.

CLAIR DE LUNE. By Anthony Pryde. New York: Dodd, Mead & Co.; $2.
A novel.

A DEFENSE OF COSMETICS. By Max Beerholm. New York: Dodd, Mead & Co.
An essay.

VIOLA GWYNN. By George Barr McCutcheon. New York: Dodd, Mead & Co.; $2.
A story of romantic Indiana early in the nineteenth century.

HUMAN NATURE IN THE BIBLE. By William Lyon Phelps. New York: Charles Scribner's Sons; $2.
Delineation of character in the Bible.

All Books that are reviewed in the Argonaut can be obtained at
Robertson's
222 STOCKTON ST.
Union Square San Francisco

THE HOLMES BOOK CO.

707 Market St. 152 Kearny St. 22 Third St.
Largest variety of new and second-hand books in the city. A visit to our stores will convince you of the truth of this assertion. We buy libraries or single books for cash. See us before selling. Phone—Douglas 3283.
SAN FRANCISCO, CAL.

IF YOU ARE A REAL
BOOK-LOVER

Spend a pleasant hour in the real "Old Book Shop" at 2 TILLMAN PLACE, OFF GRANT AVENUE—below Sutter.
Rare Old Books Bought, Sold and Hunted For by GEORGE HARGENS (formerly of the White House)

BOOKS
AT
PAUL ELDER'S
239 POST ST., SAN FRANCISCO

NEWBEGIN'S BOOKSTORE

358 POST STREET SAN FRANCISCO
Opposite Union Square
A Shop known for its courteous service, and a pleasant place to browse.
Information on books, authors and editions gladly given. Books bought and sold. Buyer will call.
Telephone Douglas 2810

JOHN HOWELL
IMPORTER BOOKS PUBLISHER
RARE BOOKS and FIRST EDITIONS
Libraries Bought and Sold
328 Post Street Union Square
Sutter 3268
SAN FRANCISCO

"THE SKIN GAME."

We were in the new England, gazing, absorbed, through an open door, and witnessing a detail of the present-day social upheaval in that land. "The old order changeth, giving place to new," Galsworthy, as ever calm, judicial, detached, shows us a phase of the present struggle between the old county families and the war-made rich.

Each must be true to himself, the patricians clinging to the old ways, the old authority, the old kindly attitude of sovereign dispenser of grace to the peasantry; or at least that was the attitude of the best of them. The new men, with commercial blood, and the energy of a genius for business, see only the business possibilities in the beautiful countryside, and thirst to turn the smiling vales surrounding the stately homes of England into a hideous turmoil of factories and mines.

In spite of his belonging to the upper classes, Galsworthy has always had a profound pity for the down dog. His cool, dispassionate tone baffles many readers who attempt him, his lack of sentimentality and heated partisanship preventing them from recognizing that he is a great humanitarian. He can interpret to us with marvelous insight the soul of the humblest charwoman; even one lowlier and more toil-worn and poverty-stricken than Mrs. Jones in "The Silver Box." What wonder, then, that this clear-sighted reader of men's souls can make us see into the mental and emotional processes of a parvenu Hornblower, as well as into those of men of his own class?

Galsworthy is so innately reasonable that all his refinement, his intellectuality, his culture can not prevent him from feeling sympathy for those base-born climbers who, in this new, war-changed England, ask for social recognition from the coldly withdrawing aristocrats whose lands and granges and castles they are buying. Conflict, in fact, useless hostilities, the cruelties practiced by human beings on each other, whether industrial, social, or physical, are hateful to Galsworthy. He considers this sort of thing horribly debasing to the human family. The conflict he shows us in "The Skin Game" is founded on a motive of lesser importance than those treated of in many of Galsworthy's plays; in "The Silver Box," for instance, in "Justice," and "The Strike." But it shows, set forth in the strong yet simple manner in which the Galsworthian drama is expressed, a timely phase of the eternal human conflict.

The two families, the aristocratic Hillcrists and the rich plebeians, that might have gravitated toward friendly social relations because the youth of the day is progressive, democratic, and perceptive, are made bitter enemies by the uncompromising social conservatism of the senior Hillcrists.

With that remarkable skill in stagecraft which enables him to present in cumulative progression just the scenes and events which make the question present itself, the story tell itself, strongly, directly, and dramatically, we finally see the ethical point unfold. Can even as knightly a soul as Squire Hillcrist's enter into such a fight and remain unsmirched?

Promises are broken on both sides, and though victory has apparently perched on the Hillcrist banners, the battle has left fearful devastation in its wake: lifelong, unseparable enmities, a family tragedy, sundered lives, and young hearts embittered toward each other whose dawning sentiments if permitted to flower into love might have been the means of welding the two families into a part of that social union between the high and the lowly born that is bound to come yet in this new England that is still in the throes of its painful birth.

"The Skin Game" is acted with almost if not quite perfect realism by the English company that is interpreting it. The performance impresses by its naturalistic treatment of a theme founded on human ethics.

The result is an absorbing, even impressive performance. Mr. Galsworthy classifies his play as a tragedy-comedy; an excellent classification, for we perceive the high comedy of human nature in play, the dramatic urge of the conflict, and the tragedy that is caused, not only by a breaking heart, but by the flavor of an unworthily won victory to a soul attuned to an unassuming but unswerving nobility.

The personnel of the company is very interesting, partly on account of its marked

English flavor, which, it seems to me, is very necessary. American players can give a very good, but not perfect, imitation of British characters, but they are not in the atmosphere, as are this group that William Brady has sent us.

Audrey Cameron, in the part of Jill Hillcrist, is a fascinating little figure, with her boyish air, her tranquil poise, her serene up-to-dateness—as she expresses Jill—and a most attractive individualistic charm that she owns, but does not exert. A very sane young actress, who expresses completely yet without emphasis the kind of being Jill is: well-balanced, reasonable, finely perceptive, affectionate, and tolerant; yet with an underlying stratum of class feeling that for all her twentieth-century flavor causes her to cling to her own when the social war breaks out.

A remarkably good presentation by Matthew Boulton of Hornblower, the energetic upstart, won cordial recognition from a deeply interested and profoundly appreciative audience. Almost too fine and dignified looking for the character, Mr. Boulton's art is such that it enables him with but a minimum of make-up to make over his physiognomy to express the plebeian origin and the commercial hardness underlying the superficial bonhomie of a man who is naturally a driving wedge. Kate Wingfield's portrayal of Mrs. Hillcrist lacks the aristocratic exterior. But have we not seen pictures of queens that look like cooks? Miss Wingfield represented a woman of patrician origin with a base-born soul, and did it authoritatively except for a voice that at times was rather too strident. Her expression, her pose, and even the less startling tones of her voice were in keeping. Herbert Bunston's Hillcrist conveyed with a most pleasurable effect of sincerity the idea of the finer kind of the landed gentry; the sort of men we have met in some of Galsworthy's novels who feel a sense of high responsibility toward the humbler tenants of their land. And Arthur Bowyer presented another type made familiar to us in English fiction: the land-owner's agent, who is indispensable in the management of the estate and develops a sort of callousness in his dealings with the tenant that his thinner-skinned employer may not always attain.

Ann Delafield gave a romantically moving impersonation of the lovely Chloe who was the means of bringing home to the squire's saddened perceptions that even the fighter who fastidiously tries to keep the women out of the fight may, when he enters "the skin game," be the unconscious, unintentional means of hounding a woman to death. Messrs. Fortescue and McEwen filled their small rôles satisfactorily. Eugene Wellesley gave a very cleverly faithful depiction of the dapper auctioneer rallying his cohorts to the charge, and Ine Cameron and Frank Sherlock were true to life both in their get-up and their acting as the two evicted peasants, Ine Cameron, if I am not mistaken, doubling in the rôle of the spying maid with her sneering smile; an extremely well done bit.

"The Skin Game" provides another instance of Galsworthy's impartiality in presenting a case. He shows the faults and virtues on both sides, and leaves it to you to make the decision. Being logical, non-partisan, and never sentimental, he is not and never will be a great favorite with the masses, who want you to knock them on the head and say, "Thus must you think." But he is one of the leading figures in the literature and drama of the day. He is a modernist, and, aside from rather too warm-blooded a tendency in dealing with sex questions, according to Anglo-Saxon taste, his thought is always worth following.

"WHEN KNIGHTHOOD WAS IN FLOWER."

All the young things are rushing, bright-eyed and expectant, to the Curran this week, where they will see a magnificent fashion show of the sixteenth-century period. The picture, a romantic comedy upon which a fortune has been lavished, is made from a best-seller widely read more than a decade ago, and now rescued from oblivion because of its great possibilities for camera exploitation.

The story lends itself well to photographic depiction, its historical background being a decided asset.

There is no particular novelty in the treatment, for in "The Three Guardsmen" and "The Prisoner of Zenda" we have also seen kings in their magnificent courts surrounded by gorgeous sycophants, lovely princesses shrined in romance, and troops of intrepid horsemen galloping away and away, through mysterious, arched gateways, over bridged highways, and pursued through storm-beaten forests by mounted cavaliers of equal courage and tenacity.

Mary Tudor, sister of Henry VIII, is depicted as a demure madcap with a fine, well-grown Tudor will of her own with which she dared to oppose that of the burly Henry VIII.

The characters, kings, courtiers, churchmen, a jester, ladies in waiting, ambassadors, and so forth, are represented by players who are well selected because of some appropriate line of feature, as in the cases of Cardinal Wolsey, Duke of Buckingham, and Duc de Longueville, or for some special grace in the wearing of the court costumes.

Sad to say there is no great beauty among the women. The part of Mary Tudor is taken by Marion Davies, who doesn't know how to act; or at least she knows mighty little about the art.

She has three ways of expressing emotion by her features: a frown, a smile, and opening her mouth. However, she has a pretty figure, and no doubt many who failed to remark her lack of the native distinction due to a princess of the blood accepted her as a beauty, more particularly as she wore a different costume in every scene and a perfectly thrilling series of veiled and laced and embroidered and jeweled headdresses.

Muscularly Miss Davies is a very active actress, and she certainly came out strong in the scene at the inn, where, garbed as a boy page, she was as lively as popcorn as she danced about her teasing assailant and slapped him energetically with her sword.

It struck me, however, that in the demeanor of the princess there was little to convey a suggestion of the clipped, pruned, tamed, trained and repressed demeanor of a royal maiden whose every gracious motion and gesture should express that she is a human court ornament.

Mary Tudor giggled, and fluttered, and chattered, and almost nudged her lady-in-waiting; and out in open court the princess and Brandon held hands with that absence of a perception of the conventional fitness of things that one often perceives in the pictured results of a movie producer's efforts at suggesting drawing-room elegance and class tone.

Forrest Stanley is quite a handsome and romantic figure in the rôle of Brandon, and carries himself gallantly in doublet and hose. There is a lot of pretty sword-play in the piece, plenty of action, and those exciting climaxes which thrill young blood and the indications are that the Curran is going to draw well during a prolonged run.

AT THE PLAZA.

Different American and French standards have clashed in the attempted adaptation of "S. S. Tenacity" to the tastes of English-speaking audiences. The French would enjoy the long monologues of Hidoux—provided the rôle were played in first-class style—while the Americans would become restless and impatient during their protracted delivery; and did so in spite of the genuine merit of Irving Dillon's representation.

The theme of the play is scarcely strong enough to please the seeker for tense drama, and requires the most delicate and careful treatment. A girl—the pretty waitress at a respectable inn at a French port—is swayed between the youthful homage of a clean-minded, romantic adolescent and the more materialistic admiration of a maturer man. She veers toward the youth; but Bastien, half in sportive mood, half in calculation, induces her to drink champagne—a beverage for which she betrays an entirely innocent partiality—with him. In the scene which follows we see how the scruples of a naturally decent-minded girl break down under the influence of the heady liquor.

Once his, Bastien has got her, or his kind has, for good. There is no saving Thérèse now. She is on the downward path.

There is a character symbolism in the title, applicable to the two men who wooed Thérèse. The story moves rather slowly, the dialogue tends to run toward monologue, and the whole portrayal of an opening life swaying perilously between the good and the evil choice misses dramatic intensity.

Only the kind of acting that is polished to the greatest finesse could put us in that mood, almost tragic in its regret, with which we would witness bright, tender girlhood losing its buckler and shield.

The company played the piece well, and yet not well enough. There was an amateurish quality detectable in their acting, due, I should judge, to the lack of sufficient give and take in the dialogue and to the requirement of super-delicate of treatment in the crucial scene. Phyllis Blake's bright face is very expressive; Lloyd Corrigan's depiction of a good-natured materialist allowing his better self to be drowned in a flood of predatory lustfulness had its merits; yet both fell short.

"The Drums of Oude" is a study in atmosphere. Located in India, land of mystery, we partly behind the scenes, see the silent treachery of the Hindu servants, and witness the method by which the chain of seditious communication between the natives rallying to the mutiny—the famous one of 1857—was maintained.

It is a fine piece of work that Austin Strong did in building up that atmosphere of mute, gestureless dread. The piece does not call so much for individual acting as for fine stage direction accompanied by collective intensity. We get the required emotion: the suggestion of masked, invisible peril all about; terrible peril menacing the military post, temporarily unguarded save by the British, bulldog courage of a small group, typical of the men who built up the British Empire.

Slowly yet inevitably the action develops, reaching a strong culmination when the siege by the mutinous Sepoys begins, and the fuse to the magazine is lighted, and ending in a note of joyful relief at the sound of the bagpipes of the returning regiment.

Mr. Sam Hume's somewhat impassive style

AGENTS WANTED.

DEFLEXOGRAPH fits any phonograph. Stops scratch and surface noises. Softens tone. Immense profits. VANTONE CO., Dept. 102, Box 1244, City Hall Station, New York.

A Gift to Progress

California's highway of grandeur—the Skyline Boulevard—is under construction.

Beauty and utility joined hands in the planning of this avenue of inspiration that runs from San Francisco along the westernmost verge of our continent.

The Skyline Boulevard cancels a "No Thoroughfare" sign that Nature placed on our peninsula.

From its north terminal at Sloat Boulevard and the Great Highway, the Skyline runs for eleven miles through properties of Spring Valley Water Company.

Two miles the Skyline runs across Lake Merced Rancho; then nine miles through Spring Valley watershed in San Mateo County, opening to travel a region that presents noble picture after picture of ocean, mountain, lake and valley.

Right-of-way for this northern unit of the Skyline Boulevard is from 80 to 100 feet wide in San Francisco, and from 80 to 90 feet wide in San Mateo County.

This right-of-way, for eleven miles in two counties, is the gift of Spring Valley Water Company.

SPRING VALLEY
WATER COMPANY

ESMOND'S

"THE CAKE SHOP"
253 Grant Ave.

Mince Pies made from our own home-made mince-meat. Genuine English Plum Puddings and Fruit Cakes.

"ECCLES CAKES" Our Specialty

is well adapted to the rôle of the major who is faithful unto death. Mary Morris and Dan Totheroh fill the two other principal rôles, Mr. Totheroh without distinction, but the young playwright is gaining the valuable stage technique almost indispensable to a modern writer of plays.

Mary Morris adjusts herself to the old-fashioned romance of the love scene, and the Hindus have been carefully tutored to be pussy-footed and silent-fingered.

JOSEPHINE HART PHELPS.

Austria's Musical Stamps.

At least something new has come out of the distress of Austria, in the form of postage stamps bearing the portraits, not of sovereigns, according to custom, but of famous musicians, says the New York Tribune. Japan, it will be remembered, adorns her exquisite stamps with a chrysanthemum flower, Great Britain with the portrait of the sovereign, but Austria alone selects men whose fame is in the world of art.

Thus the two-kronen stamp bears the portrait of Francis Haydn, the immortal composer of "The Creation," "The Seasons," "Armida," and a wealth of sacred and secular music, not forgetting the national hymn of Austria. The five-kronen stamp shows the handsome face of Mozart, the inspired melodist of "Don Giovanni," "The Magic Flute," and other masterpieces. On the seven-and-a-half-kronen stamp appears the mighty and incomparable Beethoven. And on the ten-kronen stamp is the likeness of Franz Schubert, worthy companion of the other great masters.

Musicians and philatelists alike will rejoice in these stamps, which are excellent examples of the engraver's art. But connoisseurs will wonder at the judgment which placed on the highest-priced stamp of all, the fifty-kronen, the portrait of the composer of "The Beautiful Blue Danube," "Wine, Woman and Song," "Thousand and One Nights" and other fashionable dances of a generation or two ago. Is it to be believed that the Viennese really rank Johann Strauss above Haydn, Mozart, Schubert and Beethoven?

FOYER AND BOX-OFFICE.

The Columbia Theatre.

The second and final week of Galsworthy's play, "The Skin Game," opens Sunday night. Theatre-goers are making the most of this engagement.

Henry W. Savage will offer America's prima donna comedienne, Mitzi, in her musical success, "Lady Billy," by Zelda Sears and Harold Levey, at the Columbia on the night of Monday, November 27th. Every three years Mitzi makes a tour to the Coast, and this city has been included in the few places in which the company will play. A famed Savage singing ensemble, a metropolitan cast, and a spectacular scenic production will support Mitzi.

At the Curran.

"When Knighthood Was in Flower" is shown twice daily, duplicating the experience in New York, Chicago, and London. It is a massive production, but much of its success is owing to the screen art of Marion Davies as Princess Mary Tudor. She heads a large company.

"Spring Maid" at the Rivoli.

With Monday's performance "The Spring Maid," the Hartman-Steindorff attraction at the Rivoli Opera House, will begin its second and last week. There will be matinées Saturday and Sunday. The production has attracted wide attention because of its melodious music, the comedy of Hartman as a tragedian, the singing of Lillian Glaser, John Van, Robert Carlson, Lavinia Winn, Nona Campbell and Hazel Van Hatten, the dancing of Paul Hartman and Edna Malone, the scenery of the Tylers and the musical interpretations given the numbers by Paul Steindorff and his orchestra.

Because of the limited capacity of the theatre the management requests those planning to see the production to take advantage of the matinées or the performances early in the week.

"The Bohemian Girl" is announced as the next production.

The Orpheum Next Week.

Henry Santrey, former baritone at the old Tivoli Opera, has a good voice, and he and his band present a popular programme which is a hit.

Harry and Anna Seymour are a likable, youthful pair, who present bits of mirth and melody.

D. D. H. is a mystery, even to the management. Williams and Wolfus are said to be clever humorists.

"The Letter Writer" is a humorous sketch by Edwin S. Burke and S. Jay Kaufman. The cast is composed of extraordinary talent. Meehan's Canines accomplish feats which to the general public might seem impossible.

Vincent O'Donnell, "The Miniature McCormack," as this protégé of Gus Edwards is called, has youth and the art of an experienced showman.

The Royal Gascoignes begin where most jugglers end. Their performance is a series of feats beginning with the most difficult and ending with the seemingly impossible.

Fine Arts Ensemble Concerts.

The second of the series of four concerts being given at the Palace of Fine Arts by the San Francisco Museum Ensemble will take place on Friday afternoon, November 22d, when the eminent harpist of the San Francisco Symphony Orchestra, Kajetan Attl, will appear as soloist. The programme will be of Bohemian music, and Attl will play a group of Bohemian folk songs, some of which have not been heard before in this city. He will also play a harp fantasy on Smetana's "Bartered Bride," arranged by Hans Trnecel.

Song Recital

BY
JOHN CHARLES THOMAS
American Baritone
Sunday Afternoon, Nov. 26th
at 2:30
Scottish Rite Auditorium
Tickets, $1.00, $1.50 and $2.00 (war tax extra). On sale at Sherman, Clay & Co.'s.
Management FRANK W. HEALY

EXPOSITION AUDITORIUM

Tuesday Evening, Nov. 28, at 8:20
First and Only San Francisco Appearance
MARCEL DUPRE
World Famous Organist, from Notre Dame Cathedral, Paris
A Programme of Rare Excellence
Reserved seats, 50c, 75c, $1. Admission, 25c
Seats now on sale at Sherman, Clay & Co.'s.
Auspices Auditorium Committee,
Board of Supervisors

professor of the harp at the Prague Conservatory.

The ensemble, composed of the well-known artist, Miss Ada Clement, who is one of the finest ensemble players in this state; Alexander Saslavsky, the eminent violinist and conductor, who will be first violin and director; R. Mendelevitch, second violin; Emile Hahl, viola, and Otto King, violoncello, will render Smetana's trio and Dvorak's quintet.

The recitals are being given under the auspices of the Woman's Auxiliary of the San Francisco Museum of Art, of which Mrs. Joseph Fife is the chairman.

The New Baritone.

Frank W. Healy, under whose direction John Charles Thomas, the new American baritone, will give a song recital Sunday afternoon, November 26th, at the Scottish Rite Auditorium, is in receipt of the following telegram from R. E. Johnston, New York manager of the singer: "Thomas' second recital is an even greater success than the first. The Herald says he has an unusually beautiful voice and delighted his audience with his skillful style and musical feeling. The Tribune says he revealed traits that will make him a favorite with our public. The Globe says his voice recalls Caruso's."

Marcel Dupre.

Marcel Dupre, organist of Notre Dame Cathedral, Paris, will make his first and only appearance in San Francisco on Tuesday evening, November 28th, at the Exposition Auditorium. The auditorium committee of the board of supervisors, under whose direction Dupre will appear, feels very fortunate in securing him for San Francisco and has placed the price of reserved seats at 50 cents, 75 cents and $1, with admission at 25 cents. Reservations may now be made at Sherman,

The Salmagundian Thumbboxes.

The Salmagundi exhibition of thumbbox sketches begins this year on November 24th with the usual stag, and thereafter will be open to the public from 12 to 6, Sundays 2 to 6, until the 21st of December. The walls of the gallery will be hung with something like five or six hundred tiny paintings, all of them practically of the same size.

CURRENT VERSE.

The Lonely Maidens.

Young Meg is married:
She who was the glory of our woodland dances,
She who shone the whitest when the slow moon-glances

Played upon our bodies at the midnight pool;
For a little gold ring she gave her maiden laughter,

The maiden hours, the merry hours, with no thought after,
And the secrets of her eyes so crystal cool:

Oh, it's ring, cruel ring, is the dirge maids sing,
When the queen of all their revels goes amarrying.

Young Meg is married:

Come and let us find where alone she lingers,—
Dark hair tumbled by the soft wind's fingers,—

Pegging out her linen by the lichen'd wall;
There's a song on her lips and a smile just sleeping,

But not for us her singing or the wild blood leaping,
Or the smile that slumbers till she hears him call—

Singing, ring, pretty ring, the happy maidens sing,
When the lover of their dream comes amarrying.

No, come away, away, to tread our dances.
Loneliness is better than her stranger-glances

(Ah! she was our beauty and our love so long!)—
Dance until the moon outshine her eyes so tender,

Till larches in the moonlight dim her white bride's splendor,
And the music of our voices drown her song:

Singing, ring, cruel ring, the lonely maidens sing,
When the darling of their heart goes amarrying.

—P. H. B. Lyon in Westminster Gazette.

Stucco and Stone.

By summer seas that lull your flight,
By drowsy shores serenely old,
In gleaming towns of rose and white,
You will find bodies burnt to gold—

There where the waves are brought to heel,
There where the Alps, no longer free,
Come down like elephants to kneel
Beside the glazed and azure sea;

Or—parched for yellow, rose, and red—
Where madder, rose, and yellow rot,
Gay drooping palaces that wade
Green waters odorous and hot.

—Edmund Wilson, Jr., in the Double Dealer.

Of the 25,000,000 more women than men in Europe, Russia has the greatest surplus.

COLUMBIA THEATRE Leading Playhouse of the West
Geary at Mason Phone Franklin 150
Final Week Begins Sunday, Nov. 19
Matinees Wednesday and Saturday
William A. Brady Presents
John Galsworthy's Greatest Play
"THE SKIN GAME"
London and New York Cast
Nov. 27—MITZI in "Lady Billy."

CURRAN THEATRE Geary Street Near Mason
Geary at Mason Phone Prospect 9300
Now Playing for a Short Engagement
A Picturization of Charles Major's Story of Love and Romance
"WHEN KNIGHTHOOD WAS IN FLOWER"
Prices for All Performances
50c and $1 (tax extra)
Matinees Daily (except Sunday)

RIVOLI OPERA HOUSE
Market at Seventh. Phone Market 373
Matinees Saturday and Sunday
Every Week
Is Music
Week at the Rivoli
FERRIS HARTMAN AND PAUL STEINDORFF
Present the Exquisitely Tunesful Comic Opera
"THE SPRING MAID"
Best Seats One Dollar

THE BEST IN VAUDEVILLE
Orpheum
Orpheum Circuit
MATINEES 25 and 50c
DAILY
EVENINGS 25c to $1.25
Except Sats., Suns. and Holidays
ALWAYS A GREAT SHOW
SMOKING PERMITTED IN DRESS CIRCLE AND LOGES

Sequoia Little Theatre
1725 Washington St. Pet. Polk St. and Van Ness Ave.
Tuesday and Saturday Nights in November
Three One-Act Plays
Dunsanny-Galsworthy-G. Bernard Shaw
Prices $1 and 50c, plus tax.
Sherman, Clay's and Paul Elder's

daily to Denver,
Kansas
City and Chicago

Solid Pullman train with buffet smoker
and Observation cars
Fred Harvey
dining car service Exclusively for first class travel

Grand Canyon Line

Tickets to and from Europe via all Trans-Atlantic Lines

Ask any Santa Fe Agent

R. D. Johnson, Div. Pass. Agt.
601 Market Street
Phone Sutter 7600
or
Market Street Ferry
Phone Sutter 7600

OAKLAND
434 13th St.
40th St. & San Pablo Ave.
BERKELEY
University Ave. & West St.
SAN JOSE
43 Ryland Block
SACRAMENTO
201 Calif. Fruit Bldg.

VANITY FAIR.

The Supreme Court of the United States has a great deal to do in order to protect the rights of minorities from the tyranny of majorities and stop the perversion of the Constitution by zealots; and so perhaps our professional cavillers should not cavil too much if in the recent decision on pearl buttons it failed to state definitively whether the mussel from whose indurated overcoat the buttons are cut is or is not a wild animal. One party to the litigation contended that it was, the other that it failed to exhibit the necessary mobility and ferocity. In rendering the decision Justice Holmes inclined toward the contention that the mussel is tame; at least he declared that it should not be classed with birds and fishes, which have the power of moving about; each, of course, in its respective perspective element—whereas the mussel neither swims nor sings. He found that, like the farmer, it is attached to the land, and whether tame or wild, is the property of the owner of the estate through which runs the stream the mussel regards as its home—provided said stream is not navigable. If the stream be navigable, the fact introduces another uncertainty with which the Supreme Court did not feel well enough that day to deal. The decision is confined, of course, to the button-bearing mussel of the streams tributary to the Mississippi River, and has no power to bind or loose in the case of the edible mussel of tidal waters. Whether that be tame or wild is another question, even when the navigability of such waters is conceded under due stipulation. We should say that particular question would depend on how such mussels are served. Simply steamed or stewed, they are not very wild, at least until they reach the human stomach. They are incapable of pursuing a victim or committing acts of depredation or devastation of sufficient severity to occupy the time of the court. To them would apply the doctrine of nil nisi bonum, or caveat emptor, or ultra vires, or something of the sort, or that other one whose Latin formula we forget, but whose clear meaning is, why worry, let the tail go with the hide. But mussels bordelaise are different. They are wilder than the lupin, the eschscholtzia, the baby-blue-eye or any other wild flower. Even after death and ingestion they have power over men, power of projection, power of locomotion they never had before, power to devastate, to desolate, to pursue and ruin. The Supreme Court, should the question ever come before it, need have no hesitancy in deciding that mussels bordelaise are the wildest thing on the menu. We have known Chinamen in a crowded car to change their seats when approached by an order of mussels bordelaise that had been eaten an hour before, and when a Chinaman leaves his seat in a car it is only under the most grievous compulsion. We have known an American citizen of African descent to flee in similar circumstances from a fellow-citizen of Anglo-Saxon descent. We have known mussels bordelaise to start an incipient panic on a ferryboat—and this long after they were dead. There can be no question of it; the mussel bordelaise is ferox natura, or whatever it is called, and it is ferox with a ferocity that only time can tame. It is to be hoped that this will help the Supreme Court next time it is in difficulty with buttons.

The London clubs are in distress, and from a curious reason associated with what some persons have been thinking of as the degeneracy of the times. Women appear to have made themselves too attractive. Time was, and not so far back, that the mid-Victorian type of woman drove men to the clubs. The clubs were cities of refuge, and they did a good business at it. When home was a place presided over by a Victorian virago whom the male appendage of the house had married in some hour of optimism the club became a sacred place where man was safe. Today women have added to their charms a certain latitudinarianism of behavior and a certain breadth of view about personal relations that seem astonishingly to have made them less formidable and more desirable. Among their other charms, for example, some of them now smoke pipes. This imparts the delicate perfume of a navy, but the male who exhales the same perfume does not detect it. Moreover, and this may be the stronger factor, the female house smoker is estopped from vinegar criticism of male house habits. Woman appears to have descended until she is almost on a level with man. And while man may not look up to her as he did, he seems more willing to be with her. We do not know the exact moral of this situation, and suspect it has none, or if any, then one with reverse English on it. But at any rate it has been sad for the clubs. They resisted by rupturing every tradition of English club life and inviting women into the once sacred precincts, but it did no good. Times had changed, and the dancing men simply took the women away from the clubs to the hotel dance floors, leaving the aforesaid sacred precincts to hardshell bachelors and softshell youths. It is said that the fashionable Guards, having moved from Pall Mall into larger quarters in Brook Street to accommodate the new mode, finds itself in such distress that it looks to Lord Lascelles, the wealthy husband of Princess Mary, to keep it afloat. The Royal Air Force is almost deserted. The betting clubs still prosper; and the political clubs, such as the National Liberal, the Reform, and the Constitution, have their regular supporters, while those supplying bathing and athletic and sleeping accommodations manage to get along. But the old-fashioned drinking hideout, once typical of Piccadilly and Pall Mall, is doomed. Men are drinking less and hiding less; and since skirts were shortened they have been seeing much more of the women.

Many notable persons are hoping these days that Sir Thomas Lipton will behave. They know him for a good old sport and on that they can to some extent rely. But as you never can tell what a person intends doing until he has done it, there is ground for anxiety, keen and carling. Sir Thomas has recently been bitten with the bug that makes the most unexpected characters write impetuous memoirs, in the Margot mode; the pesky little itch-mite that should be classified scientifically as the Bacillus Asquithiensis, or something of that sort, number and gender agreeing, and whose literary ravages invariably shock a puritanical world all waiting to be shocked and hoping, like the lady in the beleaguered city, that the shocks will soon begin. Because of his sporting blood there is ground to fear the best, and because of it there is also ground to hope for the worst, according as you may be the reader or the read about. For a sport is a sort of artist, one that believes in doing things with the best effect, and being a sport, how can Tommy avoid making good stories? And as he has had almost everybody that is anybody aboard his yacht, the Erin, and almost everybody's wife, and as the Erin has so often cruised a long way from land, law, and mother church, there is going to be a lot of hard guessing and many a headache over what he may disclose. Of course, he might give fictitious names to his guests. In fact, no memoirist that was a host could do less. But that will not disguise the characters. Everybody will know just who is meant. Tommy has a tenacious, clear-cut memory, and a keen Irish sense of humor, and would make the worst possible witness in any scandal. What Irishman can help telling a good story? If Sir Thomas can not lift the America cup, he can certainly lift a lot of eyebrows, and probably he will, in spite of himself. There can be no question of the saleability of his memoirs. It would not be surprising if some former guest of the Erin bought the whole edition.

THE LAST ECCENTRIC.

One of the most entertaining chapters in Henry Adams' autobiography deals with the religion of eccentricity in England sixty years ago, says the New York Tribune. "The commonest phrase overheard at an English club or dinner-table was that So-and-So was quite mad. It was no offense to So-and-So; eccentricity was so general as to become hereditary distinction." English sympathy for the Southern Confederacy was due to the fact that "its combined attributes—foreign rebellion of English blood—came nearer ideal eccentricity than could be reached by Poles, Hungarians, Italians or Frenchmen." In that somewhat chaotic period, when a man "wandered in and out of London society like a maggot in cheese," everybody was eccentric as a matter of duty and style, and individuals of specially pronounced paranoia were hardly noticed.

Those great days are gone. With the passing of splendid isolation the English had to learn something about Europe, and to accommodate themselves, if in ever so slight a degree, to Europe's ideas. In the middle of the nineteenth century the whole Continent was familiar with the "crazy Englishman," who, in effect, was any Englishman who got so far away from home as the Continent. In more modern times the Continentals have merely thought their insular neighbors crazy like the fox. Minor eccentrics of our day would have been lost in the universal lunacy of the '60s. This degeneration into comparative rationality ought to be discussed by some philosophic historian of London society, perhaps under the title "From Maggot to Margot."

Wilfrid Swane Blunt, who died recently, was one of the last survivors of this glorious age of professional mania. Unlike the mass of Englishmen, who, according to Adams, were deeply sympathetic with rebellion provided it was foreign, Blunt gave most of his efforts to the aid of rebellion against British rule. But he differed from the modern adherents of the doctrine that one's own country is always wrong in that he had no new idol to set up in place of the overthrown image of the fatherland. He admired Egyptians, and Mohammedans in general, in so far as they made themselves obnoxious to Englishmen, and Irishmen to the same extent. He would have agreed with John Bright: "We English are a nation of brutes, and ought to be exterminated to the last man." But he would perhaps have doubted whether any other nation had a much better right to survive. At any rate, he had a share of the abounding vitality of his race in the middle nineteenth century; it could not be said of him, as of most modern dissidents, that his hostility to the favorite doctrines of the time seemed to have no higher origin than mere cantankerousness. The moderns rebel sourly as a matter of duty, but Blunt got pleasure out of it.

POIRET TWILL.

Orders for Poiret twills for the spring, 1923, season have been exceptionally heavy, and, from present indications, this fabric will lead all others in the ready-to-wear field, says the New York Times. From the demand both for the present fall and the coming spring woolen authorities believe that its popularity is destined to parallel that of Canton crepe, which is said to have been the greatest success ever achieved in the history of fabric merchandising.

"For the tailored dress, the conservative tailor and the practical outer wrap for spring and early fall wear, the demand for this twill not only continues unabated," according to a leading dress goods factor, "but all efforts to supplant it with 'newer' or 'more interesting' textures have, so far, proved unavailing."

"If the style of a garment shown in another texture proved desirable, in many instances it was ordered in Poiret twill, the effort to promote a supplanting fabric proving fruitless. Specialists in the mannish tailored dress uphold the draping qualities and the rare 'bloom' of the fabric as a basis of their support. In addition, the cloth readily lends itself to keeping the long lines of the tailor, the sweeping coat, or straight line coat. These virtues combined have induced in the fabric buyer that rare state of mind known as absolute confidence in consumer demand."

"Added to these characteristics of the cloth is the insistence that an inferior grade of Poiret twill will hold its own against the superior qualities of almost any other accepted navy fabric in point of exposure to the elements, hard wear, and frequent trips to the tailor.

"Further indication of the sustained vogue of Poiret twills is afforded by the sales to home dressmakers. The yardage sale of this fabric to these consumers has been tremendous, because the clumsiest effort of the beginner with the first pattern can not wholly result in a bad appearing finished product owing to the fundamental quality of the cloth."

Real Pin Money.

Pin-money, though used commonly as a general term for the occasional extras that a husband chooses to give his wife, has as well a perfectly definite legal meaning.

The expression originated as long ago as the fourteenth century, when metal pins as a novelty in England were not only extremely costly, but were only allowed to be sold on certain days of the year.

Amongst rich people, therefore, these luxuries were looked upon as of great importance, and lawyers, in drawing up a marriage settlement, would specially refer to the sum that the lady was to be allowed yearly for dress and pin-money, as opposed to what she might be given to spend on her husband's household.

Pins are now cheap, but the term is still used in English law, where "pin-money," if properly secured by settlement, is not liable to seizure for a husband's debts. A wife, moreover, may legally save her pin-money, whereas she may not save her housekeeping allowance. The one is given her for a definite purpose; the other for whatever she chooses to do with it.

"Briar-wood" pipes are made from the wood of the lobelia tree.

BIG POWER for SMALL CARS

"Red Crown" enables your car to develop the maximum of power and per-gallon mileage that its makers designed it to give.

It vaporizes rapidly and uniformly in the carburetor—that means quick starting. It is consumed completely in the cylinders—that means a steady stream of power and more mileage at less cost.

Run your car with "Red Crown" and nothing else, and you won't have to bother with carburetor adjustments.

Fill at the Red Crown sign—at Service Stations, at garages, and at other dealers.

STANDARD OIL COMPANY
(California)

The Gasoline
of Quality

STORYETTES.

Grave and Gay, Epigrammatic and Otherwise.

A class of boys was undergoing an examination in Scripture. The subject was the Good Samaritan. "And why do you think the Pharisee, after looking at him, passed by on the other side?" "Because he saw he had been robbed already," was the answer given.

It was the terminal examination, and a budding philosopher concluded his essay on Mother Earth with this startling statement: "The earth revolves on its own axis 365 times in twenty-four hours. This rapid motion through space causes its sides to perspire; this is called dew."

A Chinaman was much worried by a vicious-looking dog which barked at him in an angry manner. "Don't be afraid of him," said a friend. "You know the old proverb: 'A barking dog never bites.'" "Yes," said the Chinaman, "you know proverb, I know proverb, but does damn dog know proverb?"

"Mother," said little Eva, on the way from church, "babies aren't so good as they used to be, are they?" "Whatever makes you think that?" replied her mother. "Well, little Willie can't talk yet, and he's nearly two, but Job could talk when he was a baby." "Where does it tell you that, dear?" asked mother. "Don't you remember the lesson this morning, mother? It said that Job cursed the day he was born."

A story of a Tudor judge is told of Sir Nicholas Bacon, who in the time of Elizabeth was importuned by a criminal to spare his life on account of kinship. "How so?" demanded the judge. "Because my name is Hog and yours is Bacon; and hog and bacon are so near akin that they can not be separated." "Aye," responded the judge, dryly, "but you and I can not yet be kindred, for the hog is not bacon until it be well hanged."

Novelist Upton Sinclair at a Coronado tea condemned snobbishness. "An English lord," he said, "took up his residence in Los Angeles last year to study the novel art. Of course all the Los Angeles snobs tried to make his acquaintance. He was exclusive, though. But one day a young fellow went home and reported that the lord had spoken to him. 'Oh, good,' said his mother. 'What did his lordship say to you, Jim?' 'He told me,' said Jim, 'to quit throwing cigarette butts on his lawn.'"

Being a politician has both its pleasures and its penalties, and in politics as well as in other walks of life the "infant terrible" rushes in like an angel where even fools fear to tread. Take, for example, a recent experience attributed to a certain Western senator, attending a non-partisan tea in Washington. According to the story, the little daughter of the hostess ran up to the great man and asked to be taken on his knees, explaining: "I want to see if I can see that word." "Word, what word?" demanded the puzzled senator. To which the child replied: "Well, I heard mama say that if any man had the word 'idiot' written all over his face, it was you."

Speaking of his recent London visit, Patrick Francis Murphy, the after-dinner speaker, mentioned a New Yorker in the English metropolis who was decidedly the worse for liquor. The following morning Mr. Murphy took him to task sternly. The culprit beamed as if he had been congratulated. "Thanks, old man, I was stewed, wasn't I?" he said. "And do you know what it cost me? Why, only $5.50." Then he beamed again and added, "A good, satisfactory stew of that kind in New York would have set me back at least $100, plus a week in hospital with acute wood alcohol poisoning."

The Monroe Doctrine was under discussion at a recent dinner in Washington and some one asked that dean of all solons, "Uncle Joe" Cannon, what he thought about it, in view of present-day politics. "Well," replied Uncle Joe, "if we had stuck to the Monroe Doctrine we wouldn't have been dragged into the world war, but since we did go into it, I guess that from now on the Monroe Doctrine is a back number. In world politics today Uncle Sam is in much the same fix as was Cactus Joe at the bridge party: 'Do you like bridge?' Joe was asked. 'No,' he answered. 'It looks to me like one of them games where they put in a lot of arithmetic so's to take a regular card player's mind off'n the run of the deck.'"

Mrs. John D. Rockefeller, Jr., made a graceful little speech at the opening of the Grace Dodge Hotel in Washington. This hotel, which Mrs. Rockefeller helped to found, is exclusively for women. It has many novel features, among them elaborately equipped rooms where women guests may launder their own linen. "Comfortable, even luxurious, as our hotel is," said Mrs. Rockefeller, "there are some women who will hesitate to patronize it out of pride. Pride! Such pride reminds me of a story. 'Father, what is a swell?' a little boy once asked. 'A swell, son,' the father answered, 'is a lazy loafer whose sole claim to importance lies in the fact that he once had an ancestor who devoted his life to hard and honest work.'"

Professor Johnson, the antiquary, returning meditatively from a learned discourse, came upon the recumbent body of a man in front of a house. Being a Samaritan, he proffered his services, and discovered that the man lived on the first floor. Thither he piloted him, and opening a door pushed him gently in. Reaching again the ground floor another human being confronted him, and he also needed help to the first floor. But when our professor found yet another fellow-creature in distress his curiosity was aroused, and he said: "It is strange that there should be three men needing help to the first floor of the same house." "Not so strange, mister," replied the prone figure, "seeing as 'ow you've dropped me down the lift 'ole twice."

W. C. Laidlaw of the Kansas Farmers' Union said during the agricultural conference in Washington: "When people try to tell me that the middleman helps the farmer, I tell them in return the story of the fat actor. A fat actor had to jump from a twelve-foot cliff to a piece of ground that was hidden behind the scenes, so he gave a brawny super a quarter to be there to catch him as he landed. Well, the time came for the fat actor to leap, and, looking and seeing that the super was on the spot, he sprang carelessly into the void, as if twelve feet were no more to him than twelve inches. Down he sailed swiftly through the air and—crash! he struck the hard floor with terrible impact. For the super, stepping back, had failed him. 'Why didn't you catch me?' he moaned, when he could speak at last. 'I wanted to,' said the super, 'but you didn't bounce.'"

"George Harvey turning Anglophile? Not on your life!" said a New York editor who had worked as a reporter with the ambassador-journalist in the old days. "George," he went on, "at a fashionable dinner at the embassy while I was visiting him poked fun at English names. He said that one of the aristocratic Cave-Brown-Caves went over to New York and made there the acquaintance of a man named Home. Home, as he talked to his new friend, kept calling him Mr. Cave. The Englishman winced every time this happened, but Home didn't notice anything amiss, so finally he said: 'I say, call me Cave-Brown-Cave, there's a good chap, won't you?' Home accepted the correction humbly. But he was biding his time. After a while the Englishman called him Mr. Home, and he said: 'I'll ask you to call me Home-Sweet-Home if you don't mind.'"

THE MERRY MUSE.

Diurnal Amelioration.

(The formula of the Coue method of auto-suggestion is: Day by day in every way I am getting better and better. I think this might prove more effective if put into verse, and I submit the following.)

I have eighty separate ailments by the newest diagnosis,
Ranging all the way from fever to arterio-sclerosis;
There are pains around my kidneys more severe than tongue can utter;
My digestion simply isn't and my heart has quite a flutter;
There is something bent or missing in the strongest of my vitals,
And the finest organ in me's off the key in its recitals;
Yet my mind is all unconquered and acknowledges no fetter,
For in spite of all my aches and pains, I know I'm getting better.
Oh! I'm really getting better, better, better, better, better,
Yes, I'm really getting better, better, better, better, better,
Yea, I'm really getting better, nay, I'm really getting better;
So I'm really getting better, better, better, better, better.
—Tapestry in the New York World.

ORNAMENTALS, FRUIT TREES,
VINES AND FIELD GROWN ROSES

Open Daily and Sunday to visitors and purchasers

GEO. C. ROEDING, Pres.

California Nursery Company

(Founded in 1865 by John Rock)

NILES, CALIFORNIA

DESTRUCTIVE "Sulpho" compounds are the cause of motor oils breaking down rapidly under engine heat. An enormous amount of money is annually lost through the presence of these unnecessary properties in oils.

Cycol will save engine owners this tremendous amount of money lost through wasted oil, wasted fuel, preventable repairs, because it is free from destructive "sulpho" compounds. These have been removed by the new Hexeon Process used exclusively by us.

When your oil contains destructive "sulpho" compounds it breaks down rapidly under engine heat. Its lubricating value becomes quickly impaired. The oil film is broken and serious damage may result.

Have your crank case thoroughly flushed—not with kerosene. Use the correct grade of Cycol as shown on the Cycol Recommendation Chart. Use Associated Gasoline. Then notice the improved performance of your motor.

ASSOCIATED OIL COMPANY
SAN FRANCISCO

CYCOL
MOTOR OIL
FREE FROM DESTRUCTIVE "SULPHO" COMPOUNDS

PERSONAL.

Social Notes.

Mr. and Mrs. W. S. Tinning of Martinez have announced the engagement of their daughter, Miss Winifred Tinning, to Dr. James Goodman Noyes, the son of Mrs. J. C. Noyes of Napa and Berkeley. The announcement was made on November 11th at a luncheon which Miss Tinning gave at the Mt. Diablo Country Club, complimenting Miss Marion Fitzhugh and Miss Helen Holman, both of whom have recently returned from abroad.

An engagement of interest was announced last Wednesday, when Miss Helen Dorothy Foster daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Walter F. Foster, told of her betrothal to Mr. Eugene Andrew Tracey of Orange, New Jersey. The marriage will take place early in the spring.

Mrs. Martha Leet and Mr. Archibald Johnson will be married on November 23d at Mrs. Leet's home at Stanford Court. They will tour Europe on their wedding trip.

Mr. and Mrs. Arthur Maxwell Sharp will give a ball at the Hotel St. Francis on December 22d to introduce their daughter, Miss Adrienne Sharp. Miss Sharp returned recently from Europe and New York, where she visited her aunt, Mrs. Colgate Hoyt. Miss Sharp was graduated from Miss Spence's school in the spring. She was the complimented guest at an informal tea which Mrs. Harry H. Scott gave at her Divisadero Street home on Wednesday of last week. Among Mrs. Scott's guests, asked to meet the guest of honor, were Mrs. James Moffitt, Mrs. George Nickel, Mrs. Richard Heimann, Mrs. Stuart Haldorn, Mrs. Corbett Moody, Miss Josephine Grant, Miss Edith Grant, Miss Lillian Hopkins, Miss Lawton Filer, Miss Leonore Armsby, Miss Mary Emma Flood, Miss Jane Carrigan, Miss Jean Howard, Miss Hélène de Latour, Miss Ruth Hobart, Miss Alice Moffitt, Miss Doris Schmiedell, Miss Eleanor Martin, Miss Geraldine King and Miss Mary Bernice Moore.

On Friday, December 8th, Mr. and Mrs. Richard J. Hanna will formally introduce their daughter, Miss Virginia Hanna, at a ball in the Borgia Room of the Hotel St. Francis at which they will be hosts. The date of the ball at which Miss Leonora Armsby will make her debut is November 18th. Mr. and Mrs. George Armsby will entertain at the Burlingame Country Club.

A large ball complimenting the season's debutantes will be given on December 16th, when Mr. and Mrs. James L. Flood and their daughter, Miss Mary Emma Flood, will entertain at their home in Broadway.

Miss Mary Bernice Moore, who is to make her debut in January, entertained at luncheon at the San Francisco Golf and Country Club in honor of Miss Francesca Deering, who will be a debutante of next season. Miss Deering has recently returned from a year's stay abroad with her mother, Mrs. Frank P. Deering. Miss Moore's guests were Mrs. Dean Dillman, Miss Dorothy Crawford, Miss Adrienne Sharp, Miss Jean Howard, Miss Isabelle Bishop and Miss Kathryn Chace.

Mr. and Mrs. William Fries of the Hotel St. Francis have invited 150 guests to a dinner-dance and bridge early in December.

A Pioneer of the Pacific.

The passing of Mrs. James Otis, who died in San Francisco on November 3, 1922, at the age of ninety years, diminishes the small remaining group of pioneer women who made history for this city in its infancy.

Mrs. Otis, nee Lucy Hamilton Macondray, was born in 1832 in Macao, China, where her father, Captain Frederick Macondray, had taken his bride after his wedding in Boston about one hundred years ago. This was before Hongkong was founded, and while the tea ships still loaded their cargoes in Macao harbor at the mouth of the Pearl River. The Macondray sailing vessels—one of which was commanded by Captain Macondray at the age of twenty-two years—plied regularly between Boston and Canton. In the early 'forties the family returned to their old home near Boston, whence Captain Macondray came to San Francisco in 1849, and established his business house, bringing with him two young men, James Otis and Mr. Cary, as office managers.

Captain Macondray again returned to Boston, and closing the old New England home brought his family with him, landing in San Francisco via Panama in March, 1852. A few years later the eldest daughter, Lucy, became the bride of James Otis, who had become a partner in the firm of Macondray & Co.

In 1867 Mr. and Mrs. Otis, with their children, sailed for China in the Pacific Mail side-wheeler Colorado, the first steamer to cross the Pacific. A nephew, Edward Hale Greenleaf, now an old gentleman residing in London, wrote a journal of the voyage.

In the early 'seventies James Otis was elected mayor of San Francisco and the hospitable Otis home became a centre for the leading gayeties of the season, both at South Park and afterward at the residence on Sutter Street near Jones, where, in 1875, King Kalakaua of Hawaii was entertained on his first visit to the United States.

Mrs. Otis is survived by her sister, Miss Martha Macondray, by her children, James Otis of the shipping firm of Otis, McAllister & Co., Charles L. Otis, Mrs. Hall McAllister and Mrs. Frederick B. Lake, and by many grandchildren and great-grandchildren.

Death of Father Vaughan.

A London dispatch of November 4th reports the death of Father Bernard Vaughan, a famous priest of the Catholic church and a member of one of the oldest and most notably vital and brilliant of the Catholic families of England. Of Father Vaughan's immediate family he was one of six out of eight brothers who became priests, the roster including a cardinal and two bishops. Five of Father Vaughan's sisters became nuns.

For many years Father Vaughan was a commanding figure in the English Catholic church. His eloquence kept audiences spell-bound, while his utterances gave the newspapers unlimited copy. He entered the Jesuit Order in 1866, his ability coming under the notice of Pope Leo XIII, and he was transferred to London in 1901. He first worked among the lower classes and soon became known throughout the kingdom as an "aristocrat servant of the poor." In 1906 he assumed charge of a fashionable church in Berkeley Square, where he delivered his famous sermons on "The Sins of Society," which created the widest comment.

These sermons denounced modern dress tendencies, Father Vaughan declaring that "women used to dress for dinner, now they undress." He attacked birth control, asserting: "The nation is traveling toward the cemetery," and "there are more pedagogues in London than children." And "a woman tells me she expects to meet her pet dog in the next world; she didn't say where."

Among incidents illustrating his wittiness is one when he was visiting a slums school. The teacher asked a pupil to explain the sacrament of marriage. The pupil answered: "Matrimony is a period of suffering and torment man has to go through in order to prepare for the higher life."

The teacher remarked: "That is purgatory, not matrimony." Father Vaughan interrupted, saying: "You never can tell; the boy may be right, after all."

Father Vaughan visited San Francisco shortly before the war, spending several weeks here in lecturing and in social visitation. He will be remembered as a most engaging pulpit orator and as an unusually interesting social guest. His quips and witticisms from the pulpit and at dinner-tables literally filled the atmosphere with merriment. "What do you think of Father Vaughan?" asked one of a sprightly Catholic woman of San Francisco. "Why," she replied, "I think he is even better than Harry Lauder."

Caillaux Again?

Caillaux again Premier Ministre! It is not at all impossible, says J. A. M. de Sanchez in the new American quarterly review, Foreign Affairs. A very few years and it may be probable. Caillaux, with all his faults, has one of the best minds in Europe. He is practical, he understands the Germans. He is the hope of the radicaux and the radicaux-socialistes. He appears to realize that no economic settlement in Europe is possible without a political settlement first. He understands the futility of seeking to reestablish the Central Europe of 1914, though he condemns the succession states as constituted by the Versailles treaty. He sees a way out of the impasse which exists: a Franco-German entente. He sees the difficulties in the way of its realization, but believes that he can surmount them. His faith in himself is robust. It is a pity that he no more than hints at the necessary conditions of such an entente. They are many and complex, and can only be briefly and incompletely stated. From the French viewpoint they are: the firm establishment of republican sentiment throughout Germany; some real show of willingness on Germany's part to make good, in as great a measure as possible, the material damage she did; a more cordial acceptance by Germany of Poland and certain of the Little Entente powers as political entities, which the French believe are destined to endure, economists notwithstanding.

One of the strangest features of life in Australia is due to the fact of interstate jealousy, which has resulted in a different railway gauge for every state. At state lines all passengers must change cars and all freight must be reshipped.

THE HILLCREST

American and European Plan
CALIFORNIA AND JONES STS.
Phone Franklin 3240

DEL MONTE

The Largest Resort Hotel Plant in the World
Where "Thinking People" can find Recreation
in Hotel del Monte's Comfort, Service and Outdoor Life. "Here every sportsman can find his chosen recreation."
TWO CHAMPIONSHIP GOLF COURSES
CARL S. STANLEY, Manager
DEL MONTE : : CALIFORNIA

San Ysidro Ranch

Furnished bungalows of various sizes;
situated on the foothills among the orange groves, overlooking the sea. Central dining-room, electric lights, hot and cold water. Good tennis court. Six miles from
Santa Barbara, two miles from ocean.
Booklet. Address MANAGER

San Ysidro Ranch, Santa Barbara

HOTEL RAFAEL

Special Winter Rates

$1.50 and up per day, without bath, $16.00 weekly rate. $3.00 and up per day, with bath, $15.00 weekly rate. All rooms steam-heated and modern in every respect.

Sunday Dinner $1.50

HOTEL RAFAEL is but 50 minutes from San Francisco via ferry and train or auto. Delightful, invigorating trip.

W. C. JURGENS SAN RAFAEL, CAL.

"Travel Without Trouble"

COOK'S TRAVEL SERVICE

World wide—Complete—Efficient

Inclusive Tours for Individual Travel
arranged, to start any day by
any route.

Explanatory circular on request

THOS. COOK & SON

(Est. 1841)

Agents for the best lines for travel by
Land, Water or Air

128 SUTTER STREET

(COOK'S BUILDING) Phone Kearny 3512

SERVICE

To Sacramento

Observation Cars.

Dining Car Service on Meteor
leaving 4:40 P.M. through to Chico.

We Carry Baggage

SACRAMENTO SHORT LINE

American Beauty Roses
For the Debutante.

JOSEPH'S
FLORISTS

Phone Sutter 423

233 Grant Ave.

CARIBBEAN CRUISE

JANUARY 1923

Pacific Coast to New Orleans, Havana,
Panama Canal, Costa Rica and Return.

Folder on Request.

BENNETT'S TRAVEL BUREAU, INC.

681 Market Street

SAN FRANCISCO

| Leave San Francisco                              | Arrive Los Angeles |
|--|--------------------|
| 8:00 A.M. Shore Line Limited (Third St. Station) | 10:30 P.M.         |
| 10:40 A.M. Los Angeles Express (Ferry Station)   | 7:40 A.M.          |
| 4:00 P.M. Tehachapi (Ferry Station)              | 9:40 A.M.          |
| 5:00 P.M. Sunset Limited (Third St. Station)     | 7:45 A.M.          |
| 6:00 P.M. Owl (Ferry Station)                    | 8:50 P.M.          |
| 8:00 P.M. Lark (Third St. Station)               | 9:30 A.M.          |
| 8:15 P.M. Sunset Express (Third St. Station)     | 12:10 P.M.         |

Our Agents will gladly furnish further information.
50 Third Street.

Ferry Station      Third St. Station

SOUTHERN PACIFIC

—just 40 minutes
from San Francisco

HOTEL OAKLAND, conveniently located near both shopping and resident districts of Oakland. Comfort, homelikeness and cheer, plus an atmosphere of refinement.

Truly, "one of America's most satisfying hotels."

HOTEL OAKLAND
OAKLAND · CALIFORNIA

Management
W. C. JURGENS

STRINGER STORAGE COMPANY

Sutter near Fillmore
and
Steiner near Sutter

Conducting a Storage
Business Founded
in 1880

Storage—Shipping

Expert Packing, Protection
and Dispatch

A fully informed representative, anxious to give you any desired information, will respond to your phone call.

Phone West 999

PERSONAL.

Movements and Whereabouts.

Judge and Mrs. James A. Cooper and Miss Ethel Cooper have returned from Santa Barbara, where they spent several months. They will make their home at the Hotel St. Francis during the winter.

Mr. and Mrs. Douglas McBryde will close their Woodside home December 1st. They have taken an apartment in Green Street for three or four months.

Mr. and Mrs. Cuyler Lee and their daughters, Miss Margaret Lee and Miss Rosamonde Lee, have gone to Monterey, where they will spend several months.

Mr. and Mrs. Stewart Lowery will occupy the town house of Mr. and Mrs. Cuyler Lee during the winter.

Mr. and Mrs. Augustus Taylor have closed their country home at Menlo Park and are established for the winter at their home on Gough Street.

Mr. and Mrs. Harry Stetson have taken an apartment in Paris for the winter.

Mrs. Frank W. Fuller and her daughter, Miss Margaret Fuller, have returned to San Francisco, after having spent several months abroad. Mr. Fuller remained in the East, but will join Mrs. Fuller and their daughter within a fortnight.

Mrs. E. Swift Train is in San Francisco on a visit to her parents, Mr. and Mrs. George W. McNear.

Commander James A. Bull arrived on Saturday from Peru on a visit to his parents, Commodore and Mrs. James H. Bull, at their Clay Street home.

Governor Lewis F. Hart of Washington and Mrs. Hart are in San Francisco for a short time, stopping at the Palace Hotel.

Bishop William Moreland of Sacramento is stopping at the Hotel St. Francis.

Mr. and Mrs. Edward L. Bosqui left on Thursday for New York and Europe. They will sail November 21st on the Berengaria.

Mrs. James Taylor, who has been in Berkeley on a visit to her parents, Admiral and Mrs. William H. Whiting, has returned to Coronado to join her husband, Lieutenant-Commander Taylor.

Mr. and Mrs. Heimann left last week for a fortnight's stay at Palm Springs.

Mr. and Mrs. C. O. G. Miller left hurriedly for the East on Thursday of last week. They were called by wire on account of the illness of their son, who is away at school.

Miss Margaret Buckbee is the guest of her uncle and aunt, Mr. and Mrs. Robert Currey, at their Dixon ranch. Miss Buckbee will be out of town a week or ten days.

Mr. and Mrs. Nidl Tucker have closed their Burlingame home. They will spend the winter in town.

Mr. Rennie Pierre Schwerin is in Shanghai, where he will remain until December.

Miss Elizabeth Huff, the daughter of Mrs. Charles G. Morton, arrived on Monday from the East. Miss Marie Lewis of Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania, accompanied Miss Huff and will be her house guest for several weeks.

Mr. and Mrs. Chester N. Weaver and Mr. and Mrs. Lloyd F. Weaver sailed for the Orient on Friday, and will make an extended tour.

Mr. and Mrs. E. D. Tenny arrived in San Francisco from Honolulu on the last steamer.

Mrs. I. W. Hellman, Jr., has closed her San Leandro home, in which she spent the summer, and with her family will stay at the Fairmont Hotel a few months.

Mr. and Mrs. E. Fox Bishop of Honolulu arrived during the week on the Mau and are stopping at the Palace Hotel.

Mr. and Mrs. Willis Walker will return from New York the middle of December.

Dr. H. Edward Castle, after attending the French Congress of Surgeons in Paris, has returned to San Francisco. Dr. Castle makes his home at the Fairmont hotel.

Mr. and Mrs. Wallace Alexander returned last Thursday from an extended Eastern trip. Mr. and Mrs. Alexander have closed their Piedmont home and are established at the Fairmont Hotel for the winter.

Mr. and Mrs. Robert E. Lunt are spending their honeymoon in the south, and upon their return to San Francisco will reside at 1276 Eighth Avenue. Mrs. Lunt was Miss Marion Smith.

She is a granddaughter of the late George T. Bromley, one of the old guard of the Bohemian Club, and a niece of Henry Lincoln Smith, for many years secretary of the San Francisco Board of Trade.

Miss Corinne Dillman of Sacramento arrived in San Francisco during the week and has taken an apartment for the winter. Miss Dillman passed the summer at Pebble Beach.

Miss Mary Martin, who has been in the East for several months, will return the end of November and join her parents, Mr. and Mrs. Walter Martin, at their Burlingame home.

Mrs. Daniel C. Jackling is expected from New York on Saturday. Mr. Jackling is on a hunting trip in Mexico and will not return until a fortnight later.

Mr. and Mrs. Stuart Haldorn left for the East on Wednesday to be gone two or three months.

General and Mrs. Charles G. Morton returned last Saturday from a two weeks' inspection tour of the Northwest.

Mr. and Mrs. Charles Schlessinger have returned from a several months' European trip and have taken an apartment in San Francisco.

Recent arrival at the St. Francis are Captain John C. Glithers, U. S. A.; Major J. C. Brackley, London, England; Mr. George R. McCray, Cleveland, Ohio; Mr. E. T. Durlam, Chicago; Mr. U. Y. Foley, Fresno; Mr. A. B. Strickler, Boston; Mr. Edward M. Speer, New York; Mr. F. E. Dunne, Stockton; Mr. B. Lipton, New York; Mr. K. M. Walker, Seattle; Mr. Norman Macbeth, Los Angeles; Mr. T. Seidel, New York.

How Belgium Makes Them Vote.

In an article advocating compulsory voting in the November Harper's Magazine, Samuel Spring writes:

"The practical experiment in other countries to increase the attendance at the polls casts a little light upon the problems. Belgium has had compulsory voting since 1892. A voter who fails to go to the polls in the absence of a satisfactory excuse is punished for his first offense by a reprimand or by a fine of from one to three francs; for a second offense within six years by a fine of from three to twenty francs; for a third offense his name is posted in a public place; after his fourth offense his name is removed from the voting list for ten years, he is fined, and he is held ineligible to hold any public office. Professor Léon Duprez, formerly of the University of Louvain, who has made a thorough study of

WHISPER IT IN WURRA WURRA'S EAR
COMING SOON!

this problem in Belgium, has concluded that this system has been evidenced there. During the last twenty years only 6 per cent. and at times even as low as 1 per cent. of the voters have failed to go to the polls. When it is remembered that many electors die or move or suffer from some other disability between the time that the election lists are made up and the day of election, the conclusion seems reasonable that from only 2 to 3 per cent. of the voters in Belgium failed to vote."

The
ST. FRANCIS
One of the world's great hotels
Facing Union Square
SAN FRANCISCO CALIFORNIA

WHERE SERVICE AND COMFORTS ARE PLANNED FOR GUESTS
WHO APPRECIATE
THE BEST

Thos. J. Coleman
Manager

California LIP-READING
School of
FOR THE HARD OF HEARING
MISS KENFIELD MRS. POINDENTER
Co-Principals
Demonstration classes Tuesday, 7:45 p. m.
Friday, 10:30 a. m. Representing Nitchie
School of New York. Awarding Nitchie Normal Diploma.
916 Shreve Bldg. Ph. Kearny 1666
Berkeley Branch—107 Wright Building

THE SANTA BARBARA GIRLS' SCHOOL
Resident and Day Pupils. Eleven acres.
Country Life and Sports. Sleeping porches.
Open-air school rooms. Riding. Swimming
all the year round. Basis of work, clear thinking.
MARION L. CHAMBERLAIN, A. M., Principal
P.O. Box 548, SANTA BARBARA, CAL.

FERNAC SCHOOL OF LANGUAGES
Class or Private Instructions
Prepares for All Colleges
Kohler & Chase Bldg. 26 O'Farrell St.
Phone Douglas 6732

MOST BEAUTIFUL
Rota-Gravure
Section
in the world
Published Each
Sunday
by the
San Francisco Chronicle
ONLY
$5.20
a
Year
Including Every Sunday Feature
of the CHRONICLE

GORHAM'S FOLLIES TO-NIGHT PALACE HOTEL

World's greatest hotel attraction every evening, except Sunday, seven to one, in the Palm Court, Palace Hotel.
Well known cast of Broadway favorites. Famous American Beauty
Chorus of twenty.

John Breunel & Co.
of San Francisco

281 Geary St. nr. Powell

Chairs

Covered in Needlework
Tapestry

—A decade ago this material was extensively used for chair coverings. Today sees it again coming into popularity.

—Our stock of chairs covered in needlework and petit point wool tapestry are of a most individual and classic character. People of more than ordinary discrimination have testified to that effect after a careful and systematic inspection.

—The chair here sketched is a splendid example of skill in weaving and carving in walnut. Admirably suited for the finer type of home.

THE ALLEGED HUMORISTS.

"What's the difference between a dancer and a danseuse?" "Oh, just about twelve pounds of wardrobe, I s'pose."—New York Sun.

"Close the bar and cork all bottles," shouted the captain as the ship crossed the three-mile limit. "We are now going into dry dock."—Judge.

Slim Smith Girl—I understand you stopped associating with that Princeton guard. Stout Smith Girl—Yes—he couldn't hold me.—Yale Record.

Conductor—Change for Marietta! Change for Marietta! Hick Passenger—Don't know who the girl is, but I'll chip in a dime.—Michigan Gargoyle.

Teacher—Who can name one important thing we have now that we did not have one hundred years ago? Tommy—Me.—Los Angeles Times.

"Mornin', Hank! Whatcher doin' up thar?" "Waal! The old woman is figgerin' on drivin' th' Ford an' I'm a-makin' the garage door five foot wider."—Life.

Librarian—"Captains Courageous," by Rudyard Kipling. How would you like that? Customer—Oh, no; I'm fed up with books about the war.—Punch.

"Pardon me, didn't you come from Squeak Centre, Missouri?" "That's where I come from, mister, and if I ever go back I'll come from there again."—Life.

"By the way, Hank, there's a little bill o' 90 cents agin you on my books." "By gum! Abner, you're the durndest feller to start an argument I ever seen."—Life.

"I believe in absolute candor." "I don't," declared Miss Cayenne. "My knees incline to knock and my calves are thin. I prefer to wear my skirts longer."—Washington Star.

"Has education improved you, Josh?" "Some," replied Farnie Cornosset. "His letters strikes me as more an' more grammatical when he writes home fur money."—Washington Star.

Yankee Visitor—Yes, siree, in Amurrica our hotels have elevators to carry us straight up to our bedrooms. Sandy—But you'll no need these contraptions noo, wi' prohibition.—London Passing Show.

Small Spectator (breaking the silence after a lengthy period)—I don't know 'ow you can stick it. I should never make a fisherman. Unsuccessful Sportsman—No; and you'll never make a mascot neither.—Punch.

"Do you think a man shows wisdom in changing his mind?" "Undoubtedly," replied Senator Sorghum. "I'm liable to change my mind every time a new delegation from my state calls on me."—Washington Star.

Love-Sick Girl (to photograph)—You darling, you just wonderful, perfect boy, how I'd love to—! Her Pal—Not so loud, Tess! If the maid hears you she'll be leaving shaving water outside this door in the morning.—Judge.

"Jim, I see that your mule has U. S. branded on his right hind leg. I suppose he was an army mule and belonged to Uncle Sam?" "No, suh—dat U. S. don't mean nothin' 'bout no Uncle Samuel. Dat's jess a warnin'." Dat U. S.'n jess stand fo' Un Safe—'at's all.—Judge.

"Uncle Pete, how old are you?" "I'm close to a hundred, son," said Chiggersville's oldest inhabitant. "Been using tobacco all your life, haven't you?" "No, son. Up to the time I was ten years old I'd never had a chew in my mouth."—Birmingham Age-Herald.

Pedestrian—That's an awfully poor looking horse you have there. Cabby—Yeh, you see it's this way, sir. Every morning I toss him to see whether he gets his hay or I get my beer, and would you believe it, that unlucky horse has lost for six mornings straight.—Michigan Gargoyle.

The Flapper—Yes, I made him take me to dinner at the Florentine. Then we did a theatre, with flowers and a huge box of choocs, and wound up with champagne and oysters at the Valhalla and a taxi home. We had a lovely time! The Skeptic—What, both of you?—Sydney Bulletin.

"Awfully glad to see you, Mr. Jones," said the hostess. "So good of you to come. But where is your brother?" "He was unable to come. You see, we are so busy just now that it was impossible for both of us to get away, and so we tossed up to see which of us should come." "How nice! And you won?" "No," replied the young man, absently, "I lost!"—National Republican.

WHAT WAS COLUMBUS?

With the Italians, Spanish, Portuguese, Jews and Armenians all claiming Columbus, the controversy about the discoverer of America is keener today, 430 years later, than it has been in any of the intervening years, says the New York Times.

The purposes of the voyage of Columbus are also burning subjects of controversy. Columbus was seeking only islands a short distance from the Cape Verde Island and had no notion of finding a new continent, or the coast of Asia, according to the American diplomat, Henry Vignaud, one of the foremost Columbian students, who shortly before his death published the final results of more than sixty years of research on the subject. After discovering America, Columbus invented the theory that he had always intended to discover it, according to Vignaud, and also adopted the theory that the world was round.

Vignaud held that the Italian birth of Columbus was clearly proved by the court records of Savona, a small town near Genoa. He belonged to a family of weavers, according to this, which is now the prevailing opinion among scholars. Columbus is accused of concealing his real parentage and claiming kinship with admirals and noblemen, but the truth is asserted to be that he was descended from weavers and was a weaver himself up to the time that he took ship.

His alleged reasons for misrepresenting his family are interpreted differently by those who hold the theory that he was born in Spain. The claims put forward by the Spaniards and by the Jews are identical—that Columbus was a Spanish Jew and that he concealed his birthplace and race because it was a period when Jews were being persecuted and burned.

The Portuguese and Armenian claims were both put in this year. The Portuguese theory was put forward by Ribeiro, a member of the Portuguese Academy of Sciences, and seems to be based on some ancient document referring to Lusitania as the birthplace of Columbus. This reference is interpreted by the Spaniards to mean Lusitania as it existed in Roman days, when it included part of what is now Spain. The Armenian claim, which is considered somewhat thin, is based on a tradition that the explorer's real name was Kholumbian and that his family were recent emigrants from Armenia to Spain.

Among other evidences in their favor, the Spanish point to the fact that all authentic documents in the writing of Columbus are in the Spanish language, but this, the Italians say, is due to the fact that he left Genoa at the age of fourteen years and almost constantly thereafter lived among Spaniards.

One reason why there are so many unsettled questions about Columbus today, according to A. P. Newton, an English historian, is that little attention was given to Columbus in his lifetime, and essential information was missing before people took an interest in him. Writing under the head of "Historical Revisions," an article on Columbus in the recent number of the Journal of the British Historical Association, Newton says:

"The traditional story of Columbus' origin and of his life has mainly come down to us from two authors—Ferdinand Columbus, his younger son, and Bartolome de Las Casas, Bishop of Chiapas, who knew him personally and many years after his death was entrusted with the family papers.

"The admiral's glory is entirely posthumous; his contemporaries found him a difficult and impracticable person who made himself a nuisance by his incessant complaints and his extravagant pretensions. After his death his name sunk almost to oblivion, but long after Ferdinand set himself to preserve the full story of his father's achievements and to rescue his memory from the slurs that had been cast upon it. The original Spanish version of his book was written about 1539 and was never published and has completely disappeared. It is known to us only in an Italian version.

"The story of the search for the Indies," says Newton, "was invented after the new islands were discovered and the scientific reasoning employed to support the practicability of the western route to Asia and the Spice Islands was only put together in 1493 or 1494, and then not upon the basis of wide learning, but solely upon such facts as could be culled from one or two works of cosmography that had been published in the earlier years of the fifteenth century. Such is the case for the prosecution, and it is supported by an almost embarrassing amount of evidence."

Key to a Safe Deposit Box in Crocker Safe Deposit Vaults Means Security.

Crocker Safe Deposit Vaults
Crocker Building Post and Market Sts.

The Paradise of Long Life.

That which Ponce de Léon vainly sought seems to exist at Horchies, in Hainaut, four miles from Mons, in the midst of the coal and metallurgic region of Belgium, says the New York Tribune. It is a village of 3000 inhabitants, where almost everybody reaches the age of the patriarchs.

They have just been celebrating, one after another, two diamond weddings (sixty, sometimes seventy-five, years of married life); five golden weddings (fifty years of married life), and the 101st birthday anniversary of a man, François Colin. But even this centenarian does not constitute a phenomenon in this privileged community, for there was born, in the last year of the eighteenth century, a woman who saw the end of the nineteenth century and who died only at the end of the first lustrum of the twentieth century.

It is noteworthy that the Methuselahs of Horchies are all former working men and working women, who knew neither the benefits of the eight-hour day nor those of the anti-liquor laws. Will Horchies, under the new régime of the least effort and of the uttermost abstinence, remain the paradise of long life? Some doubt it. In some fifteen or twenty lustrums we shall know if they are right.

The largest newspaper in the world is to be found in Aix-la-Chapelle Museum, although it is of American origin. Its pages measure 8½ feet by 6 feet.

The Catacombs of Cypress Lawn

Comparable with the luxurious tombs of ancient Egyptian kings, yet within the means of people of moderate circumstances.

A stone edifice, highly artistic in appearance, containing a magnificent chapel. Eleven Tomb Rooms, 425 Crypts.

Cypress Lawn Cemetery
Association

one Douglas 4772P

995 Market St.

Coldwell Mowers

(HAND, HORSE and POWER)

Good
Lawns Demand
Them

H. V. Carter Motor Co.
52 Beale St. San Francisco

KING COAL

High in Heat Units
Low in Ash

FOR SALE BY ALL DEALERS
IN CALIFORNIA

KING COAL CO.

Main Office
EXCHANGE BLOCK
San Francisco

Wholesale Only

TO LEASE

Entire Top Floor
IN

Wells Fargo Building
Second and Mission Streets
(Will Sub-Divide to Suit)

consisting of about 12,000 square feet; unlimited light, surrounded 4 streets. Janitor service and all modern conveniences. Will construct partitions or remodel to suit. Rent only 15 cents per square foot.

Apply Your Own Agent or Express Building Co.
Care of E. TROPP, Owner,
Kearny 316 129 Sutter St.

FOR A

CLEAR COMPLEXION

and a

HEALTHY COLOR

eat

FLEISCHMANN'S YEAST

Three Cakes a Day

The Argonaut.

VOL. LXXXI. No. 2383.

SAN FRANCISCO, NOVEMBER 25, 1922.

Price Ten Cents

PUBLISHER'S NOTICE: The Argonaut (title trade-marked) is published every week by the Argonaut Publishing Company. Subscriptions, $5.00 per year; six months, $2.55; three months, $1.50, payable in advance—postage prepaid. Subscriptions to all foreign countries within the Postal Union, $6.00 per year. Sample copies free. Single copies, 10 cents. News Dealers and Agents in the interior supplied by the San Francisco News Company, 747 Howard Street, San Francisco. Subscribers wishing their addresses changed should give their old as well as new addresses. The American News Company, New York, are agents for the Eastern trade. The Argonaut may be ordered from any News Dealer or Postmaster in the United States or Europe. Special advertising rates to publishers. Address all communications to The Argonaut, 207 Powell Street, San Francisco. Make all checks, drafts, postal orders, etc., payable to "The Argonaut Publishing Company."

Entered at the San Francisco Postoffice as second-class matter. The Argonaut can be obtained in London at the International News Co., Breems Building, Chancery Lane; American Newspaper and Advertising Agency, Trafalgar Square, Northumberland Avenue; and at Daws Steamship Agency, 17 Green Street, Leicester Square, and can be ordered from any of the news-stands of W. H. Smith & Son. In Paris, at 37 Avenue de l'Opéra. In New York, at Brentano's, Fifth Avenue and Twenty-Fourth Street. In Chicago, Western News Company. In Washington, at Adams' News Agency, Ninth and G Streets.

The Argonaut is on sale at the Ferry Station, San Francisco, by Foster & Orear; on the ferryboats of the Key Route system by the news agents, and by the Van Noy-Interstate Company on Southern Pacific boats and trains.

Telephone, Kearny 5895. Publication office, 207 Powell Street. WM. J. MILLIKEN, Business Manager.

FORTY-SIXTH YEAR

ALFRED HOLMAN - - - - - EDITOR

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

|  |         |
|--|---------|
| EDITORIAL: Our Newest Municipal Mortgage—The President's Appeal to Congress—High Time to Clean House—Matters Political—A Tip for Mr. Richardson—A New Note in Senatorial Service—The Prime Minister of Britain ..... | 337-339 |
| THE LAUSANNE CONFERENCE: Its Task Will Be to Find Some Ground of Accommodation with a Rejuvenated Turkey .....   | 339-340 |
| OLD FAVORITES .....  | 340     |
| INDIVIDUALITIES .....  | 340     |
| SOME CHESTERTONIAN APPRAISALS: How That Well-Known Institution, the United States, Looks to the Touring English Lecturer .....   | 341     |
| RANKING AND INVESTMENT NEWS .....  | 342-343 |
| BOOKS ON THE TABLE: Notes of Books and Authors .....   | 343     |
| BRIEFER REVIEWS: New Books Received .....  | 345     |
| DRAMA: "Peter Weston"; "The Spring Maid"; The European Invasion; Pictured Biography. By Josephine Hart Phelps .....  | 346     |
| FOYER AND BOX-OFFICE .....   | 347     |
| VANITY FAIR .....  | 348     |
| STORYETTES .....   | 349     |
| THE MERRY MUSE .....   | 349     |
| PERSONAL: Social Notes—Movements and Whereabouts .....   | 350-351 |
| THE ALLEGED HUMORISTS .....  | 352     |

Our Newest Municipal Mortgage.

By a popular vote in which only a fraction of the electors of San Francisco were represented and in which—it is to be suspected—a majority of the affirmative ballots were cast by non-taxpayers, there was clapped upon San Francisco on Tuesday a mortgage of fourteen million dollars. Two million dollars of this sum will go to provide new quarters for indigents and twelve millions will be spent in a wholesale construction of new schoolhouses. Now the Argonaut does not wish that the indigent wards of the municipality shall live in danger or discomfort; still less does it wish that the school children of the city should be housed in unsanitary or insufficient buildings. But here is what will happen: Immediate and wholesale construction of buildings on municipal account, added to the current activity of general building, will artificially stimulate the labor market and the building supplies market. It will make a period of over-stimulated flush times—a brief period. Then, with the end of construction on municipal account, there will come reaction in the form of a slump with its inevitable accompaniments of non-employment, of contentions about wage rates and, of course, a series of strikes. It is safe to say that the bonds provided for in Tuesday's election can not be sold at par under the restricted rate of interest which they are to carry. This difficulty will be overcome by paying the building contractors, etc., in bonds; and in order to compensate the difference between the face value and the market value of these securities the various contractors will add anywhere from 10 to 25 per cent. to what should be the normal figures of their bids. Thus we shall have the familiar spectacle of the same old devil whipped around the traditional stump. The mischiefs above defined will define the price we pay for going about a right thing in a wrong way. Far better it would be if the needed structures were built in detail—one or two at a time—under close supervision, especially at the point of cost. And it would be still better if, instead of mortgaging the city to provide for wholesale and unbusinesslike methods of augmenting facilities, there should have been policies of enforced prudence and economy under which the cost of the new structures could have been borne as items of current expense without a specific enlargement of the municipal debt. We note that a few hours after the election Tuesday groups of workmen were busy tearing down and carrying away the many hundreds of election booths scattered throughout the city. This of course has the merit of making work and increasing expense at the cost of the taxpayers. But in all seriousness it would be better to allow these structures to stand permanently, since every few weeks they will be needed in order that new mortgages in the form of bond issues shall be voted upon the long-suffering taxpayers of our good old but long-suffering town.

The President's Appeal to Congress.

In his address to Congress President Harding makes it plain that there is a double purpose in his urgency of the ship subsidy bill. He seeks (1) to stop the ruinous outflow from the treasury on account of the Shipping Board; he wishes (2) to augment and sustain an America merchant marine. The one proposal is a positive necessity; the other is in every way desirable. The ways and means embodied in the shipping bill represents the best expert judgment the country affords. Possibly at some points the bill may be bettered; but at the point of its essential purpose, as defined by the President, there would seem to be no ground for criticism or question. As to the message itself as delivered by the President in person on Tuesday, a more constructive or a more logically conclusive argument was never made by any President to any Congress. Further, there was in it the fervor of personal conviction and a fine note of appeal. In this matter we can see no logical line of partisan or geographical division. Surely the proposal to stop a colossal treasury leak should appeal to men of all parties and all sections; and as surely the project to augment and sustain a merchant marine relates directly to the interest of all citizens of all sections. Yet we are told that there will be arrayed against this measure the organized force of the Democrats in Congress and the scarcely less formidable force of the agricultural bloc in the Senate. That the bill will pass the House of Representatives is probable; that it will find favor in the Senate is doubtful. But the President has done his part and done it with an emphasis worthy of his purpose, worthy of his great office. He has put the matter up to Congress, and if the outcome shall be failure the fault will not lie at his door.

High Time to Clean House.

The revolt of the taxpayers of California, illustrated first by the nomination of Mr. Richardson against long odds and now made emphatic by his election by a great majority, comes none too soon. The bonded indebtedness of the state, its counties, its cities and its districts, reaches the prodigious total of $522,149,144. In the year 1921 alone the taxpayers of California paid a total of $27,559,299 for interest and redemption of state, county, and city bonds—well above two million dollars per month. In ten years the population of the state has increased 45 per cent. In the same period the public debt has increased 242 per cent. and taxes 231 per cent. Our growth in population and wealth, substantial as it has been, has thus been far surpassed by the growth in our indebtedness. We have too many commissions whose salaries and expenses are paid by the taxpayers. We have too many state-owned automobiles bought and operated at the expense of the taxpayers. There is too much waste, and we pay too much in sheer support of political machinery. Mr. Richardson promises to eliminate extravagance, to save the taxpayers' money. Accompanying this promise is the statement that there shall be no expenditure for political machinery, since he is indifferent as to his own political fortunes. It now remains for him to make good on these assurances. The Argonaut will hopefully wait upon events.

Matters Political.

The propensity of American editors, politicians, and other lay-statesmen to futile speculation is freshly illustrated in the ten thousand post-mortems now holding over the late election. By their multitude no less than by varying verdicts they bear witness that the upheaval is due to no one particular cause beyond the general spirit of dissatisfaction and unrest. Different sections of the country interpret this spirit in different ways, no one of which supplies a comprehensive and satisfactory conclusion. But broadly it may be said that our elections betoken less the positive desire of a great majority of our people than the inertia of the great mass. In this last election as in others in recent years it was the stay-at-home voters that determined the result.

The extent of the stay-at-home vote is an interesting study. According to the census of 1920 the total number of citizens twenty-one years of age and over was 54,421,832, made up of 27,661,880 men and 26,759,952 women. The citizenship thus enumerated comprised all native and all naturalized foreign-born persons. In the same year (1920) there was cast for President the largest poll in the history of the country, running to a total of 26,786,758. Now if we set this figure of 26,786,758 votes cast against the total number of citizens of voting age male and female, of 54,421,882, we find that less than half the number of persons entitled to vote actually exercised that right in a year of exceptional political interest and of exceptional voting. If we deduct liberally to cover the criminals, the insane, and persons in the public service whose duties prevented them from going to the polls, we find that little if any more than half of those who possessed the qualifications of voters actually voted. The exact figures of the late election are not yet at hand, but we know that they are materially short of the record of 1920, despite the fact that in two years there has been a considerable natural increase in the number of potential voters.

The record for 1920 exhibits the fact that the voters of California were derelict in about the same proportion as the voters of the country at large. In that year California had a total of 1,928,247 citizens twenty-one years of age and over, of whom 998,095 were men and 930,152 women. In the presidential election of that year California cast 943,344 votes, or 48.9 per cent. of the available. Figures of the recent election are not yet compiled, but the record will fall very considerably short of 48.9 per cent. of the year 1920.

From comparison of opinions as they are reflected by the press and in the statements of students of politics it is evident that the people generally are uneasy, restless, and more or less resentful of the fact that taxes are high, that the cost of living is high, that economic normality has not been restored. But above all they are angered over the trifling opportunism that has characterized the conduct of Congress and our political leaders. Persistent truckling to the prohibition vote, to the labor vote, to the soldier vote, has produced a feeling of disgust with politics and politicians; and this is an emotion that tends to keep voters home on election day. The result is that there has been commissioned to the Congress which comes into office next March an amazing aggregation of opportunists and panderers to class demands. Thus, instead of curing the condition with reference to which there is universal resentment, the actual voters with the stay-at-homes have managed to intensify it. One need not be imbued with the spirit of prophecy to foretell that by 1924 the people generally will be even more disgruntled than they are now. And the meaning of this is that the next presidential election is likely to be close.

President Harding has discreetly avoided any statement implying interpretation of the late election. Yet it is precisely at this point that there appears the most interesting field for political speculation. If Mr. Harding shall assume that the people have spoken and in so doing have repudiated his policies and his acts, God help us all. Interpretation of the result of the election to this effect by the President would mean letting down the bars to the blocs and classes, the enactment of a soldiers' bonus bill, the parent of many direful raids on the treasury, of unscientific and unsound revision of the tax laws with the right of government interference in business, finance, and transportation. If on the other hand Mr. Harding shall conceive the result, as many of us do, as a rebuke to opportunism in politics, and particularly to opportunism in Congress, he will be forced into a position of national leadership in antagonism to Congress. Such an attitude, masterfully sustained, will either destroy him completely or make him a national hero. His announced policy of endeavoring to restore "normalcy" is precisely in accord with the actual desire of a great body of our people. What can the government do to restore normalcy? In time past Mr. Harding believed that it could best serve the purpose by restoring normality to the government itself; by cutting out useless expenditures; by living within its income; by reducing the burden of taxation and debt. This is or was his programme, simple and understandable, containing nothing spectacular, nothing to stir the emotions. It is the programme of a practical man who looks at the job of running the government in common-sense fashion.

But arrayed against this prescription are the prescriptions put forward by a multitude of quacks and malpractitioners, who insist that the country shall turn to nostrums of spelling enlarged and increased cost in affairs of the government. Look over the platforms and the campaign utterances of our new senators, Brookhart, Frazier, Shepstead, Howell, Wheeler, Dill and the rest. Note that not one of them offers a suggestion that is not an appeal to the selfishness and cupidity of some group or interest. Not one of them suggests anything helpful in the direction of reducing taxation or the cost of government. These men—demagogues all—have attained election to the Senate through demagogic appeals and on the basis of demagogic promises. They have told the Western farmers that the Esch-Cummins transportation law will be repealed and that thereby, in some magic fashion, the car shortage now prevalent, with other embarrassments of a record-breaking year of agricultural production, will be prevented. They have promised to revise the financial system of the country so that any man who calls himself a farmer may borrow government money to his heart's desire. They have told the people that the government is to blame for all the material ills that afflict the world, although these ills are less direful here than elsewhere. They promise to repeal the enactments of nature and of economic law. In brief, they promise the millennium overnight.

Of immediate consequence is the session of Congress that began on Monday of this week, the last of the old Congress whose mandate runs out in March. The Harding programme contains as its major items the appropriation bills, the proposals embodied in the shipping bill, and a bill reorganizing the executive and administrative branches of the government on a scientific plan designed to eliminate waste and excessive costs. It is easy to foresee what will happen. The shipping bill and the reorganization bill offer exceptional opportunity for debate and resistance. Democratic leaders in both houses have determined upon a policy of filibustering, hoping thereby to prevent enactment of any legislation, and hoping further to prevent the passage of some of the appropriation bills—this to the end of compelling the President against his announced desire to call the new Congress in special session next summer. The Democratic leaders assume, not without reason, that the new Congress bearing the Republican label, though far from Republican in fact, will so disgust the country that it will be easy in the election of 1924 to sweep the Republican party into oblivion.

Yet the matters before this session are not proper subjects for political division. The appropriation bills are a necessity of current government. The shipping bill is in the nature of a desperate compromise. What Mr. Harding is trying to do is to wipe out the expensive machinery of the Shipping Board, which is now running a deficit of about half a million dollars per day and must continue at this ruinous rate of loss under existing laws. The subsidy, which will cost much less than the present order of things, is offered because it is obvious that if we are to maintain a merchant fleet we must furnish a direct subsidy as proposed or a more expensive subsidy such as we are now paying, or some other form of indirect subsidy as was proposed in the Jones Act of 1920, which was found impracticable. With our existing navigation laws, including the mischievous La Follette Seamen's Act, we can not otherwise maintain our flag on the seas. The reorganization bill is a general and long-needed reform, opposed only by bureaucrats animated by selfish motives, but able, none the less, to maintain a far-reaching opposing propaganda.

The fight is coming on. The strategy and tactics on each side are being formulated. Presently, it seems inevitable, we shall see President Harding arrayed against Congress, and unless all the omens fail he will stand in this attitude until the end of his term. For we must not be blind to the fact that the Republican party has lost control of both houses of Congress. There will be a nominal Republican majority of ten in the Senate and there are perhaps twice as many in the House of Representatives. But these majorities are only nominal, since they are made up of men who are not Republicans, though they appealed to the voters under the Republican name and were elected upon Republican tickets. It is a time for real Republicans to get behind the President; and in truth it is a time for all men of constructive and conservative mind, Republicans and Democrats alike, to compel the radicals in both parties to come out in the open and flock by themselves.

In what is written above there has been no attempt to gloss over the fact that the Republican party is in a bad way. It is afflicted from without by a pest of radical demagogues who have taken its name and assumed its garb without devotion to its principles or acceptance of its discipline. From within it has suffered through the rise of blocs formed in geographical, industrial, or special interest and holding over those who adhere to them an authority superior to that of the party itself. That it has ceased to be a coherent and vital force was illustrated many times in the recent session of Congress, and that painful record is in the way of being duplicated in the session now sitting at Washington.

There is in the situation a call to the President to take a positive stand as the leader of his party. And it is not going too far to say that the life of the party depends upon the part he shall play during the months immediately oncoming. As the head of the Republican party his first duty is to discover, among senators and representatives who go under the party name, who are and who are not Republicans. This can be determined only by party conferences—by caucuses—and they should be called. Those who shall decline participation are not Republicans and may not be counted as such. We say the life of the party depends upon the President because only the President is in position to enforce determinations by which the status of the party may be defined. He and he alone can take action that will either hold men claiming the party name to party allegiance or drive them, as pretenders and traitors, from the party fold. It is a time for positive courses—it is a time for elimination of uncertainties, a time to separate the sheep from the goats. The party can not survive—it will not deserve to survive—if there be not within it power to rid itself of those who hang upon its skirts even while denying its principles and repudiating its authority.

A Tip for Mr. Richardson.

Buried in the mass of written and pictured puerilities, inanities, vulgarities and putridities that went into the make-up of the Chronicle's last "Sunday sup" there was one careful study in matters serious and worthy; so serious and worthy as to merit a better environment. This study was embodied in a report of an interview with Hon. Frank O. Lowden of Illinois, reviewing the achievements of his governorship, particularly as related to his reorganization of the Illinois executive system with the cutting down of the cost of the state government. It is a great record, worthy of its fame. And it is just now of timely interest in California, where a newly-chosen governor-to-be has promised to duplicate the job. Governor Lowden points out that while in recent time the management of business has grown vastly in complexity there has been scant progress in the business of government. Because revenues have largely been derived from indirect and concealed sources it is only recently that the public has become conscious of the weight of the tax burden. But as the cost of living has grown and as its causes have been looked into there has come realization that advancing costs of government have been a tremendous factor in the case.

The commission system, of which we have plenteous illustration here in California, has had a notable part in increasing the cost of government and in augmenting the tax rate. Governor Lowden points out that the activities of government have multiplied rapidly during recent years—"more rapidly than warranted"—and when the state has decided to take on some new function, instead of fitting it into some agency of government already established, it usually has created an entirely new arm, sometimes an official, more frequently a board or a commission. From the standpoint of practical politics the commission was a happy invention. It provides good places for political workers, and since only a few commissioners have anything serious to do, there is time both for political activity and for private business. A commission once created is almost impossible to abolish, since, as Governor Lowden says, "there is nothing more difficult in government than to get rid of a lucrative office once established." We quote:

When I became governor of Illinois in January, 1917, there were something over one hundred and twenty-five independent and unrelated agencies of the state government. So confused was the situation that no two agreed upon just exactly how many independent activities the state was conducting. Necessarily, this resulted in much overlapping of work. In purchases there was competition between the different agencies of the government, and there was, of course, needless expense. Above all, there was greatly reduced efficiency. In theory, these various offices were supervised by the governor, but in fact it was absolutely impossible for him to exercise any adequate supervision over them. For all practical purposes the state government was without an actual head. Energetic and competent administration was impossible.

As a result of the delinquencies and the confusion growing out of the commission system, enforcement of the law of Illinois had become lax—so lax that it was widely regarded as a joke. The problem was to gather up the scattered agencies and to reorganize them into departments of government. The legislature happily was in the mood to cooperate. More than one hundred and twenty-five boards, commissions, and independent offices were abolished and nine new departments were created to take over their functions. These departments were:

- Department of Finance.
- Department of Agriculture.
- Department of Labor.
- Department of Mines and Minerals.
- Department of Public Works and Buildings.
- Department of Public Welfare.
- Department of Public Health.
- Department of Trade and Commerce.
- Department of Registration and Education.

Governor Lowden holds to the theory that when something important is to be done it can best be done by an individual rather than by a group. Where quasi-judicial or quasi-legislative powers are required there is work for a group or commission. But where duties are largely ministerial it is a man, and not a body of men, that gets results. "Where," says Governor Lowden, "responsibility is upon the individual he can not shirk it. Where it is placed in a body of men the individual can find shelter behind that body when called upon to account for the manner in which he has exercised his power." Then there is what Governor Lowden characterizes as "deadly inertia" in a board or commission which is not so likely to be found in an individual, for it is everlastingly true that what is everybody's business is nobody's business. Responsibility should be fixed; and under this principle there was placed at the head of each of the nine departments above enumerated an individual called a Director. In this connection it happened that there were many situations in which an official director could find counsel and help from able and experienced men. Therefore there was provided a series of advisory committees whose members served without pay. By this means there was brought to the service of the state many able men glad to lend their aid in public affairs, but who could not have been induced to take salaried positions.

Democracy, says Governor Lowden, too frequently has been so afraid of itself and of its own chosen officials that it has hedged them about with restrictions fatal to efficiency. In recognition of this fact the revolutionary movement in Illinois cut out a vast deal of red tape. Under this reform there has been maintained in the public service "something of the efficiency that goes with private service, and it has resulted in great savings to the people." The war, of course, brought on increased cost of government in many forms, but comparison of total appropriations in the war period for state purposes of Pennsylvania, Ohio, Wisconsin, Minnesota, Massachusetts, New York and Michigan—the only other states whose compiled figures were available to Governor Lowden—shows an increase for the period of 48 per cent. to 108 per cent., or an average increase for the seven states of 78 per cent. The increase in Illinois during the four-year period was less than the decrease in the purchasing value of the dollar. In addition, the indirect revenues of the state, because of increased efficiency of administration, increased considerably.

A New Note in Senatorial Service.

Among the reversals of the late election is the substitution of Royal S. Copeland (Democrat) for William M. Calder (Republican) in the United States Senate from the State of New York. Copeland is a physician who for a long time has held the office of health commissioner of New York City and his knowledge and his enthusiasms relate to the humanities rather than to politics. As health commissioner his work has in large part been that of keeping diseased and other undesirable immigrants from entering the United States; and upon one subject—that of immigration—he will be better informed and more definitely interested than any other member of the Senate. "What do you know about political affairs?" was asked of Dr. Copeland, following his election. "Nothing," he replied; "I don't care for politics; I have no wish to be a politician, and have not the slightest interest in politics, as popularly regarded. * * * In the Senate I am going to try to stimulate interest in human beings in contradistinction to interest in business. The Senate needs some one in it who can think in terms of humanity."

Proceeding, Dr. Copeland declared himself as entirely out of sympathy with present methods of examining immigrants upon their arrival in America. His idea is that examination of persons proposing to enter the country should be made at points of departure, thus eliminating in many cases expense, disappointment, and humiliation—not to mention the tendency to lax administration of restrictive laws in cases appealing to humanitarian sympathies. Examination, he said, as to qualifications for reception in America should take stock of mental, physical, moral and industrial considerations. Further, immigrants should be directed to different points and not all dumped as now in New York. It is, he declared, folly to send thousands of agricultural workers to a place not ready to provide them with occupation or even to give them information. Distribution of immigrants should be made, not for the convenience and profit of the shipping companies, but should look to the welfare of the newcomer and the interests of the country.

In these suggestions Dr. Copeland is offering nothing new excepting as to their application to American policy. Canada has long maintained at ports of departure inspectors to whom all applicants for admission to the country must apply for passports. Thus while Canada is receiving steadily a large inflow of new population, there is being kept out of the country multitudes of undesirables—persons who would bring to the new land only their incapacities and infirmities with liability of becoming a charge upon the public rather than an aid to the common welfare.

It is a commonplace observation that in large measure the amazing growth of the United States in man power and wealth has largely been due to immigration; and now that the tide running this way has been stopped the movement finds vent in other directions. Canada, Australia, New Zealand and South Africa are getting in crowded shiploads the man power of industry that in past times has come to us. What all this will mean for these countries it is easy to foretell, for we have concrete illustration in our own history. It is an easy prophecy that our putting up of the bars will in its direct results lead to an immense increment of population and of vigorous life in the newer countries still largely vacant and now gladly receiving those who will bring to them the man power needed for their development. We may look within the next few years to a growth in Canada, Australia, New Zealand and South Africa comparable to that already recorded in our own history.

The Prime Minister of Britain.

Theoretically the prime minister of England is the first lord of the treasury, and not the prime minister at all: actually, he is or may be—it depends largely on the man—the ruler of the empire. Since this significant office has loomed so large of late in the public horizon, it is not amiss to review something of the history of an institution whose prestige is comparatively modern.

The function of the prime minister may be mathematically expressed as a variable, since the office originated non-constitutionally with Sir Robert Walpole's appointment in 1721 as first lord of the treasury and his gradual interpretation of functions of that post as that of chief executive of the realm. Prior to Walpole's régime in the treasury the lord of that department was just that and little more, though it is true his authority had gradually grown through the centuries. But Walpole's power was largely the result of a fluke. A combination of circumstances—the accession of the German Elector of Hanover as George I, his ignorance of the English language, his dependence on Walpole, who happened to be the leader of the House of Commons, and the latter's appointment as first lord of the treasury were the circumstances that created the non-constitutional office of the prime minister, a term which, by the way, is even more recent than the office it describes. In November, 1841, Lord Melbourne, whose political career was then behind him, wrote on that subject to his sovereign: "Prime minister is a term belonging to the last century. Lord Melbourne doubts its being to be found in English parliamentary language previously. Sir Robert Walpole was always accused of having introduced and arrogated to himself an office previously unknown to the law and constitution."

However, Walpole's arrogance was not without logical basis. He was first lord of the treasury, an office that is theoretically the third highest lay position in the kingdom, for by strict interpretation of the constitution the highest lay subject is the high steward and the next highest is the chancellor, practically extinct offices today whose functions have devolved on the third officer of the realm, the high treasurer. So much for constitutional intention. Money speaks, and the man who handled the seals and keys of the treasury outpaced his two superior confrères so that when Walpole was presented by his Hanoverian monarch with the white staff of the treasury it became the most powerful office in the land and Walpole was opportunist enough to use a weak foreign king to make it more powerful. It is curious that the office intended for the premiership, the high steward, should never have had satisfactory scope. Held chiefly by ecclesiastics in the middle ages, its power, which was all but regal, was too great, and was quickly curtailed by the inherent democracy of the British people. By the rise of Parliament in the thirteenth century, the prime officer of state had ceased to exist. The chancellor, the second officer, tended throughout the centuries to become more and more the first officer of the law and of its highest court.

But though the term prime minister has become stereotyped by two centuries of usage its attributes are still almost as vague as when Walpole created the anomalous office. A premier of indifferent statesmanship, though such a one is not likely to be appointed—and it is a significant fact that practically all of the thirty-five men who have held the post since Walpole have been individually strong—could revert to the nominal post of president of the cabinet, though he would still have to be leader of the house of Parliament in which he sat—another precedent established by Walpole. In practice the prime minister has come to be the leader of the government, of the house of legislation in which he sits, and of one of the political parties—an onerous job. Small wonder that it calls for the most competent men in the government and that its conflicting claims are not conducive to longevity in any one administration.

THE LAUSANNE CONFERENCE.

Its Task Will Be to Find Some Ground of Accommodation With a Rejuvenated Turkey.

The old order changeth, and if the Lausanne conference fails to recognize that fact it is going to wade in trouble. It is Europe's present hope of promoting peace in the Near East, and since Turkey refuses to get out of Europe, and Turkish rejuvenation has been the only result of the efforts of Greece to destroy it in Asia, it is Western civilization's one chance of reestablishing relations with the Turk on a basis that will make him tolerable as a neighbor. A very useful citizen of the European order, in any positive and constructive sense, he probably can not be. But the conference is the hope of the world that he can be rendered harmless to humanity's major interests. And that involves considerations of policy and strategy, of economics and diplomacy, far transcending any sentimental slants of the sort that express themselves in the form of religious antipathies, or the futile desire to see people of foreign nature and nationality "assimilated" to the forms and formulas some of us happen to think holy. Turkey does not have to be assimilated. It does have to be educated, or it would better be educated, if the cause of the peace of Europe is to be served. But it will never be educated by foreign zealots that despise its religion and condemn its social order, and are at the same time unable to show that their own social order is even reasonably free from corruption, or that their religion saves all their peoples from degradation. Missionaries have not accomplished much in the way of the conversion of the Turk, and even the efforts at educating him have been disappointing. He still exhibits the vices and the cruelties of the ignorant man everywhere. Granting for argument's sake that he is cruel and ferocious, is he much more so than the "gouging and gilling" Americans of the early days of this country, or the Southwestern gentlemen that used to work their way to the vitals of their enemies with the Bowie knife?

Your cruel man is your ignorant man, whether he be the unschooled Turk, or the German peasant schooled only in what his military bureaucrats and subsidized professors wanted him to believe.

It is enlightenment that makes men just, and in justice there is no room for needless cruelties. And it is enlightenment that the Turk has lacked. It does not enlighten him to tell him that his father was immoral to be a polygamist like a Hebrew patriarch, or that his mother was not really a wife, or that he is a fool to wear a red hat without a brim and turn himself toward Mecca when he prays. It only makes him angry. It would make us angry, too. It may be true that no effort such as has been made at the Western education of Turks could persist over a long period without having some effect; but the effect has not been to bring Turkey into line with Western ideas. Yet it should still be possible to get along with him, provided some things he thinks essential to his newly aroused nationalism be recognized.

Not even his victory over the Greeks attests more clearly the ability and intelligence of Mustapha Kemal than his demand for the annulment of the so-called Capitulations. The Capitulations are an element of international law first set up in Turkey and later applied to China and Japan, expressing the principle of extraterritoriality where the rights of foreigners are concerned. In the Turkish empire they were a source of irresponsibility on the part of denizens, and hence a factor of national weakness and disintegration. Foreigners had a right under treaties to be tried under the laws of their own countries, and by courts of those countries, sitting in Turkey. Instead of being amenable to Turkish law, or even to a law common to all of them, each was amenable to his own law, as administered by his own judge. This has made it possible in the past for a foreign group to become a centre of sedition and anti-nationalist propaganda. Wherever the interests of foreigners were concerned, the Capitulations robbed the state of its proper central authority and enfeebled the administration of justice. Great organizer and passionate nationalist, Mustapha Kemal has seen that such a condition was bad organization and a menace to nationalism.

Strange to say, this arrangement, which no Western nation would tolerate, was not imposed on Turkey from without, but is a vestige of the days when she was one of the most powerful nations of Europe; and it represents the inherent weakness of all things Turkish and many things English and American as well—the inclination to rub along in the easiest way, to follow the line of least resistance, no matter where it leads. That is Turkish, and it is, in the Turkish degree, probably part of the Turk's Mongolian character and habit. The Chinese have it in superlative measure, in a measure that makes it almost impossible to eradicate an evil, because before eradication is complete the thing becomes tolerable, and when it is tolerable it is tolerated and you can get no more attention upon it. Shrewd observers say the whole polity of China is shot through and through with the rotting roots of immemorial abuses, awaiting only some favorable sort of political weather to put up shoots and flourish again in their ancient places.

That easy way of dealing with wrongs is, of course, not peculiar to Mongolians, Chinese or Turkish. We have plenty of persons among what our Afro-American brother called "us Angry-Saxons" who like to drift along on that malarious current. But we also have others who get real mad and won't be placated by anything less than cure, and who persist until they become even less tolerable than the wrongs the rest of us are willing to tolerate, and they are often great nuisances, but they keep us off the rocks of actual depravity. Such an element, however, seems lacking in the economy of the Turkish empire, and so, to enable the officials to get along as easily as possible with the foreigners and persons claiming to be foreigners in Turkish territory, they were willing to play that part of Turkish territory was Italian territory, or French territory, or Austrian territory, and save the Moham-medan Cadis the trouble of trying the "pestilent fellows" when they fell out with other pestilent fellows. It was a mere Turkish way of dodging trouble; but when you dodge trouble you don't really kill it, you just give it exercise, and it comes on you from behind. So here. Responsibility was nowhere, and the Turkish population had ever before its eyes the bad example of irresponsibility. Administration, for which the Turk never had any genius, became more or less farcical, the state was filled with little separate entities, secular and religious, absolved by treaty from loyalty to Turkish authority, and there slipped from the weakening grasp of this exotic empire one holding after another.

The last of it in Europe, down to the armistice, was secured to Turkey, not because she was strong, but because she had grown weak. Today Europe can not look without apprehension on the fact that Turkey refuses to remain weak, but is determined to be strong, and as one of the first of her athletic exercises she purposes to kick out the Capitulations and do her own internal governing. It is not too much to say that there is consternation among the Western European powers, similar to that which led Austria, after the Young Turk rising in 1908, to seize Bosnia and Herzegovina. Only this time there is no Western disposition to seize anything. The Turk is the one that is getting ready to do the seizing. He makes three demands that worry the Allies: a plebiscite in western Thrace, this side the Maritza River, which, no matter how conducted, would probably result in a pro-Turkish vote in that region and its return to the Turkish empire; a rectification of the frontier of Syria, probably to undo part of the mandate to France; and the abolition of those Capitulations which, to the political insight of Kemal, have been the cause of so much weakness in his nation. To this last demand Great Britain is opposed, with a positiveness which indicates a desire to have that weakness remain. But Ismet Pasha, head of the Turkish delegation to Lausanne, declares his adhesion to the demand for the abolition of the Capitulations—and there you are. It looks as though the conference might deadlock on that.

In respect to all this tribulation the United States is trying to remain aloof yet present, involved but clear, a participant though not participating. It is true that American interests are more sentimental than substantial. And yet, the world has grown so small that no one can start the conflagration of another war without our being involved soon or late, provided the conflict is at all protracted. We have a real interest in humanity, and we also have some interest in what are called the Chester concessions in Asia Minor, leading by intendment of projected railroads lines to fat petroleum fields in northern Mesopotamia. So we appoint observers, who can sit at the conference if the real conferees have no objections, and note and report what goes on, and what seems to threaten, in order to safeguard American interests and facilitate exchanges of views; and to be ready to indicate this government's desires in any little matters that may come up. To this service have been assigned Minister Joseph C. Grew, from Switzerland, inasmuch as Switzerland seems to be at peace, and Ambassador Richard Washburn Child from Italy, which seems partly pacified. Mr. Grew was secretary to Colonel House during the pre-armistice negotiations at Versailles. He has passed most of his life thus far in the diplomatic service which the United States has been wisely opening of late to young men ambitious for a life career in this field. He is an Episcopalian, and so will probably look just as good to a Turk as though he were a hardshell Baptist. Mr. Child is the former editor of Collier's Weekly and will be remembered as the author of a number of interesting short stories in a popular American weekly magazine. He will probably get a fresh lot of fiction material at the conference.

And the United States is also for the repeal of those Capitulations; which repeal, in the words of our State Department, "may be necessary to the safeguarding of non-Moslem interests." Our other objects are: "The protection, under proper guaranties, of philanthropic, educational, and religious institutions; appropriate undertakings in regard to the freedom of opportunity, without discrimination or special privilege, of commercial enterprise; indemnity for losses suffered by Americans in Turkey as a result of arbitrary and illegal acts; suitable provisions for the protection of minorities; assurances touching the freedom of the straits; and reasonable opportunity for archaeological research and study."

Great Britain, France, and Italy have been apprised of these modest desires, which coincide at many points with their own requirements.

The dangerous element in the situation is the sharp conflict with a strong Turkey, which is a new power; for there has been no strong Turkey for two centuries; and the possibility that to the strength of Turkey may be added at any time the strength of the red Russian army. The latter element, however, is apt to be overrated, for no army can be strong in a modern sense with a weakened, starving, and demoralized people behind it. Meanwhile the Sultan has escaped from Constantinople to British protection at Malta; much like a zoo garden bear that passes from one cage into another. He says he has not abdicated; but over a month ago the Angora government, as in the case of the Afro-American preacher, "done sent him his resignation." The British have him, and may be able, as our sporting writers would put it, to "build him up" into a respectable Caliph again, and use him at least as a pawn in the game. Not that he would be recognized by Kemal, who refused to recognize him while he was in Constantinople on the perfectly logical ground that he was a prisoner, and a prisoner could not govern an empire because he could not even govern himself; but he might be made to pass for a Caliph with the Indian Mussulmans. That, however, is another matter. They never believed much in the Sultan as Caliph, anyhow. Altogether it is a mean little mess.

MORTON TOWN.

OLD FAVORITES.

The Selkirk Grace.

(Allan Cunningham records that this very characteristic "Grace before meat" was uttered (by Burns) at the table of the Earl of Selkirk, while on his tour through Galloway with his friend Syme in July, 1793.)

Some hae meat and canna eat,
And some wad eat that want it;
But we hae meat, and we can eat,
And sae the Lord be thanket.—Robert Burns.

In Bohemia.

I'd rather live in Bohemia than in any other land;
For only there are the values true,
And the laurels gathered in all men's view.
The prizes of traffic and state are won
By shrewdness of force or by deeds undone;
But fame is sweeter without the feud,
And the wise of Bohemia are never shrewd.
Here, pilgrims stream with a faith sublime
From every class and clime and time,
Aspiring only to be enrolled
With the names that are writ in the book of gold;
And each one bears in mind or hand
A palm of the dear Bohemian land.
The scholar first, with his book—a youth
Aflame with the glory of harvested truth;
A girl with a picture, a man with a play,
A boy with a wolf he has modeled in clay;
A smith with a marvelous hilt and sword,
A player, a king, a ploughman, a lord—
And the player is king when the door is past.
The ploughman is crowned, and the lord is last!
I'd rather fail in Bohemia than win in another land;
No gold or hope for the brainless heir;
No gilded dullard native born
To stare at his fellow with leaden scorn:
Bohemia has none but adopted sons;
Its limits, where Fancy's bright stream runs;
Its honors, not garnered for thrift or trade,
But for beauty and truth men's souls have made.
To the empty heart in a jeweled breast
There is value, maybe, in a purchased crest;
But the thirsty of soul soon learn to know
The moistureless froth of the social show;
The vulgar sham of the pompous feast
Where the heaviest purse is the highest priest;
The organized charity, scrimped and iced,
In the name of a cautious, statistical Christ;
The smile restrained, the respectable cant,
When a friend in need is a friend in want;
Where the only aim is to keep afloat,
And a brother may drown with a cry in his throat.
Oh, I long for the glow of a kindly heart and the grasp
Of a friendly hand.
And I'd rather live in Bohemia than in any other land.
—John Boyle O'Reilly.

Canadian Boat Song.

Listen to me, as when ye heard our father
Sing long ago the song of other shores—
Listen to me, and then in chorus gather
All your deep voices, as ye pull your oars:

*Fair these broad meads—these hoary woods are grand;
But we are exiles from our fathers' land.*

From the lone shieling of the misty island
Mountains divide us, and the waste of seas—
Yet still the blood is strong, the heart is Highland.
And we in dreams behold the Hebrides.

*Fair these broad meads—these hoary woods are grand;
But we are exiles from our fathers' land.*

We ne'er shall tread the fancy-haunted valley,
Where 'tween the dark hills creeps the small clear stream,
In arms around the patriarch banner rally,
Nor see the moon on royal tombstones gleam.

*Fair these broad meads—these hoary woods are grand;
But we are exiles from our fathers' land.*

When the bold kindred, in the time long vanished,
Conquer'd the soil and fortified the keep,
No seer foretold the children would be banished,
That a degenerate lord might boast his sheep.

*Fair these broad meads—these hoary woods are grand;
But we are exiles from our fathers' land.*

Come foreign rage, let discord burst in slaughter!
O! then, for clansmen true, and stern claymore—
The hearts that would have given their blood like water
Beat heavily beyond the Atlantic roar.

*Fair these broad meads—these hoary woods are grand;
But we are exiles from our fathers' land.*
—From the Gaelic.

INDIVIDUALITIES.

Sarah Bernhardt, who is now in her seventy-eighth year, has just published a novel in Paris and is at work on a volume of advice to actors to be called "Conseils aux Comédiens." Her principal advice is: "Be sincere."

Mr. Ernest H. Wilson, assistant director of the Arnold Arboretum, Boston, has recently returned from a twenty-seven months' tour through a large part of the Southern Hemisphere and equatorial regions in the interests of the institution he represents. Mr. Wilson, whose previous tours of botanical exploration in Japan, Formosa, Western China and other parts of the Orient have resulted in the discovery of more new plants than any other botanical researcher has to his record, did much on his latest journey to cement good will between the various parts of the British Empire and the United States. Mr. Wilson is known as the man who in his Asiatic explorations added 1193 species and varieties of woody plants to the knowledge of science, introducing hundreds of trees and shrubs that have since been disseminated throughout the temperate zone. The Arnold Arboretum in Boston possesses the richest collections of woods and shrubs in the world.

Cherry Kearton, one of the most notable of big game hunters, has recently returned to England, where he reports that he has been repeating something resembling the adventure of Tarzan. Mr. Kearton has been lost in the jungle for three years, and in fact was given up for dead. His fate, however, was not so tragic—he was simply the guest and not the victim of the jungle, where he has been entertained by a tribe of enormous chimpanzees with whom he has lived for the past two years. He has brought one of his friends with him, Toto, who understands French, Spanish, and English, according to his host. Toto shakes hands, brushes the carpet, makes tea, and every morning brushes his teeth.

Major-General Leonard Wood heads the list of petitioners to the Massachusetts legislature seeking the passage of a special act providing for the organization of a corporation to be known as the "General Society of Mayflower Descendants." The list includes former President William H. Taft, United States Senator Henry Cabot Lodge, Miles Standish of Boston and a number of other "descendants" bearing historic names.

Our American equivalent of Sir Arthur Pearson, the late British benefactor of the blind, is a woman, Miss Winifred Holt. Miss Holt, who is a Chevalier of the Legion d'Honneur and one of the three women to whom the Italian government has given the gold medal for national sanitation, is the founder of Lighthouse No. 1 in New York, an institute for the blind. She has founded eight other beacons for the blind in other countries, Poland, France, and Italy, notably, each of which is now under government supervision.

Korfanty, the Polish leader who was recently defeated by Pilsudski for the premiership of Poland, declares that he is not a party man. He claims to be a consistent champion of the working people whose dream it is one day to unite the Germans, Poles, and Frenchmen in common economic activity. He is himself a working man's son who spent his holidays as a student gathering experience in the mines and factories of Upper Silesia. So far from causing a military revolt to overthrow Pilsudski, Korfanty says: "We need, above all, peace at home and peace abroad."

Although he returned from the Far East only a few months ago, Isaac F. Marcossion is off again, this time to put the probe into troubled Germany. He will also visit France and England. Upon his return Mr. Marcossion will go on an extended lecture tour. It is doubtful if any other living writer has covered as much ground during the past eight years as this "king of interviewers."

Hiram Bingham, recently elected lieutenant-governor of Connecticut, is one of the best known of American explorers. The son of missionaries, he was born in Honolulu in 1875, educated at Yale, the University of California, and Harvard, and has taught at Princeton and Yale. Mr. Bingham explored Bolivar's route across Venezuela and Colombia, 1906-07; the Spanish trade route, Buenos Aires to Lima, 1908-09; the ruins of Machu Picchu; and directed the Yale Peruvian expedition in 1911 and the Peruvian expeditions of 1912, '14, and '15 under the auspices of Yale University and the National Geographical Society. Professor Bingham also located Vitcos, the last Inca capital, and made the first ascent of Mount Coropuna, a 21,703-foot climb. Needless to say, he is the author of many volumes on the results of his travels. Mr. Bingham was in the air service during the war, where he held various posts, including chief of the Air Personnel Division and commanding officer of the Aviation Instruction Centre, Issoudun, France, which was the Allies' largest flying school. Professor Bingham's discovery of Machu Picchu, the great stone city of the Incas, has been called "the greatest archaeological discovery of the age." Buried beneath the jungle, its site inhabited by only three families of wandering Indians, Machu Picchu was found in a state of good preservation, temples, homes, streets and burial caves bearing witness to an extinct order of high civilization.

SOME CHESTERTONIAN APPRAISALS.

How That Well-Known Institution, the United States, Looks to the Touring English Lecturer.

In Gilbert K. Chesterton's "What I Saw in America" we have to do with what at times appears to be a vanishing species, that of the conscious stylist, the writer who redeems his text from dryness in those spots which would otherwise inevitably be dry by resort to certain quirks, graces, and, if you please, tricks of composition and verbal prestidigitation, or prestiverbation, such as tease the mind and quicken the perceptions to meanings which may not always be whole, may not always be sound, may not always in fact be there at all, but which when they are there do have some real value in the way and form of verbal beauty. Mr. Chesterton prestiverbitates (that word is all ours and we mean to make the most of it) or, every page, almost to prestiverbosity. He gives us all he has. We are never conscious that he is merely filling space. And while he may be infuriating, he never is tiresome, at least until one wearies of quite so much verbal antithesis, phrase balance, and shocking paradox. And when that time arrives we still can wonder at his cleverness, as we do at the cleverness of the tight-rope walker; even after we have detected that it is really the pole that balances the circus gentleman, and not the circus gentleman the pole. Nor can we entertain the opinion that G. K. C. is merely a holiday figure in tights and spangles. Far from it. He has his uses, and they are good ones. Had he been present when those two knights met on the road and one proclaimed that the shield hanging from the oak was white and the other that it was black, they would not have fought about it, for Gilbert K. would have mounted acrobatically on some convenient stump or barrel, turned the shield about, and shown each that the other was at least half right. He can not show both sides of the shield at once—no one can. But at showing one side he is an adept. And it is usually the side that was not meant to be presented, and at which most of us have conventionally agreed not to look. We imagine that as a little boy G. K. C. was a fat little boy, and that when they took him to the Christmas pantomime he escaped from his parents and ran behind the scenes, and then came forward and shrilled to the consternation of the actors: "What you think you see isn't there at all; you only see what you think." For he deals in reversals, as Shaw deals in inversions. Some of them are quite startling; and when they are too much so and invite that silent back talk from the reader which every writer dreads, he brings to their support some astonishing spiritual interpretations which tend to humble the most savage critic. As, for example:

I have never managed to lose my old conviction that travel narrows the mind. At least a man must make a double effort of moral humility and imaginative energy to prevent it from narrowing his mind. Indeed there is something touching and even tragic about the thought of the thoughtless tourist, who might have stayed at home loving Laplanders, embracing Chinamen, and clasping Patagonians to his heart in Hampstead or Surbiton, but for his blind and suicidal impulse to go and see what they looked like. This is not meant for nonsense; still less is it meant for the silliest sort of nonsense, which is cynicism. The human bond that he feels at home is not an illusion. On the contrary, it is rather an inner reality. Man is inside all men. In a real sense any man may be inside any men. But to travel is to leave the inside and draw dangerously near the outside. So long as he thought of men in the abstract, like naked toiling figures in some classic frieze, merely as those who labor and love their children and die, he was thinking of the fundamental truth about them. By going to look at their unfamiliar manners and customs he is inviting them to disguise themselves in fantastic masks and costumes. Many modern internationalists talk as if men of different nationalities had only to meet and mix and understand each other. In reality that is the moment of supreme danger—the moment when they meet. We might shiver, as at the old euphemism by which a meeting meant a duel.

Nevertheless, Chesterton was willing to risk having his mind narrowed by coming to America and lecturing, for compensation. This is dangerously like narrowing the mind for hire, and is not new. But some attorneys find it lucrative, so why not a writer? And perhaps as the mind narrows it sharpens. At any rate the views of us that he gives are well worth attention. If our author's rotund front could be silvered and glazed it would make a remarkable mirror, and it would give necessarily distorted images, but they would be worth looking at for the mere enlargements and contractions of things we would not otherwise consider at all. Nor would these distortions always be grotesque. Here, for example, is one of beauty and strong high lights:

We are perpetually boring the world and each other with talk about the bonds that bind us to America. We are perpetually crying aloud that England and America are very much alike, especially England. We are always insisting that the two are identical in all the things in which they most obviously differ. We are always saying that both stand for democracy, when we should not consent to stand for their democracy for half a day. We are always saying that at least we are all Anglo-Saxons, when we are descended from Romans and Normans and Britons and Danes, and they are descended from Irishmen and Italians and Slavs and Germans. We tell a people whose very existence is a revolt against the British crown that they are passionately devoted to the British constitution. We tell a nation whose whole policy has been isolation and independence that with us she can bear safely the White Man's Burden of the universal empire. We tell a continent crowded with Irishmen to thank God that the Saxon can always rule the Celt. We tell a populace whose very virtues are lawless that together we uphold the Reign of Law. We recognize our own law-abiding character in people who make laws that neither they nor anybody else can abide. We congratulate them on clinging to all they have cast away, and on imitating everything which they came into existence to insult. And when we have established all these nonsensical analogies with a non-existent nation, we wait until there is a crisis in which we really are at one with America, and then we falter and threaten to fail her. In a battle where we really are of one blood, the blood of the great white race throughout the world, when we really have one language, the fundamental alphabet of Cadmus and the script of Rome, when we really do represent the same reign of law, the common conscience of Christendom and the morals of men baptized, when we really have an implicit faith and honor and type of freedom to summon up our souls as with trumpets—then many of us begin to weaken and waver and wonder whether there is not something very nice about little yellow men, whose heroic legends revolved round polygamy and suicide, and whose heroes wore two swords and worshipped the ancestors of the Mikado.

Right or wrong, that's good stuff, and beautiful. And here is another bit of beauty in words and ideas, evoked by a meeting with some children in a Philadelphia park; and as delicately lovely as some best parts of "They":

I felt a profound and radiant peace in the thought that they at any rate were not going to my lecture. It made me happy that in that talk neither they nor I had any names. I was full of that indescribable waking vision of the strangeness of life, and especially of the strangeness of locality; of how we find places and lose them; and see faces for a moment in a far-off land, and it is equally mysterious if we remember and mysterious if we forget.

Mr. Chesterton is a socialist, and an individualist may be pardoned some unholy joys at discovering in his text such an obvious indictment of paternalism and endorsement of individual enterprise as the following, even though the clear meaning of it may be lost in one of those favorite prestiverbitations:

The telephone in New York works miracles all day long. Replies from remote places come as promptly as in a private talk; nobody cuts anybody off; nobody says, "Sorry you've been troubled." But then the postal service of New York does not work at all. At least I could never discover it working. Letters lingered in it for days and days, as in some wild village of the Pyrenees. When I asked a taxi-driver to drive me to a postoffice, a look of far-off vision and adventure came into his eyes, and he said he had once heard of a postoffice somewhere near West Ninety-Seventh Street. Men are not efficient in everything, but only in the fashionable thing. This may be a mark of the march of science; it does certainly in one sense deserve the description of youth. We can imagine a very young person forgetting the old toy in the excitement of a new one.

And who could put the case for the American dollar better than this?

The fact without the truth is futile; indeed the fact without the truth is false. I have already noted that this is especially true touching our observations of a strange country; and it is certainly true touching one small fact which has swelled into a large fable. I mean the fable about America commonly summed up in the phrase about the Almighty Dollar. I do not think that the dollar is almighty in America; I fancy many things are mightier, including many ideals and some rather insane ideals. But I think it might be maintained that the dollar has another of the attributes of deity. If it is not omnipotent it is in a sense omnipresent. Whatever Americans think about dollars, it is, I think relatively true that they talk about dollars. If a mere mechanical record could be taken by the modern machinery of dictaphones and stenography, I do not think it probable that the mere word "dollars" would occur more often in any given number of American conversations than the mere word "pounds" or "shillings" in a similar number of English conversations.

I fancy that the American, quite apart from any love of money, has a great love of measurement. He will mention the exact size or weight of things in a way which appears to us as irrelevant. It is as if we were to say that a man came to see us carrying three feet of walking stick and four inches of cigar. It is so in cases that have no possible connection with any avarice or greed for gain. An American will praise the prodigious generosity of some other man in giving up his own estate for the good of the poor. But he will generally say that the philanthropist gave them a 200-acre park, where an Englishman would think it quite sufficient to say that he gave them a park. There is something about this precision which seems suitable to the American atmosphere; to the hard sunlight, and the cloudless skies, and the glittering detail of the architecture and the landscape; just as the vaguer English version is consonant to our mistier and more impressionist scenery. It is also connected perhaps with something more boyish about the younger civilization; and corresponds to the passionate particularity with which a boy will distinguish the uniform of regiments, the rigs of ships, or even the colors of tram tickets. It is a certain godlike appetite for things, as distinct from thoughts.

Few could fail to be interested in what Chesterton has to say about our predominant subject of thought. It has become our national intellectual atmosphere, and he could not avoid it. So he says:

I went to America with some notion of not discussing prohibition. But I soon found that well-to-do Americans were only too delighted to discuss it over the nuts and wine. They were even willing, if necessary to dispense with the nuts. I am far from sneering at this; having a general philosophy which need not here be expounded, but which may be symbolized by saying that monkeys can enjoy nuts but only men can enjoy wine. But if I am to deal with prohibition, there is no doubt of the first thing to be said about it. The first thing to be said about it is that it does not exist. It is to some extent enforced among the poor; at any rate it was intended to be enforced among the poor; though even among them I fancy that it is much evaded. It is certainly not enforced among the rich; and I doubt whether it was intended to be. I suspect that this has always happened whenever this negative notion has taken hold of some particular province or tribe. Prohibition never prohibits. It never has in history; not even in Moslem history; and it never will. Mahomet at least had the argument of a climate and not the interest of a class. But if a test is needed, consider what part of Moslem culture has passed permanently into our own modern culture. You will find the one Moslem poem that has really pierced is a Moslem poem in praise of wine. The crown of all the victories of the Crescent is that nobody reads the Koran and everybody reads the Rubaiyat.

The phenomenon puzzles him, and he attributes it to a willingness on our part to shed our beer as well as our blood in defense of our liberties. But now that war is over, the thing takes on this aspect to him:

Only, if war is the exception, why should prohibition be the rule? If the surrender of beer is worthy to be compared to the shedding of blood, why then blood ought to be flowing forever like a fountain in the public squares of Philadelphia and New York. If my critic wants to complete his parallel, he must draw up rather a remarkable programme for the daily life of the ordinary citizens. He must suppose that, through all their lives, they are paraded every day at lunch time and prodded with bayonets to show that they will shed their blood for their country. He must suppose that every evening, after a light repast of poison gas and shrapnel, they are made to go to sleep in a trench under a permanent drizzle of shell-fire. It is surely obvious that if this were the normal life of the citizen, the citizen would have no normal life. The common sense of the thing is that sacrifices of this sort are admirable but abnormal. It is not normal for the state to be perpetually regulating our days with the discipline of a fighting regiment; and it is not normal for the state to be perpetually regulating our diet with the discipline of a famine. To say that every citizen must be subject to control in such bodily things is like the saying that every Christian ought to tear himself with red-hot pincers because the Christian martyrs did their duty in time of persecution. A man has a right to control his body, though in a time of martyrdom he may give his body to be burned; and a man has a right to control his bodily health, though in a state of siege he may give his body to be starved. Thus, though the patriotic defense was a sincere defense, it is a defense that comes back on the defenders like a boomerang. For it proves only that prohibition ought to be ephemeral, unless war ought to be eternal.

And having his reflections on wine, one naturally wants to know what he thought about women. He says:

Interviewers in the United States perpetually asked me what I thought of American women, and I confessed a distaste for such generalizations which I have not managed to lose. The Americans, who are the most chivalrous people in the world, may perhaps understand me; but I can never help feeling that there is something polygamous about talking of women in the plural at all; something unworthy of any American except a Mormon. Nevertheless, I think the exaggeration I suggest does extend in a less degree to American women, fascinating as they are. I think they, too, tend too much to this cult of impersonal personality. It is a description easy to exaggerate even by the faintest emphasis; for all these things are subtle and subject to striking individual exceptions. To complain of people for being brave and bright and kind and intelligent may not unreasonably appear unreasonable. And yet there is something in the background that can only be expressed by a symbol, something that is not shallowness, but a neglect of the subconsciousness and the vaguer and slower impulses; something that can be missed amid all that laughter and light, under those starry candelabra of the ideals of the happy virtues. Sometimes it came over me, in a wordless wave, that I should like to see a sulky woman. How she would walk in beauty like the night, and reveal more silent spaces full of older stars! These things can not be conveyed in their delicate proportion even in the most large and allusive terms. But the same thing was in the mind of the white-bearded old man I met in New York, an Irish exile and a wonderful talker, who stared up at the tower of gilded galleries of the great hotel, and said with that spontaneous movement of style which is hardly heard except from Irish talkers: "And I have been in a village in the mountains where the people could hardly read or write; but all the men were like soldiers, and all the women had pride."

It sounds like a poem about an earthly paradise to say that in this land the old women can be more beautiful than the young. Indeed, I think Walt Whitman, the national poet, has a line somewhere almost precisely to that effect. It sounds like a parody upon Utopia, and the image of the lion lying down with the lamb, to say it is a place where a man might almost fall in love with his mother-in-law. But there is nothing in which the finer side of American gravity and good feeling does more honorably exhibit itself than in a certain atmosphere around the older women. It is not a cant phrase to say that they grow old gracefully; for they do really grow old. In this the national optimism really has in it the national courage. The old women do not dress like young women; they only dress better. There is another side to this feminine dignity in the old, sometimes a little lost in the young, with which I shall deal presently. The point for the moment is that even Whitman's truly poetic vision of the beautiful old women suffers a little from that bewildering multiplicity and recurrence that is indeed the whole theme of Whitman. It is like the green eternity of Leaves of Grass. When I think of the eccentric spinsters and incorrigible grandmothers of my own country, I can not imagine that any one of them could possibly be mistaken for another, even at a glance; and in comparison I feel as if I had been traveling in an earthly paradise of more decorative harmonies.

There is another cause of this strange servile disease in American democracy. It is to be found in American feminism, and feminist America is an entirely different thing from feminine America. I should say that the overwhelming majority of American girls laugh at their female politicians at least as much as the majority of American men despise their male politicians. But though aggressive feminists are a minority, they are in this atmosphere which I have tried to analyze; the atmosphere in which there is a sort of sanctity about the minority. And it is this superstition of seriousness that constitutes the most solid obstacle and exception to the general and almost conventional pressure of public opinion. When a fad is frankly felt to be anti-national, as was abolitionism before the civil war, or pro-Germanism in the great war, or the suggestion of radical admixture in the South at all times, then the fad meets far less mercy than anywhere else in the world; it is snowed under and swept away. But when it does not thus directly challenge patriotism or popular ideas, a curious halo of hopeful solemnity surrounds it, merely because it is a fad, but above all if it is a feminine fad. The earnest lady-reformer who really utters a warning against the social evil of beer or buttons is seen to be walking clothed in light, like a prophetess. Perhaps it is something of the holy aureole which the East sees shining around an idiot.

This is a diverting and even a stimulating book, and a consolation to those that enjoy beauty in letters and feel that conscious English style is dying. And if some captious person should suggest that all this mechanism, this dragged-in antithesis and balance and inversion, is really decadent, why the answer to that is that style in decay is better than no style at all. We need a return to it—to the upbuilding of beauty in words and phrases and sentences. It is more luscious fruit than any hard kernels of fact enveloped in hickory shell.

WHAT I SAW IN AMERICA. By G. K. Chesterton. New York: Dodd, Mead & Co.; $3.

BANKING AND INVESTMENT NEWS.

San Francisco bank clearings for the week ending November 18, 1922, were $183,900,000; for the corresponding week of last year, $152,200,000; an increase of $31,700,000.

Public utilities occupy a position closely parallel to that of the railroads in that they furnish public service and are subject to rate and other regulations. Income in most cases is somewhat fixed and the fluctuation in the margin of profit is the result of changing operating costs. All public service corporations, whether railroads, gas companies, electric light and power, or tractions, suffered many states railroad bonds are the only corporate instruments which are legally authorized for savings bank investment, a restriction which has greatly improved the theoretical investment value of railroad bonds to the disparagement of other classes of securities. As a matter of fact, public utility corporations are as stable earners as the railroads and the security of the bonds as high. Certain states have recognized this and legalized public utility bonds for savings bank and trust funds. Such action is very likely to become more and more common and justifiably so.

The present trend in public utility financing and regulation is resulting in increased safety for the investor in utility bonds. Almost every indenture securing a new public utility offering restricts the amount borrowed to 75 per cent. of the valuation of the property securing the loan. Normally a public utility property increases in value as the community grows, and, moreover, the equity of the bondholder increases year by year through the operation of a sinking fund. Public service is the pivotal point upon which growth in any community is centered and the general admission of this in late years has much changed the attitude of regulatory commissions. A fair return of the capital invested is now usually allowed. Another influence which has done much to establish the public utilities in popular favor has been the customers' ownership campaign. Customers now fight the battles of their corporation instead of assuming an antagonizing attitude which was at one time popular.

A selected list of public utility bonds is suggested here for investment. The group contains long and short-term securities and bonds of various ratings, to meet the needs of the individual investor.

The Columbia Gas & Electric Company, which operates principally in Cincinnati, has worked into a strong earning position. The $14,196,500 of first 5s, 1927, are secured by a first mortgage on property and securities carried at over $65,000,000. Interest charges have been earned by a substantial margin, even during the period of highest costs. Earnings are now running at the highest rate ever reported, income available for fixed charges and depreciation amounting to $5,547,700 for the first seven months of 1922 against $4,345,680 in the corresponding period of last year. Fixed charges for 1922 should be earned more than twice over.

The Commonwealth Power Company operates in Michigan, Ohio, Indiana and Illinois, and at the present time has electric generating stations of 306,867 horsepower, of which 101,500 horsepower are hydro-electric. The gas plants have a capacity of approximately 30,000,000 cubic feet a day. Undeveloped water power resources aggregate about 200,000 horsepower. The $12,431,000 of 6 per cent. bonds, 1947, are secured by a pledge of $33,394,400 of stock representing control of five important subsidiary companies. The net earnings available for depreciation and dividends on the securities pledged amounted to $4,678,407 for the twelve months ended August 31, 1922. Annual interest requirements together with a sinking fund of $250,000 per year amount to $995,860 annually. The equity of the bonds outstanding increases year by year as a sinking fund operates.

The Consumers Power Company serves with gas and electricity a section of lower Michigan, having an estimated population of 775,000. The electric business has increased 168 per cent. within the last seven years and the gas business has increased 166 per cent. in the same period. About 84 per cent. of the net earnings are derived from the sale of electric current, over 66 per cent. of which is hydro-electric. For the twelve months ended September 30, 1922, net earnings available for interest charges on the bonded debt amounted to 3.15 times the requirement.

The Detroit Edison 1st ref. 5s, 1940, outstanding to the amount of $16,665,000, are secured jointly with $18,319,000 by a first lien on a new generating station at Detroit and by a lien on all other property subject to $10,000,000 of first 5s, 1933. Securities are deposited also as additional security. The plant investment is carried at over $86,000, 000. For the first nine months of 1922 a new high record of earnings applicable to bond interest and depreciation was established, amounting to $4,968,400 against $4,217,900 in the corresponding period of 1921. Interest charges are being earned about twice over.

The Hudson & Manhattan Railroad Company operates a dual system of tubes connecting New York City with Jersey City and Hoboken. The company is showing a consistent expansion in earning power, interest on the funded debt being covered about twice over at present. The $37,521,234 1st ref. 5s, 1957, are secured by mortgage on the entire property subject to $5,000,000 of prior lien bonds.

Laclede Gas Light ref. 5s, 1934, are outstanding to the amount of $10,000,000 and secured by first mortgage on all property and franchises which are carried at more than $40,000,000. This company has showed a remarkable recovery in earning power recently, earning its bond interest about one and three-fourths times over during the first six months of 1922, against only 88 per cent. of the requirement in 1921. Dividends were recently resumed on the common stock.

The Niagara Falls Power Cons. 6s, 1950, are outstanding to the amount of $10,000,000 and secured by mortgage on the entire operating company. Interest on the funded debt has been earned from two to two and one-half times over each year for several years.

The growth of Pacific Gas & Electric is substantial and consistent. As fast as it has grown the company has not been able to supply the demand. Interest charges were earned twice over in 1921 and about two and one-half times over in the first six months of this year. A large unit was recently put into operation which means a further gain in income.

The Philadelphia Company $20,000,000 of 1st ref. 6s, 1914, are secured by a first mortgage on properties and securities valued at $56,000,000 and further secured by liens on $41,000,000 additional property which is subject to $16,622,000 of underlying bonds. Interest on the funded debt has been earned from two and one-half times to four times over each year for the last ten years.

During the past three weeks, although the news has been generally favorable, the stock market has had a severe decline, with numerous issues suffering sharp breaks. This reaction has since been followed by a very good rally. However, if we analyze the situation, the market's behavior is not surprising. For about fourteen months security prices had steadily advanced with two minor interruptions, one in June and one in September, when recessions of about five points each occurred in the averages. Therefore, it is not necessary to look beyond the market itself for reasons for the present reaction.

Price movements, whether in stocks or commodities and whether upward or downward, never proceed uninterruptedly. Usually a bull market may be divided into two or more phases, separated by major reactions, each phase itself being punctuated by minor setbacks. The present decline in the averages has extended about eight and a half points and, if it proves to be the separating reaction between two periods of the bull market it may even go a bit farther. In view of the extended rise of the past year, a setback of, say, ten points more or less in the averages would be altogether normal and reasonable. This does not mean that all stocks will decline, for there are many issues whether either the advance has been moderate or there has been no distributive selling, and in such instances we may expect little or no recession or possibly a continuance of the rise, while the overbilled speculative leaders are dropping to a point where reaccumulation will take place.

The outlook for the bond and investment market has undergone a very real change. Price movements here are largely determined by the trend in interest rates; that is, as long as the latter declines bond prices rise and vice versa. Now, as the result of the enormous flotation of new securities during the past year and the steadily increasing demands of expanding industry for funds, the supply of money no longer exceeds the demand. It does not follow, though, that there shall immediately succeed a period of rising money rates

Sixty-five Sutter Street

BONDS

Ask to be placed on our mailing list for monthly circular and for data regarding various bond issues.

STEPHENS &amp; COMPANY

SAN FRANCISCO OAKLAND
Los Angeles San Diego

Long Term—Non-Callable
Income Tax Exempt
FLORENCE, ARIZONA
General Obligation 6% Bonds
to Yield 5.25%.
Ask for Circular

FREEMAN
SMITH
&
CAMP
CO.

SECOND FLOOR
FIRST NATIONAL BANK BLDG.
Douglas 2121

severely during the war period because gross income could not be expanded to cover the increase in operating costs, but the situation has been reversed and now wages and materials have declined and in almost every case the increase in rates, or at least a large part of it, has been retained. This means a gain in income and a decline in outgo with the result that the margin of safety on senior obligations has become wide, says Forbes Magazine.

Under the influence of increasing profits and

We offer
a limited number of
7 1/2% OREGON
BONDS

This is the current rate for farm mortgage loans in the state of Oregon

Secured by a First Mortgage on ranch property valued at nearly five times amount of bonds issued. Ask for information regarding

Jordan Valley Cattle Co.
Phone Sutter 334

G. E. MILLER &amp; COMPANY

105 Montgomery St. 229 First Nat. Bank Bldg.
SAN FRANCISCO OAKLAND

PORTLAND
SEATTLE

SAN FRANCISCO
LOS ANGELES

declining interest rates sound railroad and public utility bonds have advanced considerably, but in the case of the latter the advance generally has not discounted present conditions and many sound public utility bonds may be purchased to yield much higher than railroad bonds of a corresponding grade. The reason for this is that investors have not had their attention called as repeatedly to public utility bonds as to railroad bonds. In a great and falling bond prices. What is likely is that for many months we may see stabilization around the current levels.

The approach of another crisis in the German reparations question has resulted in a sharp decline in French and Belgian francs and bonds. Of course German marks also have descended to new depths, but for some time they have been so close to the zero point as to be scarcely entitled to the designation of money. However, there are signs that at

INVESTMENT SECURITIES

Government, Municipal and Corporation Bonds in denominations of $100, $500, and $1000 for the investment of Banks, Trust Funds, and Individual Investors. Inquiries Invited.

HUNTER, DULIN &amp; CO.

THE SECOND FLOOR—
256 MONTGOMERY ST.

Los Angeles San Francisco Oakland
Pasadena San Diego

last the Allies are beginning to realize that definite and concerted action must be taken, else Germany will reach the condition of Austria, from whom hopes of an indemnity have long since been abandoned.

Operations in the steel trade continue at about 70 per cent. capacity, which, although not sufficient to fully supply the demand, is most satisfactory in view of conditions as regards coal and cars. Last week's coal output was the largest since the termination of the strike, and there now seems little likelihood

McDONNELL &amp; Co.

And Other Leading Exchanges

633 Market St., at New Montgomery
SAN FRANCISCO
TELEPHONE SUTTER 7676
N. Y. Office, 120 Broadway
Los Angeles, 634 So. Spring St.

PRIVATE WIRES

CARSTENS &amp; EARLES, INCORPORATED

GOVERNMENT, MUNICIPAL
AND CORPORATION BONDS

ESTABLISHED 1891

Ground Floor

California Commercial Union Building
San Francisco

Telephone Douglas 6050

SEATTLE LOS ANGELES SPOKANE SAN FRANCISCO

Private Wires
Coast to Coast

E. F. Hutton &amp; Co.

MEMBERS
NEW YORK STOCK EXCHANGE
HUTTON BUILDING
Montgomery and Bush Sts.
HOTEL ST. FRANCIS
DEL MONTE HOTEL

The Oldest Bond House in California

Member of San Francisco Stock and Bond Exchange

E·H·ROLLINS·&·SONS
300 Montgomery Street, San Francisco
Telephone Kearny 3807

of scarcity during the coming winter, provided the railroads are able to distribute it.

Car loadings continue to show increase, and general industrial and commercial conditions and prospects throughout the country are very encouraging.—The Trader.

In no civilized country have recent events in England caused less excitement than in England. To outsiders, however, it came as a shock that the man who had rendered so great services to his country at a critical period in her history, who had furthermore would puzzle them would be that any one should have thought otherwise.

On the face of it, it surely seemed that the people of England had grown tired of Mr. Lloyd George. What they were really tired of were the consequences of the position he occupied. Subconsciously, they felt that he was being hampered in the work he was doing, and was being prevented from doing other and—to their minds—more important work by his associates. Illogical, as they have ever been, they attacked the man instead of the sources of his weakness.

English political parties, so far as principles go, may be compared to the dummies that dress the window of a storekeeper whose enterprise is ahead of his capital. The wrappings and labels represent nothing. The Conservative party owes it to the late Lord Beaconsfield that it is not conservative; the old Liberal (Whig) party died with the Duke of Devonshire of Gladstone's days, its place being taken by a motley crowd of political jugglers, styled Liberal or Radical as you please. The Labor party, at one time a serious competitor for office, is now a patchwork quilt, stained and frayed. The "Wizard of Wales" is responsible for its condition, a fact that explains labor's distrust of him. Its only hope is that he may decide to restore it, under his own guidance. At present it is divided into at least three camps, the trades unions, the "Free Labor" indeterminates, and the Socialists—the last a house divided against itself, comprising the Intellectuals, the Social Democrats, and the British Socialist party (a bunch of dreamers, hard drinkers, and Weary Willies).

The foreign policy of England will remain what it has been for centuries. Two things are of its essence today, the development of foreign trade and the maintenance of a hold on the East. The road through Asia Minor will be kept open, Constantinople will be balanced against Mesopotamia. The Turk will be kept strong enough to render futile any Russian designs, imperialist or bolshevist, but he will be watched. Both German and Russian friendship will be cultivated—for trade purposes. France will not be antagonized, if it can be prevented, but this is a risk that will be taken.

The general trade situation has developed in an orderly manner during the past month, without any exciting or disturbing features, says the National City Bank. The weak spot to which we alluded a month ago, to-wit: the relatively low prices of most agricultural products, has been strengthened by advances in grain, dairy products, and cotton, which sentimentally and practically are of great benefit. The railroads have been handling a volume of traffic closely approaching that of October, 1920, and above that of any other month on record. For the week ended October 14th the number of cars loaded with freight was 983,470, against 910,529 in the corresponding week of 1921, and 1,018,539 in the corresponding week of 1920. Undoubtedly car-loadings would be running above the 1920 figures if the railroads were able to handle the business offered. The movement of grain has been seriously hampered by lack of cars or motive power, with the result that spot grain in New York and Chicago has commanded a premium over the normal parity with country markets and over the future deliveries, a situation which has not existed since the fall of 1920. Country elevators are full, and unable to take farmers' deliveries. At the twelve leading Western primary markets receipts of all grains since July 1st have been less than last year, but more than in the corresponding period of 1920.

The production of coal has been below the capacity of the mines, partly from lack of cars and partly because of an indisposition of purchasers to accumulate stock on a falling market. The coal situation, however, is working easier, and consumers are so far getting what they need as fast as they require it.

The industries are generally active, with employment practically full and wages continuing to come into line on the higher level established last month. Retail trade in the industrial centres has improved, and is now running well over last year's figures. The iron and steel industry is operating at about 70 per cent. of capacity, and the congestion of orders is diminishing. The premiums for early deliveries are disappearing; the supply of pig iron is gaining on the demand, and the price is falling.

More construction work of an industrial character is being planned, particularly with a view to economical production. Orders for railroad cars and locomotives continue to be large, but sales of fabricated structural steel for September were the lowest for the building season, which is usually the case. The outlook for building operations next year is good.

Newport is the summer home of a large population, coming from Orange, Riverside, and San Bernardino counties, and also from Los Angeles. It has a permanent resident population of 1500, and the local fisheries are an industry of importance. It is on a branch line of the Southern Pacific from Santa Ana, and on the Pacific Electric Railway, which operates frequent trains. East Newport and Balboa are both embraced in the city limits of Newport Beach. Newport Beach has two banks and two public schools, with grammar and high school grades.

The Freeman, Smith & Camp Company are offering $60,000 City of Newport Beach, Cali-

Stocks • Bonds Cotton • Grain Commodities

STRASSBURGER
& COMPANY
133 Montgomery Street
San Francisco
TELEPHONE DOUGLAS 2220

Members
San Francisco Stock &
Bond Exchange and
Chicago Board of Trade

Private Wires to New
York & other leading
Eastern Financial and Commercial Centers

BONDS

$850,000

Fifth Street Building

First Mortgage 6% Gold Bonds

(Secured on a 99-Year Leasehold Estate)

Due Serially 1925-47

George H. Burr & Co.

KOHL BUILDING
SAN FRANCISCO

|              |             |           |
|--------------|-------------|-----------|
| NEW YORK     | LOS ANGELES | CLEVELAND |
| BOSTON       | ATLANTA     | DETROIT   |
| PHILADELPHIA | CHICAGO     | PITTSBURG |
| SCRANTON     | ST. LOUIS   | SEATTLE   |

"A National Yet Personal Service"

steered her safely through the scarcely less troubled waters of the post-war period, should, for no apparent cause, be "dismissed without a character," say Strassburger & Co. in the Review.

The English people remain undisturbed because they know that what they seem to have done, they have not done at all. Their confidence in the shock-headed little Welshman is greater than ever, and the only thing that

Government
Municipal and Corporation
Bonds

The less you have the less you can afford to lose

YOUR DUTY to yourself and family is to know how to invest wisely—to get the maximum income without hazard or speculation.

Many people think the other fellow's game is easier than their own and they pay high to find out that there may be some things about it they don't know.

What you and every investor want is good income and freedom from worry. To be sure of this you should thoroughly understand the few basic underlying principles of sound investment.

You should know, for instance, why bonds are the safest of all investments; why some bonds are much better for you than others.

Ten minutes of easy reading will prime you on these major points of sound investment. Don't be caught off your guard by not knowing. Send for WEALTH THAT ENDURES (just off the press), which explains briefly and interestingly the essential points of bond investment that everyone should know and understand.

Tear out this coupon—fill in and mail in envelope or paste on back of postcard

BRADFORD, KIMBALL & CO.
Insurance Exchange Building, San Francisco

I should like to have a free copy of this new reference booklet, WEALTH THAT ENDURES, sent without obligation to anyone interested in better and safer investment.

Name _____

Address _____

Our First Concern

WE are interested, first of all, in the excellence of the security behind any issue of bonds offered by us to investors. Then we are interested in securing for our clients the highest yield consistent with such security.

WM. R. STAATS CO.

Established 1887

Alexander Bldg., Montgomery St., cor. of Bush
SAN FRANCISCO
Telephone Kearny 301
LOS ANGELES SAN DIEGO PASADENA

INVESTMENT SECURITIES

COMMERCIAL PAPER
AND ACCEPTANCES
—
GOVERNMENT
MUNICIPAL
AND CORPORATION
BONDS

BOND & GOODWIN & TUCKER
